Since thou hast imparted this design to me, I bid thee hold thy hand, both from a wish to serve thee and because I would uphold the laws men make.

MEDEA

It cannot but be so; thy words I pardon since thou art not in the same sorry plight that I am.

LEADER

O lady, wilt thou steel thyself to slay thy children twain?

MEDEA

I will, for that will stab my husband to the heart.

LEADER

It may, but thou wilt be the saddest wife alive.

MEDEA

No matter; wasted is every word that comes 'twixt now and then. Ho! (The Nurse enters in answer to her call.) Thou, go call me Jason hither, for thee I do employ on every mission of trust. No word divulge of all my purpose, as thou art to thy mistress loyal and likewise of my sex. (The Nurse goes out.)

CHORUS

(singing, strophe 1)

Sons of Erechtheus, heroes happy from of yore, children of the blessed gods, fed on wisdom's glorious food in a holy land ne'er pillaged by its foes, ye who move with sprightly step through a climate ever bright and clear, where, as legend tells, the Muses nine, Pieria's holy maids, were brought to birth by Harmonia with the golden hair.

(antistrophe 1)

And poets sing how Cypris drawing water from the streams of fair-flowing Cephissus breathes o'er the land a gentle breeze of balmy winds, and ever as she crowns her tresses with a garland of sweet rose-buds sends forth the Loves to sit by wisdom's side, to take part in every excellence.

(strophe 2)

How then shall the city of sacred streams, the land that welcomes those it loves, receive thee, the murderess of thy children, thee whose presence with others is a pollution? 'Think on the murder of thy children, consider the bloody deed thou takest on thee. Nay, by thy knees we, one and all, implore thee, slay not thy babes.

(antistrophe 2)

Where shall hand or heart find hardihood enough in wreaking such a fearsome deed upon thy sons? How wilt thou look upon thy babes, and still without a tear retain thy bloody purpose? Thou canst not, when they fall at thy feet for mercy, steel thy heart and dip in their blood thy hand. (Jason enters.)

JASON

I am come at thy bidding, for e'en though thy hate for me is bitter thou shalt not fail in this small boon, but I will hear what new request thou hast to make of me, lady.

MEDEA

Jason, I crave thy pardon for the words I spoke, and well thou mayest brook my burst of passion, for ere now we twain have shared much love. For I have reasoned with my soul and railed upon me thus, "Ah! poor heart! why am I thus distraught, why so angered 'gainst all good advice, why have I come to hate the rulers of the land, my husband too, who does the best for me he can, in wedding with a princess and rearing for my children noble brothers? Shall I not cease to fret? What possesses me, when heaven its best doth offer? Have I not my children to consider? do I forget that we are fugitives, in need of friends?" When I had thought all this I saw how foolish I had been, how senselessly enraged. So now do commend thee and think thee most wise in forming this connection for us; but I was mad, I who should have shared in these designs, helped on thy plans, and lent my aid to bring about the match, only too pleased to wait upon thy bride. But what we are, we are, we women, evil I will not say; wherefore thou shouldst not sink to our sorry level nor with our weapons meet our childishness. I yield and do confess that I was wrong then, but now have I come to a better mind. Come hither, my children, come, leave the house, step forth, and with me greet and bid farewell to your father, be reconciled from all past bitterness unto your friends, as now your mother is; for we have made a truce and anger is no more. (The Attendant comes out of the house with the children.) Take his right hand; ah me! my sad fate! when I reflect, as now, upon the hidden future. O my children, since there awaits you even thus a long, long life, stretch forth the hand to take a fond farewell. Ah me! how new to tears am I, how full of fear! For now that I have at last released me from my quarrel with your father, I let the tear-drops stream adown my tender cheek.

LEADER OF THE CHORUS

From my eyes too bursts forth the copious tear; O, may no greater ill than the present e'er befall!

JASON

Lady, I praise this conduct, not that I blame what is past; for it is but natural to the female sex to vent their spleen against a husband when he trafficks in other marriages besides his own. But thy heart is changed to wiser schemes and thou art determined on the better course, late though it be; this is acting like a woman of sober sense. And for you, my sons, hath your father provided with all good heed a sure refuge, by God's grace; for ye, I trow, shall with your brothers share hereafter the foremost rank in this Corinthian realm. Only grow up, for all the rest your sire and whoso of the gods is kind to us is bringing to pass. May I see you reach man's full estate, high o'er the heads of those I hate! But thou, lady, why with fresh tears dost thou thine eyelids wet, turning away thy wan cheek, with no welcome for these my happy tidings?

MEDEA

'Tis naught; upon these children my thoughts were turned.

JASON

Then take heart; for I will see that it is well with them.

MEDEA

I will do so; nor will I doubt thy word; woman is a weak creature, ever given to tears.

JASON

Why prithe, unhappy one, dost moan o'er these children?

MEDEA

I gave them birth; and when thou didst pray long life for them, pity entered into my soul to think that these things must be. But the reason of thy coming hither to speak with me is partly told, the rest will I now mention. Since it is the pleasure of the rulers of the land to banish me, and well I know 'twere best for me to stand not in the way of thee or of the rulers by dwelling here, enemy as I am thought unto their house, forth from this land in exile am I going, but these children,-that they may know thy fostering hand, beg Creon to remit their banishment.

JASON

I doubt whether I can persuade him, yet must I attempt it.

MEDEA

At least do thou bid thy wife ask her sire this boon, to remit the exile of the children from this land.

JASON

Yea, that will I; and her methinks I shall persuade, since she is woman like the rest.

MEDEA

I too will aid thee in this task, for by the children's hand I will send to her gifts that far surpass in beauty, I well know, aught that now is seen 'mongst men, a robe of finest tissue and a chaplet of chased gold. But one of my attendants must haste and bring the ornaments hither. (A servant goes into the house.) Happy shall she be not once alone but ten thousand-fold, for in thee she wins the noblest soul to share her love, and gets these gifts as well which on a day my father's sire, the Sun-god, bestowed on his descendants. (The servant returns and hands the gifts to the children.) My children, take in your hands these wedding gifts, and bear them as an offering to the royal maid, the happy bride; for verily the gifts she shall receive are not to be scorned.

JASON

But why so rashly rob thyself of these gifts? Dost think a royal palace wants for robes or gold? Keep them, nor give them to another. For well I know that if my lady hold me in esteem, she will set my price above all wealth.

MEDEA

Say not so; 'tis said that gifts tempt even gods; and o'er men's minds gold holds more potent sway than countless words. Fortune smiles upon thy bride, and heaven now doth swell her triumph; youth is hers and princely power; yet to save my children from exile I would barter life, not dress alone. Children, when we are come to the rich palace, pray your father's new bride, my mistress, with suppliant voice to save you from exile, offering her these ornaments the while; for it is most needful that she receive the gifts in her own hand. Now go and linger not; may ye succeed and to your mother bring back the glad tidings she fain would hear (Jason, the Attendant, and the children go out together.)

CHORUS

(singing, strophe 1)

Gone, gone is every hope I had that the children yet might live; forth to their doom they now proceed. The hapless bride will take, ay, take the golden crown that is to be her ruin; with her own hand will she lift and place upon her golden locks the garniture of death.

(antistrophe 1)

Its grace and sheen divine will tempt her to put on the robe and crown of gold, and in that act will she deck herself to be a bride amid the dead. Such is the snare whereinto she will fall, such is the deadly doom that waits the hapless maid, nor shall she from the curse escape.

(strophe 2)

And thou, poor wretch, who to thy sorrow art wedding a king's daughter, little thinkest of the doom thou art bringing on thy children's life, or of the cruel death that waits thy bride. Woe is thee! how art thou fallen from thy high estate!

(antistrophe 2)

Next do I bewail thy sorrows, O mother hapless in thy children, thou who wilt slay thy babes because thou hast a rival, the babes thy husband hath deserted impiously to join him to another bride. (The Attendant enters with the children.)

ATTENDANT

Thy children, lady, are from exile freed, and gladly did the royal bride accept thy gifts in her own hands, and so thy children made their peace with her.

MEDEA

Ah!

ATTENDANT

Why art so disquieted in thy prosperous hour? Why turnest thou thy cheek away, and hast no welcome for my glad news?

MEDEA

Ah me!

ATTENDANT

These groans but ill accord with the news I bring.

MEDEA

Ah me! once more I say.

ATTENDANT

Have I unwittingly announced some evil tidings? Have I erred in thinking my news was good?

MEDEA

Thy news is as it is; I blame thee not.

ATTENDANT

Then why this downcast eye, these floods of tears?

MEDEA

Old friend, needs must I weep; for the gods and I with fell intent devised these schemes.

ATTENDANT

Be of good cheer; thou too of a surety shalt by thy sons yet be brought home again.

MEDEA

Ere that shall I bring others to their home, ah! woe is me

ATTENDANT

Thou art not the only mother from thy children reft. Bear patiently thy troubles as a mortal must.

MEDEA

I will obey; go thou within the house and make the day's provision for the children. (The Attendant enters the house. Medea turns to the children.) O my babes, my babes, ye have still a city and a home, where far from me and my sad lot you will live your lives, reft of your mother for ever; while I must to another land in banishment, or ever I have had my joy of you, or lived to see you happy, or ever I have graced your marriage couch, your bride, your bridal bower, or lifted high the wedding torch. Ah me! a victim of my own self-will. So it was all in vain I reared you, O my sons; in vain did suffer, racked with anguish, enduring the cruel pangs of childbirth. 'Fore Heaven I once had hope, poor me! high hope of ye that you would nurse me in my age and deck my corpse with loving hands, a boon we mortals covet; but now is my sweet fancy dead and gone; for I must lose you both and in bitterness and sorrow drag through life. And ye shall never with fond eyes see your mother more for o'er your life there comes a change. Ah me! ah me! why do ye look at me so, my children? why smile that last sweet smile? Ah me! what am I to do? My heart gives way when I behold my children's laughing eyes. O, I cannot; farewell to all my former schemes; I will take the children from the land, the babes I bore. Why should I wound their sire by wounding them, and get me a twofold measure of sorrow? No, no, I will not do it. Farewell my scheming! And yet what possesses me? Can I consent to let those foes of mine escape from punishment, and incur their mockery? I must face this deed. Out upon my craven heart! to think that I should even have let the soft words escape my soul. Into the house, children! (The children go into the house.) And whoso feels he must not be present at my sacrifice, must see to it himself; I will not spoil my handiwork. Ah! ah! do not, my heart, O do not do this deed! Let the children go, unhappy one, spare the babes! For if they live, they will cheer thee in our exile there. Nay, by the fiends of hell's abyss, never, never will I hand my children over to their foes to mock and flout. Die they must in any case, and since 'tis so, why I, the mother who bore them, will give the fatal blow. In any case their doom is fixed and there is no escape. Already the crown is on her head, the robe is round her, and she is dying, the royal bride; that do I know full well. But now since I have a piteous path to tread, and yet more piteous still the path I send my children on, fain would I say farewell to them. (The children come out at her call. She takes them in her arms.) O my babes, my babes, let your mother kiss your hands. Ah! hands I love so well, O lips most dear to me! O noble form and features of my children, I wish ye joy, but in that other land, for here your father robs you of your home. O the sweet embrace, the soft young cheek, the fragrant breath! my children! Go, leave me; I cannot bear to longer look upon ye; my sorrow wins the day. At last I understand the awful deed I am to do; but passion, that cause of direst woes to mortal man, hath triumphed o'er my sober thoughts. (She goes into the house with the children.)

CHORUS

(chanting) Oft ere now have I pursued subtler themes and have faced graver issues than woman's sex should seek to probe; but then e'en we aspire to culture, which dwells with us to teach us wisdom; I say not all; for small is the class amongst women-(one maybe shalt thou find 'mid many)-that is not incapable of wisdom. And amongst mortals I do assert that they who are wholly without experience and have never had children far surpass in happiness those who are parents. The childless, because they have never proved whether children grow up to be a blessing or curse to men are removed from all share in many troubles; whilst those who have a sweet race of children growing up in their houses do wear away, as I perceive, their whole life through; first with the thought how they may train them up in virtue, next how they shall leave their sons the means to live; and after all this 'tis far from clear whether on good or bad children they bestow their toil. But one last crowning woe for every mortal man now will name; suppose that they have found sufficient means to live, and seen their children grow to man's estate and walk in virtue's path, still if fortune so befall, comes Death and bears the children's bodies off to Hades. Can it be any profit to the gods to heap upon us mortal men beside our other woes this further grief for children lost, a grief surpassing all? (Medea comes out of the house.)

MEDEA

Kind friends, long have I waited expectantly to know how things would at the palace chance. And lo! I see one of Jason's servants coming hither, whose hurried gasps for breath proclaim him the bearer of some fresh tidings. (A Messenger rushes in.)

MESSENGER

Fly, fly, Medea! who hast wrought an awful deed, transgressing every law: nor leave behind or sea-borne bark or car that scours the plain.

MEDEA

Why, what hath chanced that calls for such a flight of mine?

MESSENGER

The princess is dead, a moment gone, and Creon too, her sire, slain by those drugs of thine.

MEDEA

Tidings most fair are thine! Henceforth shalt thou be ranked amongst my friends and benefactors.

MESSENGER

Ha! What? Art sane? Art not distraught, lady, who hearest with joy the outrage to our royal house done, and art not at the horrid tale afraid?

MEDEA

Somewhat have I, too, to say in answer to thy words. Be not so hasty, friend, but tell the manner of their death, for thou wouldst give me double joy, if so they perished miserably.

MESSENGER

When the children twain whom thou didst bear came with their father and entered the palace of the bride, right glad were we thralls who had shared thy griefs, for instantly from ear to ear a rumour spread that thou and thy lord had made up your former quarrel. One kissed thy children's hands, another their golden hair, while I for very joy went with them in person to the women's chambers. Our mistress, whom now we do revere in thy room, cast a longing glance at Jason, ere she saw thy children twain; but then she veiled her eyes and turned her blanching cheek away, disgusted at their coming; but thy husband tried to check his young bride's angry humour with these words: "O, be not angered 'gainst thy friends; cease from wrath and turn once more thy face this way, counting as friends whomso thy husband counts, and accept these gifts, and for my sake crave thy sire to remit these children's exile." Soon as she saw the ornaments, no longer she held out, but yielded to her lord in all; and ere the father and his sons were far from the palace gone, she took the broided robe and put it on, and set the golden crown about her tresses, arranging her hair at her bright mirror, with many a happy smile at her breathless counterfeit. Then rising from her seat she passed across the chamber, tripping lightly on her fair white foot, exulting in the gift, with many a glance at her uplifted ankle. When lo! a scene of awful horror did ensue. In a moment she turned pale, reeled backwards, trembling in every limb, and sinks upon a seat scarce soon enough to save herself from falling to the ground. An aged dame, one of her company, thinking belike it was a fit from Pan or some god sent, raised a cry of prayer, till from her mouth she saw the foam-flakes issue, her eyeballs rolling in their sockets, and all the blood her face desert; then did she raise a loud scream far different from her former cry. Forthwith one handmaid rushed to her father's house, another to her new bridegroom to tell his bride's sad fate, and the whole house echoed with their running to and fro. By this time would a quick walker have made the turn in a course of six plethra and reached the goal, when she with one awful shriek awoke, poor sufferer, from her speechless trance and oped her closed eyes, for against her a twofold anguish was warring. The chaplet of gold about her head was sending forth a wondrous stream of ravening flame, while the fine raiment, thy children's gift, was preying on the hapless maiden's fair white flesh; and she starts from her seat in a blaze and seeks to fly, shaking her hair and head this way and that, to cast the crown therefrom; but the gold held firm to its fastenings, and the flame, as she shook her locks, blazed forth the more with double fury. Then to the earth she sinks, by the cruel blow overcome; past all recognition now save to a father's eye; for her eyes had lost their tranquil gaze, her face no more its natural look preserved, and from the crown of her head blood and fire in mingled stream ran down; and from her bones the flesh kept peeling off beneath the gnawing of those secret drugs, even as when the pine-tree weeps its tears of pitch, a fearsome sight to see. And all were afraid to touch the corpse, for we were warned by what had chanced. Anon came her hapless father unto the house, all unwitting of her doom, and stumbles over the dead, and loud he cried, and folding his arms about her kissed her, with words like these the while, "O my poor, poor child, which of the gods hath destroyed thee thus foully? Who is robbing me of thee, old as I am and ripe for death? O my child, alas! would I could die with thee!" He ceased his sad lament, and would have raised his aged frame, but found himself held fast by the fine-spun robe as ivy that clings to the branches of the bay, and then ensued a fearful struggle. He strove to rise, but she still held him back; and if ever he pulled with all his might, from off his bones his aged flesh he tore. At last he gave it up, and breathed forth his soul in awful suffering; for he could no longer master the pain. So there they lie, daughter and aged sire, dead side by side, a grievous sight that calls for tears. And as for thee, I leave thee out of my consideration, for thyself must discover a means to escape punishment. Not now for the first time I think this human life a shadow; yea, and without shrinking I will say that they amongst men who pretend to wisdom and expend deep thought on words do incur a serious charge of folly; for amongst mortals no man is happy; wealth may pour in and make one luckier than another, but none can happy be. (The Messenger departs.)

LEADER OF THE CHORUS

This day the deity, it seems, will mass on Jason, as he well deserves, heavy load of evils. Woe is thee, daughter of Creon We pity thy sad fate, gone as thou art to Hades' halls as the price of thy marriage with Jason.

MEDEA

My friends, I am resolved upon the deed; at once will I slay my children and then leave this land, without delaying long enough to hand them over to some more savage hand to butcher. Needs must they die in any case; and since they must, I will slay them-I, the mother that bare them. O heart of mine, steel thyself! Why do I hesitate to do the awful deed that must be done? Come, take the sword, thou wretched hand of mine! Take it, and advance to the post whence starts thy life of sorrow! Away with cowardice! Give not one thought to thy babes, how dear they are or how thou art their mother. This one brief day forget thy children dear, and after that lament; for though thou wilt slay them yet they were thy darlings still, and I am a lady of sorrows. (Medea enters the house.)

CHORUS

(chanting) O earth, O sun whose beam illumines all, look, look upon this lost woman, ere she stretch forth her murderous hand upon her sons for blood; for lo! these are scions of thy own golden seed, and the blood of gods is in danger of being shed by man. O light, from Zeus proceeding, stay her, hold her hand, forth from the house chase this fell bloody fiend by demons led. Vainly wasted were the throes thy children cost thee; vainly hast thou borne, it seems, sweet babes, O thou who hast left behind thee that passage through the blue Symplegades, that strangers justly hate. Ah! hapless one, why doth fierce anger thy soul assail? Why in its place is fell murder growing up? For grievous unto mortal men are pollutions that come of kindred blood poured on the earth, woes to suit each crime hurled from heaven on the murderer's house.

FIRST SON

(within) Ah, me; what can I do? Whither fly to escape my mother's blows?

SECOND SON

(within) I know not, sweet brother mine; we are lost.

CHORUS

(chanting) Didst hear, didst hear the children's cry? O lady, born to sorrow, victim of an evil fate! Shall I enter the house? For the children's sake I am resolved to ward off the murder.

FIRST SON

(within) Yea, by heaven I adjure you; help, your aid is needed.

(within) Even now the toils of the sword are closing round us.

CHORUS

(chanting) O hapless mother, surely thou hast a heart of stone or steel to slay the offspring of thy womb by such a murderous doom. Of all the wives of yore I know but one who laid her hand upon her children dear, even Ino, whom the gods did madden in the day that the wife of Zeus drove her wandering from her home. But she, poor sufferer, flung herself into the sea because of the foul murder of her children, leaping o'er the wave-beat cliff, and in her death was she united to her children twain. Can there be any deed of horror left to follow this? Woe for the wooing of women fraught with disaster! What sorrows hast thou caused for men ere now! (Jason and his attendants enter.)

JASON

Ladies, stationed near this house, pray tell me is the author of these hideous deeds, Medea, still within, or hath she fled from hence? For she must hide beneath the earth or soar on wings towards heaven's vault, if she would avoid the vengeance of the royal house. Is she so sure she will escape herself unpunished from this house, when she hath slain the rulers of the land? But enough of this! I am forgetting her children. As for her, those whom she hath wronged will do the like by her; but I am come to save the children's life, lest the victim's kin visit their wrath on me, in vengeance for the murder foul, wrought by my children's mother.

LEADER OF THE CHORUS

Unhappy man, thou knowest not the full extent of thy misery, else had thou never said those words.

JASON

How now? Can she want to kill me too?

LEADER

Thy sons are dead; slain by their own mother's hand.

JASON

O God! what sayest thou? Woman, thou hast sealed my doom.

LEADER

Thy children are no more; be sure of this.

JASON

Where slew she them; within the palace or outside?

LEADER

Throw wide the doors and see thy children's murdered corpses.

JASON

Haste, ye slaves, loose the bolts, undo the fastenings, that I may see the sight of twofold woe, my murdered sons and her, whose blood in vengeance I will shed. Medea appears above the house, on a chariot drawn by dragons; the children's corpses are beside her.)

MEDEA

Why shake those doors and attempt to loose their bolts, in quest of the dead and me their murderess? From such toil desist. If thou wouldst aught with me, say on, if so thou wilt; but never shalt thou lay hand on me, so swift the steeds the sun, my father's sire, to me doth give to save me from the hand of my foes.

JASON

Accursed woman! by gods, by me and all mankind abhorred as never woman was, who hadst the heart to stab thy babes, thou their mother, leaving me undone and childless; this hast thou done and still dost gaze upon the sun and earth after this deed most impious. Curses on thee! now perceive what then I missed in the day I brought thee, fraught with doom, from thy home in a barbarian land to dwell in Hellas, traitress to thy sire and to the land that nurtured thee. On me the gods have hurled the curse that dogged thy steps, for thou didst slay thy brother at his hearth ere thou cam'st aboard our fair ship, Argo. Such was the outset of thy life of crime; then didst thou wed with me, and having borne me sons to glut thy passion's lust, thou now hast slain them. Not one amongst the wives of Hellas e'er had dared this deed; yet before them all I chose thee for my wife, wedding a foe to be my doom, no woman, but a lioness fiercer than Tyrrhene Scylla in nature. But with reproaches heaped thousandfold I cannot wound thee, so brazen is thy nature. Perish, vile sorceress, murderess of thy babes! Whilst I must mourn my luckless fate, for I shall ne'er enjoy my new-found bride, nor shall I have the children, whom I bred and reared, alive to say the last farewell to me; nay, I have lost them.

MEDEA

To this thy speech I could have made a long reply, but Father Zeus knows well all I have done for thee, and the treatment thou hast given me. Yet thou wert not ordained to scorn my love and lead a life of joy in mockery of me, nor was thy royal bride nor Creon, who gave thee a second wife, to thrust me from this land and rue it not. Wherefore, if thou wilt, call me e'en a lioness, and Scylla, whose home is in the Tyrrhene land; for I in turn have wrung thy heart, as well I might.

JASON

Thou, too, art grieved thyself, and sharest in my sorrow.

MEDEA

Be well assured I am; but it relieves my pain to know thou canst not mock at me.

JASON

O my children, how vile a mother ye have found!

MEDEA

My sons, your father's feeble lust has been your ruin!

JASON

'Twas not my hand, at any rate, that slew them.

MEDEA

No, but thy foul treatment of me, and thy new marriage.

JASON

Didst think that marriage cause enough to murder them?

MEDEA

Dost think a woman counts this a trifling injury?

JASON

So she be self-restrained; but in thy eyes all is evil.

MEDEA

Thy sons are dead and gone. That will stab thy heart.

JASON

They live, methinks, to bring a curse upon thy head.

MEDEA

The gods know, whoso of them began this troublous coil.

Medea

JASON

Indeed, they know that hateful heart of thine.

MEDEA

Thou art as hateful. I am weary of thy bitter tongue.

JASON

And I likewise of thine. But parting is easy.

MEDEA

Say how; what am I to do? for I am fain as thou to go.

JASON

Give up to me those dead, to bury and lament.

MEDEA

No, never! I will bury them myself, bearing them to Hera's sacred field, who watches o'er the Cape, that none of their foes may insult them by pulling down their tombs; and in this land of Sisyphus I will ordain hereafter a solemn feast and mystic rites to atone for this impious murder. Myself will now to the land of Erechtheus, to dwell with Aegeus, Pandion's son. But thou, as well thou mayst, shalt die a caitiff's death, thy head crushed 'neath a shattered relic of Argo, when thou hast seen the bitter ending of my marriage.

JASON

The curse of our sons' avenging spirit and of justice, that calls for blood, be on thee!

MEDEA

What god or power divine hears thee, breaker of oaths and every law of hospitality?

JASON

Fie upon thee! cursed witch! child-murderess!

MEDEA

To thy house! go, bury thy wife.

JASON

I go, bereft of both my sons.

MEDEA

Thy grief is yet to come; wait till old age is with thee too.

JASON

O my dear, dear children!

MEDEA

Dear to their mother, not to thee.

JASON

And yet thou didst slay them?

MEDEA

Yea, to vex thy heart.

JASON

One last fond kiss, ah me! I fain would on their lips imprint.

MEDEA

Embraces now, and fond farewells for them; but then a cold repulse!

JASON

By heaven I do adjure thee, let me touch their tender skin.

MEDEA

No, no! in vain this word has sped its flight.

JASON

O Zeus, dost hear how I am driven hence; dost mark the treatment I receive from this she-lion, fell murderess of her young? Yet so far as I may and can, I raise for them a dirge, and do adjure the gods to witness how thou hast slain my sons, and wilt not suffer me to embrace or bury their dead bodies. Would I had never begotten them to see thee slay them after all! (The chariot carries Medea away.)

CHORUS

(chanting) Many a fate doth Zeus dispense, high on his Olympian throne; oft do the gods bring things to pass beyond man's expectation; that, which we thought would be, is not fulfilled, while for the unlooked-for god finds out a way; and such hath been the issue of this matter.

The End

OEDIPUS THE KING

Sophocles (ca. 496-ca. 406 B.C.E.)

Composed ca. 429-420 B.C.E.

Greece

Although Sophocles wrote over one hundred plays, only seven survive. In competitions during religious festivals for Dionysus, which required three playwrights to present three dramatic plays each (plus a farce), Sophocles won first place at least twenty times; the rest of the time, he came in second (never third). Greek plays previously had a chorus and one actor on stage; Aeschylus (ca. 525-456) introduced the idea of a second actor, while Sophocles was the first to have three actors, plus painted scenery as a backdrop for the action. Masks allowed the (all male) actors to portray men, women, children, and gods without confusion. Since the stories were familiar to the audience, the popularity of Sophocles stems from his clever wordplay and insightful grasp of psychology. The three plays that cover the story of Oedipus and his family are referred to as the Theban cycle, although they were written for different competitions over 36 years of his career: Antigone, which was written first, but chronologically is the last story; Oedipus Tyrannos (or just Oedipus), which was written second, but chronologically is the first story; and Oedipus at Colonus, which was written last, but chronologically is the second story. Oedipus begins in medias res, with the city of Thebes suffering from a plague; as the king, Oedipus is trying to discover why the gods are punishing the city.

OEDIPUS TYRANNUS

OEDIPUS

My children—you most recently reared from ancient Cadmus—
 Why do you hasten to these seats
 Wreathed in suppliant branches?
 Since the citadel is filled with incense,
 Chants and lamentations 5
 I did not deem it fitting, my children, to hear
 The report of some messenger—so I come here myself:
 I, Oedipus the renowned, who is respected by you all.
 As you, Elder, are distinguished by nature,
 You should speak for these others. Is your manner 10
 One of fear or affection? My will is to assist you
 For I would be indifferent to pain
 Were I not to have pity after such a supplication as this.

PRIEST

Oedipus, master of my land:
 You see how many sit here 15
 Before your altars—some not yet robust enough
 To fly far; some heavy as I, Priest of Zeus, with age;
 And these, chosen from our unmarried youth.
 Enwreathed like them, our people sit in the place of markets,
 By the twin shrines of Pallas 20
 And by the embers of the Ismenian oracle.
 Our clan, as you yourself behold, already heaves
 Too much—its head bent
 To the depths bloodily heaving. 25
 Decay is in the unfruitful seeds in the soil,
 Decay is in our herds of cattle—our women
 Are barren or abort, and that god of fever
 Swoops down to strike our clan with an odious plague,
 Emptying the abode of Cadmus and giving dark Hades
 An abundance of wailing and lamentation. 30
 Not as an equal of the gods do I,
 And these children who sit by your altar, behold you—
 But as the prime man in our problems of life
 And in our dealings and agreements with daimons.
 You arrived at our town of Cadmus to disentangle us 35
 From the tax we paid to that harsh Songstress—
 And that with less than we knew because Without our experience. Rather—and it is the custom
 To say this—you had the support of a god
 And so made our lives to prosper. 40
 Thus, Oedipus—you, the most noble of all—
 We all as suppliants beseech you
 To find us a defence, whether it be from a god's oracle
 Or whether it be learnt from some man.
 For those who are practical are, by events, 45
 Seen to give counsels which are the most effective.

Most noble among mortals—restore our clan!
 But—be cautious. For now this land of yours
 Names you their protector for your swiftness before—
 Do not let it be recorded of your leadership 50
 That you raised us up again only to let us thereafter fall:
 So make us safe, and restore our clan.
 Favourable—then—the omens, and prosperity
 You brought us: be of the same kind, again!
 For, in commanding a land, as you are master of this, 55
 It is much better to be master of men than of an emptiness!
 Of no value are a ship or a defensive tower
 If they are empty because no men dwell within them.

OEDIPUS

You, my children, who lament—I know, for I am not without knowledge,
 Of the desire which brings you here. For well do I see 60
 All your sufferings—and though you suffer, it is I
 And not one of you that suffers the most.
 For your pain comes to each of you
 By itself, with nothing else, while my psyche
 Mourns for myself, for you and the clan. 65
 You have not awakened me from a resting sleep
 For indeed you should know of my many tears
 And the many paths of reflection I have wandered upon and tried.
 And, as I pondered, I found one cure
 Which I therefore took. The son of Menoeceus, 70
 Creon—he who is my kin by marriage—I have sent to that Pythian dwelling
 Of Phoebus to learn how I
 By word or deed can give deliverance to the clan.
 But I have already measured the duration
 And am concerned: for where is he? He is longer than expected 75
 For his absence is, in duration, greater than is necessary.
 Yet when he does arrive, it would dishonourable
 For me not to act upon all that the gods makes clear.

PRIEST

It is fitting that you spoke thus—for observe that now
 We are signalled that Creon is approaching. 80

OEDIPUS

Lord Apollo! Let our fate be such
 That we are saved—and as bright as his face now is!

PRIEST

I conjecture it is pleasing since he arrives with his head crowned
 By laurel wreaths bearing many berries.

OEDIPUS

Soon we will know, for, in distance, he can hear us now. 85
[Enter Creon]

Lord—son of Menoeceus—my kin by marriage:
 Give to us the saying you received from the god!

CREON

It is propitious, for I call it fortunate when what is difficult to bear
 Is taken from us, enabling us thus to prosper again.

	OEDIPUS
But what is it? I am not given more courage Nor more fear by your words.		90
	CREON
Do you insist upon hearing it here, Within reach of these others—or shall we go within?
	OEDIPUS
Speak it to all. For my concern for their suffering Is more than even that for my own psyche.		95
	CREON
Then I shall speak to you what I heard from the god. The command of Lord Phoebus was clear— That defilement nourished by our soil Must be driven away, not given nourishment until it cannot be cured.
	OEDIPUS
When came this misfortune? How to be cleansed?		100
	CREON
Banishment of a man—or a killing in return for the killing To release us from the blood and thus this tempest upon our clan.
	OEDIPUS
What man is thus fated to be so denounced?
	CREON
My Lord, Laius was the Chief Of this land, before you guided us.		105
	OEDIPUS
That I have heard and know well although I never saw him.
	CREON
Because he was slaughtered it is clearly ordered that you Must punish the killing hands, whosoever they are.
	OEDIPUS
But are they in this land? Can we still find The now faded marks of the ancient tracks of those so accused?		110
	CREON
Still in our land, he said. What is sought Can be caught, but will escape if not attended to.
	OEDIPUS
Was Laius in his dwelling, in his fields, Or in another land when he met his death?
	CREON
He said he was journeying to a shrine: But, having gone, he did not return.		115
	OEDIPUS

Was there no messenger, no other with him
Who saw anything and whom we could consult and thus learn from?

CREON

No—killed: all of them. Except one who fled in fear
And so saw nothing except the one thing he did speak of seeing. 120

OEDIPUS

What? One thing may help us learn many more
And such a small beginning may bring us hope.

CREON

He announced that robbers came upon them and, there being so many,
In their strength slew them with their many hands.

OEDIPUS

How could robbers do that? Unless—unless silver 125
Was paid to them, from here! Otherwise, they would not have the courage!

CREON

Such was the opinion. But with Laius killed
No one arose to be his avenger since we had other troubles.

OEDIPUS

What troubles were before you that with your King fallen 130
You were kept from looking?

CREON

The convoluted utterances of the Sphinx made us consider what was before us
And leave unknown what was dark.

OEDIPUS

Then, as a start, I shall go back to make it visible.
It is fitting for Phoebus, and fitting also for you
For the sake of him dead, to return your concern there 135
And fair that I am seen as an ally
In avenging this land and the god.

Yet not in the name of remote kin
But for myself will I banish the abomination
Since that person who killed may—and soon— 140
And by his own hand, wish to avenge me.

Thus in this way by so giving aid, I also benefit myself.
Now and swiftly, my children, stand up from these steps—
Raising your suppliant branches—
And go to summon here the people of Cadmus 145

For I shall do all that is required. Either good fortune—
If the gods wills—will be shown to be ours, or we shall perish.
[Exit Oedipus]

PRIEST

Stand, children, for that favour
For which we came he has announced he will do.
May Phoebus—who delivered this oracle— 150
Be our Saviour and cause our suffering to cease.
[Exit Priest. Enter Chorus]

CHORUS

Zeus—your pleasing voice has spoken
 But in what manner from gold-rich Pytho do you come
 To the splendour that is Thebes?
 My reason is stretched by dread as fear shakes me— 155
 O Delian Paeon I invoke you!—
 And I am in awe. For is this new
 Or the continuation of that obligation
 Which each season brings again?
 Speak to me with your divine voice, 160
 You born from she whom we treasure—our Hope!
 You I shall name first—you the daughter of Zeus, the divine Athene!
 And then you, her sister, who defends our lands—Artemis!—
 Whose illustrious throne is the circle of our market.
 And you, Phoebus with your far-reaching arrows! 165
 You—the triad who guard us from death! Appear to me!
 When misfortune moved over our clan before
 You came to completely drive away that injuring fire—
 So now come to us, again!
 Beyond count are the injuries I bear 170
 And all my comrades are sick;
 There is no spear of thought to defend us—
 The offspring of our fertile soil do not grow
 While at the birth there are no cries of joy
 For the women stretched by their labour: 175
 I behold one after another rushing forth—swifter than feathered birds,
 Swifter than invincible fire—
 Toward the land of the twilight god!
 They are beyond count and make the clan to die:
 For her descendants lie unpitied, unmourned on the ground 180
 Condemning others to death
 As both the child-less and the mothers gather
 Around the base of the altars
 To labour as suppliants with their injurious laments
 Although clear are the hymns to the Healer 185
 Above those accompanying wailing voices!
 In answer, you whom we hold precious—daughter of Zeus—
 Send us She of strength with the beautiful eyes!
 Grant that fiery Ares—he who fights not with shield of bronze
 But who burns as he encircles with his battle-cry— 190
 Turns around to swiftly run back, away from our fatherland
 With a fair wind following, to that great Chamber of Amphitrite
 Or to that Thracian harbour where strangers are dashed,
 Since what he neglects at night He achieves when day arrives.
 Thus—you who carry fire, 195
 Who bestows the power of lighting—
 All-father Zeus: waste him beneath your thunder!
 Lord Lyceus! From your gold-bound bowstring
 I wish you to deal out the hardest of your arrows
 So they rise before us as a defence! 200
 And you—Artemis—who by your gleaming light
 Rushes through the mountains of Lycia.
 And you of the golden mitre whose name
 Is that of our land—I invoke you
 Ruddied Bacchus with E-U-O-I!— 205

With your roaming Maenads
 Come near to us with your blazing pine-torch
 And gleaming eyes, to be our ally
 Against that god given no honour by gods!
 [Enter Oedipus]

OEDIPUS

You ask and what you ask will come— 210
 For if you in your sickness listen and accept and assist me
 You shall receive the strength to lift you out of this trouble.
 I here make the declaration even though I am a stranger to that report
 And a stranger to that deed. I, myself, would not have delayed
 Tracking this, even had there been no signs. 215
 But since it was after these things I became a tax-paying citizen among you citizens,
 I proclaim this now to all who are of Cadmus:
 Whosoever, concerning Laius son of Labdacus,
 Knows the man who killed him
 I command him to declare everything to me. 220
 But if he is afraid, he can himself remove the accusation
 Against him since what awaits him
 Shall not be hostile since he shall pass uninjured to another land.
 But if you know of another from another region
 Whose hand did it, do not be silent 225
 For I shall reward and confer favours upon you.
 But if you keep silent because he is your own kin
 Or because you yourself are afraid and so reject this—
 Then hear what I of necessity must do.
 I forbid that man, whoever he is, to be in this land— 230
 This land where I have power and authority:
 No one is to receive him nor speak to him;
 Neither is he to share in your offering thanks to the gods,
 Nor in the sacrifices or in the libations before them.
 Instead, everyone shall push him away—for our defilement 235
 Is, in truth, him: as the Pythian god
 By his oracle just now announced to me.
 Thus in such a way do I and this god
 And the man who was killed become allies—
 And so this pact I make concerning he who did that deed 240
 Whether alone or together with others in secret:
 Being ignoble, may his miserable life ignobly waste away.
 And I also make this pact—that should he arrive at my dwelling
 And with my consent stay by my hearth, then may that disease
 I desired for those ones come to me! 245
 So I command you to accomplish this
 On behalf of me, the god and this land
 Now barren, lain waste and without gods.
 For even had no god sent you to deal with this matter
 It would not have been fitting to leave it uncleaned 250
 For the man killed was both brave and your own lord:
 You should have enquired. However, I now have the authority
 And hold the command that was his,
 And now possess his chambers and his woman—seeded by us both—
 And by whom we might have children shared in common had that family 255
 Not had its misfortune and thus there had been a birth:
 But it was not to be, for fate bore down upon him.

Thus, I—as if he were my own father— Will fight for him and will go to any place To search for and to seize the one whose hand killed That son of Labdacus—he of Polydorus, Of Cadmus before that and before then of ancient Agenor. As to those who do not do this for me, I ask the god That the seeds they sow in the earth shall not bring forth shoots Nor their women children, and also that it be their destiny To be destroyed by this thing—or one that is much worse. But as for you others, of Cadmus, to whom this is pleasing— May the goddess, Judgement, who is on our side, And all of the gods, be with us forever.	260
Bound by your oath, my Lord, I speak: I am not the killer—nor can I point out he who did the killing. It is he who sent us on this search— Phoebus—who should say who did that work.	270
OEDIPUS
That would be fair. But to compel the gods Against their will is not within the power of any man.	275
CHORUS
Shall I speak of what I consider is the second best thing to do?
OEDIPUS
Do not neglect to explain to me even what is third!
CHORUS
He who sees the most of what Lord Phoebus knows Is Lord Tiresias—and it is from his watching, and clearness, My Lord, that we might learn the most.	280
OEDIPUS
I have not been inactive in attending to that: Since Creon spoke of it, I have sent two escorts— And it is a wonder after this long why he is not here.
CHORUS
What can still be told of those things is blunt from age.
OEDIPUS
What is there? For I am watching for any report.	285
CHORUS
It was said that he was killed by travellers.
OEDIPUS
That I have heard—but no one sees here he who observed that.
CHORUS
But he will have had his share of fear Having heard your pact—and will not have stayed here.
OEDIPUS
And he who had no fear of the deed? Would such a one fear such words?	290

CHORUS

But here is he who can identify him. For observe,
 It is the prophet of the god who is led here:
 He who of all mortals has the most ability to reveal things.
[Enter Tiresias, guided by a boy]

OEDIPUS

Tiresias—you who are learned in all things: what can be taught; what is never spoken of;
 What is in the heavens and what treads on the earth— 295
 Although you have no sight, can you see how our clan
 Has given hospitality to sickness? You are our shield,
 Our protector—for you, Lord, are the only remedy we have.
 Phoebus—if you have not heard it from the messengers—
 Sent us as answer to our sending; release from the sickness 300
 Will come only if we are skilled enough to discover who killed Laius
 And kill them or drive them away from this land as fugitives.
 Therefore, do not deny to us from envy the speech of birds
 Or any other way of divination which you have,
 But pull yourself and this clan—and me— 305
 Pull us away from all that is defiled by those who lie slain.
 Our being depends on you. For if a man assists someone
 When he has the strength to do so, then it is a noble labour.

TIRESIAS

Ah! There is harm in judging when there is no advantage
 In such a judgement. This I usefully understood 310
 But then totally lost. I should not have come here.

OEDIPUS

What is this? Are you heartless, entering here so?

TIRESIAS

Permit me to return to my dwelling. Easier then will it be
 For you to carry what is yours, and I what is mine, if you are persuaded in this.

OEDIPUS

Such talk is unusual because unfriendly toward this clan 315
 Which nourishes you: will you deprive us of oracles?

TIRESIAS

Yes—for I know that the words you say
 Are not suitable. And I will not suffer because of mine.

OEDIPUS

Before the gods! Turn aside that judgement! Here, before you,
 All of us are as humble suppliants! 320

TIRESIAS

Since all of you lack judgement, I will not speak either about myself
 Or you and so tell about defects.

OEDIPUS

What? If you are aware of it but will not speak,
 Do you intend to betray and so totally destroy your clan?

	TIRESIAS
I will not cause pain to either you or myself. Therefore, Why these aimless rebukes since I will not answer.		325
	OEDIPUS
Not...? Why, you ignoble, worthless...! A rock, By its nature, can cause anger. Speak it!— Or will you show there is no end to your hardness?
	TIRESIAS
You rebuke me for anger—but it is with you That she dwells, although you do not see this and blame me instead.		330
	OEDIPUS
And whose being would not have anger Hearing how you dishonour our clan!
	TIRESIAS
By themselves, these things will arrive—even though my silence covers them.
	OEDIPUS
Then since they shall arrive, you must speak to me about them!		335
	TIRESIAS
Beyond this, I explain nothing. But if it is your will, Become savage with wrath in anger.
	OEDIPUS
Yes indeed I will yield to the anger possessing me Since I do understand! For I know you appear to me To have worked together with others to produce that deed, Although it was not your hand that did the killing. But—had you sight— I would say that the blow was yours and yours alone!		340
	TIRESIAS
Is that so! I declare it is to the proclamation You announced that you must adhere to, so that from this day You should not speak to me or these others Since you are the unhealthy pollution in our soil!		345
	OEDIPUS
It is disrespectful to bound forth With such speech! Do you believe you will escape?
	TIRESIAS
I have escaped. For, by my revelations, I am nourished and made strong.
	OEDIPUS
Where was your instruction from? Certainly not from your craft!		350
	TIRESIAS
From you—for against my desire I cast out those words.
	OEDIPUS
What words? Say them again so I can fully understand.

TIRESIAS

Did you not hear them before? Or are your words a test?

OEDIPUS

They expressed no meaning to me. Say them again.

TIRESIAS

I said you are the killer and thus the man you seek.

355

OEDIPUS

You shall not escape if you injure me so again!

TIRESIAS

Shall I then say more to make your anger greater?

OEDIPUS

As much as you desire for you are mistaken in what you say.

TIRESIAS

I say that with those nearest to you are you concealed
In disrespectful intimacy, not seeing the trouble you are in.

OEDIPUS

Do you believe you can continue to speak so and remain healthy?

TIRESIAS

Yes, if revelations have power.

OEDIPUS

They do for others, but not for you! They have none for you
Because you are blind in your ears, in your purpose as well as in your eyes!

TIRESIAS

In faulting me for that you are unfortunate
Because soon there will be no one who does not find fault with you.

365

OEDIPUS

You are nourished by night alone! It is not for me,
Or anyone here who sees by the light, to injure you.

TIRESIAS

It is not my destiny to be defeated by you—
Apollo is sufficient for that, since it is his duty to obtain vengeance.

OEDIPUS

Were those things Creon's inventions—or yours?

TIRESIAS

It is not Creon who harms you—it is yourself.

OEDIPUS

Ah! Wealth, Kingship and that art of arts
Which surpasses others—these, in life, are envied:
And great is the jealousy cherished because of you.
It is because of this authority of mine—which this clan
Gave into my hands, unasked—
That the faithful Creon, a comrade from the beginning,

375

Desires to furtively creep about to overthrow me
 And hires this performing wizard, 380
 This cunning mendicant priest who sees only
 For gain but who is blind in his art!
 So now tell me: where and when have you given clear divinations?
 For you did not—when that bitch was here chanting her verses—
 Speak out and so give deliverance to your clansfolk. 385
 Yet her enigma was not really for some passing man
 To disclose since it required a prophet's art:
 But your augury foretold nothing and neither did you learn anything
 From any god! It was I who came along—
 I, Oedipus, who sees nothing!—I who put an end to her 390
 By happening to use reason rather than a knowledge of augury.
 Now it is me you are trying to exile since your purpose
 Is to stand beside the throne among Creon's supporters.
 But I intend to make you sorry! Both of you—who worked together
 To drive me out. And if I did not respect you as an Elder, 395
 Pain would teach you a kind of judgement!

CHORUS

Yet I suspect that he has spoken
 In anger, as I believe you did, Oedipus.
 But this is not what is needed. Instead, it is the god's oracle
 That will, if examined, give us the best remedy. 400

TIRESIAS

Though you are the King, I have at least an equality of words
 In return, for I also have authority.
 I do not live as your servant—but for Loxias—
 Just as I am not inscribed on the roll as being under Creon's patronage.
 Thus, I speak for myself—since you have found fault with me because I am blind. 405
 When you look, you do not see the trouble you are in,
 Nor where you dwell, nor who you are intimate with.
 Do you know from whom your being arose? Though concealed, you are the enemy
 Of your own, below and upon this land:
 On both sides beaten by your mother and your father 410
 To be driven out from this land by a swift and angry Fury—
 And you who now see straight will then be in darkness.
 What place will not be a haven for your cries?
 What Cithaeron will not, and soon, resound with them
 When you understand your wedding-night in that abode 415
 Into where you fatefully and easily sailed but which is no haven from your voyage?
 Nor do you understand the multitude of troubles
 Which will make you equal with yourself and your children.
 Thus it is, so therefore at my mouth and at Creon's
 Throw your dirt! For there is no other mortal whose being 420
 Will be so completely overwhelmed by troubles as yours.

OEDIPUS

Am I to endure hearing such things from him?
 May misfortune come to you! Go from here—without delay!
 Away from my dwelling! Turn and go!

TIRESIAS

I would not have come here, had you not invited me. 425

OEDIPUS

I did not know you would speak nonsense
Or I would have been unwilling to ask you here to my dwelling.

TIRESIAS

So you believe I was born lacking sense?
Yet I made sense to those who gave you birth.

OEDIPUS

What? Wait! Which mortals gave me birth?

430

TIRESIAS

It is on this day that you are born and also destroyed.

OEDIPUS

All that you have said is enigmatic or lacking in reason.

TIRESIAS

But are you not the best among us in working things out?

OEDIPUS

Do you find fault with what I have discovered is my strength?

TIRESIAS

It is that very fortune which has totally ruined you.

435

OEDIPUS

I am not concerned—if I have preserved this clan.

TIRESIAS

Then I shall depart. You—boy! Lead me away.

OEDIPUS

Let him lead you away. While here, you are under my feet
And annoy me. When gone—you will give me no more pain.

TIRESIAS

I shall go but speak that for which I was fetched, with no dread
Because of your countenance. For you cannot harm me.

I say that the man you have long searched for
And threatened and made proclamation about for the killing
Of Laius—he is present, here.

Although called a foreigner among us, he will be exposed as a native
Of Thebes but have no delight in that event.

Blind, though recently able to see—

And a beggar, who before was rich—he shall go to foreign lands
With a stick to guide him along the ground on his journey.

And he shall be exposed to his children as both their father
And their brother; to the woman who gave him birth

As both her son and husband; and to his father

As his killer who seeded her after him. So go

Within to reason this out and if you catch me deceiving you,

Then say that in my prophecies there is nothing for me to be proud of.

[Exit Tiresias and Oedipus]

CHORUS

Who is the one that the god-inspired oracle-stone at Delphi saw
 With bloody hands doing that which it is forbidden to speak of?
 For now is the day for him to move his feet swifter
 Than storm's horses as he flees
 Since the son of Zeus—armed with fire and lightning— 460
 Is leaping toward him
 Accompanied by those angry
 And infallible Furies!
 It was not that long ago that the omen shone forth
 From the snows of Parnassus: Search everywhere for that man who is concealed; 465
 He who wanders up to the wild-woods,
 Through caves and among the rocks like some bull—
 He unlucky in his desolation who by his unlucky feet
 Seeks to elude that prophecy from the Temple at the centre of the world—
 That living doom which circles around him. 470
 There is a strange wonder—wrought by he who is skilled in augury;
 I cannot believe, yet cannot disbelieve, nor explain my confusion
 For fear hovers over me. I cannot see what is here, or what is behind!
 Yet—if there was between the family of Labdacus,
 And that son of Polybus, any strife existing 475
 Either now or before, I have not learned of it
 To thus use it as proof to examine by trial and thus attack
 The public reputation of Oedipus, becoming thus for the family of Labdacus
 Their ally in respect of that killing which has been concealed.
 Rather—this is for Zeus and Apollo, who have the skill 480
 To understand, although that other man has won more
 For his discoveries than I.
 Even so, on some things nothing decisive is discovered:
 As in learning, where by learning
 One man may overtake another. 485
 Thus not before I see that they who accuse him are speaking straight
 Will I declare myself for them
 For she was visible—that winged girl who came down against him—
 And we then saw proof of his knowledge, which was beneficial to our clan.
 So therefore my decision is not to condemn him as ignoble. 490
[Enter Creon]

CREON

Clansmen! Having learnt of a horrible accusation
 Made against me by Oedipus the King
 I hastened here! If, in these our troubles,
 He deems that he has suffered because of me—
 Been injured by some word or some deed— 495
 Then I would have no desire to live as long as I might Having to bear such talk! For it is not simple—
 The damage that would be done to me by such words:
 Rather, it would be great, for I would be dishonoured before my clan—
 With you and my kinsfolk hearing my name dishonoured. 500

CHORUS

That insult perhaps came forth because of anger—
 Rather than being a conclusion from reason.

CREON

And it was declared that it was my reasoning

Which persuaded the prophet to utter false words?

CHORUS

It was voiced—but I do not know for what reason.

505

CREON

Were his eyes straight, was he thinking straight
When he made that allegation against me?

CHORUS

I do not know. For I do not observe what my superiors do.
But here, from out of his dwelling, comes the Chief himself.
[Enter Oedipus]

OEDIPUS

You there! Why are you here? Have you so much face
That you dare to come to my home?

You—the one exposed as the killer of its man
And, vividly, as a robber seeking my Kingship!

In the name of the gods, tell me if it was cowardice or stupidity
That you saw in me when you resolved to undertake this!

Did you reason that I would not observe your cunning treachery—
Or, if I did learn of it, I would not defend myself?

Instead, it was senseless of you to set your hand to this—

With no crowd or comrades—and go in pursuit of authority:

That which is captured by using wealth and the crowd!

CREON

You know what you must do—in answer to your words

Be as long in hearing my reply so that you can, with knowledge, judge for yourself.

OEDIPUS

Your words are clever—but I would be mistaken to learn from you,
Since I have found how dangerous and hostile you are to me.

CREON

That is the first thing you should hear me speak about.

525

OEDIPUS

Do not tell me: it is that you are not a traitor!

CREON

If you believe that what is valuable is pride, by itself,
Without a purpose, then your judgement is not right.

OEDIPUS

And if you believe you can betray a kinsman

And escape without punishment, then your judgement is no good.

CREON

I agree that such a thing is correct—

So inform me what injury you say I have inflicted.

OEDIPUS

Did you convince me or did you not convince me that I should

Send a man to bring here that respected prophet?

CREON

I am the same person now as the one who gave that advice.

535

OEDIPUS

How long is the duration since Laius—

CREON

Since he did what? I do not understand.

OEDIPUS

Since he disappeared: removed by deadly force?

CREON

The measurement of that duration is great—far into the past.

OEDIPUS

So—was that prophet then at his art?

540

CREON

Yes: of equal skill and having the same respect as now.

OEDIPUS

At that period did he make mention of me?

CREON

Certainly not to me nor when I was standing nearby.

OEDIPUS

Was there no inquiry held about the killing?

CREON

It was indeed undertaken, although nothing was learned.

545

OEDIPUS

So why did that clever person not speak, then?

CREON

I do not know. And about things I cannot judge for myself, I prefer to be silent.

OEDIPUS

But you do know why and would say it if you had good judgement!

CREON

What? If I did know, then I would not deny it.

OEDIPUS

It is that if he had not met with you,
He would not have spoken about “my” killing of Laius.

550

CREON

You should know if he indeed said that.
Now, however, it is fair that I question you just as you have me.

OEDIPUS

Question me well—for you will never convict me as the killer!

CREON
Nevertheless. You had my sister—took her as wife? 555

OEDIPUS
That is an assertion that cannot be denied.

CREON
Does she, in this land, possess an authority the equal of yours?

OEDIPUS
Whatever is her wish, she obtains from me.

CREON
And am I—who completes the triad—not the equal of you both?

OEDIPUS
And it because of that, that you are exposed as a traitor to your kin! 560

CREON
No! For consider these reasons for yourself, as I have,
Examining this first: do you believe anyone
Would prefer authority with all its problems
To untroubled calm if they retained the same superiority?
I myself do not nurture such a desire 565

To be King rather than do the deeds of a King:
No one commanding good judgement would, whoever they were.
Now, and from you, I receive everything with no problems
But if the authority was mine, I would have to do many things against my nature.
How then could being a King bring me more pleasure 570
Than the trouble-free authority and power I have?
I am not yet so much deceived

As to want honours other than those which profit me.
Now, I greet everyone, and now, everyone bids me well
Just as, now, those who want something from you call upon me 575
Since only in that way can they possibly have success.

Why, then, would I let go of these to accept that?
A traitor cannot, because of his way of thinking, have good judgement.
I am not a lover of those whose nature is to reason so
And would not endure them if they did act. 580

As proof of this, first go yourself to Pytho
To inquire whether the message I brought from the oracle there was true
And if you detect that I and that interpreter of signs
Plotted together, then kill me—not because of a single vote,
But because of two, for you will receive mine as well as yours. 585

I should not be accused because of unclear reasoning and that alone.
It is not fair when the ignoble, rashly,
Are esteemed as worthy or the worthy as ignoble.
I say that to cast away an honourable friend is to do the same
To that which is with life and which you cherish the most. 590
It takes a while for an intuition to be made steady
For it is only after a while that a man shows if he is fair
Although an ignoble one is known as such in a day.

CHORUS
Honourable words from someone cautious of falling,
My Lord. Those swift in their judgement are unsteady. 595

OEDIPUS

But when there is a plot against me which is swiftly and furtively
Moving forward, then I must be swift in opposing that plot
Since if I remain at rest, then indeed
What is about to be done, will be—because of my mistake.

CREON

Then you still desire to cast me from this land?

600

OEDIPUS

Not so! It is your death, not your exile, that I want!

CREON

When you explain to me what is the nature of this thing “envy”—

OEDIPUS

You speak without yielding and not in good faith!

CREON

Is it not your ‘good judgement’ that is keenly being observed?

OEDIPUS

But at least it is mine!

605

CREON

And for that very reason it is but the equal of mine.

OEDIPUS

But you have a treacherous nature!

CREON

But if nothing has been proved—

OEDIPUS

Even so, there must be authority.

CREON

Not when that authority is defective.

610

OEDIPUS

My clan! My clan!

CREON

A portion of the clan is for me—not wholly for you!

CHORUS

My Lords, stop this! It is fortunate perhaps that I observe
Jocasta approaching from her dwelling, since it is fitting for her
To make right the quarrel which now excites you.

[Enter Jocasta]

JOCASTA

You wretches! Why this ill-advised strife
Produced by your tongues? Are you not dishonoured—when this land

Is suffering—by becoming moved by personal troubles?
 You should go within; while you, Creon, should go to your dwelling
 So as not to let what is only nothing become a great sorrow. 620

CREON

My kin by blood! It is horrible what your husband Oedipus,
 From two unfair things, has decided it is right to do!
 To push me from this land of my ancestors—or to seize and kill me!

OEDIPUS

Yes! For he was, my lady, caught trying to injure
 My person by a cowardly art. 625

CREON

[looking upward]
 Deny me, this day, your assistance—curse and destroy me
 If I committed that which I am accused of doing!

JOCASTA

Before the god, trust him, Oedipus!
 Chiefly because of this oath to the god
 And then because of me and these others here beside you. 630

CHORUS

My Lord—be persuaded, having agreed to reflect on this.

OEDIPUS

To what do you wish me to yield?

CHORUS

Respect he who before has never been weak—he now strengthened by that oath.

OEDIPUS

Do you know what it is that you so desire?

CHORUS

I do know. 635

OEDIPUS

Then explain what you believe it to be.

CHORUS

When a comrade is under oath, you should never accuse him
 Because of unproved rumours and brand him as being without honour.

OEDIPUS

Then attend to this well. When you seek this, it is my Destruction that is sought—or exile from this land. 640

CHORUS

No! By the god who is Chief of all the gods—
 Helios! Bereft of gods, bereft of kin—may the extremist death
 Of all be mine if such a judgement was ever mine!
 But ill-fated would be my breath of life—which the decay in this soil
 Already wears down—if to those troubles of old 645
 There was joined this trouble between you and him.

OEDIPUS

Then allow him to go—although it requires my certain death
 Or that I, without honour and by force, am thrown out from this land.
 And it is because of you, not because of him—the mercy coming from your mouth—
 That I do this. As for him—wherever he goes—I will detest him! 650

CREON

It is clear that you are hostile as you yield—and so dangerous, even though
 Your anger has gone. For natures such as yours
 Are deservedly painful to those who endure them.

OEDIPUS

Then go away and leave me.

CREON

I shall depart. To you, I remain unknown—but to these, here, I am the same. 655
[Exit Creon]

CHORUS

My Lady—why do you delay in returning with him into your dwelling?

JOCASTA

Because I wish to learn what has happened.

CHORUS

Suspicion arising from unreasonable talk—and a wounding that was unfair.

JOCASTA

From both of them?

CHORUS

Indeed. 660

JOCASTA

What was the talk?

CHORUS

Too much for me, too much for this land, wearied before this.
 Since it appears to have ceased, here—let it remain so.

OEDIPUS

Observe where you have come to with your prowess in reason
 By me giving way and blunting my passion! 665

CHORUS

My Lord, I will not say this only this once:
 My judgement would be defective—and by my purposeless judgements
 Would be shown to be so—if I deserted you,
 You who when this land I love was afflicted
 And despairing, set her straight. 670
 Now be for us our lucky escort, again!

JOCASTA

My Lord—before the god explain to me
 What act roused such wrath and made you hold onto it.

OEDIPUS

It will be told. For I respect you, my lady, more than them.
It was Creon—the plot he had against me.

JOCASTA

Then speak about it—if you can clearly affix blame for the quarrel.

OEDIPUS

He declared that it was me who had killed Laius.

JOCASTA

Did he see it, for him self—or learn of it from someone?

OEDIPUS

It was rather that he let that treacherous prophet bring it—
So as to make his own mouth entirely exempt.

JOCASTA

Therefore, and this day, acquit yourself of what was spoken about
And listen to me, for you will learn for yourself
That no mortal is given the skill to make prophecies.
I bring to light evidence for this:

An oracle came to Laius once—not I say
From Phoebus himself but from a servant—
That his own death was destined to come from a child
Which he and I would produce.

685

But—as it was reported—one day foreign robbers
Slew him where three cart-tracks meet.
As to the child—his growth had not extended to the third day
When we yoked the joints of its feet
And threw it—by another's hand—upon a desolate mountain.

690

So, in those days, Apollo did not bring about, for him,
That he slay the father who begot him—nor, for Laius,
That horror which he feared—being killed by his son.
Such were the limits set by those words of revelation!

695

Therefore, do not concern yourself with them: for what a god
Wants others to find out, he will by himself unmistakably reveal.

OEDIPUS

As I heard you just now my lady,
My judgement became muddled as the breath of life left me.

JOCASTA

What has so divided you that you turn away to speak?

OEDIPUS

I believed I heard this from you—that Laius
Was killed near where three cart-tracks meet.

JOCASTA

It was, indeed, voiced—and is so, still.

705

OEDIPUS

Where is the place where came his misfortune?

JOCASTA

The nearby land of Phocis—where the track splits
To come from Delphi and from Daulia.

OEDIPUS

How many seasons have passed since that thing was done?

JOCASTA

It was just before you held this land's authority
That it was revealed by a herald to the clan.

OEDIPUS

O Zeus! What was your purpose in doing this to me?

JOCASTA

What is it that burdens your heart, Oedipus?

OEDIPUS

Do not enquire yet; rather, explain to me the appearance Laius had:
Was he at the height of his vigour?

JOCASTA

He was big—his head covered in hair but having a recent whiteness.
His build was not far removed from your own.

OEDIPUS

Wretch that I am! For it seems that over myself
I, without looking, threw that terrible curse!

JOCASTA

What are you saying? My Lord—I tremble as I look at you.

720

OEDIPUS

My courage is replaced by fear—that the prophet possesses sight!
More can be explained—if you make known one more thing.

JOCASTA

Though I still tremble, if I have knowledge of what you ask, I shall speak it.

OEDIPUS

Did he have a slender one—or did he have many men
As escort as befits a warrior chieftain?

725

JOCASTA

Altogether there were five, one of those being an official—
And one carriage, which conveyed Laius.

OEDIPUS

Now it becomes visible. But who was he,
My lady, who gave you that report?

JOCASTA

A servant—the very person who alone returned, having escaped harm.

730

OEDIPUS

Then perhaps he is to be found, at this moment, within our dwelling?

JOCASTA

Definitely not. For as soon as he returned here again and saw you
 Were the master of what the dead Laius had held,
 He beseeched me—his hand touching mine—
 To send him away to the wilds as a shepherd to a herd, 735
 Far away where he could not see the town.
 And so I sent him. For I deemed him worthy,
 As a slave, to have a greater reward than that favour.

OEDIPUS

Then swiftly—and with no delay—can he be returned here?

JOCASTA

He is around. But why do you desire it? 740

OEDIPUS

I fear, my lady, that far too much has already Been said by me. Yet it is my wish to see him.

JOCASTA

Then he shall be here. But it merits me to learn,
 My Lord, what burden within you is so difficult to bear.

OEDIPUS

I shall not deprive you of that—for what I fear 745
 Comes closer. Who is more important to me than you
 To whom I would speak when going through such an event as this?
 Polybus the Corinthian was my father—
 And the Dorian, Meropè, my mother. I was, in merit,
 Greater than the clansfolk there—until I was, by chance, 750
 Attacked. This, for me, was worthy of my wonder
 Although unworthy of my zeal:
 At a feast a man overfull with wine
 Mumbled into his chalice what I was falsely said to be my father's.
 I was annoyed by this during that day—scarcely able 755
 To hold myself back. On the one following that, I sought to question
 My mother and father, and they were indignant
 At he who had let loose those words at me.
 Because of this, I was glad, although I came to itch from them
 For much did they slither about. 760
 So, unobserved by my mother and father, I travelled To Pytho. But for that which I had come, Phoebus there
 Did not honour me; instead—suffering and strangeness
 And misery were what his words foresaw:
 That I must copulate with my mother—and show, 765
 For mortals to behold, a family who would not endure—
 And also be the killer of the father who planted me.
 I, after hearing this—and regarding Corinth—
 Thereafter by the stars measured the ground
 I fled upon so that I would never have to face— 770
 Because of that inauspicious prophecy—the disgrace of its fulfilment.
 And while so travelling I arrived in those regions
 Where you spoke of the King himself being killed.
 For you, my lady, I shall declare what has not been spoken of before.
 While journeying, I came near to that three-fold track, 775
 And at that place an official and a carriage
 With young horse with a man mounted in it—such as you spoke of—
 Came toward me. And he who was in front as well as the Elder himself

Were for driving me vigorously from the path.
 But the one who had pushed me aside—the carriage driver— 780
 I hit in anger: and the Elder, observing this
 From his chariot, watched for me to go past and then on the middle
 Of my head struck me with his forked goad.
 He was certainly repaid with more! By a quick blow
 From the staff in this, my hand, he fell back 785
 From the middle of the carriage and rolled straight out!
 And then I destroyed all the others. Yet if to that stranger
 And Laius there belongs a common relation
 Then who exists who is now as unfortunate as this man, here?
 Who of our race of mortals would have a daimon more hostile— 790
 He to whom it is not permitted for a stranger nor a clansman
 To receive into their homes, nor even speak to—
 But who, instead, must be pushed aside? And it is such things as these—
 These curses!—that I have brought upon myself.
 The wife of he who is dead has been stained by these hands 795
 Which killed him. Was I born ignoble?
 Am I not wholly unclean? For I must be exiled
 And in my exile never see my family
 Nor step into my own fatherland—or by marriage
 I will be yoked to my mother and slay my father 800
 Polybus, he who produced and nourished me.
 And would not someone who decided a savage daimon
 Did these things to me be speaking correctly?
 You awesome, powerful, gods—
 May I never see that day! May I go away 805
 From mortals, unobserved, before I see
 The stain of that misfortune come to me.

CHORUS

I also, my Lord, would wish to draw away from such things.
 But surely until you learn from he who was there, you can have expectations?

OEDIPUS

Indeed. There is for me just such an expectation, 810
 And one alone—to wait for that herdsman.

JOCASTA

And when he does appear, what is your intent?

OEDIPUS

I will explain it to you. If his report is found to be
 The same as yours, then I shall escape that suffering.

JOCASTA

Did you then hear something odd in my report? 815

OEDIPUS

You said he spoke of men—of robbers—being the ones
 Who did the killing. If, therefore, he still Speaks of there being many of them, then I am not the killer
 For one cannot be the same as the many of that kind.
 But if he says a solitary armed traveller, then it is clear, 820
 And points to me as the person who did that work.

JOCASTA

You should know that it was announced in that way.
 He cannot go back and cast them away
 For they were heard, here, by the clan—not just by me.
 Yet even if he turns away from his former report, 825
 Never, my Lord, can the death of Laius
 Be revealed as a straight fit—for it was Loxias
 Who disclosed he would be killed by the hand of my child.
 But he—the unlucky one—could not have slain him
 For he was himself destroyed before that. 830
 Since then I have not by divination looked into What is on either side of what is next.

OEDIPUS

I find that pleasing. However, that hired hand
 Should be summoned here by sending someone—it should not be neglected.

JOCASTA

I will send someone, and swiftly. But let us go into our dwelling. 835
 I would not do anything that would be disagreeable to you.
[Exit Oedipus and Jocasta]

CHORUS

May the goddess of destiny be with me
 So that I bear an entirely honourable attitude
 In what I say and in what I do—
 As set forth above us in those customs born and 840
 Given their being in the brightness of the heavens
 And fathered only by Olympus.
 For they were not brought forth by mortals,
 Whose nature is to die. Not for them the lethargy
 Of laying down to sleep 845
 Since the god within them is strong, and never grows old.
 Insolence plants the tyrant:
 There is insolence if by a great foolishness
 There is a useless over-filling which goes beyond
 The proper limits— 850
 It is an ascending to the steepest and utmost heights
 And then that hurtling toward that Destiny
 Where the useful foot has no use.
 Yet since it is good for a clan to have combat,
 I ask the god never to deliver us from it: 855
 As may I never cease from having the god for my champion.
 If someone goes forth and by his speaking
 Or the deeds of his hands looks down upon others
 With no fear of the goddess Judgement and not in awe
 Of daimons appearing, 860
 Then may he be seized by a destructive Fate
 Because of his unlucky weakness.
 If he does not gain what he gains fairly,
 Does not keep himself from being disrespectful,
 And in his foolishness holds onto what should not be touched, 865
 Then how will such a man thereafter keep away those arrows of anger
 Which will take revenge on his breath of life?
 For if such actions are those are esteemed,
 Is this my respectful choral-dance required?

No more would I go in awe to that never to be touched sacred-stone, 870
 Nor to that Temple at Abae,
 Nor Olympia—if those prophecies do not fit
 In such a way that all mortals can point it out.
 But you whom it is right to call my master—
 Zeus!—you who rule over everyone: do not forget this, 875
 You whose authority is, forever, immortal.
 For they begin to decay—those prophecies of Laius
 Given long ago, and are even now set aside
 And nowhere does Apollo become manifest because esteemed:
 For the rituals of the gods are being lost. 880
[Enter Jocasta]

JOCASTA

Lords of this land—the belief has been given to me
 That I should go to the Temples of our guardian gods, my hands
 Holding a garland and an offering of incense.
 For Oedipus lets his breath of life be too much possessed by his heart
 Because of all his afflictions—since, unlike a man who reasons 885
 And determines the limits of what is strange by the past,
 He is fearful when someone, in speaking, speaks of such things.
 Therefore, since none of my counsels have achieved anything,
 I come here—to you, Lycean Apollo, since you are close to us—
 To petition you by asking you with these my gifts 890
 That we are cleansed of defilement by you bringing us deliverance.
 For now all of us are afraid as we behold
 That he who is guiding our vessel is wounded.
[Enter Messenger]

MESSENGER

Is it from you, stranger, that I might learn where
 Is the dwelling of King Oedipus: 895
 Or, more particularly, if you have knowledge of where he himself is?

CHORUS

Here are his chambers, stranger, and he himself is within.
 But here is his wife and mother of his children.

MESSENGER

May she always prosper in her prospering descent
 Since by them her marriage is complete. 900

JOCASTA

And may you, also, stranger, because of your worthy eloquence.
 But explain to me what you seek in arriving here
 Or what it is that you wish to make known.

MESSENGER

What is profitable, my lady, for both your family and your husband.

JOCASTA

What is it? And who sent you here, to us? 905

MESSENGER

I am from Corinth. And when, presently, I have said my speech,
There will be joy—of that I have no doubt—but also an equal sorrowing.

JOCASTA

How can that be? What has a double strength that it could cause that?

MESSENGER

He, as their King: for they who inhabit the land
Of Isthmia would make him so—so they have said.

910

JOCASTA

How is that? For is not Polybus, the Elder, their Master?

MESSENGER

Not now—because death holds him in a tomb.

JOCASTA

What are you saying? That the father of Oedipus—has died?

MESSENGER

Is my report is not correct, then I merit death.

JOCASTA

Swiftly—my handmaiden—go to your master
To tell him this. You prophecies from the gods!—
Where is your reality? This was the man whom Oedipus long ago from fear Avoided lest he kill him. And now it is because Of his own destiny that he died rather than through that of another.
[Enter Oedipus]

915

OEDIPUS

My Lady, Jocasta:
Why did you summon me here from my chamber?

920

JOCASTA

Hear this man and, as you listen, watch to where
It is that those solemn prophecies of the gods lead.

OEDIPUS

What report has he—wherever he is from—for me?

JOCASTA

He is from Corinth with the message that your father
Polybus is no more—he is dead.

925

OEDIPUS

Then announce it, stranger—leading it out yourself, old one.

MESSENGER

If that is what I must relate first and clearly
Then know well that his death has come upon him.

OEDIPUS

Was it by treachery—or by dealing with sickness?

930

MESSENGER

A small turn downwards, and the ageing body lies in sleep.

OEDIPUS

Am I to assume that he unfortunately perished from a sickness?

MESSENGER

Indeed—for he had been allocated a great many seasons.

OEDIPUS

Ah! Then why, my lady, look toward
 The altar of some Pythian prophet, or above to those 935
 Screeching birds—whose guidance was that I would Assuredly kill my father? But he is dead
 And hidden within the earth, while I am here
 Without having to clean my spear. Unless—it was a longing for me
 Which destroyed him, and thus he is dead because of me. 940
 But then—that divine prophecy has been, by that circumstance, taken away
 By Polybus lying in Hades, and thus has no importance.

JOCASTA

Did I not declare such things to you, just now?

OEDIPUS

Such was said—but I turned away because of my fear of them.

JOCASTA

Do not anymore wound your heart by such things. 945

OEDIPUS

But how can I not distance myself from that intercourse with my mother?

JOCASTA

What is there for mortals to fear, for it is chance
 Which rules over them, and who can clearly foresee what does not exist?
 It is most excellent to live without a plan—according to one's ability.
 You should not fear being married to your mother: 950
 For many are the mortals who have—in dreams also—Lain with their mothers, and he to whom such things as these
 Are as nothing, provides himself with a much easier life.

OEDIPUS

All that you expressed is fine, except for this:
 She who gave me birth is alive, and since she is now still living, 955
 It is necessary that I—despite your fine words—distance myself from her.

JOCASTA

Yet the death of your father is a great revelation for you.

OEDIPUS

Yes—a great one. But I fear she who is living.

MESSENGER

Who is this woman that you so fear?

OEDIPUS

Meropè, old one: she who belonged with Polybus. 960

MESSENGER

And what, concerning her, could produce fear in you?

OEDIPUS

A strange god-inspired prophecy.

MESSENGER

Is it forbidden for someone else to know—or can it be told?

OEDIPUS

Certainly. Once, Loxias said to me
That I must copulate with my own mother
And by my own hands take my father's blood.
Therefore, and long ago, I left Corinth
And have kept far away from there. And good fortune has been mine,
Although it is very pleasing to behold the eye's of one's parents.

965

MESSENGER

Was that what distanced you from your clan?

970

OEDIPUS

Yes, old one: I did not want to slaughter my father.

MESSENGER

Then why, my Lord, have I not released you from that fear—
Since I came here as a favour to you?

OEDIPUS

Certainly you would merit receiving a reward from me.

MESSENGER

And that was chiefly why I came here—
That on your arrival home I would obtain something useful.

975

OEDIPUS

But I will not rejoin those who planted me.

MESSENGER

My son! It is clearly evident you cannot see what you are doing—

OEDIPUS

Why, old one? Before the gods, enlighten me!

MESSENGER

—If it was because of that, that you avoided returning to your home.

980

OEDIPUS

Yes, out of respect for Phoebus so that what he explained could not be fulfilled.

MESSENGER

A defilement brought to you by they who planted you?

OEDIPUS

That, Elder, is the thing I have always feared.

MESSENGER

Then you should know that there is nothing to make you tremble.

OEDIPUS

Nothing? Why—if I was the child born to them?

985

MESSENGER

Because you and Polybus are not kin by blood.

OEDIPUS

Are you saying that Polybus did not sire me?

MESSENGER

The same as but no more than this man, here!

OEDIPUS

How can he who sired me be the same as he who did not?

MESSENGER

Because he did not beget you—as I did not.

990

OEDIPUS

But then why did he name me as his son?

MESSENGER

Know that you were accepted from my hands as a gift.

OEDIPUS

And he strongly loved what came from the hand of another?

MESSENGER

He was persuaded because before then he was without children.

OEDIPUS

When I was given to him—had you purchased or begotten me?

995

MESSENGER

You were found in a forest valley on Cithaeron.

OEDIPUS

And why were you travelling in that region?

MESSENGER

I was there to oversee the mountain sheep.

OEDIPUS

A shepherd—who wandered in search of work?

MESSENGER

Yes—and that season the one who, my son, was your saviour.

1000

OEDIPUS

What ailment possessed me when you took me into your hands?

MESSENGER

The joints of your feet are evidence of it.

OEDIPUS

What makes you speak of that old defect?

MESSENGER

I undid what held and pierced your ankles.

OEDIPUS

A strange disgrace—to carry such a token with me.

1005

MESSENGER

Such was the fortune that named you who you are.

OEDIPUS

Before the gods, tell me whether that thing was done by my father or my mother.

MESSENGER

I do not know—he who gave you to me would be the best judge of that.

OEDIPUS

What? From someone else? Then it was not by chance you found me?

MESSENGER

No—another shepherd gave you to me.

1010

OEDIPUS

Who was it? Can you point him out? Tell whom you saw?

MESSENGER

He was perhaps named among those of Laius.

OEDIPUS

He who once and long ago was King of this land?

MESSENGER

Yes—that man was his shepherd.

OEDIPUS

Is he then still living? Is it possible for me to see him?

1015

MESSENGER

You who are of this region would know that best.

OEDIPUS

Is there among you here, anyone
Whoever he might be, who knows this shepherd he speaks of
Or who has seen him either here or in the wilds?
If so, declare it—for here is the opportunity to find out about these things.

1020

CHORUS

I believe he is that one in the wilds
Whom you saught before to see.
But it is Jocasta—for certain—who could tell of him.

OEDIPUS

My lady—do you know if it is he who, before,
We desired to return to here? Is that the one about whom this person speaks?

1025

JOCASTA

The one he spoke about? Why? Do not return to it
Nor even desire to attend again to this idle talk!

OEDIPUS

It could never be that I would fail to grasp
These proofs which will shed light upon my origin.

JOCASTA

Before the gods! If you value your own life,
Do not seek that. I have enough pain now.

1030

OEDIPUS

Have courage—for even if my three mothers past
Were shown to be three slaves, you would not be the one exposed as low-born.

JOCASTA

I beseech you to be persuaded by me. Do not do this.

OEDIPUS

I cannot be persuaded not to learn of this for certain.

1035

JOCASTA

Yet my judgement is for your good—it is said for the best.

OEDIPUS

This “for the best” pained me before and does so again.

JOCASTA

You, the unlucky one—may you never find out who you are.

OEDIPUS

Someone go and bring that Shepherd here to me,
For she can still rejoice in her distinguished origins.

1040

JOCASTA

You are doomed: this and this alone will I
Say to you—and nothing hereafter!
[Exit Jocasta]

CHORUS

Why, Oedipus, has your lady gone, taken away
By some wild affliction? I am in awe
Of a misfortune bursting forth because of her silence about this.

1045

OEDIPUS

It is necessary that it does burst forth. However lowly
My seed may be, it is my wish to know about it.
Although she is a woman, she has a mature judgement—
But even so, perhaps she is ashamed of my low-born origins.
But I—who apportion myself a child of the goddess, Fortuna,
She of beneficence—will not become dishonoured,
For She was the mother who gave me birth: my kinsfolk
The moons which separated my greatness and my lowness.
As this is the nature of my being, I cannot ever go away from it
To another, and so not learn about my birth.

CHORUS

If indeed I am a prophet or skillful in reason,
 Then—by Olympus!—you shall not be without the experience,
 O Cithaeron, on the rising of the full moon,
 Of me exalting you—the kinsfolk of Oedipus,
 His mother and provider—by my choral-dance 1060
 Since a joy has been brought to my King.
 Phoebus—I invoke you, that this may also be pleasing to you!
 Who, my son, of those whose living in years is long,
 Did the mountain-wanderer Pan come down upon
 To be your father? Or was it Loxias who slept with a woman? 1065
 For agreeable to him are all those who inhabit the wilds!
 Or perhaps it was he who is the sovereign of Cyllene:
 Or he the mountain-summit dwelling god of those Bacchinities
 Who gladly received you who was found by one of those Helicon Nymphs
 With whom he so often plays! 1070

OEDIPUS

If it fitting for me—who has never had dealings with him—
 To make an estimate, Elders, then I believe I see that Shepherd
 Whom we saught before. For his great age
 Would conform and be in accord with that of this man.
 Also, those who are escorting him are servants 1075
 Of my own family. But, about this, your experience
 Has the advantage over mine since you have seen that Shepherd before.

CHORUS

I see him clearly—and, yes, I know him. For if Laius ever had A faithful Shepherd, it was this man.
[Enter Shepherd]

OEDIPUS

You, the stranger from Corinth, I question you first— 1080
 Is this he whom you talked about.

MESSENGER

Indeed—you behold him.

OEDIPUS

You there, old man! Here, look at me, and answer
 My questions. Did you once belong to Laius?

SHEPHERD

Yes—nourished by him, not purchased as a slave. 1085

OEDIPUS

What work did you share in or was your livelihood?

SHEPHERD

For the greater part, my living was the way of a shepherd.

OEDIPUS

And in what region did you mostly dwell with them?

SHEPHERD

It was Cithaeron—and also neighbouring regions.

OEDIPUS

This man here—did you ever observe him there and come to know him? 1090

SHEPHERD

Doing what? Which is the man you speak of?

OEDIPUS

This one, standing there. Did you have dealings with him?

SHEPHERD

Not as I recall—so as to speak about now.

MESSENGER

That is no wonder, your Lordship. But I shall bring light
Upon those things which are now unknown. For well do I know 1095

That he will see again that region of Cithaeron when he

With a double flock and I with one

Were neighbours and comrades for three entire six month

Durations from Spring to Arcturus.

Then for the Winter I would drive mine to my stables 1100

And he, his, to the pens of Laius.

Was this, of which I have spoken, done or not as I have spoken?

SHEPHERD

Your words disclose it—although it is from long ago.

MESSENGER

Well, now say you know that you offered me a boy,
A nursling to rear as my own. 1105

SHEPHERD

What do you mean? What do you ask me for?

MESSENGER

This, sir, is he who was that youngster!

SHEPHERD

May misfortune come to you! Why do you not keep silent?

OEDIPUS

You—old man. Do not restrain him for it is your speech
Which should be more restrained, not his. 1110

SHEPHERD

Most noble Lord—what is my fault?

OEDIPUS

In not telling of the child he asked about.

SHEPHERD

But he speaks without looking as he toils without an aim.

OEDIPUS

If you will not speak as a favour, you will when you cry-out.

	SHEPHERD
Before the gods, do not strike someone who is old.		1115
	OEDIPUS
Swiftly, one of you, twist his hands behind his back.
	SHEPHERD
You unlucky one! What more do you desire to learn from me?
	OEDIPUS
Did you give him that child he asked about?
	SHEPHERD
I did. And it would have been to my advantage to die that day.
	OEDIPUS
It will come to that if your words are not true.		1120
	SHEPHERD
Yet much more will be destroyed if I do speak.
	OEDIPUS
This man, it seems, pushes for a delay.
	SHEPHERD
I do not. Just now I said I gave him.
	OEDIPUS
Taken from where? Your abode—or from that of another?
	SHEPHERD
Not from my own; I received him from someone.		1125
	OEDIPUS
Who—of these clansmen here? From whose dwelling?
	SHEPHERD
Your lordship, before the gods do not ask me more.
	OEDIPUS
You die if I have to put that question to you again.
	SHEPHERD
Then—it was one of those fathered by Laius.
	OEDIPUS
From a slave? Or born from one of his own race?		1130
	SHEPHERD
Ah! Here before me is what I dread. Of speaking it...
	OEDIPUS
And I, of hearing it, although hear it I must.
	SHEPHERD
It was said to be his own child. But of these things,

It is your lady—who is within—who could best speak of them.

OEDIPUS

Why? Because she gave it to you?

1135

SHEPHERD

Indeed, Lord.

OEDIPUS

Why did she want that?

SHEPHERD

So it would be destroyed.

OEDIPUS

How grievous for she who bore the child!

SHEPHERD

Yes—but she dreaded divine prophecies of ill-omen.

1140

OEDIPUS

Which were?

SHEPHERD

The word was that he would kill his parents.

OEDIPUS

Then why did you let this elderly one take him.

MESSENGER

Because, your lordship, of mercy—so that to another land
He might fittingly convey it: to where he himself came from.
But he saved him for this mighty wound. If then you are
The one he declares you to be, know how unlucky was your birth!

1145

OEDIPUS

Ah! All that was possible has, with certainty, passed away.
You—daylight—I now look my last at what I behold by you:
I, exposed as born from those who should not have borne me—
As having been intimate with those I should not, and killed those I should not.
[Exit Oedipus, Shepherd and Messenger]

1150

CHORUS

You descendants of mortals—
I count your zest as being equivalent to nothing,
For where is the person
Who has won more from a lucky daimon
Than just that appearance of fame
Which later is peeled away?
Yours—your daimon, Oedipus the unlucky—
We hold as an example
That nothing mortal is favoured.
For, O Zeus, it was beyond the bounds of others
That he shot his arrow to win
An all-prospering lucky daimon:

1160

He who in destroying that virginal chantress of oracles
 With the curved claws, 1165
 Arose in my country as a defence against death.
 And who since then has been called my Lord
 And greatly honoured as the chief of Thebes the magnificent!
 But now—who has heard of a greater misfortune?
 Who is there so savagely ruined that he dwells with such troubles 1170
 With his life so changed?
 Alas—Oedipus, the renowned! A mature haven
 Was enough for you
 As child and father when you fell upon
 That woman in her inner chamber! 1175
 How, how could what your father pushed into
 Have the vigour for you for so long and in silence?
 Chronos, the all-seeing, has found you, beyond your own will,
 For long ago it was determined that from that marriage which was no marriage
 Those children who have been born were the children that would be born. 1180
 But—as being the son of Laius,
 I wish, I wish that I had never known this.
 For I lament, and my cry is above all the others
 As it comes forth from my mouth.
 To speak straight: you gave me breath again 1185
 But I allowed my eyes to sleep.
[Enter Second Messenger]

MESSENGER

You who in this land have always been esteemed the most!
 What deeds you are to hear—what behold!—and how much grief
 Will weigh upon you if, on fidelity to your origins, 1190
 Your concern is still for the family of Labdacus!
 For, alas, neither the Ister nor the Phasis
 Can wash clean these chambers, so much suffering
 Do they conceal—soon to be exposed to the light
 As willed, not done outside the aid of will. Those injuries
 Which bring the most grieving, are those shown to be of our own choice. 1195

CHORUS

What I knew before could not fail to make my grieving
 Anything but grave; after that—what could you announce?

MESSENGER

What is a quick tale to say
 And to understand: the divinity, Jocasta, is dead.

CHORUS

A misfortune! From what cause? 1200

MESSENGER

By she herself. But, of those events,
 What was most painful is not for you—for you did not view them.
 Yet—as long as my Muse is with me—
 You can learn of the sufferings of her fate.
 She—coloured by emotion—passed within the hall 1205
 To run straight to that bridal-bed of hers
 Tearing at her hair with the fingers of both her hands.

Then, she went within—thrusting the doors closed—
 To invoke Laius, he who long ago was a corpse,
 Recalling that seed she received long ago by which 1210
 He was killed, to leave her to produce
 Unlucky children from his own begotten child.
 She lamented the bed of her double misfortune:
 From her husband, a husband—and children from that child.
 How, after that, she perished, I did not see 1215
 For with a war-cry Oedipus pushed in—and, because of him,
 We did not behold the end of her suffering.
 To him, we looked as he ploughed around
 For wildly he ranged about, demanding his spear,
 His lady who was not his lady, and where he might find that maternal 1220
 Double-womb which produced he himself and his children.
 He was frenzied, and a daimon guided him—
 For it was no man who was standing nearby—
 And with a fearful shout—as if someone led the way—
 He was propelled into those double-doors and, from their supports, 1225
 Bent those hollow barriers to fall into her chamber.
 And there we beheld that lady suspended
 In the swinging braided cords by which she had stricken herself.
 He, seeing this, with a fearful roar of grief
 Let down the cords which suspended her. Then when she the unfortunate 1230
 Was lain on the ground, there was something dreadful to behold:
 For he tore from her those gold brooches
 With which she had adorned herself
 And raised them to assault his own circular organs,
 Speaking such as this: that they would not have sight of 1235
 Those troubles he had suffered or had caused
 But would henceforth and in darkness have sight of what
 They should not and what he himself should not have had knowledge of.
 Then with a awesome lament not once but frequently
 He raised them to strike into his eyes. At each, blood 1240
 From his eyes dropped to his beard, not releasing blood
 Drop by drop—but all at once:
 A dark storm hailing drops of blood.
 From those two has this burst forth—not on one
 But on that man and his lady, joined by these troubles. 1245
 That old prosperity anciently theirs was indeed once
 A worthy prosperity—but now, on this day, there is Lamentation, misfortune, death, disgrace, and of all those troubles
 That exist and which have names, there is not one which is not here.

CHORUS

Does he who suffers now rest from injury? 1250

MESSENGER

He shouts for the barriers to be opened to expose
 To all who are of Cadmus, this patricide,
 This mother...—I will not say the profanity he speaks—
 So he can cast himself from this land, and not remain
 For this dwelling to become cursed because of his curse. 1255
 But he requires strength and a guide
 For too great for him to carry is that burden
 Which he will make known to you. You will behold a spectacle
 Which even those to whom it is horrible, will make lament for.
[Enter the blind Oedipus]

	CHORUS
How strange for mortals to see such an accident as this!		1260
It is the strangest thing of all ever
To come before me. You—who suffer this—
What fury came upon you? What daimon
With great leaps from a great height
Came upon you bringing such an unfortunate fate?		1265
I lament for your bad-luck.
Though I am not able to look at you—
There is much I wish to ask, much to understand,
Much to know
Even though I am here, shivering.		1270
	OEDIPUS
I am in agony!
To where, in my misery, am I carried? To where
Is my voice conveyed as it flees from me?
You—that daimon! To where have you brought me?
	CHORUS
Somewhere strange with nothing to be heard and nothing to be seen.		1275
	OEDIPUS
Nothing announced the arrival of this dark cloud shrouding me!
Something unconquerable—brought by an unfavourable wind.
As one do the stings of those goads,
And the recalling of those troubles, pierce me!
	CHORUS
It is no surprise that because of such injuries		1280
You endure a double mourning and a double misfortune.
	OEDIPUS
My friend!
You, at least, are my steadfast comrade
Because you have the endurance to attend to the blind.
For you are not hidden from me—I clearly know,		1285
Even in this darkness, that it is your voice.
	CHORUS
You of strange deeds—how did you bear
To so extinguish your sight? What daimon carried you away?
	OEDIPUS
It was Apollo—Apollo, my friend,
Who brought such troubles to such a troubled end.		1290
But it was my own hand, and no other, which made the assault—
I, who suffer this. For why should I have sight
When there was nothing pleasing to see?
	CHORUS
These things are as you have said they are.
	OEDIPUS
Who could I behold?		1295

Who could be loved—or whose greeting,
 My friend, would be delightful to hear?
 So, and swiftly, send me away from this place.
 Send away, my friend, this great pest—
 This bringer of a curse: the mortal whom our gods
 Detest the most. 1300

CHORUS

You are as helpless in that resolve as you were in your misfortune:
 Thus I wish you had never come to know of those things!

OEDIPUS

May death come to whosoever while roaming those grasslands loosened
 Those cruel fetters and so safely pulled me away from death!
 For it was not a favourable deed. 1305
 For had I died then no grief such as this
 Would have been caused to either me or my kin.

CHORUS

I also wish that.

OEDIPUS

I would not, then, have shed the blood of my father
 As I journeyed, and not be named by mortals
 As the husband of she who gave me my birth.
 I am without a god—an unconsecrated child—
 And now of the same kind as he who gave me this miserable existence!
 If there is a trouble which is even older than these troubles,
 Then it will be the lot of Oedipus. 1310
 1315

CHORUS

I do not know if I could say that your intentions were right,
 For it is perhaps better to no longer exist than to live, blind.

OEDIPUS

But as to this being done for the best—
 You should not instruct me, nor offer me more advice. 1320
 For, if I had eyes, I would not know where to look
 When I went to Hades and saw my father
 Or my unfortunate mother, since to both
 I have done what is so outstanding that a strangling is excluded.
 Perhaps the sight of children is desirable: 1325
 To behold how those buds are mine will grow—
 But it would certainly not be to these eyes of mine.
 Nor would that of this town, or its towers, or the sacrifices
 Offered to daimons. For it was most unfortunate that I—
 Who as no one else in Thebes prospered most excellently— 1330
 Bereaved myself of such things by my own declaration
 That everyone must push aside the profane one—the one the gods
 Have exposed as unclean and of the clan of Laius.
 After I have made known this, my stain,
 How could I look those here straight in the eye? 1335
 Certainly I could not. And if what is heard could be blocked out
 At that source in my ears, I would not have held myself back
 From this miserable body and thus would be blind and also hear nothing!
 For it is pleasing to dwell away from concern about injury.
 Why, Cithaeron—why did you receive me, and having accepted, 1340

Not directly kill me so I would never make known
 To mortals whence I was born?
 O Polybus and Corinth—and you that others called the ancient clan-home
 Of my ancestors—I, the beauty that you reared
 Had bad wounds festering underneath! 1345
 For I am found to be defective having been defective from my birth.
 You three routes and concealed valley,
 You grove and narrow place of the three-fold paths:
 You took in from my hands that blood which was my father's
 But also mine—so perhaps you can still recall 1350
 Those deeds that I did there, and then, when here,
 What I also achieved? You—those rites of joy
 Which gave me my birth and which planted me anew
 By the same seed being shot up to manifest fathers,
 Brothers, sons—the blood of a kinsman— 1355
 Brides, wives, mothers: as much shame
 As can arise from deeds among mortals.
 No one should speak about things they do not favour doing.
 Swiftly then—before the gods and beyond here—
 Hide me away or kill me or upon the sea cast me 1360
 So that you will never look upon me again.
 Come, and dignify this unhappy man by your touch.
 Be persuaded—do not fear. For this misfortune is mine alone
 And no mortal except me can bear it.
[Enter Creon]

CHORUS

As to this request of yours—it is fitting that here is Creon 1365
 To act and give advice,
 For he alone is left to be guardian of this region in your place.

OEDIPUS

But what is there than I can say to him?
 What trust can with fairness be shown to me?
 For I am discovered as being false to him, previously, in everything. 1370

CREON

I did not come here, Oedipus, to laugh
 Nor to blame you for your previous error.
[Creon turns to speak to the crowd who have gathered]
 You—there—even if you do not honour those descended from mortals,
 Have respect for the all-nourishing flames of the Lord Helios
 So that this stain is not looked upon when it is uncovered— 1375
 This which neither our soil nor the sacred waters
 Nor daylight will welcome.
 Swiftly now take him into his chambers:
 For the most proper conduct is that only kinfolk
 Look at and hear a kinsman's faults. 1380

OEDIPUS

Before the gods—since you have torn from me a dread
 By you coming here—you, the most noble—to me, a most ignoble man,
 Yield me something. I say this not for myself, but for you.

CREON

What favour do you request so earnestly?

OEDIPUS

That you throw me from this land as swiftly as you can 1385
To where it is known there will be not one mortal to greet me.

CREON

Know that this would certainly have been done—were it not necessary
For me first to learn from the god what I should do.

OEDIPUS

But his saying was completely clear—
That I, the disrespectful one, the patricide, must depart. 1390

CREON

Those were the words—but since our needs have changed
It is better to learn what must be done.

OEDIPUS

But you will enquire of behalf of this unhappy man?

CREON

Yes—as you should now pay tribute to the god.

OEDIPUS

Certainly—and I rely on you for this supplication: 1395

That you give to she who is within, a tomb such as you might desire
To lay yourself in—for it is correct to so perform this on behalf of your own.
As for me—never once let it be deemed fitting, while I happen to live,
For this my father's town to have me within it.

Instead, let me dwell in the mountains—to where is Cithaeron 1400
Renowned because of me; for my mother and my father

While they lived appointed it the tomb I would lay in.
Thus, there I will depart, killed as they desired.

Yet I do know that neither a sickness
Nor anything similar will destroy me, for I would never have been saved 1405
From that death unless it was for some horrible injury.

Hence I shall await that destiny which is mine—whatever its nature.
As for my sons—do not, Creon, add them

To your care. For they are men, and therefore will never Lack the ability—wherever they are—to survive. 1410

But as for those unfortunate ones, my girls
For whom my table of food was never separate from

Nor who were ever without me, so that whatever I touched
Would be shared between us—
Attend to them, for me. 1415

Would that you could let my hands touch them
And they lament for my injuries.

Let these things be, Lord—
Let them be so, you of this noble race. 1420

For if my hands could reach them
I would believe they were mine just as when I had my sight.

For if my hands could reach them
I would believe they were mine just as when I had my sight.

[Enter Antigone and Ismene]

What is this?

Before the gods!—Do I not hear those whom I love,

Weeping? Has Creon let them make lament for me,
 Sending here those who are dearest to me—my daughters?
 Is this right? 1425

CREON

It is right. For I prepared this for you.
 I conjectured this—your present delight—since it has possessed you before.

OEDIPUS

Then good fortune to you on your path—
 And may you be guarded by a better daimon than was my fate! 1430

My children—where are you? Come here—here
 To these my hands of he who is your brother:
 These of he who planted you and which assisted your father
 To see in this way with what before were clear eyes.
 He, my children, who sees nothing, who enquires about nothing— 1435

He who is exposed as fathering you from where he himself was sown.
 Even though I cannot behold you, I lament for you
 Because I know of the bitter life left to you
 Which mortals will cause you to live. 1440

For what gathering of townfolk could you go to?
 What festivals—from where you would not return, lamenting,
 To your dwelling instead of watching the spectacle?

And when you become ripe for marriage
 Who is there who exists, my children, who would chance it—
 Accepting the rebukes that will as painful for they who begat me 1445
 As they will be for you?

For what injury is not here? Your father killed his father;
 He seeded her who had brought him forth
 And from where he himself was sown
 You were born—in the same way he himself was acquired. 1450

Such as this will you be rebuked with. Who then will marry you?
 Such a person does not exist. No, my children, it is without doubt
 That you must go to waste unsown and unmarried.
 Son of Menoeceus! You are the only father
 Who is left to them, for we who planted them are destroyed: 1455

Both of us. Watch that they do not wander
 As beggars, without a man, since they are of your family—
 Or that they become the equal of me in misfortune.
 Rather, favour them because you see them at such an age as this,
 Deserted by everyone—except for yourself. 1460

Agree to this, noble lord, and touch me with your hand.
 And you, my children—had you judgement, I would even now
 Have given you much advice. As it is, let your supplication be
 To live where it is allowed and to obtain a life more agreeable
 Than that of the father who planted you. 1465

CREON

Let this abundance of lamentation pass away—and go into those chambers.

OEDIPUS

I shall obey, although it is not pleasing.

CREON

All fine things have their season.

OEDIPUS

Do you know my conditions for going?

CREON

Speak them—and I, having heard them, will know.

1470

OEDIPUS

Send me far from this land.

CREON

That gift comes from the gods.

OEDIPUS

But the gods must detest me!

CREON

Then swiftly will your wish be fulfilled.

OEDIPUS

But do you grant this?

1475

CREON

I have no desire to speak idly about things I cannot judge.

OEDIPUS

Then now lead me from here.

CREON

Move away from your children—and go.

OEDIPUS

But do not take them from me.

CREON

Do not desire to be master in all things:

1480

For you are without the strength which assisted you during your life.

CHORUS

You who dwell in my fatherland, Thebes, observe—here is Oedipus,

He who understood that famous enigma and was a strong man:

What clansman did not behold that fortune without envy?

But what a tide of problems have come over him!

Therefore, look toward that ending which is for us mortals

To observe that particular day—calling no one lucky until,

Without the pain of injury, they are conveyed beyond life's ending.

China

The dates of the selections in this chapter range from approximately the 500s B.C.E. to approximately the 200s B.C.E., which is mostly the Warring States Period in Chinese history (476-221 B.C.E.). During this time period, the different regions of China (each with a separate ruler and tradition) fought to maintain independence and defend their borders. In 221 B.C.E., the Qin/Chin ruler finished the process of unifying China by the sword, becoming the first Emperor. These texts, therefore, predate the unification of China, and some of the advice offered (in particular in the works of Confucius) are meant to be seen in the context of multiple kingdoms; Confucius suggests leaving a kingdom and going elsewhere if the leadership is corrupt, which was no longer possible post-unification.

The works in this chapter are foundational texts to later Chinese literature, politics, and philosophy. The Analects of Confucius, with its focus on ethical and moral issues, provides the reader with a guide to proper behavior (according to Confucius). The Shi king (The Book of Songs/The Book of Odes/The Classic of Poetry) may have been edited by Confucius, according to some sources, and the poems themselves offer a glimpse into the expectations of that society. Daoism, the other influential perspective at that time, is found in the Zhuangzi (both a book and the possible name of the author), which offers a challenge to the Confucian way of thinking. Finally, Sun Tzu's Art of War remains an influential text to this day, found as it is on the reading lists of military academies everywhere.

Students who are not familiar with Chinese literature and culture often have the same first problem: how to pronounce the names. Chinese is a complex language, so the answer is not straightforward. In Chinese, words must be pronounced using the proper tone. For example, the word “ma” can be pronounced four different ways, and in each case it is a different word.

- First tone: Rising tone (start low and go up the scale, like a rising accent mark)
- Second tone: Falling tone (start high and drop lower, like a falling accent mark)
- Third tone: Falling and Rising tone (begin high, drop low, and rise again, so that the sound is “U” shaped)
- Fourth tone: Steady and High tone (high pitched, steady sound)

Since each syllable of the word has a tone, and most translations do not mark which tone to use, there can be no way for students to know how to pronounce the word (except by taking a class in Chinese). Even then, students would have to choose between a class on Mandarin (spoken in the north) and Cantonese (spoken in the south), since they are too different to be taught as the same language. In addition to several major dialects of Chinese, there are numerous sub-dialects: some unintelligible to each other.

An additional challenge for students looking for research on these texts is that the same word can be spelled differently, depending on the pinyin system used. Pinyin is the way that Chinese characters are converted into letters, so that the sound of the character is approximated. For example, the Chinese character for “person” looks like a type of wishbone, but it is converted to “ren” in pinyin.

There are two major systems of pinyin (and some minor), and each one uses a different format to approximate sounds; both systems can be found online and in anthologies. The medieval Chinese poet Li Bo can be spelled Li Po or Li Bai, depending on the system used. In fact, the western name for “China” results from a series of translations, beginning with the pinyin “Chin” (more commonly translated as “Qin” these days) to describe the dynasty that unified the country in 221 B.C.E.; in other words, “China” is the land of the Chin/Qin.

AS YOU READ, CONSIDER THE FOLLOWING QUESTIONS:

- What do Confucius and Sun Tzu expect from leaders? What is the proper behavior toward subordinates, and how do you know?

- How do Confucian ideals contrast with Daoist ideals? What seems to be the reason for the difference?
- What kind of behavior does society expect from its people, particularly in the Shi king (Book of Songs)? How do we know, based on the text?
- What is the definition of heroism in these works, based on the texts themselves?
- How would a Confucian hero be different from other ancient world heroes in other chapters, and why?

THE ANALECTS

Confucius (551-479 B.C.E.)

Compiled ca. 200 B.C.E.

China

Confucius (or “Kongzi” in Chinese) was deeply concerned about the problem of social chaos and explored ways to achieve social order. Inspired by the early rulers of the Zhou Dynasty (ca. 1045-256 B.C.E.), whom he considered exemplary, Confucius developed his philosophy about government, morality, ethics, social roles, and the importance of rituals. As a teacher, Confucius had a great number of disciples during his time. The Analects, translated as “Collected Conversations,” were compiled by later Confucian scholars, reaching their complete form around the second century B.C.E. The Analects are perhaps the most well-known text in Confucianism, belonging to the so-called “Four Books” of this tradition. Confucianism, which is known as Ruxue (Doctrine of the Sages) in China, forms a large part of the basis of many East Asian cultures.

Confucius, Translated James Legge

The Master “Is it not pleasant to learn with a constant perseverance and application?

“Is it not delightful to have friends coming from distant quarters?

“Is he not a man of complete virtue, who feels no discomposure though men may take no note of him?”

The philosopher Yu said, “They are few who, being filial and fraternal, are fond of offending against their superiors. There have been none, who, not liking to offend against their superiors, have been fond of stirring up confusion.

“The superior man bends his attention to what is radical. That being established, all practical courses naturally grow up. Filial piety and fraternal submission,—are they not the root of all benevolent actions?”

The Master said, “Fine words and an insinuating appearance are seldom associated with true virtue.”

The philosopher Tsang said, “I daily examine myself on three points:—whether, in transacting business for others, I may have been not faithful;—whether, in intercourse with friends, I may have been not sincere;—whether I may have not mastered and practiced the instructions of my teacher.”

The Master said, “To rule a country of a thousand chariots, there must be reverent attention to business, and sincerity; economy in expenditure, and love for men; and the employment of the people at the proper seasons.”

The Master said, “A youth, when at home, should be filial, and, abroad, respectful to his elders. He should be earnest and truthful. He should overflow in love to all, and cultivate the friendship of the good. When he has time and opportunity, after the performance of these things, he should employ them in polite studies.”

Tsze-hsia said, “If a man withdraws his mind from the love of beauty, and applies it as sincerely to the love of the virtuous; if, in serving his parents, he can exert his utmost strength; if, in serving his prince, he can devote his life; if, in his intercourse with his friends, his words are sincere:—although men say that he has not learned, I will certainly say that he has.

The Master said, “If the scholar be not grave, he will not call forth any veneration, and his learning will not be solid.

“Hold faithfulness and sincerity as first principles.

“Have no friends not equal to yourself.

“When you have faults, do not fear to abandon them.”

The philosopher Tsang said, “Let there be a careful attention to perform the funeral rites to parents, and let them be followed when long gone with the ceremonies of sacrifice;—then the virtue of the people will resume its proper excellence.”

Tsze-ch'in asked Tsze-kung saying, “When our master comes to any country, he does not fail to learn all about its government. Does he ask his information? or is it given to him?”

Tsze-kung said, “Our master is benign, upright, courteous, temperate, and complaisant and thus he gets his information. The master's mode of asking information,—is it not different from that of other men?”

The Master said, “While a man's father is alive, look at the bent of his will; when his father is dead, look at his conduct. If for three years he does not alter from the way of his father, he may be called filial.”

The philosopher Yu said, “In practicing the rules of propriety, a natural ease is to be prized. In the ways prescribed by the ancient kings, this is the excellent quality, and in things small and great we follow them.

“Yet it is not to be observed in all cases. If one, knowing how such ease should be prized, manifests it, without regulating it by the rules of propriety, this likewise is not to be done.”

The philosopher Yu said, “When agreements are made according to what is right, what is spoken can be made good. When respect is shown according to what is proper, one keeps far from shame and disgrace. When the parties upon whom a man leans are proper persons to be intimate with, he can make them his guides and masters.”

The Master said, “He who aims to be a man of complete virtue in his food does not seek to gratify his appetite, nor in his dwelling place does he seek the appliances of ease; he is earnest in what he is doing, and careful in his speech; he frequents the company of men of principle that he may be rectified:—such a person may be said indeed to love to learn.”

Tsze-kung said, “What do you pronounce concerning the poor man who yet does not flatter, and the rich man who is not proud?” The Master replied, “They will do; but they are not equal to him, who, though poor, is yet cheerful, and to him, who, though rich, loves the rules of propriety.”

Tsze-kung replied, “It is said in the Book of Poetry, ‘As you cut and then file, as you carve and then polish.’—The meaning is the same, I apprehend, as that which you have just expressed.”

The Master said, “With one like Ts'ze, I can begin to talk about the odes. I told him one point, and he knew its proper sequence.”

The Master said, “I will not be afflicted at men's not knowing me; I will be afflicted that I do not know men.”

The Master said, “He who exercises government by means of his virtue may be compared to the north polar star, which keeps its place and all the stars turn towards it.”

The Master said, “In the Book of Poetry are three hundred pieces, but the design of them all may be embraced in one sentence ‘Having no depraved thoughts.’”

The Master said, “If the people be led by laws, and uniformity sought to be given them by punishments, they will try to avoid the punishment, but have no sense of shame.

“If they be led by virtue, and uniformity sought to be given them by the rules of propriety, they will have the sense of shame, and moreover will become good.”

The Master said, “At fifteen, I had my mind bent on learning.

“At thirty, I stood firm.

“At forty, I had no doubts.

“At fifty, I knew the decrees of Heaven.

“At sixty, my ear was an obedient organ for the reception of truth.

“At seventy, I could follow what my heart desired, without transgressing what was right.”

Mang I asked what filial piety was. The Master said, “It is not being disobedient.”

Soon after, as Fan Ch'ih was driving him, the Master told him, saying, “Mang-sun asked me what filial piety was, and I answered him,—‘not being disobedient.’”

Fan Ch'ih said, “What did you mean?” The Master replied, “That parents, when alive, be served according to propriety; that, when dead, they should be buried according to propriety; and that they should be sacrificed to according to propriety.”

Mang Wu asked what filial piety was. The Master said, "Parents are anxious lest their children should be sick."

Tsze-yu asked what filial piety was. The Master said, "The filial piety nowadays means the support of one's parents. But dogs and horses likewise are able to do something in the way of support;—without reverence, what is there to distinguish the one support given from the other?"

Tsze-hsia asked what filial piety was. The Master said, "The difficulty is with the countenance. If, when their elders have any troublesome affairs, the young take the toil of them, and if, when the young have wine and food, they set them before their elders, is THIS to be considered filial piety?"

The Master said, "I have talked with Hui for a whole day, and he has not made any objection to anything I said;—as if he were stupid. He has retired, and I have examined his conduct when away from me, and found him able to illustrate my teachings. Hui!—He is not stupid."

The Master said, "See what a man does.

"Mark his motives.

"Examine in what things he rests.

"How can a man conceal his character? How can a man conceal his character?"

The Master said, "If a man keeps cherishing his old knowledge, so as continually to be acquiring new, he may be a teacher of others."

The Master said, "The accomplished scholar is not a utensil."

Tsze-kung asked what constituted the superior man. The Master said, "He acts before he speaks, and afterwards speaks according to his actions."

The Master said, "The superior man is catholic and not partisan. The mean man is partisan and not catholic."

The Master said, "Learning without thought is labor lost; thought without learning is perilous."

The Master said, "The study of strange doctrines is injurious indeed!"

The Master said, "Yu, shall I teach you what knowledge is? When you know a thing, to hold that you know it; and when you do not know a thing, to allow that you do not know it;—this is knowledge."

Tsze-chang was learning with a view to official emolument.

The Master said, "Hear much and put aside the points of which you stand in doubt, while you speak cautiously at the same time of the others:—then you will afford few occasions for blame. See much and put aside the things which seem perilous, while you are cautious at the same time in carrying the others into practice: then you will have few occasions for repentance. When one gives few occasions for blame in his words, and few occasions for repentance in his conduct, he is in the way to get emolument."

The Duke Ai asked, saying, "What should be done in order to secure the submission of the people?" Confucius replied, "Advance the upright and set aside the crooked, then the people will submit. Advance the crooked and set aside the upright, then the people will not submit."

Chi K'ang asked how to cause the people to reverence their ruler, to be faithful to him, and to go on to nerve themselves to virtue. The Master said, "Let him preside over them with gravity;—then they will reverence him. Let him be final and kind to all;—then they will be faithful to him. Let him advance the good and teach the incompetent;—then they will eagerly seek to be virtuous."

Some one addressed Confucius, saying, "Sir, why are you not engaged in the government?"

The Master said, "What does the Shu-ching say of filial piety?—'You are final, you discharge your brotherly duties. These qualities are displayed in government.' This then also constitutes the exercise of government. Why must there be THAT—making one be in the government?"

The Master said, "I do not know how a man without truthfulness is to get on. How can a large carriage be made to go without the crossbar for yoking the oxen to, or a small carriage without the arrangement for yoking the horses?"

Tsze-chang asked whether the affairs of ten ages after could be known.

Confucius said, "The Yin dynasty followed the regulations of the Hsia: wherein it took from or added to them may be known. The Chau dynasty has followed the regulations of Yin: wherein it took from or added to them may be known. Some other may follow the Chau, but though it should be at the distance of a hundred ages, its affairs may be known."

The Master said, "For a man to sacrifice to a spirit which does not belong to him is flattery.

"To see what is right and not to do it is want of courage."

3

Confucius said of the head of the Chi family, who had eight rows of pantomimes in his area, "If he can bear to do this, what may he not bear to do?"

The three families used the Yungode, while the vessels were being removed, at the conclusion of the sacrifice.

The Master said, "Assisting are the princes;—the son of heaven looks profound and grave;—what application can these words have in the hall of the three families?"

The Master said, "If a man be without the virtues proper to humanity, what has he to do with the rites of propriety? If a man be without the virtues proper to humanity, what has he to do with music?"

Lin Fang asked what was the first thing to be attended to in ceremonies.

The Master said, "A great question indeed!"

"In festive ceremonies, it is better to be sparing than extravagant. In the ceremonies of mourning, it is better that there be deep sorrow than in minute attention to observances."

The Master said, "The rude tribes of the east and north have their princes, and are not like the States of our great land which are without them."

The chief of the Chi family was about to sacrifice to the T'ai mountain. The Master said to Zan Yu, "Can you not save him from this?" He answered, "I cannot." Confucius said, "Alas! will you say that the T'ai mountain is not so discerning as Lin Fang?"

The Master said, "The student of virtue has no contentions. If it be said he cannot avoid them, shall this be in archery? But he bows complaisantly to his competitors; thus he ascends the hall, descends, and exacts the forfeit of drinking. In his contention, he is still the Chun-tsze."

Tsze-hsia asked, saying, "What is the meaning of the passage—'The pretty dimples of her artful smile! The well—defined black and white of her eye! The plain ground for the colors?'"

The Master said, "The business of laying on the colors follows the preparation of the plain ground."

"Ceremonies then are a subsequent thing?" The Master said, "It is Shang who can bring out my meaning. Now I can begin to talk about the odes with him."

The Master said, "I could describe the ceremonies of the Hsia dynasty, but Chi cannot sufficiently attest my words. I could describe the ceremonies of the Yin dynasty, but Sung cannot sufficiently attest my words. They cannot do so because of the insufficiency of their records and wise men. If those were sufficient, I could adduce them in support of my words."

The Master said, "At the great sacrifice, after the pouring out of the libation, I have no wish to look on."

Some one asked the meaning of the great sacrifice. The Master said, "I do not know. He who knew its meaning would find it as easy to govern the kingdom as to look on this"—pointing to his palm.

He sacrificed to the dead, as if they were present. He sacrificed to the spirits, as if the spirits were present.

The Master said, "I consider my not being present at the sacrifice, as if I did not sacrifice."

Wang-sun Chia asked, saying, "What is the meaning of the saying, 'It is better to pay court to the furnace than to the southwest corner?'"

The Master said, "Not so. He who offends against Heaven has none to whom he can pray."

The Master said, "Chau had the advantage of viewing the two past dynasties. How complete and elegant are its regulations! I follow Chau."

The Master, when he entered the grand temple, asked about everything. Some one said, "Who say that the son of the man of Tsau knows the rules of propriety! He has entered the grand temple and asks about everything." The Master heard the remark, and said, "This is a rule of propriety."

The Master said, "In archery it is not going through the leather which is the principal thing;—because people's strength is not equal. This was the old way."

Tsze-kung wished to do away with the offering of a sheep connected with the inauguration of the first day of each month.

The Master said, "Ts'ze, you love the sheep; I love the ceremony."

The Master said, "The full observance of the rules of propriety in serving one's prince is accounted by people to be flattery."

The Duke Ting asked how a prince should employ his ministers, and how ministers should serve their prince. Confucius replied, "A prince should employ his minister according to the rules of propriety; ministers should serve their prince with faithfulness."

The Master said, "The Kwan Tsu is expressive of enjoyment without being licentious, and of grief without being hurtfully excessive."

The Duke Ai asked Tsai Wo about the altars of the spirits of the land. Tsai Wo replied, "The Hsia sovereign planted the pine tree about them; the men of the Yin planted the cypress; and the men of the Chau planted the chestnut tree, meaning thereby to cause the people to be in awe."

When the Master heard it, he said, "Things that are done, it is needless to speak about; things that have had their course, it is needless to remonstrate about; things that are past, it is needless to blame."

The Master said, "Small indeed was the capacity of Kwan Chung!"

Some one said, "Was Kwan Chung parsimonious?" "Kwan," was the reply, "had the San Kwei, and his officers performed no double duties; how can he be considered parsimonious?”

“Then, did Kwan Chung know the rules of propriety?” The Master said, “The princes of States have a screen intercepting the view at their gates. Kwan had likewise a screen at his gate. The princes of States on any friendly meeting between two of them, had a stand on which to place their inverted cups. Kwan had also such a stand. If Kwan knew the rules of propriety, who does not know them?”

The Master instructing the grand music master of Lu said, “How to play music may be known. At the commencement of the piece, all the parts should sound together. As it proceeds, they should be in harmony while severally distinct and flowing without break, and thus on to the conclusion.”

The border warden at Yi requested to be introduced to the Master, saying, “When men of superior virtue have come to this, I have never been denied the privilege of seeing them.” The followers of the sage introduced him, and when he came out from the interview, he said, “My friends, why are you distressed by your master’s loss of office? The kingdom has long been without the principles of truth and right; Heaven is going to use your master as a bell with its wooden tongue.”

The Master said of the Shao that it was perfectly beautiful and also perfectly good. He said of the Wu that it was perfectly beautiful but not perfectly good.

The Master said, “High station filled without indulgent generosity; ceremonies performed without reverence; mourning conducted without sorrow;—wherewith should I contemplate such ways?”

4

The Master said, “It is virtuous manners which constitute the excellence of a neighborhood. If a man in selecting a residence do not fix on one where such prevail, how can he be wise?”

The Master said, “Those who are without virtue cannot abide long either in a condition of poverty and hardship, or in a condition of enjoyment. The virtuous rest in virtue; the wise desire virtue.”

The Master said, “It is only the truly virtuous man, who can love, or who can hate, others.”

The Master said, “If the will be set on virtue, there will be no practice of wickedness.”

The Master said, “Riches and honors are what men desire. If they cannot be obtained in the proper way, they should not be held. Poverty and meanness are what men dislike. If they cannot be avoided in the proper way, they should not be avoided.

“If a superior man abandon virtue, how can he fulfill the requirements of that name?”

“The superior man does not, even for the space of a single meal, act contrary to virtue. In moments of haste, he cleaves to it. In seasons of danger, he cleaves to it.”

The Master said, “I have not seen a person who loved virtue, or one who hated what was not virtuous. He who loved virtue, would esteem nothing above it. He who hated what is not virtuous, would practice virtue in such a way that he would not allow anything that is not virtuous to approach his person.

“Is any one able for one day to apply his strength to virtue? I have not seen the case in which his strength would be insufficient.

“Should there possibly be any such case, I have not seen it.”

The Master said, “The faults of men are characteristic of the class to which they belong. By observing a man’s faults, it may be known that he is virtuous.”

The Master said, “If a man in the morning hear the right way, he may die in the evening hear regret.”

The Master said, “A scholar, whose mind is set on truth, and who is ashamed of bad clothes and bad food, is not fit to be discoursed with.”

The Master said, “The superior man, in the world, does not set his mind either for anything, or against anything; what is right he will follow.”

The Master said, “The superior man thinks of virtue; the small man thinks of comfort. The superior man thinks of the sanctions of law; the small man thinks of favors which he may receive.”

The Master said: “He who acts with a constant view to his own advantage will be much murmured against.”

The Master said, “If a prince is able to govern his kingdom with the complaisance proper to the rules of propriety, what difficulty will he have? If he cannot govern it with that complaisance, what has he to do with the rules of propriety?”

The Master said, “A man should say, I am not concerned that I have no place, I am concerned how I may fit myself for one. I am not concerned that I am not known, I seek to be worthy to be known.”

The Master said, “Shan, my doctrine is that of an all-pervading unity.” The disciple Tsang replied, “Yes.”

The Master went out, and the other disciples asked, saying, “What do his words mean?” Tsang said, “The doctrine of our master is to be true to the principles—of our nature and the benevolent exercise of them to others,—this and nothing more.”

The Master said, "The mind of the superior man is conversant with righteousness; the mind of the mean man is conversant with gain."

The Master said, "When we see men of worth, we should think of equaling them; when we see men of a contrary character, we should turn inwards and examine ourselves."

The Master said, "In serving his parents, a son may remonstrate with them, but gently; when he sees that they do not incline to follow his advice, he shows an increased degree of reverence, but does not abandon his purpose; and should they punish him, he does not allow himself to murmur."

The Master said, "While his parents are alive, the son may not go abroad to a distance. If he does go abroad, he must have a fixed place to which he goes."

The Master said, "If the son for three years does not alter from the way of his father, he may be called filial."

The Master said, "The years of parents may by no means not be kept in the memory, as an occasion at once for joy and for fear."

The Master said, "The reason why the ancients did not readily give utterance to their words, was that they feared lest their actions should not come up to them."

The Master said, "The cautious seldom err."

The Master said, "The superior man wishes to be slow in his speech and earnest in his conduct."

The Master said, "Virtue is not left to stand alone. He who practices it will have neighbors."

Tsze-yu said, "In serving a prince, frequent remonstrances lead to disgrace. Between friends, frequent reproofs make the friendship distant."

The Master said of Kung-ye Ch'ang that he might be wived; although he was put in bonds, he had not been guilty of any crime. Accordingly, he gave him his own daughter to wife.

Of Nan Yung he said that if the country were well governed he would not be out of office, and if it were in governed, he would escape punishment and disgrace. He gave him the daughter of his own elder brother to wife.

The Master said of Tsze-chien, "Of superior virtue indeed is such a man! If there were not virtuous men in Lu, how could this man have acquired this character?"

Tsze-kung asked, "What do you say of me, Ts'ze!" The Master said, "You are a utensil." "What utensil?" "A gemmed sacrificial utensil."

Some one said, "Yung is truly virtuous, but he is not ready with his tongue."

The Master said, "What is the good of being ready with the tongue? They who encounter men with smartness of speech for the most part procure themselves hatred. I know not whether he be truly virtuous, but why should he show readiness of the tongue?"

The Master was wishing Ch'i-tiao K'ai to enter an official employment. He replied, "I am not yet able to rest in the assurance of this." The Master was pleased.

The Master said, "My doctrines make no way. I will get upon a raft, and float about on the sea. He that will accompany me will be Yu, I dare say." Tsze-lu hearing this was glad, upon which the Master said, "Yu is fonder of daring than I am. He does not exercise his judgment upon matters."

Mang Wu asked about Tsze-lu, whether he was perfectly virtuous. The Master said, "I do not know."

He asked again, when the Master replied, "In a kingdom of a thousand chariots, Yu might be employed to manage the military levies, but I do not know whether he be perfectly virtuous."

"And what do you say of Ch'iu?" The Master replied, "In a city of a thousand families, or a clan of a hundred chariots, Ch'iu might be employed as governor, but I do not know whether he is perfectly virtuous."

"What do you say of Ch'ih?" The Master replied, "With his sash girt and standing in a court, Ch'ih might be employed to converse with the visitors and guests, but I do not know whether he is perfectly virtuous."

The Master said to Tsze-kung, "Which do you consider superior, yourself or Hui?"

Tsze-kung replied, "How dare I compare myself with Hui? Hui hears one point and knows all about a subject; I hear one point, and know a second."

The Master said, "You are not equal to him. I grant you, you are not equal to him."

Tsai Yu being asleep during the daytime, the Master said, "Rotten wood cannot be carved; a wall of dirty earth will not receive the trowel. This Yu,—what is the use of my reproving him?"

The Master said, "At first, my way with men was to hear their words, and give them credit for their conduct. Now my way is to hear their words, and look at their conduct. It is from Yu that I have learned to make this change."

The Master said, "I have not seen a firm and unbending man." Some one replied, "There is Shan Ch'ang."

"Ch'ang," said the Master, "is under the influence of his passions; how can he be pronounced firm and unbending?"

Tsze-kung said, "What I do not wish men to do to me, I also wish not to do to men." The Master said, "Ts'ze, you have not attained to that.”

Tsze-kung said, “The Master’s personal displays of his principles and ordinary descriptions of them may be heard. His discourses about man’s nature, and the way of Heaven, cannot be heard.”

When Tsze-lu heard anything, if he had not yet succeeded in carrying it into practice, he was only afraid lest he should hear something else.

Tsze-kung asked, saying, “On what ground did Kung-wan get that title of Wan?”

The Master said, “He was of an active nature and yet fond of learning, and he was not ashamed to ask and learn of his inferiors!—On these grounds he has been styled Wan.”

The Master said of Tsze-ch’an that he had four of the characteristics of a superior man—in his conduct of himself, he was humble; in serving his superior, he was respectful; in nourishing the people, he was kind; in ordering the people, he was just.”

The Master said, “Yen P’ing knew well how to maintain friendly intercourse. The acquaintance might be long, but he showed the same respect as at first.”

The Master said, “Tsang Wan kept a large tortoise in a house, on the capitals of the pillars of which he had hills made, and with representations of duckweed on the small pillars above the beams supporting the rafters.—Of what sort was his wisdom?”

Tsze-chang asked, saying, “The minister Tsze-wan thrice took office, and manifested no joy in his countenance. Thrice he retired from office, and manifested no displeasure. He made it a point to inform the new minister of the way in which he had conducted the government; what do you say of him?” The Master replied, “He was loyal.” “Was he perfectly virtuous?” “I do not know. How can he be pronounced perfectly virtuous?”

Tsze-chang proceeded, “When the officer Ch’ui killed the prince of Ch’i, Ch’an Wan, though he was the owner of forty horses, abandoned them and left the country. Coming to another state, he said, ‘They are here like our great officer, Ch’ui,’ and left it. He came to a second state, and with the same observation left it also;—what do you say of him?” The Master replied, “He was pure.” “Was he perfectly virtuous?” “I do not know. How can he be pronounced perfectly virtuous?”

Chi Wan thought thrice, and then acted. When the Master was informed of it, he said, “Twice may do.”

The Master said, “When good order prevailed in his country, Ning Wu acted the part of a wise man. When his country was in disorder, he acted the part of a stupid man. Others may equal his wisdom, but they cannot equal his stupidity.”

When the Master was in Ch’an, he said, “Let me return! Let me return! The little children of my school are ambitious and too hasty. They are accomplished and complete so far, but they do not know how to restrict and shape themselves.”

The Master said, “Po-i and Shu-ch’i did not keep the former wickednesses of men in mind, and hence the resentments directed towards them were few.”

The Master said, “Who says of Weishang Kao that he is upright? One begged some vinegar of him, and he begged it of a neighbor and gave it to the man.”

The Master said, “Fine words, an insinuating appearance, and excessive respect;—Tso Ch’iu-ming was ashamed of them. I also am ashamed of them. To conceal resentment against a person, and appear friendly with him;—Tso Ch’iu-ming was ashamed of such conduct. I also am ashamed of it.”

Yen Yuan and Chi Lu being by his side, the Master said to them, “Come, let each of you tell his wishes.”

Tsze-lu said, “I should like, having chariots and horses, and light fur clothes, to share them with my friends, and though they should spoil them, I would not be displeased.”

Yen Yuan said, “I should like not to boast of my excellence, nor to make a display of my meritorious deeds.”

Tsze-lu then said, “I should like, sir, to hear your wishes.” The Master said, “They are, in regard to the aged, to give them rest; in regard to friends, to show them sincerity; in regard to the young, to treat them tenderly.”

The Master said, “It is all over. I have not yet seen one who could perceive his faults, and inwardly accuse himself.”

The Master said, “In a hamlet of ten families, there may be found one honorable and sincere as I am, but not so fond of learning.”

The Master said, “There is Yung!—He might occupy the place of a prince.”

Chung-kung asked about Tsze-sang Po-tsze. The Master said, “He may pass. He does not mind small matters.”

Chung-kung said, “If a man cherish in himself a reverential feeling of the necessity of attention to business, though he may be easy in small matters in his government of the people, that may be allowed. But if he cherish in himself that easy feeling, and also carry it out in his practice, is not such an easymode of procedure excessive?”

The Master said, "Yung's words are right."

The Duke Ai asked which of the disciples loved to learn.

Confucius replied to him, "There was Yen Hui; he loved to learn. He did not transfer his anger; he did not repeat a fault. Unfortunately, his appointed time was short and he died; and now there is not such another. I have not yet heard of any one who loves to learn as he did."

Tsze-hwa being employed on a mission to Ch'i, the disciple Zan requested grain for his mother. The Master said, "Give her a fu." Yen requested more. "Give her a yi," said the Master. Yen gave her five ping.

The Master said, "When Ch'ih was proceeding to Ch'i, he had fat horses to his carriage, and wore light furs. I have heard that a superior man helps the distressed, but does not add to the wealth of the rich."

Yuan Sze being made governor of his town by the Master, he gave him nine hundred measures of grain, but Sze declined them.

The Master said, "Do not decline them. May you not give them away in the neighborhoods, hamlets, towns, and villages?"

The Master, speaking of Chung-kung, said, "If the calf of a brindled cow be red and homed, although men may not wish to use it, would the spirits of the mountains and rivers put it aside?"

The Master said, "Such was Hui that for three months there would be nothing in his mind contrary to perfect virtue. The others may attain to this on some days or in some months, but nothing more."

Chi K'ang asked about Chung-yu, whether he was fit to be employed as an officer of government. The Master said, "Yu is a man of decision; what difficulty would he find in being an officer of government?" K'ang asked, "Is Ts'ze fit to be employed as an officer of government?" and was answered, "Ts'ze is a man of intelligence; what difficulty would he find in being an officer of government?" And to the same question about Ch'iu the Master gave the same reply, saying, "Ch'iu is a man of various ability."

The chief of the Chi family sent to ask Min Tsze-ch'ien to be governor of Pi. Min Tszech'ien said, "Decline the offer for me politely. If any one come again to me with a second invitation, I shall be obliged to go and live on the banks of the Wan."

Po-niu being ill, the Master went to ask for him. He took hold of his hand through the window, and said, "It is killing him. It is the appointment of Heaven, alas! That such a man should have such a sickness! That such a man should have such a sickness!"

The Master said, "Admirable indeed was the virtue of Hui! With a single bamboo dish of rice, a single gourd dish of drink, and living in his mean narrow lane, while others could not have endured the distress, he did not allow his joy to be affected by it. Admirable indeed was the virtue of Hui!"

Yen Ch'iu said, "It is not that I do not delight in your doctrines, but my strength is insufficient." The Master said, "Those whose strength is insufficient give over in the middle of the way but now you limit yourself."

The Master said to Tsze-hsia, "Do you be a scholar after the style of the superior man, and not after that of the mean man."

Tsze-yu being governor of Wu-ch'ang, the Master said to him, "Have you got good men there?" He answered, "There is Tan-t'ai Miehming, who never in walking takes a short cut, and never comes to my office, excepting on public business."

The Master said, "Mang Chih-fan does not boast of his merit. Being in the rear on an occasion of flight, when they were about to enter the gate, he whipped up his horse, saying, 'It is not that I dare to be last. My horse would not advance.'"

The Master said, "Without the specious speech of the litanist T'o and the beauty of the prince Chao of Sung, it is difficult to escape in the present age."

The Master said, "Who can go out but by the door? How is it that men will not walk according to these ways?"

The Master said, "Where the solid qualities are in excess of accomplishments, we have rusticity; where the accomplishments are in excess of the solid qualities, we have the manners of a clerk. When the accomplishments and solid qualities are equally blended, we then have the man of virtue."

The Master said, "Man is born for uprightness. If a man lose his uprightness, and yet live, his escape from death is the effect of mere good fortune."

The Master said, "They who know the truth are not equal to those who love it, and they who love it are not equal to those who delight in it."

The Master said, "To those whose talents are above mediocrity, the highest subjects may be announced. To those who are below mediocrity, the highest subjects may not be announced."

Fan Ch'ih asked what constituted wisdom. The Master said, "To give one's self earnestly to the duties due to men, and, while respecting spiritual beings, to keep aloof from them, may be called wisdom." He asked about perfect virtue. The Master said, "The man of virtue makes the difficulty to be overcome his first business, and success only a subsequent consideration;—this may be called perfect virtue."

The Master said, "The wise find pleasure in water; the virtuous find pleasure in hills. The wise are active; the virtuous are tranquil. The wise are joyful; the virtuous are long-lived."

The Master said, "Ch'i, by one change, would come to the State of Lu. Lu, by one change, would come to a State where true principles predominated."

The Master said, "A cornered vessel without corners—a strange cornered vessel! A strange cornered vessel!"

Tsai Wo asked, saying, "A benevolent man, though it be told him,—'There is a man in the well' will go in after him, I suppose." Confucius said, "Why should he do so?" A superior man may be made to go to the well, but he cannot be made to go down into it. He may be imposed upon, but he cannot be fooled."

The Master said, "The superior man, extensively studying all learning, and keeping himself under the restraint of the rules of propriety, may thus likewise not overstep what is right."

The Master having visited Nan-tsze, Tsze-lu was displeased, on which the Master swore, saying, "Wherein I have done improperly, may Heaven reject me, may Heaven reject me!"

The Master said, "Perfect is the virtue which is according to the Constant Mean! Rare for a long time has been its practice among the people."

Tsze-kung said, "Suppose the case of a man extensively conferring benefits on the people, and able to assist all, what would you say of him? Might he be called perfectly virtuous?" The Master said, "Why speak only of virtue in connection with him? Must he not have the qualities of a sage? Even Yao and Shun were still solicitous about this.

"Now the man of perfect virtue, wishing to be established himself, seeks also to establish others; wishing to be enlarged himself, he seeks also to enlarge others.

"To be able to judge of others by what is nigh in ourselves;—this may be called the art of virtue."

Z

The Master said, "A transmitter and not a maker, believing in and loving the ancients, I venture to compare myself with our old P'ang."

The Master said, "The silent treasuring up of knowledge; learning without satiety; and instructing others without being wearied:—which one of these things belongs to me?"

The Master said, "The leaving virtue without proper cultivation; the not thoroughly discussing what is learned; not being able to move towards righteousness of which a knowledge is gained; and not being able to change what is not good:—these are the things which occasion me solicitude."

When the Master was unoccupied with business, his manner was easy, and he looked pleased.

The Master said, "Extreme is my decay. For a long time, I have not dreamed, as I was wont to do, that I saw the duke of Chau."

The Master said, "Let the will be set on the path of duty.

"Let every attainment in what is good be firmly grasped.

"Let perfect virtue be accorded with.

"Let relaxation and enjoyment be found in the polite arts."

The Master said, "From the man bringing his bundle of dried flesh for my teaching upwards, I have never refused instruction to any one."

The Master said, "I do not open up the truth to one who is not eager to get knowledge, nor help out any one who is not anxious to explain himself. When I have presented one corner of a subject to any one, and he cannot from it learn the other three, I do not repeat my lesson."

When the Master was eating by the side of a mourner, he never ate to the full.

He did not sing on the same day in which he had been weeping.

The Master said to Yen Yuan, "When called to office, to undertake its duties; when not so called, to be retired;—it is only I and you who have attained to this."

Tsze-lu said, "If you had the conduct of the armies of a great state, whom would you have to act with you?"

The Master said, "I would not have him to act with me, who will unarmed attack a tiger, or cross a river without a boat, dying without any regret. My associate must be the man who proceeds to action full of solicitude, who is fond of adjusting his plans, and then carries them into execution."

The Master said, "If the search for riches is sure to be successful, though I should become a groom with whip in hand to get them, I will do so. As the search may not be successful, I will follow after that which I love."

The things in reference to which the Master exercised the greatest caution were—fasting, war, and sickness.

When the Master was in Ch'i, he heard the Shao, and for three months did not know the taste of flesh. "I did not think" he said, "that music could have been made so excellent as this."

Yen Yu said, "Is our Master for the ruler of Wei?" Tsze-kung said, "Oh! I will ask him."

He went in accordingly, and said, "What sort of men were Po-i and Shu-ch'i?" "They were ancient worthies," said the Master. "Did they have any repinings because of their course?" The Master again replied, "They sought to act virtuously, and they did so; what was there for them to repine about?" On this, Tsze-kung went out and said, "Our Master is not for him."

The Master said, "With coarse rice to eat, with water to drink, and my bended arm for a pillow;—I have still joy in the midst of these things. Riches and honors acquired by unrighteousness, are to me as a floating cloud."

The Master said, "If some years were added to my life, I would give fifty to the study of the Yi, and then I might come to be without great faults."

The Master's frequent themes of discourse were—the Odes, the History, and the maintenance of the Rules of Propriety. On all these he frequently discoursed.

The Duke of Sheh asked Tsze-lu about Confucius, and Tsze-lu did not answer him.

The Master said, "Why did you not say to him,—He is simply a man, who in his eager pursuit of knowledge forgets his food, who in the joy of its attainment forgets his sorrows, and who does not perceive that old age is coming on?"

The Master said, "I am not one who was born in the possession of knowledge; I am one who is fond of antiquity, and earnest in seeking it there."

The subjects on which the Master did not talk, were—extraordinary things, feats of strength, disorder, and spiritual beings.

The Master said, "When I walk along with two others, they may serve me as my teachers. I will select their good qualities and follow them, their bad qualities and avoid them."

The Master said, "Heaven produced the virtue that is in me. Hwan T'ui—what can he do to me?"

The Master said, "Do you think, my disciples, that I have any concealments? I conceal nothing from you. There is nothing which I do that is not shown to you, my disciples; that is my way."

There were four things which the Master taught,—letters, ethics, devotion of soul, and truthfulness.

The Master said, "A sage it is not mine to see; could I see a man of real talent and virtue, that would satisfy me."

The Master said, "A good man it is not mine to see; could I see a man possessed of constancy, that would satisfy me."

"Having not and yet affecting to have, empty and yet affecting to be full, straitened and yet affecting to be at ease:—it is difficult with such characteristics to have constancy."

The Master angled,—but did not use a net. He shot,—but not at birds perching.

The Master said, "There may be those who act without knowing why. I do not do so. Hearing much and selecting what is good and following it; seeing much and keeping it in memory: this is the second style of knowledge."

It was difficult to talk profitably and reputably with the people of Hu-hsiang, and a lad of that place having had an interview with the Master, the disciples doubted.

The Master said, "I admit people's approach to me without committing myself as to what they may do when they have retired. Why must one be so severe? If a man purify himself to wait upon me, I receive him so purified, without guaranteeing his past conduct."

The Master said, "Is virtue a thing remote? I wish to be virtuous, and lo! virtue is at hand."

The minister of crime of Ch'an asked whether the duke Chao knew propriety, and Confucius said, "He knew propriety."

Confucius having retired, the minister bowed to Wu-ma Ch'i to come forward, and said, "I have heard that the superior man is not a partisan. May the superior man be a partisan also? The prince married a daughter of the house of WU, of the same surname with himself, and called her,—'The elder Tsze of Wu.' If the prince knew propriety, who does not know it?"

Wu-ma Ch'i reported these remarks, and the Master said, "I am fortunate! If I have any errors, people are sure to know them."

When the Master was in company with a person who was singing, if he sang well, he would make him repeat the song, while he accompanied it with his own voice.

The Master said, "In letters I am perhaps equal to other men, but the character of the superior man, carrying out in his conduct what he professes, is what I have not yet attained to."

The Master said, "The sage and the man of perfect virtue;—how dare I rank myself with them? It may simply be said of me, that I strive to become such without satiety, and teach others without weariness." Kung-hsi Hwa said, "This is just what we, the disciples, cannot imitate you in."

The Master being very sick, Tsze-lu asked leave to pray for him. He said, "May such a thing be done?" Tsze-lu replied, "It may. In the Eulogies it is said, 'Prayer has been made for thee to the spirits of the upper and lower worlds.'" The Master said, "My praying has been for a long time."

The Master said, "Extravagance leads to insubordination, and parsimony to meanness. It is better to be mean than to be insubordinate."

The Master said, "The superior man is satisfied and composed; the mean man is always full of distress." The Master was mild, and yet dignified; majestic, and yet not fierce; respectful, and yet easy.

8

The Master said, "T'ai-po may be said to have reached the highest point of virtuous action. Thrice he declined the kingdom, and the people in ignorance of his motives could not express their approbation of his conduct."

The Master said, "Respectfulness, without the rules of propriety, becomes laborious bustle; carefulness, without the rules of propriety, becomes timidity; boldness, without the rules of propriety, becomes insubordination; straightforwardness, without the rules of propriety, becomes rudeness.

"When those who are in high stations perform well all their duties to their relations, the people are aroused to virtue. When old friends are not neglected by them, the people are preserved from meanness."

The philosopher Tsang being ill, he cared to him the disciples of his school, and said, "Uncover my feet, uncover my hands. It is said in the Book of Poetry, 'We should be apprehensive and cautious, as if on the brink of a deep gulf, as if treading on thin ice, I and so have I been. Now and hereafter, I know my escape from all injury to my person. O ye, my little children.'"

The philosopher Tsang being ill, Meng Chang went to ask how he was.

Tsang said to him, "When a bird is about to die, its notes are mournful; when a man is about to die, his words are good.

"There are three principles of conduct which the man of high rank should consider specially important:—that in his deportment and manner he keep from violence and heedlessness; that in regulating his countenance he keep near to sincerity; and that in his words and tones he keep far from lowness and impropriety. As to such matters as attending to the sacrificial vessels, there are the proper officers for them."

The philosopher Tsang said, "Gifted with ability, and yet putting questions to those who were not so; possessed of much, and yet putting questions to those possessed of little; having, as though he had not; full, and yet counting himself as empty; offended against, and yet entering into no altercation; formerly I had a friend who pursued this style of conduct."

The philosopher Tsang said, "Suppose that there is an individual who can be entrusted with the charge of a young orphan prince, and can be commissioned with authority over a state of a hundred li, and whom no emergency however great can drive from his principles:—is such a man a superior man? He is a superior man indeed."

The philosopher Tsang said, "The officer may not be without breadth of mind and vigorous endurance. His burden is heavy and his course is long.

"Perfect virtue is the burden which he considers it is his to sustain;—is it not heavy? Only with death does his course stop;—is it not long?"

The Master said, "It is by the Odes that the mind is aroused.

"It is by the Rules of Propriety that the character is established.

"It is from Music that the finish is received."

The Master said, "The people may be made to follow a path of action, but they may not be made to understand it."

The Master said, "The man who is fond of daring and is dissatisfied with poverty, will proceed to insubordination. So will the man who is not virtuous, when you carry your dislike of him to an extreme."

The Master said, "Though a man have abilities as admirable as those of the Duke of Chau, yet if he be proud and niggardly, those other things are really not worth being looked at."

The Master said, "It is not easy to find a man who has learned for three years without coming to be good."

The Master said, "With sincere faith he unites the love of learning; holding firm to death, he is perfecting the excellence of his course.

"Such an one will not enter a tottering state, nor dwell in a disorganized one. When right principles of government prevail in the kingdom, he will show himself; when they are prostrated, he will keep concealed.

"When a country is well governed, poverty and a mean condition are things to be ashamed of. When a country is ill governed, riches and honor are things to be ashamed of."

The Master said, "He who is not in any particular office has nothing to do with plans for the administration of its duties."

The Master said, "When the music master Chih first entered on his office, the finish of the Kwan Tsu was magnificent;—how it filled the ears!"

The Master said, "Ardent and yet not upright, stupid and yet not attentive; simple and yet not sincere:—such persons I do not understand."

The Master said, "Learn as if you could not reach your object, and were always fearing also lest you should lose it.”

The Master said, “How majestic was the manner in which Shun and Yu held possession of the empire, as if it were nothing to them!

The Master said, “Great indeed was Yao as a sovereign! How majestic was he! It is only Heaven that is grand, and only Yao corresponded to it. How vast was his virtue! The people could find no name for it.

“How majestic was he in the works which he accomplished! How glorious in the elegant regulations which he instituted!”

Shun had five ministers, and the empire was well governed.

King Wu said, “I have ten able ministers.”

Confucius said, “Is not the saying that talents are difficult to find, true? Only when the dynasties of T’ang and Yu met, were they more abundant than in this of Chau, yet there was a woman among them. The able ministers were no more than nine men.

“King Wan possessed two of the three parts of the empire, and with those he served the dynasty of Yin. The virtue of the house of Chau may be said to have reached the highest point indeed.”

The Master said, “I can find no flaw in the character of Yu. He used himself coarse food and drink, but displayed the utmost filial piety towards the spirits. His ordinary garments were poor, but he displayed the utmost elegance in his sacrificial cap and apron. He lived in a low, mean house, but expended all his strength on the ditches and water channels. I can find nothing like a flaw in Yu.”

The subjects of which the Master seldom spoke were—profitableness, and also the appointments of Heaven, and perfect virtue.

A man of the village of Ta-hsiang said, “Great indeed is the philosopher K’ung! His learning is extensive, and yet he does not render his name famous by any particular thing.”

The Master heard the observation, and said to his disciples, “What shall I practice? Shall I practice charioteering, or shall I practice archery? I will practice charioteering.”

The Master said, “The linen cap is that prescribed by the rules of ceremony, but now a silk one is worn. It is economical, and I follow the common practice.

“The rules of ceremony prescribe the bowing below the hall, but now the practice is to bow only after ascending it. That is arrogant. I continue to bow below the hall, though I oppose the common practice.”

There were four things from which the Master was entirely free. He had no foregone conclusions, no arbitrary predeterminations, no obstinacy, and no egoism.

The Master was put in fear in K’wang.

He said, “After the death of King Wan, was not the cause of truth lodged here in me?

“If Heaven had wished to let this cause of truth perish, then I, a future mortal! should not have got such a relation to that cause. While Heaven does not let the cause of truth perish, what can the people of K’wang do to me?”

A high officer asked Tsze-kung, saying, “May we not say that your Master is a sage? How various is his ability!”

Tsze-kung said, “Certainly Heaven has endowed him unlimitedly. He is about a sage. And, moreover, his ability is various.”

The Master heard of the conversation and said, “Does the high officer know me? When I was young, my condition was low, and I acquired my ability in many things, but they were mean matters. Must the superior man have such variety of ability? He does not need variety of ability. Lao said, “The Master said, ‘Having no official employment, I acquired many arts.’”

The Master said, “Am I indeed possessed of knowledge? I am not knowing. But if a mean person, who appears quite empty—like, ask anything of me, I set it forth from one end to the other, and exhaust it.”

The Master said, “The Fang bird does not come; the river sends forth no map:—it is all over with me!”

When the Master saw a person in a mourning dress, or any one with the cap and upper and lower garments of full dress, or a blind person, on observing them approaching, though they were younger than himself, he would rise up, and if he had to pass by them, he would do so hastily.

Yen Yuan, in admiration of the Master’s doctrines, sighed and said, “I looked up to them, and they seemed to become more high; I tried to penetrate them, and they seemed to become more firm; I looked at them before me, and suddenly they seemed to be behind.

“The Master, by orderly method, skillfully leads men on. He enlarged my mind with learning, and taught me the restraints of propriety.

“When I wish to give over the study of his doctrines, I cannot do so, and having exerted all my ability, there seems something to stand right up before me; but though I wish to follow and lay hold of it, I really find no way to do so.”

The Master being very ill, Tsze-lu wished the disciples to act as ministers to him.

During a remission of his illness, he said, “Long has the conduct of Yu been deceitful! By pretending to have ministers when I have them not, whom should I impose upon? Should I impose upon Heaven?”

“Moreover, than that I should die in the hands of ministers, is it not better that I should die in the hands of you, my disciples? And though I may not get a great burial, shall I die upon the road?”

Tsze-kung said, “There is a beautiful gem here. Should I lay it up in a case and keep it? or should I seek for a good price and sell it?” The Master said, “Sell it! Sell it! But I would wait for one to offer the price.”

The Master was wishing to go and live among the nine wild tribes of the east.

Some one said, “They are rude. How can you do such a thing?” The Master said, “If a superior man dwelt among them, what rudeness would there be?”

The Master said, “I returned from Wei to Lu, and then the music was reformed, and the pieces in the Royal songs and Praise songs all found their proper places.”

The Master said, “Abroad, to serve the high ministers and nobles; at home, to serve one’s father and elder brothers; in all duties to the dead, not to dare not to exert one’s self; and not to be overcome of wine:—which one of these things do I attain to?”

The Master standing by a stream, said, “It passes on just like this, not ceasing day or night!”

The Master said, “I have not seen one who loves virtue as he loves beauty.”

The Master said, “The prosecution of learning may be compared to what may happen in raising a mound. If there want but one basket of earth to complete the work, and I stop, the stopping is my own work. It may be compared to throwing down the earth on the level ground. Though but one basketful is thrown at a time, the advancing with it my own going forward.”

The Master said, “Never flagging when I set forth anything to him;—ah! that is Hui.” The Master said of Yen Yuan, “Alas! I saw his constant advance. I never saw him stop in his progress.”

The Master said, “There are cases in which the blade springs, but the plant does not go on to flower! There are cases where it flowers but fruit is not subsequently produced!”

The Master said, “A youth is to be regarded with respect. How do we know that his future will not be equal to our present? If he reach the age of forty or fifty, and has not made himself heard of, then indeed he will not be worth being regarded with respect.”

The Master said, “Can men refuse to assent to the words of strict admonition? But it is reforming the conduct because of them which is valuable. Can men refuse to be pleased with words of gentle advice? But it is unfolding their aim which is valuable. If a man be pleased with these words, but does not unfold their aim, and assents to those, but does not reform his conduct, I can really do nothing with him.”

The Master said, “Hold faithfulness and sincerity as first principles. Have no friends not equal to yourself. When you have faults, do not fear to abandon them.”

The Master said, “The commander of the forces of a large state may be carried off, but the will of even a common man cannot be taken from him.”

The Master said, “Dressed himself in a tattered robe quilted with hemp, yet standing by the side of men dressed in furs, and not ashamed;—ah! it is Yu who is equal to this!”

“He dislikes none, he covets nothing;—what can he do but what is good!”

Tsze-lu kept continually repeating these words of the ode, when the Master said, “Those things are by no means sufficient to constitute perfect excellence.”

The Master said, “When the year becomes cold, then we know how the pine and the cypress are the last to lose their leaves.”

The Master said, “The wise are free from perplexities; the virtuous from anxiety; and the bold from fear.”

The Master said, “There are some with whom we may study in common, but we shall find them unable to go along with us to principles. Perhaps we may go on with them to principles, but we shall find them unable to get established in those along with us. Or if we may get so established along with them, we shall find them unable to weigh occurring events along with us.”

“How the flowers of the aspen-plum flutter and turn! Do I not think of you? But your house is distant.”

The Master said, “It is the want of thought about it. How is it distant?”

Confucius, in his village, looked simple and sincere, and as if he were not able to speak.

When he was in the prince’s ancestral temple, or in the court, he spoke minutely on every point, but cautiously.

When he was waiting at court, in speaking with the great officers of the lower grade, he spoke freely, but in a straightforward manner; in speaking with those of the higher grade, he did so blandly, but precisely.

When the ruler was present, his manner displayed respectful uneasiness; it was grave, but self-possessed.

When the prince called him to employ him in the reception of a visitor, his countenance appeared to change, and his legs to move forward with difficulty.

He inclined himself to the other officers among whom he stood, moving his left or right arm, as their position required, but keeping the skirts of his robe before and behind evenly adjusted.

He hastened forward, with his arms like the wings of a bird.

When the guest had retired, he would report to the prince, "The visitor is not turning round any more."

When he entered the palace gate, he seemed to bend his body, as if it were not sufficient to admit him.

When he was standing, he did not occupy the middle of the gateway; when he passed in or out, he did not tread upon the threshold.

When he was passing the vacant place of the prince, his countenance appeared to change, and his legs to bend under him, and his words came as if he hardly had breath to utter them.

He ascended the reception hall, holding up his robe with both his hands, and his body bent; holding in his breath also, as if he dared not breathe.

When he came out from the audience, as soon as he had descended one step, he began to relax his countenance, and had a satisfied look. When he had got the bottom of the steps, he advanced rapidly to his place, with his arms like wings, and on occupying it, his manner still showed respectful uneasiness.

When he was carrying the scepter of his ruler, he seemed to bend his body, as if he were not able to bear its weight. He did not hold it higher than the position of the hands in making a bow, nor lower than their position in giving anything to another. His countenance seemed to change, and look apprehensive, and he dragged his feet along as if they were held by something to the ground.

In presenting the presents with which he was charged, he wore a placid appearance.

At his private audience, he looked highly pleased.

The superior man did not use a deep purple, or a puce color, in the ornaments of his dress.

Even in his undress, he did not wear anything of a red or reddish color.

In warm weather, he had a single garment either of coarse or fine texture, but he wore it displayed over an inner garment.

Over lamb's fur he wore a garment of black; over fawn's fur one of white; and over fox's fur one of yellow.

The fur robe of his undress was long, with the right sleeve short.

He required his sleeping dress to be half as long again as his body.

When staying at home, he used thick furs of the fox or the badger.

When he put off mourning, he wore all the appendages of the girdle.

His undergarment, except when it was required to be of the curtain shape, was made of silk cut narrow above and wide below.

He did not wear lamb's fur or a black cap on a visit of condolence.

On the first day of the month he put on his court robes, and presented himself at court.

When fasting, he thought it necessary to have his clothes brightly clean and made of linen cloth.

When fasting, he thought it necessary to change his food, and also to change the place where he commonly sat in the apartment.

He did not dislike to have his rice finely cleaned, nor to have his mince meat cut quite small.

He did not eat rice which had been injured by heat or damp and turned sour, nor fish or flesh which was gone. He did not eat what was discolored, or what was of a bad flavor, nor anything which was ill-cooked, or was not in season.

He did not eat meat which was not cut properly, nor what was served without its proper sauce.

Though there might be a large quantity of meat, he would not allow what he took to exceed the due proportion for the rice. It was only in wine that he laid down no limit for himself, but he did not allow himself to be confused by it.

He did not partake of wine and dried meat bought in the market.

He was never without ginger when he ate. He did not eat much.

When he had been assisting at the prince's sacrifice, he did not keep the flesh which he received overnight. The flesh of his family sacrifice he did not keep over three days. If kept over three days, people could not eat it.

When eating, he did not converse. When in bed, he did not speak.

Although his food might be coarse rice and vegetable soup, he would offer a little of it in sacrifice with a grave, respectful air.

If his mat was not straight, he did not sit on it.

When the villagers were drinking together, upon those who carried staffs going out, he also went out immediately after.

When the villagers were going through their ceremonies to drive away pestilential influences, he put on his court robes and stood on the eastern steps.

When he was sending complimentary inquiries to any one in another state, he bowed twice as he escorted the messenger away.

Chi K'ang having sent him a present of physic, he bowed and received it, saying, "I do not know it. I dare not taste it."

The stable being burned down, when he was at court, on his return he said, "Has any man been hurt?" He did not ask about the horses.

When he would adjust his mat, first taste it, and then give it away to others. When the prince sent him a gift of undressed meat, he would have it cooked, and offer it to the spirits of his ancestors. When the prince sent him a gift of a living animal, he would keep it alive.

When he was in attendance on the prince and joining in the entertainment, the prince only sacrificed. He first tasted everything.

When he was ill and the prince came to visit him, he had his head to the east, made his court robes be spread over him, and drew his girdle across them.

When the prince's order called him, without waiting for his carriage to be yoked, he went at once.

When he entered the ancestral temple of the state, he asked about everything.

When any of his friends died, if he had no relations offices, he would say, "I will bury him."

When a friend sent him a present, though it might be a carriage and horses, he did not bow.

The only present for which he bowed was that of the flesh of sacrifice.

In bed, he did not lie like a corpse. At home, he did not put on any formal deportment.

When he saw any one in a mourning dress, though it might be an acquaintance, he would change countenance; when he saw any one wearing the cap of full dress, or a blind person, though he might be in his undress, he would salute him in a ceremonious manner.

To any person in mourning he bowed forward to the crossbar of his carriage; he bowed in the same way to any one bearing the tables of population.

When he was at an entertainment where there was an abundance of provisions set before him, he would change countenance and rise up.

On a sudden clap of thunder, or a violent wind, he would change countenance.

When he was about to mount his carriage, he would stand straight, holding the cord.

When he was in the carriage, he did not turn his head quite round, he did not talk hastily, he did not point with his hands.

Seeing the countenance, it instantly rises. It flies round, and by and by settles.

The Master said, "There is the hen-pheasant on the hill bridge. At its season! At its season!" Tsze-lu made a motion to it. Thrice it smelt him and then rose.

11

The Master said, "The men of former times in the matters of ceremonies and music were rustics, it is said, while the men of these latter times, in ceremonies and music, are accomplished gentlemen.

"If I have occasion to use those things, I follow the men of former times."

The Master said, "Of those who were with me in Ch'an and Ts'ai, there are none to be found to enter my door."

Distinguished for their virtuous principles and practice, there were Yen Yuan, Min Tsze-ch'ien, Zan Po-niu, and Chung-kung; for their ability in speech, Tsai Wo and Tsze-kung; for their administrative talents, Zan Yu and Chi Lu; for their literary acquirements, Tsze-yu and Tsze-hsia.

The Master said, "Hui gives me no assistance. There is nothing that I say in which he does not delight."

The Master said, "Filial indeed is Min Tsze-ch'ien! Other people say nothing of him different from the report of his parents and brothers."

Nan Yung was frequently repeating the lines about a white scepter stone. Confucius gave him the daughter of his elder brother to wife.

Chi K'ang asked which of the disciples loved to learn. Confucius replied to him, "There was Yen Hui; he loved to learn. Unfortunately his appointed time was short, and he died. Now there is no one who loves to learn, as he did."

When Yen Yuan died, Yen Lu begged the carriage of the Master to sell and get an outer shell for his son's coffin.

The Master said, "Every one calls his son his son, whether he has talents or has not talents. There was Li; when he died, he had a coffin but no outer shell. I would not walk on foot to get a shell for him, because, having followed in the rear of the great officers, it was not proper that I should walk on foot.”

When Yen Yuan died, the Master said, “Alas! Heaven is destroying me! Heaven is destroying me!”

When Yen Yuan died, the Master bewailed him exceedingly, and the disciples who were with him said, “Master, your grief is excessive!”

“Is it excessive?” said he. “If I am not to mourn bitterly for this man, for whom should I mourn?”

When Yen Yuan died, the disciples wished to give him a great funeral, and the Master said, “You may not do so.”

The disciples did bury him in great style.

The Master said, “Hui behaved towards me as his father. I have not been able to treat him as my son. The fault is not mine; it belongs to you, O disciples.”

Chi Lu asked about serving the spirits of the dead. The Master said, “While you are not able to serve men, how can you serve their spirits?” Chi Lu added, “I venture to ask about death?” He was answered, “While you do not know life, how can you know about death?”

The disciple Min was standing by his side, looking bland and precise; Tsze-lu, looking bold and soldierly; Zan Yu and Tsze-kung, with a free and straightforward manner. The Master was pleased.

He said, “Yu, there!—he will not die a natural death.”

Some parties in Lu were going to take down and rebuild the Long Treasury.

Min Tsze-ch’ien said, “Suppose it were to be repaired after its old style;—why must it be altered and made anew?”

The Master said, “This man seldom speaks; when he does, he is sure to hit the point.”

The Master said, “What has the lute of Yu to do in my door?”

The other disciples began not to respect Tszelu. The Master said, “Yu has ascended to the hall, though he has not yet passed into the inner apartments.”

Tsze-kung asked which of the two, Shih or Shang, was the superior. The Master said, “Shih goes beyond the due mean, and Shang does not come up to it.”

“Then,” said Tsze-kung, “the superiority is with Shih, I suppose.”

The Master said, “To go beyond is as wrong as to fall short.”

The head of the Chi family was richer than the duke of Chau had been, and yet Ch’iu collected his imposts for him, and increased his wealth.

The Master said, “He is no disciple of mine. My little children, beat the drum and assail him.”

Ch’ai is simple. Shan is dull. Shih is specious. Yu is coarse.

The Master said, “There is Hui! He has nearly attained to perfect virtue. He is often in want.

“Ts’ze does not acquiesce in the appointments of Heaven, and his goods are increased by him. Yet his judgments are often correct.”

Tsze-chang asked what were the characteristics of the good man. The Master said, “He does not tread in the footsteps of others, but moreover, he does not enter the chamber of the sage.”

The Master said, “If, because a man’s discourse appears solid and sincere, we allow him to be a good man, is he really a superior man? or is his gravity only in appearance?”

Tsze-lu asked whether he should immediately carry into practice what he heard. The Master said, “There are your father and elder brothers to be consulted;—why should you act on that principle of immediately carrying into practice what you hear?” Zan Yu asked the same, whether he should immediately carry into practice what he heard, and the Master answered, “Immediately carry into practice what you hear.” Kung-hsi Hwa said, “Yu asked whether he should carry immediately into practice what he heard, and you said, ‘There are your father and elder brothers to be consulted.’ Ch’iu asked whether he should immediately carry into practice what he heard, and you said, ‘Carry it immediately into practice.’ I, Ch’ih, am perplexed, and venture to ask you for an explanation.” The Master said, “Ch’iu is retiring and slow; therefore I urged him forward. Yu has more than his own share of energy; therefore I kept him back.”

The Master was put in fear in K’wang and Yen Yuan fell behind. The Master, on his rejoining him, said, “I thought you had died.” Hui replied, “While you were alive, how should I presume to die?”

Chi Tsze-zan asked whether Chung Yu and Zan Ch’iu could be called great ministers.

The Master said, “I thought you would ask about some extraordinary individuals, and you only ask about Yu and Ch’iu!

“What is called a great minister, is one who serves his prince according to what is right, and when he finds he cannot do so, retires.

“Now, as to Yu and Ch’iu, they may be called ordinary ministers.”

Tsze-zan said, “Then they will always follow their chief;—win they?”

The Master said, “In an act of parricide or regicide, they would not follow him.”

Tsze-lu got Tsze-kao appointed governor of Pi.

The Master said, "You are injuring a man's son."

Tsze-lu said, "There are, there, common people and officers; there are the altars of the spirits of the land and grain. Why must one read books before he can be considered to have learned?"

The Master said, "It is on this account that I hate your glib-tongued people."

Tsze-lu, Tsang Hsi, Zan Yu, and Kung-hsi Hwa were sitting by the Master.

He said to them, "Though I am a day or so older than you, do not think of that.

"From day to day you are saying, 'We are not known.' If some ruler were to know you, what would you like to do?"

Tsze-lu hastily and lightly replied, "Suppose the case of a state of ten thousand chariots; let it be straitened between other large cities; let it be suffering from invading armies; and to this let there be added a famine in corn and in all vegetables:—if I were intrusted with the government of it, in three years' time I could make the people to be bold, and to recognize the rules of righteous conduct." The Master smiled at him.

Turning to Yen Yu, he said, "Ch'iu, what are your wishes?" Ch'iu replied, "Suppose a state of sixty or seventy li square, or one of fifty or sixty, and let me have the government of it;—in three years' time, I could make plenty to abound among the people. As to teaching them the principles of propriety, and music, I must wait for the rise of a superior man to do that."

"What are your wishes, Ch'ih," said the Master next to Kung-hsi Hwa. Ch'ih replied, "I do not say that my ability extends to these things, but I should wish to learn them. At the services of the ancestral temple, and at the audiences of the princes with the sovereign, I should like, dressed in the dark square-made robe and the black linen cap, to act as a small assistant."

Last of all, the Master asked Tsang Hsi, "Tien, what are your wishes?" Tien, pausing as he was playing on his lute, while it was yet twanging, laid the instrument aside, and "My wishes," he said, "are different from the cherished purposes of these three gentlemen." "What harm is there in that?" said the Master; "do you also, as well as they, speak out your wishes." Tien then said, "In this, the last month of spring, with the dress of the season all complete, along with five or six young men who have assumed the cap, and six or seven boys, I would wash in the I, enjoy the breeze among the rain altars, and return home singing." The Master heaved a sigh and said, "I give my approval to Tien."

The three others having gone out, Tsang Hsi remained behind, and said, "What do you think of the words of these three friends?" The Master replied, "They simply told each one his wishes."

Hsi pursued, "Master, why did you smile at Yu?"

He was answered, "The management of a state demands the rules of propriety. His words were not humble; therefore I smiled at him."

Hsi again said, "But was it not a state which Ch'iu proposed for himself?" The reply was, "Yes; did you ever see a territory of sixty or seventy li or one of fifty or sixty, which was not a state?"

Once more, Hsi inquired, "And was it not a state which Ch'ih proposed for himself?" The Master again replied, "Yes; who but princes have to do with ancestral temples, and with audiences but the sovereign? If Ch'ih were to be a small assistant in these services, who could be a great one?"

12

Yen Yuan asked about perfect virtue. The Master said, "To subdue one's self and return to propriety, is perfect virtue. If a man can for one day subdue himself and return to propriety, an under heaven will ascribe perfect virtue to him. Is the practice of perfect virtue from a man himself, or is it from others?"

Yen Yuan said, "I beg to ask the steps of that process." The Master replied, "Look not at what is contrary to propriety; listen not to what is contrary to propriety; speak not what is contrary to propriety; make no movement which is contrary to propriety." Yen Yuan then said, "Though I am deficient in intelligence and vigor, I will make it my business to practice this lesson."

Chung-kung asked about perfect virtue. The Master said, "It is, when you go abroad, to behave to every one as if you were receiving a great guest; to employ the people as if you were assisting at a great sacrifice; not to do to others as you would not wish done to yourself; to have no murmuring against you in the country, and none in the family." Chung-kung said, "Though I am deficient in intelligence and vigor, I will make it my business to practice this lesson."

Sze-ma Niu asked about perfect virtue.

The Master said, "The man of perfect virtue is cautious and slow in his speech."

"Cautious and slow in his speech!" said Niu;—"is this what is meant by perfect virtue?" The Master said, "When a man feels the difficulty of doing, can he be other than cautious and slow in speaking?"

Sze-ma Niu asked about the superior man. The Master said, "The superior man has neither anxiety nor fear." "Being without anxiety or fear!" said Niu; "does this constitute what we call the superior man?"

The Master said, "When internal examination discovers nothing wrong, what is there to be anxious about, what is there to fear?"

Sze-ma Niu, full of anxiety, said, "Other men all have their brothers, I only have not."

Tsze-hsia said to him, "There is the following saying which I have heard—'Death and life have their determined appointment; riches and honors depend upon Heaven.'

"Let the superior man never fail reverentially to order his own conduct, and let him be respectful to others and observant of propriety:—then all within the four seas will be his brothers. What has the superior man to do with being distressed because he has no brothers?"

Tsze-chang asked what constituted intelligence. The Master said, "He with whom neither slander that gradually soaks into the mind, nor statements that startle like a wound in the flesh, are successful may be called intelligent indeed. Yea, he with whom neither soaking slander, nor startling statements, are successful, may be called farseeing."

Tsze-kung asked about government. The Master said, "The requisites of government are that there be sufficiency of food, sufficiency of military equipment, and the confidence of the people in their ruler."

Tsze-kung said, "If it cannot be helped, and one of these must be dispensed with, which of the three should be foregone first?" "The military equipment," said the Master.

Tsze-kung again asked, "If it cannot be helped, and one of the remaining two must be dispensed with, which of them should be foregone?" The Master answered, "Part with the food. From of old, death has been the lot of an men; but if the people have no faith in their rulers, there is no standing for the state."

Chi Tsze-ch'ang said, "In a superior man it is only the substantial qualities which are wanted;—why should we seek for ornamental accomplishments?"

Tsze-kung said, "Alas! Your words, sir, show you to be a superior man, but four horses cannot overtake the tongue. Ornament is as substance; substance is as ornament. The hide of a tiger or a leopard stripped of its hair, is like the hide of a dog or a goat stripped of its hair."

The Duke Ai inquired of Yu Zo, saying, "The year is one of scarcity, and the returns for expenditure are not sufficient;—what is to be done?"

Yu Zo replied to him, "Why not simply tithe the people?"

"With two tenths, said the duke, "I find it not enough;—how could I do with that system of one tenth?"

Yu Zo answered, "If the people have plenty, their prince will not be left to want alone. If the people are in want, their prince cannot enjoy plenty alone."

Tsze-chang having asked how virtue was to be exalted, and delusions to be discovered, the Master said, "Hold faithfulness and sincerity as first principles, and be moving continually to what is right,—this is the way to exalt one's virtue.

"You love a man and wish him to live; you hate him and wish him to die. Having wished him to live, you also wish him to die. This is a case of delusion. 'It may not be on account of her being rich, yet you come to make a difference.'"

The Duke Ching, of Ch'i, asked Confucius about government. Confucius replied, "There is government, when the prince is prince, and the minister is minister; when the father is father, and the son is son."

"Good!" said the duke; "if, indeed, the prince be not prince, the not minister, the father not father, and the son not son, although I have my revenue, can I enjoy it?"

The Master said, "Ah! it is Yu, who could with half a word settle litigations!"

Tsze-lu never slept over a promise.

The Master said, "In hearing litigations, I am like any other body. What is necessary, however, is to cause the people to have no litigations."

Tsze-chang asked about government. The Master said, "The art of governing is to keep its affairs before the mind without weariness, and to practice them with undeviating consistency."

The Master said, "By extensively studying all learning, and keeping himself under the restraint of the rules of propriety, one may thus likewise not err from what is right."

The Master said, "The superior man seeks to perfect the admirable qualities of men, and does not seek to perfect their bad qualities. The mean man does the opposite of this."

Chi K'ang asked Confucius about government. Confucius replied, "To govern means to rectify. If you lead on the people with correctness, who will dare not to be correct?"

Chi K'ang, distressed about the number of thieves in the state, inquired of Confucius how to do away with them. Confucius said, "If you, sir, were not covetous, although you should reward them to do it, they would not steal."

Chi K'ang asked Confucius about government, saying, "What do you say to killing the unprincipled for the good of the principled?" Confucius replied, "Sir, in carrying on your government, why should you use killing at all? Let your evinced desires be for what is good, and the people will be good. The relation between superiors and inferiors is like that between the wind and the grass. The grass must bend, when the wind blows across it."

Tsze-chang asked, "What must the officer be, who may be said to be distinguished?"

The Master said, "What is it you call being distinguished?"

Tsze-chang replied, "It is to be heard of through the state, to be heard of throughout his clan."

The Master said, "That is notoriety, not distinction."

"Now the man of distinction is solid and straightforward, and loves righteousness. He examines people's words, and looks at their countenances. He is anxious to humble himself to others. Such a man will be distinguished in the country; he will be distinguished in his clan."

"As to the man of notoriety, he assumes the appearance of virtue, but his actions are opposed to it, and he rests in this character without any doubts about himself. Such a man will be heard of in the country; he will be heard of in the clan."

Fan Ch'ih rambling with the Master under the trees about the rain altars, said, "I venture to ask how to exalt virtue, to correct cherished evil, and to discover delusions."

The Master said, "Truly a good question!"

"If doing what is to be done be made the first business, and success a secondary consideration:—is not this the way to exalt virtue? To assail one's own wickedness and not assail that of others;—is not this the way to correct cherished evil? For a morning's anger to disregard one's own life, and involve that of his parents;—is not this a case of delusion?"

Fan Ch'ih asked about benevolence. The Master said, "It is to love all men." He asked about knowledge. The Master said, "It is to know all men."

Fan Ch'ih did not immediately understand these answers.

The Master said, "Employ the upright and put aside all the crooked; in this way the crooked can be made to be upright."

Fan Ch'ih retired, and, seeing Tsze-hsia, he said to him, "A Little while ago, I had an interview with our Master, and asked him about knowledge. He said, 'Employ the upright, and put aside all the crooked;—in this way, the crooked will be made to be upright.' What did he mean?"

Tsze-hsia said, "Truly rich is his saying!"

"Shun, being in possession of the kingdom, selected from among all the people, and employed Kai-yao-on which all who were devoid of virtue disappeared. T'ang, being in possession of the kingdom, selected from among all the people, and employed I Yin-and an who were devoid of virtue disappeared."

Tsze-kung asked about friendship. The Master said, "Faithfully admonish your friend, and skillfully lead him on. If you find him impracticable, stop. Do not disgrace yourself."

The philosopher Tsang said, "The superior man on grounds of culture meets with his friends, and by friendship helps his virtue."

13

Tsze-lu asked about government. The Master said, "Go before the people with your example, and be laborious in their affairs."

He requested further instruction, and was answered, "Be not weary in these things."

Chung-kung, being chief minister to the head of the Chi family, asked about government. The Master said, "Employ first the services of your various officers, pardon small faults, and raise to office men of virtue and talents."

Chung-kung said, "How shall I know the men of virtue and talent, so that I may raise them to office?" He was answered, "Raise to office those whom you know. As to those whom you do not know, will others neglect them?"

Tsze-lu said, "The ruler of Wei has been waiting for you, in order with you to administer the government. What will you consider the first thing to be done?"

The Master replied, "What is necessary is to rectify names."

"So! indeed!" said Tsze-lu. "You are wide of the mark! Why must there be such rectification?"

The Master said, "How uncultivated you are, Yu! A superior man, in regard to what he does not know, shows a cautious reserve."

"If names be not correct, language is not in accordance with the truth of things. If language be not in accordance with the truth of things, affairs cannot be carried on to success."

"When affairs cannot be carried on to success, proprieties and music do not flourish. When proprieties and music do not flourish, punishments will not be properly awarded. When punishments are not properly awarded, the people do not know how to move hand or foot."

“Therefore a superior man considers it necessary that the names he uses may be spoken appropriately, and also that what he speaks may be carried out appropriately. What the superior man requires is just that in his words there may be nothing incorrect.”

Fan Ch'ih requested to be taught husbandry. The Master said, “I am not so good for that as an old husbandman.” He requested also to be taught gardening, and was answered, “I am not so good for that as an old gardener.”

Fan Ch'ih having gone out, the Master said, “A small man, indeed, is Fan Hsu! If a superior man love propriety, the people will not dare not to be reverent. If he love righteousness, the people will not dare not to submit to his example. If he love good faith, the people will not dare not to be sincere. Now, when these things obtain, the people from all quarters will come to him, bearing their children on their backs; what need has he of a knowledge of husbandry?”

The Master said, “Though a man may be able to recite the three hundred odes, yet if, when intrusted with a governmental charge, he knows not how to act, or if, when sent to any quarter on a mission, he cannot give his replies unassisted, notwithstanding the extent of his learning, of what practical use is it?”

The Master said, “When a prince's personal conduct is correct, his government is effective without the issuing of orders. If his personal conduct is not correct, he may issue orders, but they will not be followed.”

The Master said, “The governments of Lu and Wei are brothers.”

The Master said of Ching, a scion of the ducal family of Wei, that he knew the economy of a family well. When he began to have means, he said, “Ha! here is a collection—!” When they were a little increased, he said, “Ha! this is complete!” When he had become rich, he said, “Ha! this is admirable!”

When the Master went to Weil Zan Yu acted as driver of his carriage.

The Master observed, “How numerous are the people!”

Yu said, “Since they are thus numerous, what more shall be done for them?” “Enrich them, was the reply.

“And when they have been enriched, what more shall be done?” The Master said, “Teach them.”

The Master said, “If there were any of the princes who would employ me, in the course of twelve months, I should have done something considerable. In three years, the government would be perfected.”

The Master said, “‘If good men were to govern a country in succession for a hundred years, they would be able to transform the violently bad, and dispense with capital punishments.’ True indeed is this saying!”

The Master said, “If a truly royal ruler were to arise, it would stir require a generation, and then virtue would prevail.”

The Master said, “If a minister make his own conduct correct, what difficulty will he have in assisting in government? If he cannot rectify himself, what has he to do with rectifying others?”

The disciple Zan returning from the court, the Master said to him, “How are you so late?” He replied, “We had government business.” The Master said, “It must have been family affairs. If there had been government business, though I am not now in office, I should have been consulted about it.”

The Duke Ting asked whether there was a single sentence which could make a country prosperous. Confucius replied, “Such an effect cannot be expected from one sentence.

“There is a saying, however, which people have — ‘To be a prince is difficult; to be a minister is not easy.’

“If a ruler knows this,—the difficulty of being a prince,—may there not be expected from this one sentence the prosperity of his country?”

The duke then said, “Is there a single sentence which can ruin a country?” Confucius replied, “Such an effect as that cannot be expected from one sentence. There is, however, the saying which people have—‘I have no pleasure in being a prince, but only in that no one can offer any opposition to what I say!’

“If a ruler's words be good, is it not also good that no one oppose them? But if they are not good, and no one opposes them, may there not be expected from this one sentence the ruin of his country?”

The Duke of Sheh asked about government.

The Master said, “Good government obtains when those who are near are made happy, and those who are far off are attracted.”

Tsze-hsia! being governor of Chu-fu, asked about government. The Master said, “Do not be desirous to have things done quickly; do not look at small advantages. Desire to have things done quickly prevents their being done thoroughly. Looking at small advantages prevents great affairs from being accomplished.”

The Duke of Sheh informed Confucius, saying, “Among us here there are those who may be styled upright in their conduct. If their father have stolen a sheep, they will bear witness to the fact.”

Confucius said, “Among us, in our part of the country, those who are upright are different from this. The father conceals the misconduct of the son, and the son conceals the misconduct of the father. Uprightness is to be found in this.”

Fan Ch'ih asked about perfect virtue. The Master said, “It is, in retirement, to be sedately grave; in the management of business, to be reverently attentive; in intercourse with others, to be strictly sincere. Though a man go among rude, uncultivated tribes, these qualities may not be neglected.”

Tsze-kung asked, saying, “What qualities must a man possess to entitle him to be called an officer? The Master said, “He who in his conduct of himself maintains a sense of shame, and when sent to any quarter will not disgrace his prince’s commission, deserves to be called an officer.”

Tsze-kung pursued, “I venture to ask who may be placed in the next lower rank?” And he was told, “He whom the circle of his relatives pronounce to be filial, whom his fellow villagers and neighbors pronounce to be fraternal.”

Again the disciple asked, “I venture to ask about the class still next in order.” The Master said, “They are determined to be sincere in what they say, and to carry out what they do. They are obstinate little men. Yet perhaps they may make the next class.”

Tsze-kung finally inquired, “Of what sort are those of the present day, who engage in government?” The Master said “Pooh! they are so many pecks and hampers, not worth being taken into account.”

The Master said, “Since I cannot get men pursuing the due medium, to whom I might communicate my instructions, I must find the ardent and the cautiously-decided. The ardent will advance and lay hold of truth; the cautiously-decided will keep themselves from what is wrong.”

The Master said, “The people of the south have a saying — ‘A man without constancy cannot be either a wizard or a doctor.’ Good!

“Inconstant in his virtue, he will be visited with disgrace.”

The Master said, “This arises simply from not attending to the prognostication.”

The Master said, “The superior man is affable, but not adulatory; the mean man is adulatory, but not affable.”

Tsze-kung asked, saying, “What do you say of a man who is loved by all the people of his neighborhood?” The Master replied, “We may not for that accord our approval of him.” “And what do you say of him who is hated by all the people of his neighborhood?” The Master said, “We may not for that conclude that he is bad. It is better than either of these cases that the good in the neighborhood love him, and the bad hate him.”

The Master said, “The superior man is easy to serve and difficult to please. If you try to please him in any way which is not accordant with right, he will not be pleased. But in his employment of men, he uses them according to their capacity. The mean man is difficult to serve, and easy to please. If you try to please him, though it be in a way which is not accordant with right, he may be pleased. But in his employment of men, he wishes them to be equal to everything.”

The Master said, “The superior man has a dignified ease without pride. The mean man has pride without a dignified ease.”

The Master said, “The firm, the enduring, the simple, and the modest are near to virtue.”

Tsze-lu asked, saying, “What qualities must a man possess to entitle him to be called a scholar?” The Master said, “He must be thus,—earnest, urgent, and bland:—among his friends, earnest and urgent; among his brethren, bland.”

The Master said, “Let a good man teach the people seven years, and they may then likewise be employed in war.”

The Master said, “To lead an uninstructed people to war, is to throw them away.”

Hsien asked what was shameful. The Master said, “When good government prevails in a state, to be thinking only of salary; and, when bad government prevails, to be thinking, in the same way, only of salary;—this is shameful.”

“When the love of superiority, boasting, resentments, and covetousness are repressed, this may be deemed perfect virtue.”

The Master said, “This may be regarded as the achievement of what is difficult. But I do not know that it is to be deemed perfect virtue.”

The Master said, “The scholar who cherishes the love of comfort is not fit to be deemed a scholar.”

The Master said, “When good government prevails in a state, language may be lofty and bold, and actions the same. When bad government prevails, the actions may be lofty and bold, but the language may be with some reserve.”

The Master said, “The virtuous will be sure to speak correctly, but those whose speech is good may not always be virtuous. Men of principle are sure to be bold, but those who are bold may not always be men of principle.”

Nan-kung Kwo, submitting an inquiry to Confucius, said, “I was skillful at archery, and Ao could move a boat along upon the land, but neither of them died a natural death. Yu and Chi personally wrought at the toils of husbandry, and they became possessors of the kingdom.” The Master made no reply; but when Nan-kung Kwo went out, he said, “A superior man indeed is this! An esteemer of virtue indeed is this!”

The Master said, "Superior men, and yet not always virtuous, there have been, alas! But there never has been a mean man, and, at the same time, virtuous."

The Master said, "Can there be love which does not lead to strictness with its object? Can there be loyalty which does not lead to the instruction of its object?"

The Master said, "In preparing the governmental notifications, P'i Shan first made the rough draft; Shi-shu examined and discussed its contents; Tsze-yu, the manager of foreign intercourse, then polished the style; and, finally, Tsze-ch'an of Tung-li gave it the proper elegance and finish."

Some one asked about Tsze-ch'an. The Master said, "He was a kind man."

He asked about Tsze-hsi. The Master said, "That man! That man!"

He asked about Kwan Chung. "For him," said the Master, "the city of Pien, with three hundred families, was taken from the chief of the Po family, who did not utter a murmuring word, though, to the end of his life, he had only coarse rice to eat."

The Master said, "To be poor without murmuring is difficult. To be rich without being proud is easy."

The Master said, "Mang Kung-ch'ò is more than fit to be chief officer in the families of Chao and Wei, but he is not fit to be great officer to either of the states Tang or Hsieh."

Tsze-lu asked what constituted a COMPLETE man. The Master said, "Suppose a man with the knowledge of Tsang Wu-chung, the freedom from covetousness of Kung-ch'ò, the bravery of Chwang of Pien, and the varied talents of Zan Ch'iu; add to these the accomplishments of the rules of propriety and music;—such a one might be reckoned a COMPLETE man."

He then added, "But what is the necessity for a complete man of the present day to have all these things? The man, who in the view of gain, thinks of righteousness; who in the view of danger is prepared to give up his life; and who does not forget an old agreement however far back it extends:—such a man may be reckoned a COMPLETE man."

The Master asked Kung-ming Chia about Kung-shu Wan, saying, "Is it true that your master speaks not, laughs not, and takes not?"

Kung-ming Chia replied, "This has arisen from the reporters going beyond the truth.—My master speaks when it is the time to speak, and so men do not get tired of his speaking. He laughs when there is occasion to be joyful, and so men do not get tired of his laughing. He takes when it is consistent with righteousness to do so, and so men do not get tired of his taking." The Master said, "So! But is it so with him?"

The Master said, "Tsang Wu-chung, keeping possession of Fang, asked of the duke of Lu to appoint a successor to him in his family. Although it may be said that he was not using force with his sovereign, I believe he was."

The Master said, "The duke Wan of Tsin was crafty and not upright. The duke Hwan of Ch'i was upright and not crafty."

Tsze-lu said, "The Duke Hwan caused his brother Chiu to be killed, when Shao Hu died, with his master, but Kwan Chung did not die. May not I say that he was wanting in virtue?"

The Master said, "The Duke Hwan assembled all the princes together, and that not with weapons of war and chariots:—it was all through the influence of Kwan Chung. Whose beneficence was like his? Whose beneficence was like his?"

Tsze-kung said, "Kwan Chung, I apprehend was wanting in virtue. When the Duke Hwan caused his brother Chiu to be killed, Kwan Chung was not able to die with him. Moreover, he became prime minister to Hwan."

The Master said, "Kwan Chung acted as prime minister to the Duke Hwan made him leader of all the princes, and united and rectified the whole kingdom. Down to the present day, the people enjoy the gifts which he conferred. But for Kwan Chung, we should now be wearing our hair unbound, and the lappets of our coats buttoning on the left side.

"Will you require from him the small fidelity of common men and common women, who would commit suicide in a stream or ditch, no one knowing anything about them?"

The great officer, Hsien, who had been family minister to Kung-shu Wan, ascended to the prince's court in company with Wan.

The Master, having heard of it, said, "He deserved to be considered WAN (the accomplished)."

The Master was speaking about the unprincipled course of the duke Ling of Weil when Ch'i K'ang said, "Since he is of such a character, how is it he does not lose his state?"

Confucius said, "The Chung-shu Yu has the superintendence of his guests and of strangers; the litanist, T'ò, has the management of his ancestral temple; and Wang-sun Chia has the direction of the army and forces:—with such officers as these, how should he lose his state?"

The Master said, "He who speaks without modesty will find it difficult to make his words good."

Chan Ch'ang murdered the Duke Chien of Ch'i.

Confucius bathed, went to court and informed the Duke Ai, saying, "Chan Hang has slain his sovereign. I beg that you will undertake to punish him.”

The duke said, “Inform the chiefs of the three families of it.”

Confucius retired, and said, “Following in the rear of the great officers, I did not dare not to represent such a matter, and my prince says, ‘Inform the chiefs of the three families of it.’”

He went to the chiefs, and informed them, but they would not act. Confucius then said, “Following in the rear of the great officers, I did not dare not to represent such a matter.”

Tsze-lu asked how a ruler should be served. The Master said, “Do not impose on him, and, moreover, withstand him to his face.”

The Master said, “The progress of the superior man is upwards; the progress of the mean man is downwards.”

The Master said, “In ancient times, men learned with a view to their own improvement. Nowadays, men learn with a view to the approbation of others.”

Chu Po-yu sent a messenger with friendly inquiries to Confucius.

Confucius sat with him, and questioned him. “What,” said he! “is your master engaged in?” The messenger replied, “My master is anxious to make his faults few, but he has not yet succeeded.” He then went out, and the Master said, “A messenger indeed! A messenger indeed!”

The Master said, “He who is not in any particular office has nothing to do with plans for the administration of its duties.”

The philosopher Tsang said, “The superior man, in his thoughts, does not go out of his place.”

The Master said, “The superior man is modest in his speech, but exceeds in his actions.”

The Master said, “The way of the superior man is threefold, but I am not equal to it. Virtuous, he is free from anxieties; wise, he is free from perplexities; bold, he is free from fear.

Tsze-kung said, “Master, that is what you yourself say.”

Tsze-kung was in the habit of comparing men together. The Master said, “Tsze must have reached a high pitch of excellence! Now, I have not leisure for this.”

The Master said, “I will not be concerned at men’s not knowing me; I will be concerned at my own want of ability.”

The Master said, “He who does not anticipate attempts to deceive him, nor think beforehand of his not being believed, and yet apprehends these things readily when they occur;—is he not a man of superior worth?”

Wei-shang Mau said to Confucius, “Ch’iu, how is it that you keep roosting about? Is it not that you are an insinuating talker?”

Confucius said, “I do not dare to play the part of such a talker, but I hate obstinacy.”

The Master said, “A horse is called a ch’i, not because of its strength, but because of its other good qualities.”

Some one said, “What do you say concerning the principle that injury should be recompensed with kindness?”

The Master said, “With what then will you recompense kindness?”

“Recompense injury with justice, and recompense kindness with kindness.”

The Master said, “Alas! there is no one that knows me.”

Tsze-kung said, “What do you mean by thus saying—that no one knows you?” The Master replied, “I do not murmur against Heaven. I do not grumble against men. My studies lie low, and my penetration rises high. But there is Heaven;—that knows me!”

The Kung-po Liao, having slandered Tsze-lu to Chi-sun, Tsze-fu Ching-po informed Confucius of it, saying, “Our master is certainly being led astray by the Kung-po Liao, but I have still power enough left to cut Liao off, and expose his corpse in the market and in the court.”

The Master said, “If my principles are to advance, it is so ordered. If they are to fall to the ground, it is so ordered. What can the Kung-po Liao do where such ordering is concerned?”

The Master said, “Some men of worth retire from the world. Some retire from particular states. Some retire because of disrespectful looks. Some retire because of contradictory language.”

The Master said, “Those who have done this are seven men.”

Tsze-lu happening to pass the night in Shih-man, the gatekeeper said to him, “Whom do you come from?”

Tsze-lu said, “From Mr. K’ung.” “It is he,—is it not?”—said the other, “who knows the impracticable nature of the times and yet will be doing in them.”

The Master was playing, one day, on a musical stone in Weil when a man carrying a straw basket passed door of the house where Confucius was, and said, “His heart is full who so beats the musical stone.”

A little while after, he added, “How contemptible is the one-ideaed obstinacy those sounds display! When one is taken no notice of, he has simply at once to give over his wish for public employment. ‘Deep water must be crossed with the clothes on; shallow water may be crossed with the clothes held up.’”

The Master said, “How determined is he in his purpose! But this is not difficult!”

Tsze-chang said, “What is meant when the Shu says that Kao-tsung, while observing the usual imperial mourning, was for three years without speaking?”

The Master said, “Why must Kao-tsung be referred to as an example of this? The ancients all did so. When the sovereign died, the officers all attended to their several duties, taking instructions from the prime minister for three years.”

The Master said, “When rulers love to observe the rules of propriety, the people respond readily to the calls on them for service.”

Tsze-lu asked what constituted the superior man. The Master said, “The cultivation of himself in reverential carefulness.” “And is this all?” said Tsze-lu. “He cultivates himself so as to give rest to others,” was the reply. “And is this all?” again asked Tsze-lu. The Master said, “He cultivates himself so as to give rest to all the people. He cultivates himself so as to give rest to all the people:—even Yao and Shun were still solicitous about this.”

Yuan Zang was squatting on his heels, and so waited the approach of the Master, who said to him, “In youth not humble as befits a junior; in manhood, doing nothing worthy of being handed down; and living on to old age:—this is to be a pest.” With this he hit him on the shank with his staff.

A youth of the village of Ch’ueh was employed by Confucius to carry the messages between him and his visitors. Some one asked about him, saying, “I suppose he has made great progress.”

The Master said, “I observe that he is fond of occupying the seat of a full-grown man; I observe that he walks shoulder to shoulder with his elders. He is not one who is seeking to make progress in learning. He wishes quickly to become a man.”

15

The Duke Ling of Wei asked Confucius about tactics. Confucius replied, “I have heard all about sacrificial vessels, but I have not learned military matters.” On this, he took his departure the next day.

When he was in Chan, their provisions were exhausted, and his followers became so in that they were unable to rise.

Tsze-lu, with evident dissatisfaction, said, “Has the superior man likewise to endure in this way?” The Master said, “The superior man may indeed have to endure want, but the mean man, when he is in want, gives way to unbridled license.”

The Master said, “Ts’ze, you think, I suppose, that I am one who learns many things and keeps them in memory?”

Tsze-kung replied, “Yes,—but perhaps it is not so?”

“No,” was the answer; “I seek a unity all pervading.”

The Master said, “You I those who know virtue are few.”

The Master said, “May not Shun be instanced as having governed efficiently without exertion? What did he do? He did nothing but gravely and reverently occupy his royal seat.”

Tsze-chang asked how a man should conduct himself, so as to be everywhere appreciated.

The Master said, “Let his words be sincere and truthful and his actions honorable and careful;—such conduct may be practiced among the rude tribes of the South or the North. If his words be not sincere and truthful and his actions not honorable and careful will he, with such conduct, be appreciated, even in his neighborhood?

“When he is standing, let him see those two things, as it were, fronting him. When he is in a carriage, let him see them attached to the yoke. Then may he subsequently carry them into practice.”

Tsze-chang wrote these counsels on the end of his sash.

The Master said, “Truly straightforward was the historiographer Yu. When good government prevailed in his state, he was like an arrow. When bad government prevailed, he was like an arrow. A superior man indeed is Chu Po-yu! When good government prevails in his state, he is to be found in office. When bad government prevails, he can roll his principles up, and keep them in his breast.”

The Master said, “When a man may be spoken with, not to speak to him is to err in reference to the man. When a man may not be spoken with, to speak to him is to err in reference to our words. The wise err neither in regard to their man nor to their words.”

The Master said, “The determined scholar and the man of virtue will not seek to live at the expense of injuring their virtue. They will even sacrifice their lives to preserve their virtue complete.”

Tsze-kung asked about the practice of virtue. The Master said, “The mechanic, who wishes to do his work well, must first sharpen his tools. When you are living in any state, take service with the most worthy among its great officers, and make friends of the most virtuous among its scholars.”

Yen Yuan asked how the government of a country should be administered.

The Master said, “Follow the seasons of Hsia.

“Ride in the state carriage of Yin.

“Wear the ceremonial cap of Chau.

“Let the music be the Shao with its pantomimes. Banish the songs of Chang, and keep far from specious talkers. The songs of Chang are licentious; specious talkers are dangerous.”

The Master said, “If a man take no thought about what is distant, he will find sorrow near at hand.”

The Master said, “It is all over! I have not seen one who loves virtue as he loves beauty.”

The Master said, “Was not Tsang Wan like one who had stolen his situation? He knew the virtue and the talents of Hui of Liu-hsia, and yet did not procure that he should stand with him in court.”

The Master said, “He who requires much from himself and little from others, will keep himself from being the object of resentment.”

The Master said, “When a man is not in the habit of saying—‘What shall I think of this? What shall I think of this?’ I can indeed do nothing with him!”

The Master said, “When a number of people are together, for a whole day, without their conversation turning on righteousness, and when they are fond of carrying out the suggestions of a small shrewdness;—theirs is indeed a hard case.”

The Master said, “The superior man in everything considers righteousness to be essential. He performs it according to the rules of propriety. He brings it forth in humility. He completes it with sincerity. This is indeed a superior man.”

The Master said, “The superior man is distressed by his want of ability. He is not distressed by men’s not knowing him.”

The Master said, “The superior man dislikes the thought of his name not being mentioned after his death.”

The Master said, “What the superior man seeks, is in himself. What the mean man seeks, is in others.”

The Master said, “The superior man is dignified, but does not wrangle. He is sociable, but not a partisan.”

The Master said, “The superior man does not promote a man simply on account of his words, nor does he put aside good words because of the man.”

Tsze-kung asked, saying, “Is there one word which may serve as a rule of practice for all one’s life?” The Master said, “Is not RECIPROCITY such a word? What you do not want done to yourself, do not do to others.”

The Master said, “In my dealings with men, whose evil do I blame, whose goodness do I praise, beyond what is proper? If I do sometimes exceed in praise, there must be ground for it in my examination of the individual.

“This people supplied the ground why the three dynasties pursued the path of straightforwardness.”

The Master said, “Even in my early days, a historiographer would leave a blank in his text, and he who had a horse would lend him to another to ride. Now, alas! there are no such things.”

The Master said, “Specious words confound virtue. Want of forbearance in small matters confounds great plans.”

The Master said, “When the multitude hate a man, it is necessary to examine into the case. When the multitude like a man, it is necessary to examine into the case.”

The Master said, “A man can enlarge the principles which he follows; those principles do not enlarge the man.”

The Master said, “To have faults and not to reform them,—this, indeed, should be pronounced having faults.”

The Master said, “I have been the whole day without eating, and the whole night without sleeping:—occupied with thinking. It was of no use. better plan is to learn.”

The Master said, “The object of the superior man is truth. Food is not his object. There is plowing;—even in that there is sometimes want. So with learning;—emolument may be found in it. The superior man is anxious lest he should not get truth; he is not anxious lest poverty should come upon him.”

The Master said, “When a man’s knowledge is sufficient to attain, and his virtue is not sufficient to enable him to hold, whatever he may have gained, he will lose again.

“When his knowledge is sufficient to attain, and he has virtue enough to hold fast, if he cannot govern with dignity, the people will not respect him.

“When his knowledge is sufficient to attain, and he has virtue enough to hold fast; when he governs also with dignity, yet if he try to move the people contrary to the rules of propriety:—full excellence is not reached.”

The Master said, “The superior man cannot be known in little matters; but he may be intrusted with great concerns. The small man may not be intrusted with great concerns, but he may be known in little matters.”

The Master said, “Virtue is more to man than either water or fire. I have seen men die from treading on water and fire, but I have never seen a man die from treading the course of virtue.”

The Master said, “Let every man consider virtue as what devolves on himself. He may not yield the performance of it even to his teacher.”

The Master said, “The superior man is correctly firm, and not firm merely.”

The Master said, “A minister, in serving his prince, reverently discharges his duties, and makes his emolument a secondary consideration.”

The Master said, "In teaching there should be no distinction of classes."

The Master said, "Those whose courses are different cannot lay plans for one another."

The Master said, "In language it is simply required that it convey the meaning."

The music master, Mien, having called upon him, when they came to the steps, the Master said, "Here are the steps." When they came to the mat for the guest to sit upon, he said, "Here is the mat." When all were seated, the Master informed him, saying, "So and so is here; so and so is here."

The music master, Mien, having gone out, Tsze-chang asked, saying, "Is it the rule to tell those things to the music master?"

The Master said, "Yes. This is certainly the rule for those who lead the blind."

16

The head of the Chi family was going to attack Chwan-yu.

Zan Yu and Chi-lu had an interview with Confucius, and said, "Our chief, Chil is going to commence operations against Chwan-yu."

Confucius said, "Ch'iu, is it not you who are in fault here?"

"Now, in regard to Chwan-yu, long ago, a former king appointed its ruler to preside over the sacrifices to the eastern Mang; moreover, it is in the midst of the territory of our state; and its ruler is a minister in direct connection with the sovereign: What has your chief to do with attacking it?"

Zan Yu said, "Our master wishes the thing; neither of us two ministers wishes it."

Confucius said, "Ch'iu, there are the words of Chau Zan, —'When he can put forth his ability, he takes his place in the ranks of office; when he finds himself unable to do so, he retires from it. How can he be used as a guide to a blind man, who does not support him when tottering, nor raise him up when fallen?'"

"And further, you speak wrongly. When a tiger or rhinoceros escapes from his cage; when a tortoise or piece of jade is injured in its repository:—whose is the fault?"

Zan Yu said, "But at present, Chwan-yu is strong and near to Pi; if our chief do not now take it, it will hereafter be a sorrow to his descendants."

Confucius said, "Ch'iu, the superior man hates those declining to say—'I want such and such a thing,' and framing explanations for their conduct.

"I have heard that rulers of states and chiefs of families are not troubled lest their people should be few, but are troubled lest they should not keep their several places; that they are not troubled with fears of poverty, but are troubled with fears of a want of contented repose among the people in their several places. For when the people keep their several places, there will be no poverty; when harmony prevails, there will be no scarcity of people; and when there is such a contented repose, there will be no rebellious upsetsings.

"So it is.—Therefore, if remoter people are not submissive, all the influences of civil culture and virtue are to be cultivated to attract them to be so; and when they have been so attracted, they must be made contented and tranquil.

"Now, here are you, Yu and Ch'iu, assisting your chief. Remoter people are not submissive, and, with your help, he cannot attract them to him. In his own territory there are divisions and downfalls, leavings and separations, and, with your help, he cannot preserve it.

"And yet he is planning these hostile movements within the state.—I am afraid that the sorrow of the Chi-sun family will not be on account of Chwan-yu, but will be found within the screen of their own court."

Confucius said, "When good government prevails in the empire, ceremonies, music, and punitive military expeditions proceed from the son of Heaven. When bad government prevails in the empire, ceremonies, music, and punitive military expeditions proceed from the princes. When these things proceed from the princes, as a rule, the cases will be few in which they do not lose their power in ten generations. When they proceed from the great officers of the princes, as a rule, the case will be few in which they do not lose their power in five generations. When the subsidiary ministers of the great officers hold in their grasp the orders of the state, as a rule the cases will be few in which they do not lose their power in three generations.

"When right principles prevail in the kingdom, government will not be in the hands of the great officers.

"When right principles prevail in the kingdom, there will be no discussions among the common people."

Confucius said, "The revenue of the state has left the ducal house now for five generations. The government has been in the hands of the great officers for four generations. On this account, the descendants of the three Hwan are much reduced."

Confucius said, "There are three friendships which are advantageous, and three which are injurious. Friendship with the upright; friendship with the sincere; and friendship with the man of much observation:—these are advantageous. Friendship with the man of specious airs; friendship with the insinuatingly soft; and friendship with the glib-tongued:—these are injurious.”

Confucius said, “There are three things men find enjoyment in which are advantageous, and three things they find enjoyment in which are injurious. To find enjoyment in the discriminating study of ceremonies and music; to find enjoyment in speaking of the goodness of others; to find enjoyment in having many worthy friends:—these are advantageous. To find enjoyment in extravagant pleasures; to find enjoyment in idleness and sauntering; to find enjoyment in the pleasures of feasting:—these are injurious.”

Confucius said, “There are three errors to which they who stand in the presence of a man of virtue and station are liable. They may speak when it does not come to them to speak;—this is called rashness. They may not speak when it comes to them to speak;—this is called concealment. They may speak without looking at the countenance of their superior;—this is called blindness.”

Confucius said, “There are three things which the superior man guards against. In youth, when the physical powers are not yet settled, he guards against lust. When he is strong and the physical powers are full of vigor, he guards against quarrelsomeness. When he is old, and the animal powers are decayed, he guards against covetousness.”

Confucius said, “There are three things of which the superior man stands in awe. He stands in awe of the ordinances of Heaven. He stands in awe of great men. He stands in awe of the words of sages.

“The mean man does not know the ordinances of Heaven, and consequently does not stand in awe of them. He is disrespectful to great men. He makes sport of the words of sages.”

Confucius said, “Those who are born with the possession of knowledge are the highest class of men. Those who learn, and so readily get possession of knowledge, are the next. Those who are dull and stupid, and yet compass the learning, are another class next to these. As to those who are dull and stupid and yet do not learn;—they are the lowest of the people.”

Confucius said, “The superior man has nine things which are subjects with him of thoughtful consideration. In regard to the use of his eyes, he is anxious to see clearly. In regard to the use of his ears, he is anxious to hear distinctly. In regard to his countenance, he is anxious that it should be benign. In regard to his demeanor, he is anxious that it should be respectful. In regard to his speech, he is anxious that it should be sincere. In regard to his doing of business, he is anxious that it should be reverently careful. In regard to what he doubts about, he is anxious to question others. When he is angry, he thinks of the difficulties his anger may involve him in. When he sees gain to be got, he thinks of righteousness.”

Confucius said, “Contemplating good, and pursuing it, as if they could not reach it; contemplating evil! and shrinking from it, as they would from thrusting the hand into boiling water:—I have seen such men, as I have heard such words.

“Living in retirement to study their aims, and practicing righteousness to carry out their principles:—I have heard these words, but I have not seen such men.”

The Duke Ching of Ch’i had a thousand teams, each of four horses, but on the day of his death, the people did not praise him for a single virtue. Po-i and Shu-ch’i died of hunger at the foot of the Shau-yang mountains, and the people, down to the present time, praise them.

Ch’an K’ang asked Po-yu, saying, “Have you heard any lessons from your father different from what we have all heard?”

Po-yu replied, “No. He was standing alone once, when I passed below the hall with hasty steps, and said to me, ‘Have you learned the Odes?’ On my replying ‘Not yet,’ he added, ‘If you do not learn the Odes, you will not be fit to converse with.’ I retired and studied the Odes.

“Another day, he was in the same way standing alone, when I passed by below the hall with hasty steps, and said to me, ‘Have you learned the rules of Propriety?’ On my replying ‘Not yet,’ he added, ‘If you do not learn the rules of Propriety, your character cannot be established.’ I then retired, and learned the rules of Propriety.

Ch’ang K’ang retired, and, quite delighted, said, “I asked one thing, and I have got three things. I have heard about the Odes. I have heard about the rules of Propriety. I have also heard that the superior man maintains a distant reserve towards his son.”

The wife of the prince of a state is called by him Fu Zan. She calls herself Hsiao T’ung. The people of the state call her Chun Fu Zan, and, to the people of other states, they call her K’wa Hsiao Chun. The people of other states also call her Chun Fu Zan.

Confucius, who, having chosen a time when Ho was not at home went to pay his respects for the gift. He met him, however, on the way.

Ho said to Confucius, "Come, let me speak with you." He then asked, "Can he be called benevolent who keeps his jewel in his bosom, and leaves his country to confusion?" Confucius replied, "No." "Can he be called wise, who is anxious to be engaged in public employment, and yet is constantly losing the opportunity of being so?" Confucius again said, "No." "The days and months are passing away; the years do not wait for us." Confucius said, "Right; I will go into office."

The Master said, "By nature, men are nearly alike; by practice, they get to be wide apart."

The Master said, "There are only the wise of the highest class, and the stupid of the lowest class, who cannot be changed."

The Master, having come to Wu-ch'ang, heard there the sound of stringed instruments and singing.

Well pleased and smiling, he said, "Why use an ox knife to kill a fowl?"

Tsze-yu replied, "Formerly, Master, I heard you say,—'When the man of high station is well instructed, he loves men; when the man of low station is well instructed, he is easily ruled.'"

The Master said, "My disciples, Yen's words are right. What I said was only in sport."

Kung-shan Fu-zao, when he was holding Pi, and in an attitude of rebellion, invited the Master to visit him, who was rather inclined to go.

Tsze-lu was displeased. and said, "Indeed, you cannot go! Why must you think of going to see Kung-shan?"

The Master said, "Can it be without some reason that he has invited ME? If any one employ me, may I not make an eastern Chau?"

Tsze-chang asked Confucius about perfect virtue. Confucius said, "To be able to practice five things everywhere under heaven constitutes perfect virtue." He begged to ask what they were, and was told, "Gravity, generosity of soul, sincerity, earnestness, and kindness. If you are grave, you will not be treated with disrespect. If you are generous, you will win all. If you are sincere, people will repose trust in you. If you are earnest, you will accomplish much. If you are kind, this will enable you to employ the services of others.

Pi Hsi inviting him to visit him, the Master was inclined to go.

Tsze-lu said, "Master, formerly I have heard you say, 'When a man in his own person is guilty of doing evil, a superior man will not associate with him.' Pi Hsi is in rebellion, holding possession of Chung-mau; if you go to him, what shall be said?"

The Master said, "Yes, I did use these words. But is it not said, that, if a thing be really hard, it may be ground without being made thin? Is it not said, that, if a thing be really white, it may be steeped in a dark fluid without being made black?"

"Am I a bitter gourd? How can I be hung up out of the way of being eaten?"

The Master said, "Yu, have you heard the six words to which are attached six becloudings?" Yu replied, "I have not."

"Sit down, and I will tell them to you.

"There is the love of being benevolent without the love of learning;—the beclouding here leads to a foolish simplicity. There is the love of knowing without the love of learning;—the beclouding here leads to dissipation of mind. There is the love of being sincere without the love of learning;—the beclouding here leads to an injurious disregard of consequences. There is the love of straightforwardness without the love of learning;—the beclouding here leads to rudeness. There is the love of boldness without the love of learning;—the beclouding here leads to insubordination. There is the love of firmness without the love of learning;—the beclouding here leads to extravagant conduct."

The Master said, "My children, why do you not study the Book of Poetry?"

"The Odes serve to stimulate the mind.

"They may be used for purposes of self-contemplation.

"They teach the art of sociability.

"They show how to regulate feelings of resentment.

"From them you learn the more immediate duty of serving one's father, and the remoter one of serving one's prince.

"From them we become largely acquainted with the names of birds, beasts, and plants."

The Master said to Po-yu, "Do you give yourself to the Chau-nan and the Shao-nan. The man who has not studied the Chau-nan and the Shao-nan is like one who stands with his face right against a wall. Is he not so?" The Master said, "'It is according to the rules of propriety,' they say.—'It is according to the rules of propriety,' they say. Are gems and silk all that is meant by propriety? 'It is music,' they say.—'It is music,' they say. Are hers and drums all that is meant by music?"

The Master said, "He who puts on an appearance of stern firmness, while inwardly he is weak, is like one of the small, mean people;—yea, is he not like the thief who breaks through, or climbs over, a wall?"

The Master said, "Your good, careful people of the villages are the thieves of virtue."

The Master said, "To tell, as we go along, what we have heard on the way, is to cast away our virtue."

The Master said, "There are those mean creatures! How impossible it is along with them to serve one's prince!

"While they have not got their aims, their anxiety is how to get them. When they have got them, their anxiety is lest they should lose them.

"When they are anxious lest such things should be lost, there is nothing to which they will not proceed."

The Master said, "Anciently, men had three failings, which now perhaps are not to be found.

"The high-mindedness of antiquity showed itself in a disregard of small things; the high-mindedness of the present day shows itself in wild license. The stern dignity of antiquity showed itself in grave reserve; the stern dignity of the present day shows itself in quarrelsome perverseness. The stupidity of antiquity showed itself in straightforwardness; the stupidity of the present day shows itself in sheer deceit."

The Master said, "Fine words and an insinuating appearance are seldom associated with virtue."

The Master said, "I hate the manner in which purple takes away the luster of vermilion. I hate the way in which the songs of Chang confound the music of the Ya. I hate those who with their sharp mouths overthrow kingdoms and families."

The Master said, "I would prefer not speaking."

Tsze-kung said, "If you, Master, do not speak, what shall we, your disciples, have to record?"

The Master said, "Does Heaven speak? The four seasons pursue their courses, and all things are continually being produced, but does Heaven say anything?"

Zu Pei wished to see Confucius, but Confucius declined, on the ground of being sick, to see him. When the bearer of this message went out at the door, the Master took his lute and sang to it, in order that Pei might hear him.

Tsai Wo asked about the three years' mourning for parents, saying that one year was long enough.

"If the superior man," said he, "abstains for three years from the observances of propriety, those observances will be quite lost. If for three years he abstains from music, music will be ruined. Within a year the old grain is exhausted, and the new grain has sprung up, and, in procuring fire by friction, we go through all the changes of wood for that purpose. After a complete year, the mourning may stop."

The Master said, "If you were, after a year, to eat good rice, and wear embroidered clothes, would you feel at ease?" "I should," replied Wo.

The Master said, "If you can feel at ease, do it. But a superior man, during the whole period of mourning, does not enjoy pleasant food which he may eat, nor derive pleasure from music which he may hear. He also does not feel at ease, if he is comfortably lodged. Therefore he does not do what you propose. But now you feel at ease and may do it."

Tsai Wo then went out, and the Master said, "This shows Yu's want of virtue. It is not till a child is three years old that it is allowed to leave the arms of its parents. And the three years' mourning is universally observed throughout the empire. Did Yu enjoy the three years' love of his parents?"

The Master said, "Hard is it to deal with who will stuff himself with food the whole day, without applying his mind to anything good! Are there not gamesters and chess players? To be one of these would still be better than doing nothing at all."

Tsze-lu said, "Does the superior man esteem valor?" The Master said, "The superior man holds righteousness to be of highest importance. A man in a superior situation, having valor without righteousness, will be guilty of insubordination; one of the lower people having valor without righteousness, will commit robbery."

Tsze-kung said, "Has the superior man his hatreds also?" The Master said, "He has his hatreds. He hates those who proclaim the evil of others. He hates the man who, being in a low station, slanders his superiors. He hates those who have valor merely, and are unobservant of propriety. He hates those who are forward and determined, and, at the same time, of contracted understanding."

The Master then inquired, "Ts'ze, have you also your hatreds?" Tsze-kung replied, "I hate those who pry out matters, and ascribe the knowledge to their wisdom. I hate those who are only not modest, and think that they are valorous. I hate those who make known secrets, and think that they are straightforward."

The Master said, "Of all people, girls and servants are the most difficult to behave to. If you are familiar with them, they lose their humility. If you maintain a reserve towards them, they are discontented."

The Master said, "When a man at forty is the object of dislike, he will always continue what he is."

The Viscount of Wei withdrew from the court. The Viscount of Chi became a slave to Chau. Pi-kan remonstrated with him and died.

Confucius said, "The Yin dynasty possessed these three men of virtue."

Hui of Liu-hsia, being chief criminal judge, was thrice dismissed from his office. Some one said to him, "Is it not yet time for you, sir, to leave this?" He replied, "Serving men in an upright way, where shall I go to, and not experience such a thrice-repeated dismissal? If I choose to serve men in a crooked way, what necessity is there for me to leave the country of my parents?"

The duke Ching of Ch'i, with reference to the manner in which he should treat Confucius, said, "I cannot treat him as I would the chief of the Chi family. I will treat him in a manner between that accorded to the chief of the Chil and that given to the chief of the Mang family." He also said, "I am old; I cannot use his doctrines." Confucius took his departure.

The people of Ch'i sent to Lu a present of female musicians, which Chi Hwan received, and for three days no court was held. Confucius took his departure.

The madman of Ch'u, Chieh-yu, passed by Confucius, singing and saying, "O FANG! O FANG! How is your virtue degenerated! As to the past, reproof is useless; but the future may still be provided against. Give up your vain pursuit. Give up your vain pursuit. Peril awaits those who now engage in affairs of government."

Confucius alighted and wished to converse with him, but Chieh-yu hastened away, so that he could not talk with him.

Ch'ang-tsu and Chieh-ni were at work in the field together, when Confucius passed by them, and sent Tsze-lu to inquire for the ford.

Ch'ang-tsu said, "Who is he that holds the reins in the carriage there?" Tsze-lu told him, "It is K'ung Ch'iu," "Is it not K'ung of Lu?" asked he. "Yes," was the reply, to which the other rejoined, "He knows the ford."

Tsze-lu then inquired of Chieh-ni, who said to him, "Who are you, sir?" He answered, "I am Chung Yu." "Are you not the disciple of K'ung Ch'iu of Lu?" asked the other. "I am," replied he, and then Chieh-ni said to him, "Disorder, like a swelling flood, spreads over the whole empire, and who is he that will change its state for you? Rather than follow one who merely withdraws from this one and that one, had you not better follow those who have withdrawn from the world altogether?" With this he fell to covering up the seed, and proceeded with his work, without stopping.

Tsze-lu went and reported their remarks, when the Master observed with a sigh, "It is impossible to associate with birds and beasts, as if they were the same with us. If I associate not with these people,—with mankind,—with whom shall I associate? If right principles prevailed through the empire, there would be no use for me to change its state."

Tsze-lu, following the Master, happened to fall behind, when he met an old man, carrying across his shoulder on a staff a basket for weeds. Tsze-lu said to him, "Have you seen my master, sir?" The old man replied, "Your four limbs are unaccustomed to toil; you cannot distinguish the five kinds of grain:—who is your master?" With this, he planted his staff in the ground, and proceeded to weed.

Tsze-lu joined his hands across his breast, and stood before him.

The old man kept Tsze-lu to pass the night in his house, killed a fowl, prepared millet, and feasted him. He also introduced to him his two sons.

Next day, Tsze-lu went on his way, and reported his adventure. The Master said, "He is a recluse," and sent Tsze-lu back to see him again, but when he got to the place, the old man was gone.

Tsze-lu then said to the family, "Not to take office is not righteous. If the relations between old and young may not be neglected, how is it that he sets aside the duties that should be observed between sovereign and minister? Wishing to maintain his personal purity, he allows that great relation to come to confusion. A superior man takes office, and performs the righteous duties belonging to it. As to the failure of right principles to make progress, he is aware of that."

The men who have retired to privacy from the world have been Po-i, Shu-ch'i, Yuchung, I-yi, Chu-chang, Hui of Liu-hsia, and Shao-lien.

The Master said, "Refusing to surrender their wills, or to submit to any taint in their persons; such, I think, were Po-i and Shu-ch'i.

"It may be said of Hui of Liu-hsia! and of Shaolien, that they surrendered their wills, and submitted to taint in their persons, but their words corresponded with reason, and their actions were such as men are anxious to see. This is all that is to be remarked in them.

"It may be said of Yu-chung and I-yi, that, while they hid themselves in their seclusion, they gave a license to their words; but in their persons, they succeeded in preserving their purity, and, in their retirement, they acted according to the exigency of the times.

"I am different from all these. I have no course for which I am predetermined, and no course against which I am predetermined."

The grand music master, Chih, went to Ch'i.

Kan, the master of the band at the second meal, went to Ch'u. Liao, the band master at the third meal, went to Ts'ai. Chueh, the band master at the fourth meal, went to Ch'in.

Fang-shu, the drum master, withdrew to the north of the river.

Wu, the master of the hand drum, withdrew to the Han.

Yang, the assistant music master, and Hsiang, master of the musical stone, withdrew to an island in the sea.

The duke of Chau addressed his son, the duke of Lu, saying, "The virtuous prince does not neglect his relations. He does not cause the great ministers to repine at his not employing them. Without some great cause, he does not dismiss from their offices the members of old families. He does not seek in one man talents for every employment."

To Chau belonged the eight officers, Po-ta, Po-kwo, Chung-tu, Chung-hwu, Shu-ya, Shuhsia, Chi-sui, and Chi-kwa.

Tsze-chang said, "The scholar, trained for public duty, seeing threatening danger, is prepared to sacrifice his life. When the opportunity of gain is presented to him, he thinks of righteousness. In sacrificing, his thoughts are reverential. In mourning, his thoughts are about the grief which he should feel. Such a man commands our approbation indeed.

Tsze-chang said, "When a man holds fast to virtue, but without seeking to enlarge it, and believes in right principles, but without firm sincerity, what account can be made of his existence or non-existence?"

The disciples of Tsze-hsia asked Tsze-chang about the principles that should characterize mutual intercourse. Tsze-chang asked, "What does Tsze-hsia say on the subject?" They replied, "Tsze-hsia says: 'Associate with those who can advantage you. Put away from you those who cannot do so.'" Tsze-chang observed, "This is different from what I have learned. The superior man honors the talented and virtuous, and bears with all. He praises the good, and pities the incompetent. Am I possessed of great talents and virtue?—who is there among men whom I will not bear with? Am I devoid of talents and virtue?—men will put me away from them. What have we to do with the putting away of others?"

Tsze-hsia said, "Even in inferior studies and employments there is something worth being looked at; but if it be attempted to carry them out to what is remote, there is a danger of their proving inapplicable. Therefore, the superior man does not practice them."

Tsze-hsia said, "He, who from day to day recognizes what he has not yet, and from month to month does not forget what he has attained to, may be said indeed to love to learn."

Tsze-hsia said, "There are learning extensively, and having a firm and sincere aim; inquiring with earnestness, and reflecting with self-application:—virtue is in such a course."

Tsze-hsia said, "Mechanics have their shops to dwell in, in order to accomplish their works. The superior man learns, in order to reach to the utmost of his principles."

Tsze-hsia said, "The mean man is sure to gloss his faults."

Tsze-hsia said, "The superior man undergoes three changes. Looked at from a distance, he appears stern; when approached, he is mild; when he is heard to speak, his language is firm and decided."

Tsze-hsia said, "The superior man, having obtained their confidence, may then impose labors on his people. If he have not gained their confidence, they will think that he is oppressing them. Having obtained the confidence of his prince, one may then remonstrate with him. If he have not gained his confidence, the prince will think that he is vilifying him."

Tsze-hsia said, "When a person does not transgress the boundary line in the great virtues, he may pass and re-pass it in the small virtues."

Tsze-yu said, "The disciples and followers of Tsze-hsia, in sprinkling and sweeping the ground, in answering and replying, in advancing and receding, are sufficiently accomplished. But these are only the branches of learning, and they are left ignorant of what is essential.—How can they be acknowledged as sufficiently taught?"

Tsze-hsia heard of the remark and said, "Alas! Yen Yu is wrong. According to the way of the superior man in teaching, what departments are there which he considers of prime importance, and delivers? what are there which he considers of secondary importance, and allows himself to be idle about? But as in the case of plants, which are assorted according to their classes, so he deals with his disciples. How can the way of a superior man be such as to make fools of any of them? Is it not the sage alone, who can unite in one the beginning and the consummation of learning?"

Tsze-hsia said, "The officer, having discharged all his duties, should devote his leisure to learning. The student, having completed his learning, should apply himself to be an officer."

Tsze-hsia said, "Mourning, having been carried to the utmost degree of grief, should stop with that."

Tsze-hsia said, "My friend Chang can do things which are hard to be done, but yet he is not perfectly virtuous."

The philosopher Tsang said, "How imposing is the manner of Chang! It is difficult along with him to practice virtue."

The philosopher Tsang said, "I heard this from our Master: 'Men may not have shown what is in them to the full extent, and yet they will be found to do so, on the occasion of mourning for their parents.'"

The philosopher Tsang said, "I have heard this from our Master:—'The filial piety of Mang Chwang, in other matters, was what other men are competent to, but, as seen in his not changing the ministers of his father, nor his father's mode of government, it is difficult to be attained to.'"

The chief of the Mang family having appointed Yang Fu to be chief criminal judge, the latter consulted the philosopher Tsang. Tsang said, "The rulers have failed in their duties, and the people consequently have been disorganized for a long time. When you have found out the truth of any accusation, be grieved for and pity them, and do not feel joy at your own ability."

Tsze-kung said, "Chau's wickedness was not so great as that name implies. Therefore, the superior man hates to dwell in a low-lying situation, where all the evil of the world will flow in upon him."

Tsze-kung said, "The faults of the superior man are like the eclipses of the sun and moon. He has his faults, and all men see them; he changes again, and all men look up to him."

Kung-sun Ch'ao of Wei asked Tsze-kung, saying, "From whom did Chung-ni get his learning?"

Tsze-kung replied, "The doctrines of Wan and Wu have not yet fallen to the ground. They are to be found among men. Men of talents and virtue remember the greater principles of them, and others, not possessing such talents and virtue, remember the smaller. Thus, all possess the doctrines of Wan and Wu. Where could our Master go that he should not have an opportunity of learning them? And yet what necessity was there for his having a regular master?"

Shu-sun Wu-shu observed to the great officers in the court, saying, "Tsze-kung is superior to Chung-ni."

Tsze-fu Ching-po reported the observation to Tsze-kung, who said, "Let me use the comparison of a house and its encompassing wall. My wall only reaches to the shoulders. One may peep over it, and see whatever is valuable in the apartments.

"The wall of my Master is several fathoms high. If one do not find the door and enter by it, he cannot see the ancestral temple with its beauties, nor all the officers in their rich array.

"But I may assume that they are few who find the door. Was not the observation of the chief only what might have been expected?"

Shu-sun Wu-shu having spoken revilingly of Chung-ni, Tsze-kung said, "It is of no use doing so. Chung-ni cannot be reviled. The talents and virtue of other men are hillocks and mounds which may be stepped over. Chung-ni is the sun or moon, which it is not possible to step over. Although a man may wish to cut himself off from the sage, what harm can he do to the sun or moon? He only shows that he does not know his own capacity.

Ch'an Tsze-ch' in, addressing Tsze-kung, said, "You are too modest. How can Chung-ni be said to be superior to you?"

Tsze-kung said to him, "For one word a man is often deemed to be wise, and for one word he is often deemed to be foolish. We ought to be careful indeed in what we say.

"Our Master cannot be attained to, just in the same way as the heavens cannot be gone up by the steps of a stair.

"Were our Master in the position of the ruler of a state or the chief of a family, we should find verified the description which has been given of a sage's rule:—he would plant the people, and forthwith they would be established; he would lead them on, and forthwith they would follow him; he would make them happy, and forthwith multitudes would resort to his dominions; he would stimulate them, and forthwith they would be harmonious. While he lived, he would be glorious. When he died, he would be bitterly lamented. How is it possible for him to be attained to?"

Yao said, "Oh! you, Shun, the Heaven-determined order of succession now rests in your person. Sincerely hold fast the due Mean. If there shall be distress and want within the four seas, the Heavenly revenue will come to a perpetual end."

Shun also used the same language in giving charge to Yu.

T'ang said, "I the child Li, presume to use a dark-colored victim, and presume to announce to Thee, O most great and sovereign God, that the sinner I dare not pardon, and thy ministers, O God, I do not keep in obscurity. The examination of them is by thy mind, O God. If, in my person, I commit offenses, they are not to be attributed to you, the people of the myriad regions. If you in the myriad regions commit offenses, these offenses must rest on my person."

Chau conferred great gifts, and the good were enriched.

"Although he has his near relatives, they are not equal to my virtuous men. The people are throwing blame upon me, the One man."

He carefully attended to the weights and measures, examined the body of the laws, restored the discarded officers, and the good government of the kingdom took its course.

He revived states that had been extinguished, restored families whose line of succession had been broken, and called to office those who had retired into obscurity, so that throughout the kingdom the hearts of the people turned towards him.

What he attached chief importance to were the food of the people, the duties of mourning, and sacrifices.

By his generosity, he won all. By his sincerity, he made the people repose trust in him. By his earnest activity, his achievements were great. By his justice, all were delighted.

Tsze-chang asked Confucius, saying, "In what way should a person in authority act in order that he may conduct government properly?" The Master replied, "Let him honor the five excellent, and banish away the four bad, things;—then may he conduct government properly." Tsze-chang said, "What are meant by the five excellent things?" The Master said, "When the person in authority is beneficent without great expenditure; when he lays tasks on the people without their repining; when he pursues what he desires without being covetous; when he maintains a dignified ease without being proud; when he is majestic without being fierce."

Tsze-chang said, "What is meant by being beneficent without great expenditure?" The Master replied, "When the person in authority makes more beneficial to the people the things from which they naturally derive benefit;—is not this being beneficent without great expenditure? When he chooses the labors which are proper, and makes them labor on them, who will repine? When his desires are set on benevolent government, and he secures it, who will accuse him of covetousness? Whether he has to do with many people or few, or with things great or small, he does not dare to indicate any disrespect;—is not this to maintain a dignified ease without any pride? He adjusts his clothes and cap, and throws a dignity into his looks, so that, thus dignified, he is looked at with awe;—is not this to be majestic without being fierce?"

Tsze-chang then asked, "What are meant by the four bad things?" The Master said, "To put the people to death without having instructed them;—this is called cruelty. To require from them, suddenly, the full tale of work, without having given them warning;—this is called oppression. To issue orders as if without urgency, at first, and, when the time comes, to insist on them with severity;—this is called injury. And, generally, in the giving pay or rewards to men, to do it in a stingy way;—this is called acting the part of a mere official."

The Master said, "Without recognizing the ordinances of Heaven, it is impossible to be a superior man.

"Without an acquaintance with the rules of Propriety, it is impossible for the character to be established.

"Without knowing the force of words, it is impossible to know men."

Sun Tzu, Translated by Lionel Giles

Probably 6th century B.C.E.

China

Sun Tzu's Art of War is still studied in military academies around the world, including the US military academies (USMA, USNA, and USAFA), and it is taught in business schools and law schools as a manual on how to get ahead of the competition. While scholars argue about when Sun Tzu lived (or whether he was using an older text, or even whether someone named Sun Tzu existed), the impact that the work has had is undeniable. The work is both a military treatise and a philosophical argument about the nature of humanity. Unlike previous strategists, "Sun-Tzu had no patience with the protracted games generals seemed to enjoy playing with each other. Once hostilities had erupted, one's priority was to defeat the enemy, not indulge oneself in chivalry which could only prolong the conflict and cost more lives." (Mark)

In Confucian thinking, everyone has an assigned place in society, with strict expectations for behavior that could potentially limit creative/unusual responses. Sun Tzu's approach to warfare is Daoist in nature, rather than Confucian "by adapting oneself to one's situation, rather than rigidly holding fast to how one thinks things should be, one is able to recognize the fluidity of conditions and act upon them decisively." (Mark)

It is therefore Sun Tzu's skill as a Daoist philosopher that guides the work and provides the reader with an insightful view of human nature.

SUN TZU ON THE ART OF WAR

Introduction

Ssu-ma Ch'ien gives the following biography of Sun Tzu:

Sun Tzu Wu was a native of the Ch'i State. His ART OF WAR brought him to the notice of Ho Lu, King of Wu.

Ho Lu said to him: "I have carefully perused your 13 chapters. May I submit your theory of managing soldiers to a slight test?"

Sun Tzu replied: "You may."

Ho Lu asked: "May the test be applied to women?"

The answer was again in the affirmative, so arrangements were made to bring 180 ladies out of the Palace. Sun Tzu divided them into two companies, and placed one of the King's favorite concubines at the head of each. He then bade them all take spears in their hands, and addressed them thus: "I presume you know the difference between front and back, right hand and left hand?"

The girls replied: "Yes."

Sun Tzu went on: "When I say 'Eyes front,' you must look straight ahead. When I say 'Left turn,' you must face towards your left hand. When I say 'Right turn,' you must face towards your right hand. When I say 'About turn,' you must face right round towards your back."

Again the girls assented. The words of command having been thus explained, he set up the halberds and battle-axes in order to begin the drill. Then, to the sound of drums, he gave the order "Right turn." But the girls only burst out laughing. Sun Tzu said: "If words of command are not clear and distinct, if orders are not thoroughly understood, then the general is to blame."

So he started drilling them again, and this time gave the order "Left turn," whereupon the girls once more burst into fits of laughter. Sun Tzu: "If words of command are not clear and distinct, if orders are not thoroughly understood, the general is to blame. But if his orders ARE clear, and the soldiers nevertheless disobey, then it is the fault of their officers."

So saying, he ordered the leaders of the two companies to be beheaded. Now the king of Wu was watching the scene from the top of a raised pavilion; and when he saw that his favorite concubines were about to be executed, he was greatly alarmed and hurriedly sent down the following message: "We are now quite satisfied as to our general's ability to handle troops. If we are bereft of these two concubines, our meat and drink will lose their savor. It is our wish that they shall not be beheaded."

Sun Tzu replied: "Having once received His Majesty's commission to be the general of his forces, there are certain commands of His Majesty which, acting in that capacity, I am unable to accept."

Accordingly, he had the two leaders beheaded, and straightway installed the pair next in order as leaders in their place. When this had been done, the drum was sounded for the drill once more; and the girls went through all the evolutions, turning to the right or to the left, marching ahead or wheeling back, kneeling or standing, with perfect accuracy and precision, not venturing to utter a sound. Then Sun Tzu sent a messenger to the King saying: "Your soldiers, Sire, are now properly drilled and disciplined, and ready for your majesty's inspection. They can be put to any use that their sovereign may desire; bid them go through fire and water, and they will not disobey."

But the King replied: "Let our general cease drilling and return to camp. As for us, we have no wish to come down and inspect the troops."

Thereupon Sun Tzu said: "The King is only fond of words, and cannot translate them into deeds."

After that, Ho Lu saw that Sun Tzu was one who knew how to handle an army, and finally appointed him general. In the west, he defeated the Ch'u State and forced his way into Ying, the capital; to the north he put fear into the States of Ch'i and Chin, and spread his fame abroad amongst the feudal princes. And Sun Tzu shared in the might of the King.

I. Laying Plans

1. Sun Tzu said: The art of war is of vital importance to the State.
2. It is a matter of life and death, a road either to safety or to ruin. Hence it is a subject of inquiry which can on no account be neglected.
3. The art of war, then, is governed by five constant factors, to be taken into account in one's deliberations, when seeking to determine the conditions obtaining in the field.
4. These are: (1) The Moral Law; (2) Heaven; (3) Earth; (4) The Commander; (5) Method and Discipline.
- 5, 6. The MORAL LAW causes the people to be in complete accord with their ruler, so that they will follow him regardless of their lives, undismayed by any danger.
7. HEAVEN signifies night and day, cold and heat, times and seasons.
8. EARTH comprises distances, great and small; danger and security; open ground and narrow passes; the chances of life and death.
9. The COMMANDER stands for the virtues of wisdom, sincerity, benevolence, courage, and strictness.
10. By METHOD AND DISCIPLINE are to be understood the marshaling of the army in its proper subdivisions, the graduations of rank among the officers, the maintenance of roads by which supplies may reach the army, and the control of military expenditure.
11. These five heads should be familiar to every general: he who knows them will be victorious; he who knows them not will fail.
12. Therefore, in your deliberations, when seeking to determine the military conditions, let them be made the basis of a comparison, in this wise:—
13. (1) Which of the two sovereigns is imbued with the Moral law? (2) Which of the two generals has most ability? (3) With whom lie the advantages derived from Heaven and Earth? (4) On which side is discipline most rigorously enforced? (5) Which army is stronger? (6) On which side are officers and men more highly trained? (7) In which army is there the greater constancy both in reward and punishment?
14. By means of these seven considerations I can forecast victory or defeat.
15. The general that hearkens to my counsel and acts upon it, will conquer:—let such a one be retained in command! The general that hearkens not to my counsel nor acts upon it, will suffer defeat:—let such a one be dismissed!
16. While heading the profit of my counsel, avail yourself also of any helpful circumstances over and beyond the ordinary rules.
17. According as circumstances are favorable, one should modify one's plans.
18. All warfare is based on deception.
19. Hence, when able to attack, we must seem unable; when using our forces, we must seem inactive; when we are near, we must make the enemy believe we are far away; when far away, we must make him believe we are near.
20. Hold out baits to entice the enemy. Feign disorder, and crush him.
21. If he is secure at all points, be prepared for him. If he is in superior strength, evade him.
22. If your opponent is of choleric temper, seek to irritate him. Pretend to be weak, that he may grow arrogant.
23. If he is taking his ease, give him no rest. If his forces are united, separate them.
24. Attack him where he is unprepared, appear where you are not expected.
25. These military devices, leading to victory, must not be divulged beforehand.

26. Now the general who wins a battle makes many calculations in his temple ere the battle is fought. The general who loses a battle makes but few calculations beforehand. Thus do many calculations lead to victory, and few calculations to defeat: how much more no calculation at all! It is by attention to this point that I can foresee who is likely to win or lose.

II. Waging War

1. Sun Tzu said: In the operations of war, where there are in the field a thousand swift chariots, as many heavy chariots, and a hundred thousand mail-clad soldiers with provisions enough to carry them a thousand LI the expenditure at home and at the front, including entertainment of guests, small items such as glue and paint, and sums spent on chariots and armor, will reach the total of a thousand ounces of silver per day. Such is the cost of raising an army of 100,000 men.
2. When you engage in actual fighting, if victory is long in coming, then men's weapons will grow dull and their ardor will be damped. If you lay siege to a town, you will exhaust your strength.
3. Again, if the campaign is protracted, the resources of the State will not be equal to the strain.
4. Now, when your weapons are dulled, your ardor damped, your strength exhausted and your treasure spent, other chieftains will spring up to take advantage of your extremity. Then no man, however wise, will be able to avert the consequences that must ensue.
5. Thus, though we have heard of stupid haste in war, cleverness has never been seen associated with long delays.
6. There is no instance of a country having benefited from prolonged warfare.
7. It is only one who is thoroughly acquainted with the evils of war that can thoroughly understand the profitable way of carrying it on.
8. The skillful soldier does not raise a second levy, neither are his supply-wagons loaded more than twice.
9. Bring war material with you from home, but forage on the enemy. Thus the army will have food enough for its needs.
10. Poverty of the State exchequer causes an army to be maintained by contributions from a distance. Contributing to maintain an army at a distance causes the people to be impoverished.
11. On the other hand, the proximity of an army causes prices to go up; and high prices cause the people's substance to be drained away.
12. When their substance is drained away, the peasantry will be afflicted by heavy exactions.
- 13, 14. With this loss of substance and exhaustion of strength, the homes of the people will be stripped bare, and three-tenths of their income will be dissipated; while government expenses for broken chariots, worn-out horses, breast-plates and helmets, bows and arrows, spears and shields, protective mantles, draught-oxen and heavy wagons, will amount to four-tenths of its total revenue.
15. Hence a wise general makes a point of foraging on the enemy. One cartload of the enemy's provisions is equivalent to twenty of one's own, and likewise a single PICUL of his provender is equivalent to twenty from one's own store.
16. Now in order to kill the enemy, our men must be roused to anger; that there may be advantage from defeating the enemy, they must have their rewards.
17. Therefore in chariot fighting, when ten or more chariots have been taken, those should be rewarded who took the first. Our own flags should be substituted for those of the enemy, and the chariots mingled and used in conjunction with ours. The captured soldiers should be kindly treated and kept.
18. This is called, using the conquered foe to augment one's own strength.
19. In war, then, let your great object be victory, not lengthy campaigns.
20. Thus it may be known that the leader of armies is the arbiter of the people's fate, the man on whom it depends whether the nation shall be in peace or in peril.

III. Attack by Stratagem

Sun Tzu said: In the practical art of war, the best thing of all is to take the enemy's country whole and intact; to shatter and destroy it is not so good. So, too, it is better to recapture an army entire than to destroy it, to capture a regiment, a detachment or a company entire than to destroy them.

2. Hence to fight and conquer in all your battles is not supreme excellence; supreme excellence consists in breaking the enemy's resistance without fighting.
3. Thus the highest form of generalship is to balk the enemy's plans; the next best is to prevent the junction of the enemy's forces; the next in order is to attack the enemy's army in the field; and the worst policy of all is to besiege walled cities.
4. The rule is, not to besiege walled cities if it can possibly be avoided. The preparation of mantlets, movable shelters, and various implements of war, will take up three whole months; and the piling up of mounds over against the walls will take three months more.
5. The general, unable to control his irritation, will launch his men to the assault like swarming ants, with the result that one-third of his men are slain, while the town still remains untaken. Such are the disastrous effects of a siege.
6. Therefore the skillful leader subdues the enemy's troops without any fighting; he captures their cities without laying siege to them; he overthrows their kingdom without lengthy operations in the field.
7. With his forces intact he will dispute the mastery of the Empire, and thus, without losing a man, his triumph will be complete. This is the method of attacking by stratagem.
8. It is the rule in war, if our forces are ten to the enemy's one, to surround him; if five to one, to attack him; if twice as numerous, to divide our army into two.
9. If equally matched, we can offer battle; if slightly inferior in numbers, we can avoid the enemy; if quite unequal in every way, we can flee from him.
10. Hence, though an obstinate fight may be made by a small force, in the end it must be captured by the larger force.
11. Now the general is the bulwark of the State; if the bulwark is complete at all points, the State will be strong; if the bulwark is defective, the State will be weak.
12. There are three ways in which a ruler can bring misfortune upon his army:—
13. (1) By commanding the army to advance or to retreat, being ignorant of the fact that it cannot obey. This is called hobbling the army.
14. (2) By attempting to govern an army in the same way as he administers a kingdom, being ignorant of the conditions which obtain in an army. This causes restlessness in the soldier's minds.
15. (3) By employing the officers of his army without discrimination, through ignorance of the military principle of adaptation to circumstances. This shakes the confidence of the soldiers.
16. But when the army is restless and distrustful, trouble is sure to come from the other feudal princes. This is simply bringing anarchy into the army, and flinging victory away.
17. Thus we may know that there are five essentials for victory: (1) He will win who knows when to fight and when not to fight. (2) He will win who knows how to handle both superior and inferior forces. (3) He will win whose army is animated by the same spirit throughout all its ranks. (4) He will win who, prepared himself, waits to take the enemy unprepared. (5) He will win who has military capacity and is not interfered with by the sovereign.
18. Hence the saying: If you know the enemy and know yourself, you need not fear the result of a hundred battles. If you know yourself but not the enemy, for every victory gained you will also suffer a defeat. If you know neither the enemy nor yourself, you will succumb in every battle.

IV. Tactical Dispositions

1. Sun Tzu said: The good fighters of old first put themselves beyond the possibility of defeat, and then waited for an opportunity of defeating the enemy.

2. To secure ourselves against defeat lies in our own hands, but the opportunity of defeating the enemy is provided by the enemy himself.
3. Thus the good fighter is able to secure himself against defeat, but cannot make certain of defeating the enemy.
4. Hence the saying: One may KNOW how to conquer without being able to DO it.
5. Security against defeat implies defensive tactics; ability to defeat the enemy means taking the offensive.
6. Standing on the defensive indicates insufficient strength; attacking, a superabundance of strength.
7. The general who is skilled in defense hides in the most secret recesses of the earth; he who is skilled in attack flashes forth from the topmost heights of heaven. Thus on the one hand we have ability to protect ourselves; on the other, a victory that is complete.
8. To see victory only when it is within the ken of the common herd is not the acme of excellence.
9. Neither is it the acme of excellence if you fight and conquer and the whole Empire says, "Well done!"
10. To lift an autumn hair is no sign of great strength; to see the sun and moon is no sign of sharp sight; to hear the noise of thunder is no sign of a quick ear.
11. What the ancients called a clever fighter is one who not only wins, but excels in winning with ease.
12. Hence his victories bring him neither reputation for wisdom nor credit for courage.
13. He wins his battles by making no mistakes. Making no mistakes is what establishes the certainty of victory, for it means conquering an enemy that is already defeated.
14. Hence the skillful fighter puts himself into a position which makes defeat impossible, and does not miss the moment for defeating the enemy.
15. Thus it is that in war the victorious strategist only seeks battle after the victory has been won, whereas he who is destined to defeat first fights and afterwards looks for victory.
16. The consummate leader cultivates the moral law and strictly adheres to method and discipline; thus it is in his power to control success.
17. In respect of military method, we have, firstly, Measurement; secondly, Estimation of quantity; thirdly, Calculation; fourthly, Balancing of chances; fifthly, Victory.
18. Measurement owes its existence to Earth; Estimation of quantity to Measurement; Calculation to Estimation of quantity; Balancing of chances to Calculation; and Victory to Balancing of chances.
19. A victorious army opposed to a routed one, is as a pound's weight placed in the scale against a single grain.
20. The onrush of a conquering force is like the bursting of pent-up waters into a chasm a thousand fathoms deep.

VI. Weak Points and Strong

1. Sun Tzu said: Whoever is first in the field and awaits the coming of the enemy, will be fresh for the fight; whoever is second in the field and has to hasten to battle will arrive exhausted.
2. Therefore the clever combatant imposes his will on the enemy, but does not allow the enemy's will to be imposed on him.
3. By holding out advantages to him, he can cause the enemy to approach of his own accord; or, by inflicting damage, he can make it impossible for the enemy to draw near.
4. If the enemy is taking his ease, he can harass him; if well supplied with food, he can starve him out; if quietly encamped, he can force him to move.
5. Appear at points which the enemy must hasten to defend; march swiftly to places where you are not expected.
6. An army may march great distances without distress, if it marches through country where the enemy is not.
7. You can be sure of succeeding in your attacks if you only attack places which are undefended. You can ensure the safety of your defense if you only hold positions that cannot be attacked.
8. Hence that general is skillful in attack whose opponent does not know what to defend; and he is skillful in defense whose opponent does not know what to attack.

9. O divine art of subtlety and secrecy! Through you we learn to be invisible, through you inaudible; and hence we can hold the enemy's fate in our hands.
10. You may advance and be absolutely irresistible, if you make for the enemy's weak points; you may retire and be safe from pursuit if your movements are more rapid than those of the enemy.
11. If we wish to fight, the enemy can be forced to an engagement even though he be sheltered behind a high rampart and a deep ditch. All we need do is attack some other place that he will be obliged to relieve.
12. If we do not wish to fight, we can prevent the enemy from engaging us even though the lines of our encampment be merely traced out on the ground. All we need do is to throw something odd and unaccountable in his way.
13. By discovering the enemy's dispositions and remaining invisible ourselves, we can keep our forces concentrated, while the enemy's must be divided.
14. We can form a single united body, while the enemy must split up into fractions. Hence there will be a whole pitted against separate parts of a whole, which means that we shall be many to the enemy's few.
15. And if we are able thus to attack an inferior force with a superior one, our opponents will be in dire straits.
16. The spot where we intend to fight must not be made known; for then the enemy will have to prepare against a possible attack at several different points; and his forces being thus distributed in many directions, the numbers we shall have to face at any given point will be proportionately few.
17. For should the enemy strengthen his van, he will weaken his rear; should he strengthen his rear, he will weaken his van; should he strengthen his left, he will weaken his right; should he strengthen his right, he will weaken his left. If he sends reinforcements everywhere, he will everywhere be weak.
18. Numerical weakness comes from having to prepare against possible attacks; numerical strength, from compelling our adversary to make these preparations against us.
19. Knowing the place and the time of the coming battle, we may concentrate from the greatest distances in order to fight.
20. But if neither time nor place be known, then the left wing will be impotent to succor the right, the right equally impotent to succor the left, the van unable to relieve the rear, or the rear to support the van. How much more so if the furthest portions of the army are anything under a hundred LI apart, and even the nearest are separated by several LI!
21. Though according to my estimate the soldiers of Yueh exceed our own in number, that shall advantage them nothing in the matter of victory. I say then that victory can be achieved.
22. Though the enemy be stronger in numbers, we may prevent him from fighting. Scheme so as to discover his plans and the likelihood of their success.
23. Rouse him, and learn the principle of his activity or inactivity. Force him to reveal himself, so as to find out his vulnerable spots.
24. Carefully compare the opposing army with your own, so that you may know where strength is superabundant and where it is deficient.
25. In making tactical dispositions, the highest pitch you can attain is to conceal them; conceal your dispositions, and you will be safe from the prying of the subtlest spies, from the machinations of the wisest brains.
26. How victory may be produced for them out of the enemy's own tactics—that is what the multitude cannot comprehend.
27. All men can see the tactics whereby I conquer, but what none can see is the strategy out of which victory is evolved.
28. Do not repeat the tactics which have gained you one victory, but let your methods be regulated by the infinite variety of circumstances.

29. Military tactics are like unto water; for water in its natural course runs away from high places and hastens downwards.
30. So in war, the way is to avoid what is strong and to strike at what is weak.
31. Water shapes its course according to the nature of the ground over which it flows; the soldier works out his victory in relation to the foe whom he is facing.
32. Therefore, just as water retains no constant shape, so in warfare there are no constant conditions.
33. He who can modify his tactics in relation to his opponent and thereby succeed in winning, may be called a heaven-born captain.
34. The five elements (water, fire, wood, metal, earth) are not always equally predominant; the four seasons make way for each other in turn. There are short days and long; the moon has its periods of waning and waxing.

THE BOOK OF SONGS

Existed before Confucius (born around 551 B.C.E.)

China

The Book of Songs (the Shi king, also translated as The Classic of Poetry and The Book of Odes) is a collection of poems written by various anonymous authors over several centuries. Traditionally, Confucius has been credited as the editor of the collection, and it was part of the canon of Confucian works that scholars were expected to study. Scholars debate how much influence Confucius may have had on them; one theory is that he took a much larger work (possibly several thousand poems) and chose just over three hundred to form the standard version that exists today. Poetry collections in China were meant to represent the voice of the people (male and female, all social classes). The poems capture moments in time, speaking to the reader about the problems and joys of individuals who were not necessarily the rulers or heroes of other stories.

The Wedding-Journey of a Princess

The magpie has a nest;
 The dove yet takes possession.—
 Lo! the young bride departs,
 In many-wheeled procession.
 The magpie has a nest;
 The dove yet there will quarter.—
 Lo! the young bride departs;
 And countless cars escort her.
 The magpie has a nest;
 The dove will fill it (quickly).—
 Lo! the young bride departs,
 With chariots mustered thickly.

A Reverent Helpmate

There gathers she the fragrant herb
 Along the islets, by the pools,

To mingle with the votive gifts
 Of him that o'er the princedom rules.
 There gathers she the fragrant herb
 Amid the mountain streams again,
 To mingle with the votive gifts
 Her prince will offer in the fane.
 With head-gear all erect and high
 Ere dawn the temple she attends;
 With head-gear all uncared for now
 Back to her place her way she wends.

A Long-Absent Husband

Now the crickets chirp and grind;
 And the hoppers spring and fly.
 But my lord not yet I find;
 Ay, and sore at heart am I.
 O to see him once again!
 O to meet him once again!
 Stilled were then the swelling sigh.
 Climbed I yonder up South Hill,
 Plucked sweet brackens as I went.
 But my lord I saw not still;
 Loud was yet my heart's lament.
 O to see him once again!
 O to meet him once again!
 So my heart were well content.
 Climbed I yonder up South Hill,
 Now to pluck the royal fern.
 Yet my lord I saw not still;
 Still my heart must pine and yearn.
 O to see him once again!
 O to meet him once again!
 So my heart's-ease might return.

The Young Wife's Zealous Care in the Worship of her Husband's Ancestors

She goes to gather water-wort,
 Beside the streams south of the hills;
 She goes to gather water-grass
 Along the swollen roadside rills;
 Goes now to store her gathered herbs
 In basket round, in basket square;
 Goes now to seethe and simmer them
 In tripod and in cauldron there;
 Pours out libations of them all
 Beneath the light within the Hall.—
 And who is she—so occupied?
 —Who, but (our lord's) young pious bride?

In Memory of a Worthy Chieftain

O pear-tree, with thy leafy shade!
 Ne'er be thou cut, ne'er be thou laid;—
 Once under thee Shâu's chieftain stayed.
 O pear-tree, with thy leafy crest,
 Ne'er may they cut thee, ne'er molest;—
 Shâu's chief beneath thee once found rest.

O pear-tree, with thy leafy shroud,
Nèer be those branches cut, nor bowed,
That shelter to Shâu's chief allowed.

The Resisted Suitor

All soaking was the path with dew.
And was it not scarce daybreak, too?
I say: the path was drenched with dew.
Who says the sparrow has no horn?
How bores it then into my dwelling?
Who says of thee, thou art forlorn?
Why then this forcing and compelling?
But force, compel me, do thy will:
Husband and wife we are not still.
Who says of rats, they have no teeth?
How do they bore then through my wall?
Who says of thee, thou art forlorn?
Why force me then into this brawl?
But force me, sue me,—even so,
With thee I do not mean to go!

Dignity and Economy of King Wán's Councillors

Clad in lambskin or in sheepskin,
Five white silken seams that show,
To their meal from court retiring,
With what dignity they go!
Bare of wool, the lamb or sheepskin
Five white sutures may reveal,
Still with dignity retire they
From their Master to their meal.
Though the skins, now rent in patches,
Five white silken seams require,
Still with dignity the wearers
To their meal from Court retire.

The Lonely Wife

Hearken! there is thunder
On South Hill's lofty crest.
Hence why must he wander,
Nor dare a moment rest?
True-hearted husband, fain, oh fain
Were I to see thee home again.
Hearken! now the thunder
Rolls lower on South Hill.
Hence why must he wander,
Nor ever dare be still?
True-hearted husband, fain, oh fain
Were I to have thee home again.
Hearken! now the thunder
Is down upon the plain.
Hence why must he wander,
Nor dare awhile remain?
True-hearted husband, fain, oh fain
Were I to find thee home again.

Fears Of Mature Maidenhood

Though shaken be the damson-tree,
 Left on it yet are seven, O.
 Ye gentlemen who care for me,
 Take chance while chance is given, O.
 Though shaken be the damson-tree,
 Yet three are still remaining, O.
 Ye gentlemen who care for me,
 Now, now; the time is waning, O.
 Ah, shaken is the damson-tree,
 And all are in the basket, O.
 Ye gentlemen who care for me,
 Your question—would ye ask it, O!

Contented Concubines

Starlets dim are yonder peeping,—
 In the East are five, and three.
 Softly, where our lord is (sleeping),
 Soon or late by night go we.
 Some have high, some low degree.
 Starlets dim are yonder peeping,—
 Pleiades, Orion's band.
 Softly nightly go we creeping,
 Quilt and coverlet in hand.
 Some take high, some lower stand.

Jealousy Overcome

The Kiang has arms that wayward wind.
 Our lady erst as bride
 Our help declined,
 Our help declined;—
 Anon she was of other mind.
 The Kiang has banks within its bed.
 Our lady erst as bride
 Our presence fled,
 Our presence fled;—
 Anon a calmer life she led.
 The Kiang has creeks that leave it long.
 Our lady erst as bride
 Spurned all our throng,
 Spurned all our throng;—
 Her sneering now is turned to song.

The Cunning Hunter

In the wild there lies a dead gazelle,
 With the reed-grass round it wrapt;
 And a maid who loveth springtide well
 By a winsome youth is trapped.
 In the wood thick undergrowth is found,
 In the wild the dead gazelle,
 With the reed-grass round its body bound;—
 And the maid she looketh well.
 "Ah! gently, not so fast, good sir;
 My kerchief, prithee, do not stir;
 Nor rouse the barking of my cur."

A Royal Wedding

What radiant bloom is there!
 Blossoms of cherry wild.
 What care attends the equipage
 Of her, the royal child!
 What radiance! Like the bloom
 Of peach and plum in one!
 Granddaughter of the Just King she,
 He a true noble's son.
 How was the bait then laid?
 'Twas trimmed with silken twine.
 He the true noble's son (thus caught)
 Her of the Just King's line!

The Tsow Yu

Out there where the reeds grow rank and tall,
 One round he shoots, five wild boars fall.
 Hail the Tsow Yu!
 And there where the grass is waving high,
 One round he shoots, five wild hogs die.
 Hail the Tsow Yu!

Note.—Although this is one of the shortest and apparently most trivial of the Odes in the Book of Poetry, it is credited by the Chinese editors with as much meaning as the largest. It is regarded, like so many more, as illustrating the extent of the reformation brought about by King Wän. Not only was the kingdom better ruled, society better regulated, and individuals more self-disciplined and improved in manners, but the reformation affected all things: vegetation flourished, game became most abundant, hunting was attended to at the right seasons, and the benign influence of the King was everywhere felt by the people. The poet thinks it is sufficient to dwell upon these last characteristics. Probably the lines were written after some royal hunt.

BOOK III.: THE ODES OF P'EI.

P'ei was one of three principalities which King Wu created after he overthrew the dynasty of Shang. It was in the north; and the two others were—Yung in the south, and Wei in the west. P'ei and Yung were, after a short time, absorbed in Wei, which had a long history. We have, in Books III., IV. and V. titles taken from all three; but evidently the division is only artificial: the three Books might all have been included properly under the title Wei, since it is that State with which all are connected.

Derelict

The cedar boat is drifting,
 On currents never still.
 Sleepless I lie, vexed inly,
 As with some unknown ill.
 'Tis not that wine is wanting,
 Or leave to roam at will.
 My heart is no mere mirror
 That cannot comprehend.
 Brothers I have, but may not
 On brothers e'en depend.
 Tush! when I go complaining
 'Tis only to offend.
 No stone this heart of mine is,
 That may be turned and rolled;
 No mat this heart of mine is,

To fold or to unfold.
 Steadfast and strict my life is;
 Nought 'gainst it can be told.
 Yet here I sit in sorrow,
 Scorned by a rabble crew.
 My troubles have been many,
 My insults not a few.
 Calmly I think—then, starting,
 I beat my breast anew.
 O moon, why now the brighter?
 O sun, why now dost wane?
 My heart wears grief as garments
 Inured to soil and stain.
 Calmly I think—then, starting,
 Would fly—but all in vain.

Supplanted

Green now my robe!
 Green, lined with yellow.
 Ah! when shall Grief
 Be not my fellow!
 Green is the robe;
 Yellow the skirt!
 Ah! when shall Grief
 Nevermore hurt!
 Green is the silk;
 Ruled so by you.—
 Guide me, ye ancients!
 Harm lest I do.
 Lawn, fine or coarse,
 Chills in the wind.—
 Guide me, ye ancients!
 Save me my mind.

Friends In Distress

O the swallows onward flying,
 Wings aslant, irregular!
 O the lady homeward hieing;
 O'er the wilds escort her far.
 Gaze I till I gaze in vain,
 And my tears are like the rain.
 O the swallows onward flying,
 Soaring upward, darting low!
 O the lady homeward hieing;
 Far then let her escort go.
 Gaze I till I gaze in vain;
 Long I stand and weep amain.
 O the swallows onward flying,
 High and low, with twittering mouth!
 O the lady homeward hieing;
 Far escort her to the South.
 Gaze I till I gaze in vain,
 And my heart scarce bears the pain.
 Lady Chung—on love relying,
 And of feelings true and deep,
 Ever sweet and much-complying,

Strict, yet, self-respect to keep—
Thoughtful of the dead she:
Bright example to poor me!

Clouds Gathering

O sun, O moon, ye downwards turn
To earth your glorious gaze.
But ah! that men there be like this,
Forsaking ancient ways!
Where can be peace? Alas, his glance
From me for ever strays!
O sun, O moon, this earth below
Hath you as crown above.
But ah, that men there be like this,
That give not love for love!
Where can be peace? Alas that he Should so responseless prove!
O sun, O moon, that morn and eve
Rise in yon Eastern sky.
Alas that men there be like this,
Whose deeds fair words belie.
Where can be peace? Ah, better now
If memory could but die!
O sun, O moon, that morn and eve
Rise yonder in the East.
O parents mine! your charge of me
Hath not for ever ceased.
Where can be peace? For to my love
Responds he not the least.

The Storm

Long, long the stormwind blew, and wild.—
He turned to look at me: he smiled;
But mockery was there, and scorn.
Ah, how my very heart was torn!
Long, long it blew, with dust for rain.—
“Be kind, and come to me again.”
He came not, neither went his way;
And long in pensive thought I lay.
On still it blew, with storm-clouds black;
Scarce light there was, so dense the pack.
Wakeful I lay, nor closed mine eyes;
And anxious thought brought fitful sighs.
Black and more black yet grew the gloom;
Then came loud thunder, boom on boom.
Awake I lay, all sleep was fled,
And anxious thought my fever fed.

The Soldier Sighs For Wife And Home

When the beating of drums was heard around,
How we sprang to our weapons with leap and bound!
But the fields must have some, and the walls of Ts'ò;—
We alone to the South must a-marching go.
So we followed our leader Sun Tse-Chung,
And a peace there was made with Ch'in and Sung.

But of homeward march is no sign as yet,
 And our hearts are heavy, and pine and fret.
 Ah! here we are lingering; here we stay;
 And our steeds go wandering far astray;
 And quest of them all must needs be made
 Away in the depths of the woodland shade.
 But, though far to be severed in death or life,
 We are bound by the pledge each gave to his wife;
 And we vowed, as we stood then hand in hand,
 By each other in life's last years to stand.
 Alas! now wide is the gulf between!
 And life to us now is a blank, I ween.
 And, alas, for the plighted troth—so vain!
 Untrue to our words we must aye remain.

The Discontented Mother

From the South the gladdening breezes blow
 On the heart of that bush of thorn;
 And the inmost leaves in it gaily grow.—
 But the mother with care is worn.
 From the South the gladdening breezes blow
 On the twigs of that thorny tree.
 And the mother is wise and good, but oh!
 Bad and worthless men are we.
 From the spring 'neath the walls of Tsun there runs
 A cool and refreshing rill.
 But the mother, though hers be seven sons,
 Unrelieved here toils on still.
 And the golden bright-eyed orioles
 Wake their tuneful melodie.
 But the mother's heart no son consoles,
 Though we seven around her be.

Separation

The male pheasant has taken his flight,
 Yet leisurely moved he his wings!
 Ah, to thee, my beloved, thyself
 What sorrow this severance brings!
 The male pheasant has taken his flight;
 From below, from aloft, yet he cried.
 Ah, true was my lord; and my heart
 With its burden of sorrow is tried.
 As I gaze at the sun and the moon,
 Free rein to my thoughts I allow.
 O the way, so they tell me, is long:
 Tell me, how can he come to me now?
 Wot ye not, then, ye gentlemen all,
 Of his virtue and rectitude?
 From all envy and enmity free,
 What deed doth he other than good?

Untimely Unions

“The leaves of the gourd are yet sour to the taste,
 And the way through the ford is deep” (quoth she).
 —“Deep be it, our garments we'll raise to the waist,

Or shallow, then up to the knee" (quoth he).
 "But the ford is full, and the waters rise.
 Hark! a pheasant there, in alarm she cries."
 —"Nay, the ford when full would no axle wet;
 And the pheasant but cackles to fetch her mate."
 "More sweet were the wildgoose' cries to hear,
 When the earliest streaks of the dawn appear;
 And that is how men should seek their brides,—
 (In the early spring) ere the ice divides.
 The ferryman beckons and points to his boat:—
 Let others cross over, I shall not.
 The others may cross, but I say nay.
 For a (true) companion here I stay."

Lament Of A Discarded Wife

When East winds blow unceasingly,
 They bring but gloominess and rain.
 Strive, strive to live unitedly,
 And every angry thought restrain.
 Some plants we gather for their leaves,
 But leave the roots untouched beneath;
 So, while unsullied was my name,
 I should have lived with you till death.
 With slow, slow step I took the road,
 My inmost heart rebelling sore.
 You came not far with me indeed,
 You only saw me to the door.
 Who calls the lettuce bitter fare?
 The cress is not a whit more sweet.
 Ay, feast there with your new-found bride,
 Well-pleased, as when fond brothers meet.
 The Wei, made turbid by the King,
 Grows limpid by the islets there.
 There, feasting with your new-found bride,
 For me no longer now you care.
 Yet leave to me my fishing-dam;
 My wicker-nets—remove them not.
 My person spurned,—some vacant hour
 May bring compassion for my lot.
 Where ran the river full and deep,
 With raft or boat I paddled o'er;
 And, where it flowed in shallower stream,
 I dived or swam from shore to shore.
 And what we had, or what we lost,
 For that I strained my every nerve;
 When other folks had loss, I'd crawl
 Upon my knees, if aught 'twould serve.
 And you can show me no kind care,
 Nay, treated like a foe am I!
 My virtue stood but in your way,
 Like traders' goods that none will buy.
 Once it was feared we could not live;
 In your reverses then I shared;
 And now, when fortune smiles on you,
 To very poison I'm compared.
 I have laid by a goodly store,—

For winter's use it was to be;—
 Feast on there with your new-found bride,—
 I was for use in poverty!
 Rude fits of anger you have shown,
 Now left me to be sorely tried.
 Ah, you forget those days gone by,
 When you came nestling to my side!

A Prince And His Officers In Trouble

Fallen so low, so low!
 Wherefore not homeward go?
 And we,—how could we for our chief refuse
 Exposure to the nightly dews?
 Fallen so low, so low!
 Wherefore not homeward go?
 And did we not our chief himself require,
 How lived we here in mud and mire?

Li Finds No Help In Wei

How have the creepers on the crested slope
 Crept with their tendrils far and wide!
 And O, ye foster-fathers of our land,
 How have our days here multiplied!
 Why is there never movement made?
 Comes surely some expected aid.
 Why is this long, protracted pause?
 'Tis surely not without a cause.
 With foxfurs worn and frayed, without our cars,
 Came we not Eastward here to you?
 O ye, the foster-fathers of our land,
 Will ye have nought with us to do?
 A shattered remnant, last of all our host,
 But waifs and vagabonds are we!
 And ye, the foster-fathers of our land,
 Smile on, but deaf ye seem to be!

Buffoonery At Court

Calm and cool, see him advance!
 Now for posturing and dance,—
 While the sun's in middle sky,—
 There in front of platform high!
 See him, corpulent and tall,
 Capering in that ducal hall!
 Tiger-like in strength of limb,—
 Reins like ribbons were to him!
 Left hand now the flute assumes,
 Right hand grasps the pheasant's plumes;
 Red, as though with rouge, the face.
 "Give him liquor!" cries His Grace.
 There are hazels on the hill,
 There is fungus in the fen.
 Say to whom my thoughts then flee.—
 To those fine West-country men.
 Those are admirable men!
 The West-country men for me!

Homesick

Fain are those waters to be free,
 Leaving their spring to join the K'i.
 So yearns my heart for thee, dear Wei;—
 No day but there in thought I fly.
 Here are my cousins, kind are they:
 O, before these my plans I'll lay.
 On leaving home I lodged in Tsi.
 And drank the god-speed cup in Ni.
 Maids, when their wedding trip they take,
 Parents and brothers all forsake.
 Yet let me go my aunts to greet;
 Let me my elder sisters meet.
 And, leaving here, I'd lodge in Kan,
 Then drink the god-speed cup in Yen.
 Oil me then well my axles, O!
 Back in my carriage let me go.
 Soon should I be in Wei;—but oh!
 Were I not wrong in acting so?
 Ah!—For that land of fertile streams
 Long do I sigh in waking dreams.
 So when I think of Siu and Ts'ó,
 Full is my heart, to overflow.
 Drove I but forth to wander there,
 Then were unbosomed all my care.

Official Hardships

Out by the northern gate I go my way,
 Bearing a load of sorrow and of care;
 Vulgarly poor am I, and sore bestead,
 And of my hardships all are unaware.
 Ah, so indeed!
 Yet Heaven hath so decreed;
 What therefore can I say?
 On me devolves the business of the king,
 On me official burdens fast encroach;
 On me, at home, arriving from abroad,
 My household all conspire to heap reproach
 Ah, so indeed!
 Yet Heaven hath so decreed;
 What therefore can I say?
 All urgent is the business of the king;
 Official cares press on me more and more.
 And when at home, arriving from abroad,
 My household one and all thrust at me sore.
 Ah, so indeed,
 Yet Heaven hath so decreed;
 What therefore can I say?

Emigrants

Cold north winds are blowing,
 Heavy falls the snow.
 Friend, thy hand, if thou art friendly!
 Forth together let us go.
 Long, too long, we loiter here:

Times are too severe.
 How the north wind whistles,
 Driving snow and sleet!
 Friend, thy hand, if thou art friendly!
 Let us, thou and I, retreat.
 Long, too long, we loiter here:
 Times are too severe.
 Nothing red, but foxes!
 Nothing black, but crows!
 Friend, thy hand, if thou art friendly!
 Come with me—my waggon goes.
 Long, too long, we loiter here:
 Times are too severe.

Irregular Love-Making

A modest maiden, passing fair to see,
 Waits at the corner of the wall for me.
 I love her, yet I have no interview:—
 I scratch my head—I know not what to do.
 The modest maid—how winsome was she then,
 The day she gave me her vermilion pen!
 Vermilion pen was never yet so bright,—
 The maid's own loveliness is my delight.
 Now from the pasture lands she sends a shoot
 Of couchgrass fair; and rare it is, to boot.
 Yet thou, my plant (when beauties I compare),
 Art but the fair one's gift, and not the Fair!

The New Tower

Past the New Tower, so spick and span,
 The Ho majestic rolled.
 There she who sought a gallant mate
 Found one deformed and old.
 'Neath the New Tower's high battlements
 The Ho ran smooth and still.
 She sought a gallant mate, and lo!
 A shapeless imbecile!
 The net was ready for a fish,
 A goose there came instead.
 And she who sought a gallant mate,
 Must with this hunchback wed.

The Two Sons

Two youths there were, each took his boat,
 That floated, mirrored in the stream;—
 And O the fear for those two youths,
 And O the anxiety extreme!
 Two youths they were, each took his boat,
 And floated on the stream away;—
 And O the fear for those two youths;
 If harmed, yet innocent were they.

THE MOTHER OF MENCIUS

Circulated from Mencius's lifetime on (ca. 371-289 B.C.E.)

China

Mencius (ca. 371–289 B.C.E) is an early Chinese philosopher who contributed to the development of Confucianism, and he is regarded as the “second sage” in this tradition. He wrote the Mencius, a Confucian text, which was published as one of the “Four Books” of Confucianism in 1190 C.E. by Zhu Xi, a Neo-Confucian philosopher. The Mencius contains Mencius's sayings, the writings about his life, and his philosophical statements about human nature and government. Mencius emphasized the rulers' obligations to look after the welfare of the common people. Mencius believed that humans are basically good with the “seeds” of virtue. The selected text here is a famous legend about Mencius's mother from James Legge's 1895 translation. It sheds light on the educational devotion of Mencius's mother (e.g., her moving three times for his education), her Confucian beliefs, and her influence on Mencius.

1. The materials for a Memoir of Mencius are very scanty. The birth and principal incidents of Confucius' life are duly chronicled in the various annotated editions of the Ch'un Ts'ew, and in Sze-ma Ts'een. Paucity and uncertainty of materials.

It is not so in the case of Mencius. Ts'een's account of him is contained in half a dozen columns which are without a single date. That in the “Cyclopædia of Surnames” only covers half a page. Chaou K'e is more particular in regard to the early years of his subject, but he is equally indefinite. Our chief informants are K'ung Foo, and Lëw Heang in his “Record of Note-worthy Women,” but what we find in them has more the character of legend than history. It is not till we come to the pages of Mencius himself that we are treading on any certain ground. They give the principal incidents of his public life, extending over about twenty-four years. We learn from them that in the course of that time he was in such and such places, and gave expression to such and such opinions; but where he went first and where he went last, it is next to impossible to determine. I have carefully examined three attempts, made by competent scholars of the present dynasty, to construct a Harmony that shall reconcile the statements of the “Seven Books” with the current chronologies of the time, and do not see my way to adopt entirely the conclusions of any one of them. The value of the Books lies in the record which they furnish of Mencius' sentiments, and the lessons which these supply for the regulation of individual conduct and national policy. It is of little importance that we should be able to lay them down in the strict order of time.

With Mencius' withdrawal from public life, all traces of him disappear. All that is said of him is that he spent his latter years along with his disciples in the preparation and publication of his Works.

From this paragraph it will be seen that there is not much to be said in this section. I shall relate, first, what is reported of the early years and training of our philosopher, and then look at him as he comes before us in his own pages, in the full maturity of his character and powers.

2. Mencius is the latinized form of Mǎng-tsze, “The philosopher Mǎng.” His surname, birth-place; parents; the year of his birth, bc 371.

His surname thus connects him with the Mǎng or Mǎng-sun family, one of the three great Houses of Loo, whose usurpations were such an offence to Confucius in his day. Their power was broken in the time of duke Gae (bc 493—467), and they thenceforth dwindle into comparative insignificance. Some branches remained in obscurity in Loo, and others went forth to the neighbouring States.

The branch from which Mencius sprang found a home in the small adjacent principality of Tsow, which in former times had been made known by the name of Choo. It was absorbed by Loo, and afterwards by Ts’oo, and its name is still retained in one of the districts of the department of Yen-chow in Shan-tung. Confucius was a native of a district of Loo having the same name, which many contend was also the birth-place of Mencius, making him a native of Loo and not of the State of Tsow. To my mind the evidence is decidedly against such a view.

Mencius’ name was K’o. His designation does not appear in his Works, nor is any given to him by Sze-ma Ts’een or Chaou K’è. The latter says that he did not know how he had been styled; but the legends tell that he was called Tsze-keu, and Tsze-yu. The same authorities—if we can call them such—say that his father’s name was Keih, and that he was styled Kung-e. They say also that his mother’s maiden surname was Chang. Nothing is related of the former but that he died when his son was quite young, but the latter must have a paragraph to herself. “The mother of Mencius” is famous in China, and held up to the present time as a model of what a mother should be.

The year of Mencius’ birth was probably the 4th of the emperor Lēeh, bc 371. He lived to the age of 84, dying in the year bc 288, the 26th of the emperor Nan, with whom terminated the long sovereignty of the Chow dynasty. The first twenty-three years of his life thus synchronized with the last twenty-three of Plato’s. Aristotle, Zeno, Epicurus, Demosthenes, and other great men of the West, were also his contemporaries. When we place Mencius among them, he can look them in the face. He does not need to hide a diminished head.

3. It was his misfortune, according to Chaou K’è, “to lose his father at an early period; but in his youthful years he enjoyed the lessons of his kind mother, who thrice changed her residence on his account.”

Mencius’ mother.

At first they lived near a cemetery, and Mencius amused himself with acting the various scenes which he witnessed at the tombs. “This,” said the lady, “is no place for my son;”—and she removed to a house in the market-place. But the change was no improvement. The boy took to playing the part of a salesman, vaunting his wares, and chaffing with customers. His mother sought a new house, and found one at last close by a public school. There her child’s attention was taken with the various exercises of politeness which the scholars were taught, and he endeavoured to imitate them. The mother was satisfied. “This,” she said, “is the proper place for my son.”

Han Ying relates another story of this period. Near their house was a pig-butcher’s. One day Mencius asked his mother what they were killing the pigs for, and was told that it was to feed him. Her conscience immediately reproved her for the answer. She said to herself, “While I was carrying this boy in my womb, I would not sit down if the mat was not placed square, and I ate no meat which was not cut properly;—so I taught him when he was yet unborn. And now when his intelligence is opening, I am deceiving him;—this is to teach him untruthfulness!” With this she went and bought a piece of pork in order to make good her words.

As Mencius grew up, he was sent to school. When he returned home one day, his mother looked up from the web which she was weaving, and asked him how far he had got on. He answered her with an air of indifference that he was doing well enough, on which she took a knife and cut the thread of her shuttle. The idler was alarmed, and asked what she meant, when she gave him a long lecture, showing that she had done what he was doing,—that her cutting her thread was like his neglecting his learning. The admonition, it is said, had its proper effect; the lecture did not need to be repeated.

There are two other narratives in which Chang-she figures, and though they belong to a later part of Mencius’ life, it may be as well to embrace them in the present paragraph.

His wife was squatting down one day in her own room, when Mencius went in. He was so much offended at finding her in that position, that he told his mother, and expressed his intention to put her away, because of “her want of propriety.” “It is you who have no propriety,” said his mother, “and not your wife. Do not ‘the Rules of Propriety’ say, ‘When you are about to ascend a hall, raise your voice; when you enter a door, keep your eyes low?’ The reason of the rules is that people may not be taken unprepared; but you entered the door of your private apartment without raising your voice, and so caused your wife to be caught squatting on the ground. The impropriety is with you and not with her.” On this Mencius fell to reproving himself, and did not dare to put away his wife.

One day, when he was living with his mother in Ts’è, she was struck with the sorrowfulness of his aspect, as he stood leaning against a pillar, and asked him the cause of it. He replied, "I have heard that the superior man occupies the place for which he is adapted, accepting no reward to which he does not feel entitled, and not covetous of honour and emolument. Now my doctrines are not practised in Ts'e:—I wish to leave it, but I think of your old age, and am anxious." His mother said, "It does not belong to a woman to determine anything of herself, but she is subject to the rule of the three obediences. When young, she has to obey her parents; when married, she has to obey her husband; when a widow, she has to obey her son. You are a man in your full maturity, and I am old. Do you act as your conviction of righteousness tells you you ought to do, and I will act according to the rule which belongs to me. Why should you be anxious about me?"

Such are the accounts which I have found of the mother of Mencius. Possibly some of them are inventions, but they are devoutly believed by the people of China;—and it must be to their profit. We may well believe that she was a woman of very superior character, and that her son's subsequent distinction was in a great degree owing to her influence and training.

THE ZHUANGZI

Zhuangzi (ca. 369-286 B.C.E.)

Compiled ca. the fourth century C.E.

China

The Zhuangzi, also known as Nanhua zhenjing ("The Pure Classic of Nanhua"), is regarded as a primary source for Daoism, along with Daodejing (a.k.a. the Laozi) and the Liezi. Out of thirty-three chapters, the first seven chapters, called the "inner books," are attributed to Zhuangzi, whereas the other chapters, called the "outer books," are credited to the later followers of Zhuangzi. The current arrangement of the book is credited to Guo Xiang in the 4th century C.E.

In contrast to Confucianism, Zhuangzi believed that a truly virtuous man is free from socio-political bounds and obligations, personal attachments, and tradition. Scholars still find the Zhuangzi, written in reflective, serious, and sometimes playful ways, puzzling, but it certainly engages the ideas of relativity, paradox, and uncertainty. The most famous of the Zhuangzi is the part about Zhuangzi dreaming of being a butterfly, which is located at the end of the second chapter. Because the transcription of Chinese sounds into a Roman alphabet can vary, Zhuangzi has been spelled in various ways, such as Chuang Tzu, Chuang-tsze, Chuang Chou, Zhuangzi, Zhuang Tze, Zhuang Zhou, Chuang Tsu, Chouang-Dsi, Chuang Tse, and Chuangtze.

THE ADJUSTMENT OF CONTROVERSIES

License: Public Domain

Chuang Tzu, Translated by James Legge

(1)

Nan-Guo Zi-Qi was seated, leaning forward on his stool. He was looking up to heaven and breathed gently, seeming to be in a trance, and to have lost all consciousness of any companion. (His disciple), Yan Cheng Zi-You, who was in attendance and standing before him, said, "What is this? Can the body be made to become thus like a withered tree, and the mind to become like slaked lime? His appearance as he leans forward on the stool today is such as I never saw him have before in the same position." Zi-Qi said, "Yan, you do well to ask such a question, I had just now lost myself; but how should you understand it? You may have heard the notes of Man, but have not heard those of Earth; you may have heard the notes of Earth, but have not heard those of Heaven."

Zi-You said, "I venture to ask from you a description of all these." The reply was, "When the breath of the Great Mass (of nature) comes strongly, it is called Wind. Sometimes it does not come so; but when it does, then from a myriad apertures there issues its excited noise; have you not heard it in a prolonged gale? Take the projecting bluff of a mountain forest—in the great trees, a hundred spans round, the apertures and cavities are like the nostrils, or the mouth, or the ears; now square, now round like a cup or a mortar; here like a wet footprint, and there like a large puddle. (The sounds issuing from them are like) those of fretted water, of the arrowy whizz, of the stern command, of the inhaling of the breath, of the shout, of the gruff note, of the deep wail, of the sad and piping note.

The first notes are slight, and those that follow deeper, but in harmony with them. Gentle winds produce a small response; violent winds a great one. When the fierce gusts have passed away, all the apertures are empty (and still)—have you not seen this in the bending and quivering of the branches and leaves?”

Zi-You said, “The notes of Earth then are simply those which come from its myriad apertures; and the notes of Man may just be compared to those which (are brought from the tubes of) bamboo—allow me to ask about the notes of Heaven.” Zi-Qi replied, “Blowing the myriad differences, making them stop [proceed] of themselves, sealing their self-selecting—who is it that stirs it all up?”

Great knowledge is wide and comprehensive; small knowledge is partial and restricted. Great speech is exact and complete; small speech is (merely) so much talk. When we sleep, the soul communicates with (what is external to us); when we awake, the body is set free. Our intercourse with others then leads to various activity, and daily there is the striving of mind with mind. There are hesitations; deep difficulties; reservations; small apprehensions causing restless distress, and great apprehensions producing endless fears. Where their utterances are like arrows from a bow, we have those who feel it their charge to pronounce what is right and what is wrong; where they are given out like the conditions of a covenant, we have those who maintain their views, determined to overcome. (The weakness of their arguments), like the decay (of things) in autumn and winter, shows the failing (of the minds of some) from day to day; or it is like their water which, once voided, cannot be gathered up again. Then their ideas seem as if fast bound with cords, showing that the mind is become like an old and dry moat, and that it is nigh to death, and cannot be restored to vigour and brightness. Joy and anger, sadness and pleasure, anticipation and regret, fickleness and fixedness, vehemence and indolence, eagerness and tardiness;—(all these moods), like music from an empty tube, or mushrooms from the warm moisture, day and night succeed to one another and come before us, and we do not know whence they sprout. Let us stop! Let us stop! Can we expect to find out suddenly how they are produced?

If there were not (the views of) another, I should not have mine; if there were not I (with my views), his would be uncalled for:—this is nearly a true statement of the case, but we do not know what it is that makes it be so. It might seem as if there would be a true Governor concerned in it, but we do not find any trace (of his presence and acting). That such an One could act so I believe; but we do not see His form. He has affections, but He has no form. Given the body, with its hundred parts, its nine openings, and its six viscera, all complete in their places, which do I love the most? Do you love them all equally? or do you love some more than others? Is it not the case that they all perform the part of your servants and waiting women? All of them being such, are they not incompetent to rule one another? or do they take it in turns to be now ruler and now servants? There must be a true Ruler (among them) whether by searching you can find out His character or not, there is neither advantage nor hurt, so far as the truth of His operation is concerned. When once we have received the bodily form complete, its parts do not fail to perform their functions till the end comes. In conflict with things or in harmony with them, they pursue their course to the end, with the speed of a galloping horse which cannot be stopped—is it not sad? To be constantly toiling all one's lifetime, without seeing the fruit of one's labour, and to be weary and worn out with his labour, without knowing where he is going to—is it not a deplorable case? Men may say, “But it is not death;” yet of what advantage is this? When the body is decomposed, the mind will be the same along with it—must not the case be pronounced very deplorable? Is the life of man indeed enveloped in such darkness? Is it I alone to whom it appears so? And does it not appear to be so to other men?

(4)

If we were to follow the judgments of the predetermined mind, who would be left alone and without a teacher? Not only would it be so with those who know the sequences (of knowledge and feeling) and make their own selection among them, but it would be so as well with the stupid and unthinking. For one who has not this determined mind, to have his affirmations and negations is like the case described in the saying, “He went to Yue to-day, and arrived at it yesterday.” It would be making what was not a fact to be a fact. But even the spirit-like Yu could not have known how to do this, and how should one like me be able to do it? But speech is not like the blowing (of the wind); the speaker has (a meaning in) his words. If, however, what he says, be indeterminate (as from a mind not made up), does he then really speak or not? He thinks that his words are different from the chirpings of fledglings; but is there any distinction between them or not? But how can the Dao be so obscured, that there should be “a True” and “a False” in it? How can speech be so obscured that there should be “the Right” and “the Wrong” about them? Where shall the Dao go to that it will not be found? Where shall speech be found that it will be inappropriate? Dao becomes obscured through the small comprehension (of the mind), and speech comes to be obscure through the vain-gloriousness (of the speaker). So it is that we have the contentions between the Literati and the Mohists, the one side affirming what the other denies, and vice versa. If we would decide on their several affirmations and denials, no plan is like bringing the (proper) light (of the mind) to bear on them.

(5)

There is no thing that is not “that”, and there is no thing that is not “this”. If I look at something from “that”, I do not see it; only if I look at it from knowing do I know it. Hence it is said, “That view comes from this; and this view is a consequence of that.”—which is the theory that that view and this (the opposite views) produce each the other. Although it be so, there is affirmed now life and now death; now death and now life; now the admissibility of a thing and now its inadmissibility; now its inadmissibility and now its admissibility. (The disputants) now affirm and now deny; now deny and now affirm. Therefore the sagely man does not pursue this method, but views things in the light of (his) Heaven (-ly nature), and hence forms his judgment of what is right. This view is the same as that, and that view is the same as this. But that view involves both a right and a wrong; and this view involves also a right and a wrong—are there indeed the two views, that and this? Or are there not the two views, that and this? They have not found their point of correspondency which is called the pivot of the Dao. As soon as one finds this pivot, he stands in the centre of the ring (of thought), where he can respond without end to the changing views; without end to those affirming, and without end to those denying. Therefore I said, “There is nothing like the proper light (of the mind).”

(6)

By means of a finger (of my own) to illustrate that the finger (of another) is not a finger is not so good a plan as to illustrate that it is not so by means of what is (acknowledged to be) not a finger; and by means of (what I call) a horse to illustrate that (what another calls) a horse is not so, is not so good a plan as to illustrate that it is not a horse, by means of what is (acknowledged to be) not a horse. (All things in) heaven and earth may be (dealt with as) a finger; (each of) their myriads may be (dealt with as) a horse.

Does a thing seem so to me? (I say that) it is so. Does it seem not so to me? (I say that) it is not so. A path is formed by (constant) treading on the ground. A thing is called by its name through the (constant) application of the name to it. How is it so? It is so because it is so. How is it not so? It is not so, because it is not so. Everything has its inherent character and its proper capability. There is nothing which has not these. Therefore, this being so, if we take a stalk of grain and a (large) pillar, a loathsome (leper) and (a beauty like) Xi Shi, things large and things insecure, things crafty and things strange; they may in the light of the Dao all be reduced to the same category (of opinion about them).

It was separation that led to completion; from completion ensued dissolution. But all things, without regard to their completion and dissolution, may again be comprehended in their unity—it is only the far reaching in thought who know how to comprehend them in this unity. This being so, let us give up our devotion to our own views, and occupy ourselves with the ordinary views. These ordinary views are grounded on the use of things. (The study of that) use leads to the comprehensive judgment, and that judgment secures the success (of the inquiry). That success gained, we are near (to the object of our search), and there we stop. When we stop, and yet we do not know how it is so, we have what is called the Dao. When we toil our spirits and intelligence, obstinately determined (to establish our own view), and do not know the agreement (which underlies it and the views of others), we have what is called “In the morning three.” What is meant by that “In the morning three?” A keeper of monkeys, in giving them out their acorns, (once) said, “In the morning I will give you three (measures) and in the evening four.” This made them all angry, and he said, “Very well. In the morning I will give you four and in the evening three.” The monkeys were all pleased. His two proposals were substantially the same, but the result of the one was to make the creatures angry, and of the other to make them pleased—an illustration of the point I am insisting on. Therefore the sagely man brings together a dispute in its affirmations and denials, and rests in the equal fashioning of Heaven. Both sides of the question are admissible.

(7)

Among the men of old their knowledge reached the extreme point. What was that extreme point? Some held that at first there was not anything. This is the extreme point, the utmost point to which nothing can be added. A second class held that there was something, but without any responsive recognition of it (on the part of men). A third class held that there was such recognition, but there had not begun to be any expression of different opinions about it. It was through the definite expression of different opinions about it that there ensued injury to (the doctrine of) the Dao. It was this injury to the (doctrine of the) Dao which led to the formation of (partial) preferences. Was it indeed after such preferences were formed that the injury came? or did the injury precede the rise of such preferences? If the injury arose after their formation, Zhao’s method of playing on the lute was natural. If the injury arose before their formation, there would have been no such playing on the lute as Zhao’s. Zhao Wen’s playing on the lute, Shi Kuang’s indicating time with his staff, and Huizi’s (giving his views), while leaning against a dryandra tree (were all extraordinary). The knowledge of the three men (in their several arts) was nearly perfect, and therefore they practised them to the end of their lives. They loved them because they were different from those of others. They loved them and wished to make them known to others. But as they could not be made clear, though they tried to make them so, they ended with the obscure (discussions) about “the hard” and “the white.” And their sons, moreover, with all the threads of their fathers’ compositions, yet to the end of their lives accomplished nothing. If they, proceeding in this way, could be said to have succeeded, then am I also successful; if they cannot be pronounced successful, neither I nor any other can succeed. Therefore the scintillations of light from the midst of confusion and perplexity are indeed valued by the sagely man; but not to use one’s own views and to take his position on the ordinary views is what is called using the (proper) light.

(8)

But here now are some other sayings—I do not know whether they are of the same character as those which I have already given, or of a different character. Whether they be of the same character or not when looked at along with them, they have a character of their own, which cannot be distinguished from the others. But though this be the case, let me try to explain myself. There was a beginning. There was a beginning before that beginning. There was a beginning previous to that beginning before there was the beginning. There was existence; there had been no existence. There was no existence before the beginning of that no existence. There was no existence previous to the no existence before there was the beginning of the no existence. If suddenly there was nonexistence, we do not know whether it was really anything existing, or really not existing. Now I have said what I have said, but I do not know whether what I have said be really anything to the point or not.

(9)

Under heaven there is nothing greater than the tip of an autumn down, and the Tai mountain is small. There is no one more long-lived than a child which dies prematurely, and Peng Zu did not live out his time. Heaven, Earth, and I were produced together, and all things and I are one. Since they are one, can there be speech about them? But since they are spoken of as one, must there not be room for speech? One and Speech are two; two and one are three. Going on from this (in our enumeration), the most skilful reckoner cannot reach (the end of the necessary numbers), and how much less can ordinary people do so! Therefore from non-existence we proceed to existence till we arrive at three; proceeding from existence to existence, to how many should we reach? Let us abjure such procedure, and simply rest here.

(10)

The Dao at first met with no responsive recognition. Speech at first had no constant forms of expression. Because of this there came the demarcations (of different views). Let me describe those demarcations: they are the Left and the Right; the Relations and their Obligations; Classifications and their Distinctions; Emulations and Contentions. These are what are called “the Eight Qualities.” Outside the limits of the world of men, the sage occupies his thoughts, but does not discuss about anything; inside those limits he occupies his thoughts, but does not pass any judgments. In the Chun Qiu, which embraces the history of the former kings, the sage indicates his judgments, but does not argue (in vindication of them). Thus it is that he separates his characters from one another without appearing to do so, and argues without the form of argument. How does he do so? The sage cherishes his views in his own breast, while men generally state theirs argumentatively, to show them to others. Hence we have the saying, “Disputation is a proof of not seeing clearly.”

The Great Dao does not admit of being praised. The Great Argument does not require words. Great Benevolence is not (officially) benevolent. Great Disinterestedness does not vaunt its humility. Great Courage is not seen in stubborn bravery. The Dao that is displayed is not the Dao. Words that are argumentative do not reach the point. Benevolence that is constantly exercised does not accomplish its object. Disinterestedness that vaunts its purity is not genuine. Courage that is most stubborn is ineffectual. These five seem to be round (and complete), but they tend to become square (and immovable). Therefore the knowledge that stops at what it does not know is the greatest. Who knows the argument that needs no words, and the Way that is not to be trodden? He who is able to know this has what is called “The Heavenly Treasure-house.” He may pour into it without its being filled; he may pour from it without its being exhausted; and all the while he does not know whence (the supply) comes. This is what is called “The Store of Light.” Therefore of old Yao asked Shun, saying, “I wish to smite (the rulers of) Zong, Kuai, and Xu-Ao. Even when standing in my court, I cannot get them out of my mind. How is it so?” Shun replied, “Those three rulers live (in their little states) as if they were among the mugwort and other brushwood—how is it that you cannot get them out of your mind? Formerly, ten suns came out together, and all things were illuminated by them; how much should (your) virtue exceed (all) suns!”

(11)

Nie Que asked Wang Ni, saying, “Do you know, Sir, what all creatures agree in approving and affirming?” “How should I know it?” was the reply. “Do you know what it is that you do not know?” asked the other again, and he got the same reply. He asked a third time, “Then are all creatures thus without knowledge?” and Wang Ni answered as before, (adding however), “Notwithstanding, I will try and explain my meaning. How do you know that when I say ‘I know it,’ I really (am showing that) I do not know it, and that when I say ‘I do not know it,’ I really am showing that I do know it.” And let me ask you some questions: “If a man sleep in a damp place, he will have a pain in his loins, and half his body will be as if it were dead; but will it be so with an eel? If he be living in a tree, he will be frightened and all in a tremble; but will it be so with a monkey? And does any one of the three know his right place? Men eat animals that have been fed on grain and grass; deer feed on the thick-set grass; centipedes enjoy small snakes; owls and crows delight in mice; but does any one of the four know the right taste? The dog-headed monkey finds its mate in the female gibbon; the elk and the axis deer cohabit; and the eel enjoys itself with other fishes. Mao Qiang and Li Ji were accounted by men to be most beautiful, but when fishes saw them, they dived deep in the water from them; when birds, they flew from them aloft; and when deer saw them, they separated and fled away. But did any of these four know which in the world is the right female attraction? As I look at the matter, the first principles of benevolence and righteousness and the paths of approval and disapproval are inextricably mixed and confused together—how is it possible that I should know how to discriminate among them?” Nie Que said (further), “Since you, Sir, do not know what is advantageous and what is hurtful, is the Perfect man also in the same way without the knowledge of them?” Wang Ni replied, “The Perfect man is spirit-like. Great lakes might be boiling about him, and he would not feel their heat; the He and the Han might be frozen up, and he would not feel the cold; the hurrying thunderbolts might split the mountains, and the wind shake the ocean, without being able to make him afraid. Being such, he mounts on the clouds of the air, rides on the sun and moon, and rambles at ease beyond the four seas. Neither death nor life makes any change in him, and how much less should the considerations of advantage and injury do so!”

(12)

Qu Quezi asked Chang Wuzi, saying, “I heard the Master (speaking of such language as the following): ‘The sagely man does not occupy himself with worldly affairs. He does not put himself in the way of what is profitable, nor try to avoid what is hurtful; he has no pleasure in seeking (for anything from any one); he does not care to be found in (any established) Way; he speaks without speaking; he does not speak when he speaks; thus finding his enjoyment outside the dust and dirt (of the world).’ The Master considered all this to be a shoreless flow of mere words, and I consider it to describe the course of the Mysterious Way—What do you, Sir, think of it?” Chang Wuzi replied, “The hearing of such words would have perplexed even Huang Di, and how should Qiu be competent to understand them? And you, moreover, are too hasty in forming your estimate (of their meaning). You see the egg, and (immediately) look out for the cock (that is to be hatched from it); you see the bow, and (immediately) look out for the dove (that is to be brought down by it) being roasted. I will try to explain the thing to you in a rough way; do you in the same way listen to me. How could any one stand by the side of the sun and moon, and hold under his arm all space and all time? (Such language only means that the sagely man) keeps his mouth shut, and puts aside questions that are uncertain and dark; making his inferior capacities unite with him in honouring (the One Lord). Men in general bustle about and toil; the sagely man seems stupid and to know nothing. He blends ten thousand years together in the one (conception of time); the myriad things all pursue their spontaneous course, and they are all before him as doing so. How do I know that the love of life is not a delusion? and that the dislike of death is not like a young person's losing his way, and not knowing that he is (really) going home? Li Ji was a daughter of the border Warden of Ai. When (the ruler of) the state of Jin first got possession of her, she wept till the tears wetted all the front of her dress. But when she came to the place of the king, shared with him his luxurious couch, and ate his grain-and-grass-fed meat, then she regretted that she had wept. How do I know that the dead do not repent of their former craving for life? Those who dream of (the pleasures of) drinking may in the morning wail and weep; those who dream of wailing and weeping may in the morning be going out to hunt. When they were dreaming they did not know it was a dream; in their dream they may even have tried to interpret it; but when they awoke they knew that it was a dream. And there is the great awaking, after which we shall know that this life was a great dream. All the while, the stupid think they are awake, and with nice discrimination insist on their knowledge; now playing the part of rulers, and now of grooms. Bigoted was that Qiu! He and you are both dreaming. I who say that you are dreaming am dreaming myself. These words seem very strange; but if after ten thousand ages we once meet with a great sage who knows how to explain them, it will be as if we met him (unexpectedly) some morning or evening.

“Since you made me enter into this discussion with you, if you have got the better of me and not I of you, are you indeed right, and I indeed wrong? If I have got the better of you and not you of me, am I indeed right and you indeed wrong? Is the one of us right and the other wrong? are we both right or both wrong? Since we cannot come to a mutual and common understanding, men will certainly continue in darkness on the subject. Whom shall I employ to adjudicate in the matter? If I employ one who agrees with you, how can he, agreeing with you, do so correctly? If I employ one who agrees with me, how can he, agreeing with me, do so correctly? If I employ one who disagrees with you and I, how can he, disagreeing with you and I, do so correctly? If I employ one who agrees with you and I, how can he, agreeing with you and I, do so correctly? In this way I and you and those others would all not be able to come to a mutual understanding; and shall we then wait for that (great sage)? (We need not do so.) To wait on others to learn how conflicting opinions are changed is simply like not so waiting at all. The harmonising of them is to be found in the invisible operation of Heaven, and by following this on into the unlimited past. It is by this method that we can complete our years (without our minds being disturbed). What is meant by harmonising (conflicting opinions) in the invisible operation of Heaven? There is the affirmation and the denial of it; and there is the assertion of an opinion and the rejection of it. If the affirmation be according to the reality of the fact, it is certainly different from the denial of it—there can be no dispute about that. If the assertion of an opinion be correct, it is certainly different from its rejection—neither can there be any dispute about that. Let us forget the lapse of time; let us forget the conflict of opinions. Let us make our appeal to the Infinite, and take up our position there.”

(13)

The Penumbra asked the Shadow, saying, “Formerly you were walking on, and now you have stopped; formerly you were sitting, and now you have risen up—how is it that you are so without stability?” The Shadow replied, “I wait for the movements of something else to do what I do, and that something else on which I wait waits further on another to do as it does. My waiting, is it for the scales of a snake, or the wings of a cicada? How should I know why I do one thing, or do not do another?”

“Formerly, I, Zhuang Zhou, dreamt that I was a butterfly, a butterfly flying about, feeling that it was enjoying itself. I did not know that it was Zhou. Suddenly I awoke, and was myself again, the veritable Zhou. I did not know whether it had formerly been Zhou dreaming that he was a butterfly, or it was now a butterfly dreaming that it was Zhou. But between Zhou and a butterfly there must be a difference. This is a case of what is called the Transformation of Things.”

The works in this chapter were written down starting around the 4th century B.C.E., but the three stories date back to much earlier in the oral tradition. All three works remain influential and ubiquitous in Indian society to this day: common knowledge that everyone knows, at least in some part. Rather than offering a list of values and beliefs, the stories demonstrate them in action: how to approach complicated moral issues, and what to do when life seems unfair. The answer is not always easy, and sometimes the choice is between two options that are not ideal. The best choice is often the most difficult one, and the expectations of society for these characters can seem overwhelming. The intervention of the gods in these cases becomes absolutely necessary. The Bhagavad-Gita is the most directly religious work, containing as it does the teaching of the god Vishnu through his avatar Krishna, but the other two texts include direct participation of gods (and their avatars) in the stories. Therefore, some basic information about Hinduism is necessary for a clear understanding of the texts:

The one god is Brahman, who both binds the universe together and transcends it. The consciousness of Brahman is divided into three parts, which worshippers address individually:

- Brahma, the Creator
- Vishnu, the Preserver
- Shiva, the Destroyer

Each of them is represented by hundreds of minor Hindu gods, who represent aspects of these three and can function separately while still remaining part of the whole (and all of them are part of Brahman). Gods also can send down avatars—pieces of their consciousness that are born, live, and die as humans—to intervene when necessary.

In all three works, a belief in samsara—the cycle of reincarnation—drives the characters' behavior. An individual can move up or down the hierarchy in society based on their karma (the sum of their good and bad deeds), but only in their next reincarnation. For each person, the concept of dharma (doing what one is supposed to do, right behavior, Law) is slightly different: A warrior who takes an oath (no matter how crazy an oath it is) must fulfill his oath, because keeping one's word is part of a warrior's honor. Not fulfilling an oath is adharma (described as Unlaw in the texts). A farmer, however, should behave like a good farmer, rather than a warrior, and good farmers do not take crazy oaths or act in ways that could damage their ability to plant and harvest a crop. Farmers also should not try to become warriors. Social mobility, therefore, is not only discouraged, but irreligious in that context. This idea drives the caste system, forcing people to remain in their caste or face being made an Untouchable.

Each character is born into a caste, or Varna, which determines what they can and cannot do, and each Varna is broken down into numerous Jats, or communities:

- Brahmins, the priests and scholars, are the highest Varna.
- Kshatriyas, the rulers and the military, are the next level.
- Vaishyas are the farmers, landlords, and merchants.
- Sudras are peasants, servants, and workers in non-polluting jobs.

The Dalit, or Untouchables, are workers in what are considered polluting jobs. In some places, even contact with the shadow of an Untouchable was considered polluting. In some parts of India (mostly rural districts), the caste system continues, despite government attempts to stop it.

Characters need to be the best they can be (following their individual dharma) in the Varna and Jat into which they were born in order to move up the hierarchy in their next reincarnation. They are expected not only to work in their Jat, but to marry within it. Certain problems in The Mahabharata are a direct result of characters who do not stay in their Jat (or even their Varna), and the story warns us that trouble, and even disaster, will follow.

AS YOU READ, CONSIDER THE FOLLOWING QUESTIONS:

- What is this society's definition of an epic hero? How do we know, based on examples from the stories themselves?
- How do the characters view the gods, and how do the gods treat humans?
- What do we learn about what this society considers proper or improper behavior, again based on the text itself? Who is punished or rewarded, and why?
- Is family love or romantic love more important in the text, and why?

THE BHAGAVAD GITA

Added to The Mahabharata between 400 B.C.E. and 400 C.E.

India

The Bhagavad Gita records the conversation between Krishna and Arjuna right before the epic battle of Kurukshetra. Although it is a part of The Mahabharata, it often is taught separately for its insights into Hindu beliefs. Krishna is the eighth human avatar of the god Vishnu, who sends down an avatar every time that the world requires such serious divine intervention that the good side could not win without his help. In this instance, the warrior Arjuna finds himself in a difficult position; to fight a war against evil, he must fight members of his own family, which would normally be a sin. Krishna must teach Arjuna how to know what to do when faced with conflicting duties. Some of the tension of the work comes from the setting; Krishna and Arjuna are literally between the two armies as they talk, while both sides wait for Arjuna to blow his horn, which will start the battle. The Bhagavad Gita stands as one of the great moral documents in world literature, influencing people as diverse as Thoreau, Tolstoy, and Gandhi.

Chapter 1

Arjuna's Dilemma

The war of Mahabharata has begun after all negotiations by Lord Krishna and others to avoid it failed. The blind King (Dhritarashtra) was never very sure about the victory of his sons (Kauravas) in spite of their superior army. Sage Vyasa, the author of Mahabharata, wanted to give the blind King the boon of eyesight so that the King could see the horrors of the war for which he was primarily responsible. But the King refused the offer. He did not want to see the horrors of the war; but preferred to get the war report through his charioteer, Sanjaya. Sage Vyasa granted the power of clairvoyance to Sanjaya. With this power Sanjaya could see, hear, and recall the events of the past, present, and the future. He was able to give an instant replay of the eyewitness war report to the blind King sitting in the palace.

Bhishma, the mightiest man and the commander-in-chief of the Kaurava's army, is disabled by Arjuna and is lying on deathbed in the battleground on the tenth day of the eighteen day war. Upon hearing this bad news from Sanjaya, the blind King loses all hopes for victory of his sons. Now the King wants to know the details of the war from the beginning, including how the mightiest man, and the commander-in-chief of his superior army—who had a boon of dying at his own will—was defeated in the battlefield. The teaching of the Gita begins with the inquiry of the blind King, after Sanjaya described how Bhishma was defeated, as follows:

The King inquired: Sanjaya, please now tell me, in details, what did my people (the Kauravas) and the Pandavas do in the battlefield before the war started?

Sanjaya said: O King, After seeing the battle formation of the Pandava's army, your son approached his guru and spoke these words:

O Master, behold this mighty army of the Pandavas, arranged in battle formation by your other talented disciple! There are many great warriors, valiant men, heroes, and mighty archers.

Introduction Of The Army Commanders

Also there are many heroes on my side who have risked their lives for me. I shall name few distinguished commanders of my army for your information. He named all the officers of his army, and said: They are armed with various weapons, and are skilled in warfare.

Our army is invincible, while their army is easy to conquer. Therefore all of you, occupying your respective positions, protect our commander-in-chief.

War Starts With The Blowing Of Conch Shells

The mighty commander-in-chief and the eldest man of the dynasty, roared as a lion and blew his conch loudly, bringing joy to your son.

Soon after that; conches, kettledrums, cymbals, drums, and trumpets were sounded together. The commotion was tremendous.

After that, Lord Krishna and Arjuna, seated in a grand chariot yoked with white horses, blew their celestial conches.

Krishna blew His conch first, and then Arjuna and all other commanders of various divisions of the army of Pandavas blew their respective conches. The tumultuous uproar, resounding through the earth and sky, tore the hearts of your sons.

Arjuna Wants To Inspect The Army Against Whom He Is About To Fight

Seeing your sons standing, and the war about to begin with the hurling of weapons; Arjuna, whose banner bore the emblem of Lord Hanumana, took up his bow and spoke these words to Lord Krishna: O Lord, please stop my chariot between the two armies until I behold those who stand here eager for the battle and with whom I must engage in this act of war.

I wish to see those who are willing to serve and appease the evil-minded Kauravas by assembling here to fight the battle.

Sanjaya said: O King; Lord Krishna, as requested by Arjuna, placed the best of all the chariots in the midst of the two armies facing Arjuna's grandfather, his guru and all other Kings; and said to Arjuna: Behold these assembled soldiers!

Arjuna saw his uncles, grandfathers, teachers, maternal uncles, brothers, sons, grandsons, and other comrades in the army.

Arjuna's Dilemma

After seeing fathers-in-law, companions, and all his kinsmen standing in the ranks of the two armies, Arjuna was overcome with great compassion and sorrowfully spoke these words: O Krishna, seeing my kinsmen standing with a desire to fight, my limbs fail and my mouth becomes dry. My body quivers and my hairs stand on end.

The bow slips from my hand, and my skin intensely burns. My head turns, I am unable to stand steady, and O Krishna, I see bad omens. I see no use of killing my kinsmen in battle.

I desire neither victory, nor pleasure nor kingdom, O Krishna. What is the use of the kingdom, or enjoyment, or even life, O Krishna? Because all those—for whom we desire kingdom, enjoyments, and pleasures—are standing here for the battle, giving up their lives.

I do not wish to kill my teachers, uncles, sons, grandfathers, maternal uncles, fathers-in-law, grandsons, brothers-in-law, and other relatives who are about to kill us, even for the sovereignty of the three worlds, let alone for this earthly kingdom, O Krishna.

O Lord Krishna, what pleasure shall we find in killing our cousin brothers? Upon killing these felons we shall incur sin only.

Therefore, we should not kill our cousin brothers. How can we be happy after killing our relatives, O Krishna?

Though they are blinded by greed, and do not see evil in the destruction of the family, or sin in being treacherous to friends. Why should not we, who clearly see evil in the destruction of the family, think about turning away from this sin, O Krishna?

Arjuna Describes the Evils of War

Eternal family traditions and codes of moral conduct are destroyed with the destruction of the family. And immorality prevails in the family due to the destruction of family traditions.

And when immorality prevails, O Krishna, the women of the family become corrupted; when women are corrupted, unwanted progeny is born.

This brings the family and the slayers of the family to hell, because the spirits of their ancestors are degraded when deprived of ceremonial offerings of love and respect by the unwanted progeny.

The everlasting qualities of social order and family traditions of those who destroy their family are ruined by the sinful act of illegitimacy.

We have been told, O Krishna, that people whose family traditions are destroyed necessarily dwell in hell for a long time.

Alas! We are ready to commit a great sin by striving to slay our relatives because of greed for the pleasures of the kingdom.

It would be far better for me if my cousin brothers kill me with their weapons in battle while I am unarmed and unresisting.

When Going Gets Tough, Even Tough Ones Can Get Deluded

Sanjaya said: Having said this in the battlefield and casting aside his bow and arrow, Arjuna sat down on the seat of the chariot with his mind overwhelmed with sorrow.

Chapter 2

Transcendental Knowledge

Sanjaya said: Lord Krishna spoke these words to Arjuna whose eyes were tearful and downcast, and who was overwhelmed with compassion and despair.

Lord Krishna said: How has the dejection come to you at this juncture? This is not fit for a person of noble mind and deeds. It is disgraceful, and it does not lead one to heaven, O Arjuna.

Do not become a coward, O Arjuna, because it does not befit you. Shake off this trivial weakness of your heart and get up for the battle, O Arjuna.

Arjuna Continues His Reasoning Against The War

Arjuna said: How shall I strike my grandfather, my guru, and all other relatives, who are worthy of my respect, with arrows in battle, O Krishna?

It would be better, indeed, to live on alms in this world than to slay these noble personalities, because by killing them I would enjoy wealth and pleasures stained with their blood.

We do not know which alternative—to fight or to quit—is better for us. Further, we do not know whether we shall conquer them or they will conquer us. We should not even wish to live after killing our cousin brothers, who are standing in front of us.

My senses are overcome by the weakness of pity, and my mind is confused about duty (Dharma). Please tell me what is better for me. I am Your disciple, and I take refuge in You.

I do not perceive that gaining an unrivaled and prosperous kingdom on this earth, or even lordship over all the celestial controllers will remove the sorrow that is drying up my senses.

Sanjaya said: O King, after speaking like this to Lord Krishna, the mighty Arjuna said to Krishna: I shall not fight, and became silent.

O King, Lord Krishna, as if smiling, spoke these words to the distressed Arjuna in the midst of the two armies.

The Teachings Of The Gita Begin With The True Knowledge Of Spirit And The Physical Body

Lord Krishna said: You grieve for those who are not worthy of grief, and yet speak words of wisdom. The wise grieves neither for the living nor for the dead.

There was never a time when these monarchs, you, or I did not exist; nor shall we ever cease to exist in the future.

Just as the soul acquires a childhood body, a youth body, and an old age body during this life; similarly, the soul acquires another body after death. This should not delude the wise.

The contacts of the senses with the sense objects give rise to the feelings of heat and cold, and pain and pleasure. They are transitory and impermanent. Therefore, one should learn to endure them.

Because a calm person—who is not afflicted by these sense objects, and is steady in pain and pleasure—becomes fit for salvation.

The Spirit Is Eternal, Body Is Transitory

The invisible Spirit (Atma, Atman) is eternal, and the visible physical body, is transitory. The reality of these two is indeed certainly seen by the seers of truth.

The Spirit by whom this entire universe is pervaded is indestructible. No one can destroy the imperishable Spirit.

The physical bodies of the eternal, immutable, and incomprehensible Spirit are perishable. Therefore fight, O Arjuna.

The one who thinks that the Spirit is a slayer, and the one who thinks the Spirit is slain, both are ignorant. Because the Spirit neither slays nor is slain.

The Spirit is neither born nor does it die at any time. It does not come into being, or cease to exist. It is unborn, eternal, permanent, and primeval. The Spirit is not destroyed when the body is destroyed.

O Arjuna, how can a person who knows that the Spirit is indestructible, eternal, unborn, and immutable, kill anyone or causes anyone to be killed?

Death And Transmigration Of Soul

Just as a person puts on new garments after discarding the old ones; similarly, the living entity or the individual soul acquires new bodies after casting away the old bodies.

Weapons do not cut this Spirit, fire does not burn it, water does not make it wet, and the wind does not make it dry. The Spirit cannot be cut, burned, wetted, or dried. It is eternal, all pervading, unchanging, immovable, and primeval.

The Spirit is said to be unexplainable, incomprehensible, and unchanging. Knowing the Spirit as such you should not grieve.

Even if you think that the physical body takes birth and dies perpetually, even then, O Arjuna, you should not grieve like this. Because death is certain for the one who is born, and birth is certain for the one who dies. Therefore, you should not lament over the inevitable.

All beings are unmanifest, or invisible to our physical eyes before birth and after death. They manifest between the birth and the death only. What is there to grieve about?

The Indestructible Spirit Transcends Mind And Speech

Some look upon this Spirit as a wonder, another describes it as wonderful, and others hear of it as a wonder. Even after hearing about it very few people know what the Spirit is.

O Arjuna, the Spirit that dwells in the body of all beings is eternally indestructible. Therefore, you should not mourn for anybody.

Lord Krishna Reminds Arjuna Of His Duty As A Warrior

Considering also your duty as a warrior you should not waver like this. Because there is nothing more auspicious for a warrior than a righteous war.

Only the fortunate warriors, O Arjuna, get such an opportunity for an unsought war that is like an open door to heaven.

If you will not fight this righteous war, then you will fail in your duty, lose your reputation, and incur sin.

People will talk about your disgrace forever. To the honored, dishonor is worse than death.

The great warriors will think that you have retreated from the battle out of fear. Those who have greatly esteemed you will lose respect for you.

Your enemies will speak many unmentionable words and scorn your ability. What could be more painful to you than this?

You will go to heaven if killed on the line of duty, or you will enjoy the kingdom on the earth if victorious. Therefore, get up with a determination to fight, O Arjuna.

Treating pleasure and pain, gain and loss, and victory and defeat alike, engage yourself in your duty. By doing your duty this way you will not incur sin.

Importance Of Karma-Yoga, The Selfless Service

The science of transcendental knowledge has been imparted to you, O Arjuna. Now listen to the science of selfless service (Seva), endowed with which you will free yourself from all Karmic bondage, or sin.

No effort is ever lost in selfless service, and there is no adverse effect. Even a little practice of the discipline of selfless service protects one from the great fear of repeated birth and death.

A selfless worker has resolute determination for God-realization, but the desires of the one who works to enjoy the fruits of work are endless.

The Vedas Deal With Both Material And Spiritual Aspects Of Life

The misguided ones who delight in the melodious chanting of the Veda—without understanding the real purpose of the Vedas—think, O Arjuna, as if there is nothing else in the Vedas except the rituals for the sole purpose of obtaining heavenly enjoyment.

They are dominated by material desires, and consider the attainment of heaven as the highest goal of life. They engage in specific rites for the sake of prosperity and enjoyment. Rebirth is the result of their action.

The resolute determination of Self-realization is not formed in the minds of those who are attached to pleasure and power, and whose judgment is obscured by ritualistic activities.

A portion of the Vedas deals with three modes—goodness, passion, and ignorance—of material Nature. Become free from pairs of opposites, be ever balanced and unconcerned with the thoughts of acquisition and preservation. Rise above these three modes, and be Self-conscious, O Arjuna.

To a Self-realized person the Vedas are as useful as a small reservoir of water when the water of a huge lake becomes available.

Theory And Practice Of Karma-Yoga

You have control over doing your respective duty only, but no control or claim over the results. The fruits of work should not be your motive, and you should never be inactive.

Do your duty to the best of your ability, O Arjuna, with your mind attached to the Lord, abandoning worry and selfish attachment to the results, and remaining calm in both success and failure. The selfless service is a yogic practice that brings peace and equanimity of mind.

Work done with selfish motives is inferior by far to the selfless service. Therefore be a selfless worker, O Arjuna. Those who work only to enjoy the fruits of their labor are verily unhappy, because one has no control over the results.

A Karma-yogi or the selfless person becomes free from both vice and virtue in this life itself. Therefore, strive for selfless service. Working to the best of one's abilities without becoming selfishly attached to the fruits of work is called Karma-yoga or Seva.

Karma-yogis are freed from the bondage of rebirth due to renouncing the selfish attachment to the fruits of all work, and attain blissful divine state of salvation or Nirvana.

When your intellect will completely pierce the veil of confusion, then you will become indifferent to what has been heard and what is to be heard from the scriptures.

When your intellect, that is confused by the conflicting opinions and the ritualistic doctrine of the Vedas, shall stay steady and firm on concentration of the Supreme Being, then you shall attain union with the Supreme in trance.

Arjuna said: O Krishna, what are the marks of an enlightened person whose intellect is steady? What does a person of steady intellect think and talk about? How does such a person behave with others, and live in this world?

Marks Of A Self-Realized Person

Lord Krishna said: When one is completely free from all desires of the mind and is satisfied with the Supreme Being by the joy of Supreme Being, then one is called an enlightened person, O Arjuna.

A person whose mind is unperturbed by sorrow, who does not crave pleasures, and who is completely free from attachment, fear, and anger, is called an enlightened sage of steady intellect.

The mind and intellect of a person become steady who is not attached to anything, who is neither elated by getting desired results, nor perturbed by undesired results.

When one can completely withdraw the senses from the sense objects as a tortoise withdraws its limbs into the shell for protection from calamity, then the intellect of such a person is considered steady.

The desire for sensual pleasures fades away if one abstains from sense enjoyment, but the craving for sense enjoyment remains in a very subtle form. This subtle craving also completely disappears from the one who knows the Supreme Being.

Dangers Of Unrestrained Senses

Restless senses, O Arjuna, forcibly carry away the mind of even a wise person striving for perfection.

One should fix one's mind on God with loving contemplation after bringing the senses under control. One's intellect becomes steady when one's senses are under complete control.

One develops attachment to sense objects by thinking about sense objects. Desire for sense objects comes from attachment to sense objects, and anger comes from unfulfilled desires.

Delusion or wild idea arises from anger. The mind is bewildered by delusion. Reasoning is destroyed when the mind is bewildered. One falls down from the right path when reasoning is destroyed.

Attainment Of Peace And Happiness Through Sense Control And Knowledge

A disciplined person, enjoying sense objects with senses that are under control and free from attachments and aversions, attains tranquillity.

All sorrows are destroyed upon attainment of tranquillity. The intellect of such a tranquil person soon becomes completely steady and united with the Supreme.

There is neither Self-knowledge, nor Self-perception to those who are not united with the Supreme. Without Self-perception there is no peace, and without peace there can be no happiness.

Because the mind, when controlled by the roving senses, steals away the intellect as a storm takes away a boat on the sea from its destination—the spiritual shore of peace and happiness.

Therefore, O Arjuna, one's intellect becomes steady whose senses are completely withdrawn from the sense objects.

A yogi, the person of self-restraint, remains wakeful when it is night for all others. It is night for the yogi who sees when all others are wakeful.

One attains peace, within whose mind all desires dissipate without creating any mental disturbance, as river waters enter the full ocean without creating any disturbance. One who desires material objects is never peaceful.

One who abandons all desires, and becomes free from longing and the feeling of 'I' and 'my', attains peace.

O Arjuna, this is the superconscious state of mind. Attaining this state, one is no longer deluded. Gaining this state, even at the end of one's life, a person becomes one with the Absolute.

THE MAHABHARATA

Written down between 400 B.C.E. and 400 C.E.

India

The Mahabharata is the national epic of India, and it encapsulates ideas about morality, law, family relationships, class structure (in the form of the caste system), and reincarnation. The basic conflict is between two sets of cousins, the Pandavas and the Kauravas, who both have a legitimate claim to the throne. The story is told through a series of narrators, starting with Vyasa (a character in the story) and continuing down through time to a bard speaking to a descendant of the winning side. Ultimately, the side that follows dharma (and follows the words of the god Vishnu in his human avatar of Krishna) will win. Dharma, which is both a concept and the name of the god who embodies it, is a difficult concept to translate: It includes morality, law, and doing what is correct for your caste level, which can change based on your situation. The epic warns the audience not to transgress caste boundaries; good behavior will be rewarded through reincarnation into a higher caste level. Although the caste system was officially abolished in India in 1949, it remains a pervasive social force. The characters also have a continuing presence in present-day society, with references to them in everything from comic Books and movies to casual conversations.

THE GENEALOGY OF THE MAIN CHARACTERS IN THE MAHABHARATA:

Note: Certain letters are dropped sometimes in writing (a form of abbreviation), with “h” being the most common casualty. Therefore, both “Shiva” and “Siva” are found in various texts, although the correct pronunciation regardless is to say the “h.”

OTHER CHARACTERS:

- Drona: the tutor of the princes
- Drupada: the enemy of Drona, father of both Draupadi (wife of all five Pandavas) and Dhrishtadyumna, who is meant to kill Drona
- Krishna: the seventh avatar of Vishnu, who is related to Kunti in his human incarnation and reveals the Bhavagad-Gita.

KEY IDEAS:

The first thing to realize about the people in the epic is that most of them are related to each other, whether by blood, marriage, or adoption. The major conflict is between two sets of cousins—the Pandavas (sons of Pandu) and the Kauravas (sons of Dhritarashtra)—who want to inherit the throne. Technically, both sets of cousins are Kurus, but the Kauravas are referred to as Kurus more often in the story. Although they both have legitimate claims, the Pandavas are considered the nobler of the cousins. The genealogy is complicated, but the basic idea is straightforward: the cousins will fight until one side wins. Since the Kauravas are (mostly) evil, there are religious reasons for the Pandavas to win, as well, which is why Krishna (an incarnation of Vishnu, one of the three main Hindu gods) sides with the Pandavas.

LAWS:

The concept of law plays an important role in the epic. In religious terms, Dharma is both the name of one of the Hindu gods and a concept that means a range of things, including justice, right action, and doing what you must do regardless of the circumstances. The characters in the story speak about either following dharma (Law) or committing an Unlaw (the opposite of dharma), which can put the soul in jeopardy. Obeying your parents and even your elder siblings is part of the law.

Other laws involve family rights. Since the status of a woman in a family depended on her ability to bear children, a wife whose husband was unable to give her children had the right to demand that one of his brothers be the father of her children. When one of the kings in the epic (Vicitravirya) is unable to father children, his wives insist that either his half-brother (Bhisma) or his step-brother (Vyasa) give them children. Vyasa, the king's brother by marriage only, becomes the father of the king's sons, Dhritarashtra and Pandu.

Blood ties, therefore, are less important in the epic than how society chooses to recognize you. By law, children from a previous marriage (or born illegitimately) become the legal children of the man that their mother marries. If a husband accepts a child as his own, even if the father of the child is another man, society recognizes that child as his. When Pandu is unable to have children (for unusual reasons), he asks his wife to say a prayer she knows that will call down various Hindu gods to father his children, and she shares the prayer with his second wife. The sons of Pandu are not his actual blood sons, but rather are accepted as his sons by law.

SONS OF PANDU:

- Yudhishtira is the eldest. He is the son of Kunti (the first wife) and Dharma, god of justice.
- Bhima is the son of Kunti and Vayu, god of the wind (considered the strongest natural force).
- Arjuna is the son of Kunti and Indra, god of war.
- Nakula and Sahadeva are twins. Their mother is Madri (the second wife), and their fathers are
- The Asvins (pronounced Ashvins), twin horsemen gods.

They are related to Krishna through Kunti, who is his aunt, and all five brothers are married to the same woman, Draupadi (sometimes referred to as Krishnā), through a mistake in the law.

PART ONE: THE GAME OF DICE

In the first two books of the Mahabharata, we learn the background of the Bharatas (also called the Kurus) leading up to the conflict between the five sons of Pandu and their cousins the Kauravas. This story is told by the sage Vyasa, whose name came to mean the "compiler." (Actually, the author of the epic is unknown, probably many authors over centuries.) Vyasa's mother is Satyavati, whose name means truth, so he is the "son of truth." In telling his story to a descendant of the Pandavas, Vyasa says, "If you listen carefully, at the end you'll be someone else." (play) Vyasa appears infrequently throughout the story, giving advice and also fathering Pandu and Dhritarashtra.

Ancestors of the Pandavas and Kauravas

Santanu, king of Hastinapura, was married to the beautiful Ganga, who was the river goddess in disguise. She agreed to marry him as long as he never questioned her actions. Over the years they had seven sons, but Ganga threw each one into the river. Santanu was distressed but he kept his promise. Finally, when their eighth son was born, Santanu asked his wife who she really was and why she had done this. Ganga revealed herself and told that her children had once been celestial beings, but were cursed to become human. She had ended their "punishment" quickly by drowning them immediately at birth. But since Santanu had questioned her actions, she left him, along with his last son Devarata.

Devarata is better known by his later name Bhishma. He receives this name, which means "of terrible resolve," after vowing never to marry or have children. His father wanted to marry again (Satyavati, mother of Vyasa), but the conditions of the marriage were that the second wife would be the mother of a king someday. Honoring his father's wishes, Bhishma makes his vow, guaranteeing that neither he nor a son of his will challenge the claim to the throne.

Years later, one of Bhishma's half-brothers dies in battle, and the other becomes old enough to marry. On behalf of his half-brother, Bhishma abducts three sisters and fights off all their suitors. On returning home, he learns that one of the sisters, Amba, had already chosen a suitor. Bhishma allows her to leave, but her betrothed does not want her any more. Now abandoned, she returns to Bhishma and demands that he marry her. Ever faithful to his vow, Bhishma refuses. Amba then vows that one day she will kill him, even though the gods have granted Bhishma the power to choose the day of his death, because of his vow.

The importance and power of vows are evident throughout the epic. Once stated, a vow becomes the truth and must be fulfilled, no matter what else may happen. When his father and both his half-brothers die prematurely without children, Bhishma refuses to marry his step-brother's widows (Amba's sisters). He will not relinquish his vow, even though his celibacy makes no difference anymore.

The young princesses must be given children, but who can father them? There are no other men in the family besides Bhishma, and he has renounced women. So Satyawati, the king's second wife, asks her first-born son, Vyasa the poet, to give children to the two princesses. He goes to them, but the princesses dislike him, for as an ascetic who has taken a vow of poverty, he is filthy and smells. He explains to them that they will each bear a son: however, the first will be born blind because the first princess closed her eyes when seeing him, and the second will be pale-skinned because the second princess became pale at his touch. The blind son is called Dhritarashtra, the pale one is Pandu. Vyasa has a third son Vidura by a handmaiden.

As his brother is blind and unfit for the throne, Pandu becomes the new king of Hastinapura. One day while hunting in the forest, Pandu shoots a gazelle in the act of mating. The gazelle was actually a brahmin priest in disguise, who curses him saying that should Pandu make love to either of his two wives (Kunti and Madri), he will die instantly. Knowing he can never have children, Pandu resigns the throne, and goes to live with his wives in the mountains. Kunti, his first wife, informs him that she possesses a magic power. By reciting a secret formula, she can invoke a god at will and have a child by him. The mantra's power is put to the test, and three sons are born to her: Yudhishtira, the first-born, truthful and virtuous, son of the god Dharma; Bhima, the strongest of men, son of Vayu, god of the wind; and Arjuna, an irresistible warrior, son of Indra. Madri, Pandu's second wife, makes use of this power too. She gives birth to twin sons, Nakula and Sahadeva. Thanks to his two wives, Pandu now has five sons directly descended from the gods, the Pandavas, the heroes of the epic.

Years later, Pandu one day surrenders to his passion for Madri. Fearing for his life, Madri tries to push him away but her struggles only inflame his desire more. Once they make love, Pandu falls dead, fulfilling the curse, and Madri, devoted to him always, joins him on the funeral pyre.

Meanwhile, Dhritarashtra has become king, despite his blindness. He weds Gandhari in an arranged marriage. When she learns of her husband's infirmity, she decides to cover her eyes with a blindfold which she will never remove, to join him in his world of darkness. Then, after an abnormally long pregnancy of two years, she gives birth to a ball of flesh. Vyasa tells her to split up the ball into 100 parts and put them in jars of ghee (Indian butter); in this way she becomes the mother of one hundred sons, the Kauravas.

The first born is called Duryodhana. Sinister omens of violence greet his arrival into the world: jackals howl, strong winds blow, fires rage through the city. Dhritarashtra worries about what all this means. Vidura tells him that his first son brings hate and destruction into the world. He will one day destroy their race. Vidura urges the king to get rid of the child, but Dhritarashtra ignores his advice.

Dhritarashtra is a weak ruler. He allows physical blindness to become a refusal to face reality and unwillingness to confront hard decisions, being easily led by Duryodhana in later years. He continually blames fate, excusing his own inaction: "Irrevocable were all the things that have happened. Who could have stopped them? What then can I do? Destiny is surely all-powerful" (KD 69). But one of Dhritarashtra's advisors tells him: "O king, surely a man who meets with calamity as a result of his own acts should not blame the gods, destiny, or others. Each of us receives the just results of our actions" (KD 538).

GROWING RIVALRY BETWEEN THE PANDAVAS AND THE KAURAVAS

Bhishma, now an old man, takes the responsibility of raising the two sets of cousins. They fight constantly, and even try to kill each other. One day a teacher and master of arms, Drona, appears and offers his services to train the boys. He has a secret mission: to avenge an insult made by a former friend. When young, Drona was close to Drupada, but years later, when Drona went to see his childhood companion, now a great king, he was scorned by Drupada because "only equals can be friends." As payment for his training, Drona asks the Pandavas to avenge him. Being mighty warriors, they conquer Drupada's kingdom, and hand it over to Drona. He promptly gives his former friend half his kingdom back, saying "now we are equals."

- For revenge, Drupada has children by sorcery, born out of flames: son Dhrishtadyumna is fated to kill Drona; an oracle says daughter Draupadi will "bring destruction on an unrighteous ruler;" a third child Sikhandi is Amba reborn.
- Later in the war, Drona and Bhishma will fight on the side of the Kauravas not so much out of loyalty but because their mortal enemies (Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandi) fight with the Pandavas.

Drona recognizes Arjuna's superiority as a master of arms, especially the bow, and favors him with special training. In a contest of skill, he tells each of the Pandavas to strike a target, the eye of a wooden bird in a tree. He asks each one in turn, "O prince, tell me what you see." One by one they respond, "I see my teacher, my brothers, the tree and the bird.” Drona tells them, “Then you will not hit the mark.” Arjuna, however, says he sees only the bird, and in fact, only the eye of the bird. Thus, focused on his target alone, he strikes with total accuracy. Drona rewards Arjuna by giving him a supreme weapon, the Brahmasira, only to be used against celestial beings, or else it will destroy the world.

Drona stages a tournament to display all the Pandavas’ skills, but a stranger appears who challenges Arjuna and equals him in archery. This is Karna, who the reader learns is Kunti’s first son by Surya the sun god, whom she bore before she married Pandu and abandoned in a basket on the river (like Moses). Thus Karna is the older brother of the Pandavas. However, Karna does not know his real mother, being raised by a chariot driver. The Pandavas mock his lowly social status and will not fight with someone who is not of royal birth, but their cousin Duryodhana sees the chance to make an ally. Ignoring the strict rules of caste, he says, “Birth is obscure and men are like rivers whose origins are often unknown” (play). Duryodhana gives Karna a small kingdom, and Karna swears eternal friendship to the Kauravas.

- Karna’s lowly caste (social status) will haunt him throughout the epic; later at a contest for the hand of Draupadi, she rejects him outright because he is from a servant family. For a person who desires to be measured by his accomplishments, living under this shadow is unbearable.
- As the child of the sun, Karna was born with golden armor over his skin. Later, the god Indra tricks Karna into giving this divine protection away.
- After Karna was born, Kunti remained a virgin

The Pandavas narrowly escape a plot by Duryodhana to burn them in a house made of highly flammable materials. For months afterward, they live in hiding in the forest. One night as Bhima keeps watch while the others sleep, there appears a rakshasa named Hidimbi (a man-eating ogre, one type of demon). Assuming the form of a beautiful woman, she falls madly in love with Bhima, who fights and kills her venomous brother. Bhima and the magical creature then have a powerful demon child called Ghatotkacha; he swears to come to the aid of his father whenever necessary.

ARJUNA WINS THE HAND OF DRAUPADI

The Pandavas attend the swayamvara of Draupadi, a ceremony where she will pick her husband from a number of suitors. Arjuna wins the archery contest easily and Draupadi chooses him. When Arjuna announces to his mother that he has won the “prize,” Kunti tells him to share with his brothers, before seeing Draupadi. Like an irrevocable vow, her statement, even by mistake, can’t be undone, so all five brothers marry Draupadi, the daughter of Drupada.

This unusual marriage fulfills karma, for in her former life, Draupadi had prayed to the god Shiva for a husband five times, and thus is rewarded for her devotion in this life.

In the Mahabharata Shiva is not the “destroyer” of the later Puranas, but has more to do with blessings of fertility: he also granted Gandhari her 100 sons.

The brothers agree to respect the privacy of each other when with Draupadi, but one day Arjuna enters the tent to retrieve his weapons and finds Yudhishtira and Draupadi in bed together. Even though Yudhishtira forgives him, Arjuna insists on keeping the vow. As penance, Arjuna goes into exile for a year; while away he marries three other wives, one Krishna’s sister, mostly for political alliances.

As tension mounts between the cousins, Krishna makes his appearance. It is said he may be an incarnation of the god Vishnu, the preserver, come down to save the earth from chaos. The appearance of Krishna introduces a major theme in the epic: dharma (cosmic order) menaced by chaos, so Krishna must step in, indicating that this is not just a family rivalry, but a conflict with universal consequences.

- In the medieval Puranas, the story developed that Vishnu had appeared on earth nine times in the past as an avatar or incarnation, in order to set the world back on the right path, and would appear again at the end of the age.
- Krishna’s deification in the Mahabharata may be based on later interpolations into the text, as there is considerable tension in the epic between the depiction of the divine Krishna and the human prince who acts as counselor to the Pandavas, gives devious advice, and eventually dies.

On Krishna’s advice the Pandavas present themselves to the blind king. To make peace, Dhritarashtra offers them half the kingdom, but in a region which was nothing but jungle and desert. Yudhishtira accepts his offer in the hope of averting a war.

Meanwhile, Arjuna and Krishna agree to assist a hungry brahmin, who reveals himself to be Agni, god of fire. He wants to consume a nearby forest which is protected by Indra's rain. Agni rewards Krishna with his discus and Arjuna with Varuna's bow Gandiva along with an inexhaustible supply of arrows. With these he is able to create a canopy of arrows to keep the rain from putting out Agni's fire. Even Indra cannot defeat Arjuna, because Krishna is with him (an indication of Vishnu's superiority over Indra by this time). Maya (not god of illusion but an asura or demon who escaped the fires) out of gratitude builds the great hall of Indraprastha.

Living in their new territory of Indraprastha, Yudhishtira turns poor land into a wealthy kingdom, and declares himself King of Kings. Duryodhana is jealous and humiliated on his visit to the magnificent palace, where he mistakes a glass floor for a pool, then later falls into a pool thinking it is glass. Draupadi and Bhima laugh at him. He returns home bent on devising their destruction.

THE DICE GAME AND THE HUMILIATION OF DRAUPADI

Duryodhana follows the advice of his uncle, the cunning Shakuni, an infamous dice player, and invites Yudhishtira to a game, knowing full well that gambling is his cousin's one weakness. Yudhishtira accepts.

- Duryodhana is not an original thinker, always relying on other's ideas. His uncle gave him the idea for the arson and the dice game. (Later during the war Duryodhana suggests capturing Yudhishtira and playing another game, which Drona calls stupid.)
- Duryodhana always threatens to commit suicide when things don't go his way (almost comical): "Excessive self-centeredness leads to unrealistic demands and unreasonable expectations from life" (Chaitanya 67).
- Kunti: "Duryodhana is a blind man's son, living blindly." (play)

Both Dhritarashtra and Yudhishtira ignore Vidura's warning to avoid the game, leaving the results to "supreme and unavoidable" fate. Krishna warns Bhishma not to interfere with the dice game: "If your race must be destroyed to save dharma, would you allow it?" (play) Told by his father that a warrior's dharma is to fight honorably, not to win at all costs, Duryodhana says, "The way of the warrior is fixed on victory, whether there's dharma or adharma on his way."

Carried away by the intoxication of the game, Yudhishtira wagers and loses all that he possesses: his lands, his kingdom, his brothers, even himself, and eventually Draupadi, who is dragged before the company by her hair, a special insult since a married woman's hair was sacred.

She challenges the Kauravas with a question: how can someone who has lost himself wager someone else in a game, but no one can answer her. Even Bhishma is confounded: "The ways of dharma are subtle." When even the wise Bhishma cannot resolve the question, she says, "I think time is out of joint. The ancient eternal dharma is lost among the Kauravas." Instead, they insult her, displaying her during the time of her period. Karna, still stinging from his rejection at the swayamvara, calls her a harlot who services five men. Duryodhana seeks to entice her by uncovering his thigh (obscene in that culture). Enraged at this treatment of his wife, Bhima vows that he will one day drink Duhsasana's blood and break Duryodhana's thigh.

Draupadi is about to be stripped naked when she invokes Krishna, who comes to her rescue and creates an endless supply of cloth around her. She swears that one day she will be avenged. There will be a great war, a war without mercy. At her curse a jackal howls. Frightened, Dhritarashtra apologizes to her and gives her husbands' back everything they lost, but Draupadi asks nothing for herself, saying, "Greed devours all beings and is dharma's [righteousness] ruin. I refuse greed." (CN 55)

Seeing his advantage given away, Duryodhana insists on one more throw of the dice. Yudhishtira agrees to a final game, but once again, he loses. The Pandavas and Draupadi are condemned to spend twelve years in exile in the forest, and a thirteenth year in an unknown place, disguised so that no one may recognize them. If anyone does, then they must spend another twelve years in exile.

PART TWO: EXILE

Books 3-5 tell of the twelve years of living in the forest, preceding the great war. The Pandavas are not alone in the wilderness but are followed by many loyal brahmins and servants. The gods give them an inexhaustible plate of food to feed all of them.

Throughout the epic, the importance of brahmins, the priestly caste, is emphasized. Yudhishtira wants to regain his kingdom so that he can provide for 10,000 brahmins. One must never refuse a brahmin anything

THE IMPORTANCE OF DHARMA

Draupadi and Bhima reproach Yudhishtira for his inaction and resigned passivity. Since it is obvious that Shakuni cheated at dice, wouldn't it be better to stand up and fight? Yudhishtira flatly refuses. He will keep his word: he resolves to follow his dharma. Dharma (variously translated as social duty, righteousness, or universal order) is the moral obligation which each human being should recognize and follow. Failure to do so could endanger the course of the cosmos as a whole.

Draupadi cannot understand why they are suffering so, if they are the righteous ones. If everything happens by the will of god, then why do the good suffer? It seems only the powerful escape harm, not the righteous. Yudhishtira corrects her: "None should ever perform virtue with a desire to gain its fruits. Such a sinful trader of virtue will never reap the results. ... Do not doubt virtue because you do not see its results. Without doubt, the fruits of virtue will be manifest in time, as will the fruits of sin. The fruits of true virtue are eternal and indestructible" (KD 245-6).

PREPARATIONS FOR WAR

Arjuna then leaves, aiming for the highest mountains to look for the celestial weapons they will need during the war. He meets the god Shiva who gives him powerful weapons. Arjuna then spends five years with his father the divine Indra learning to use the weapons fighting demons.

Meanwhile Karna decides he too must acquire a celestial weapon, so for many months he serves a powerful brahmin, Parasurama, who hates warriors. As a reward, he bestows upon Karna, whom he takes to be a servant, a formula for the supreme weapon. But Karna reveals himself to be a warrior by an excess of bravery, as he does not cry out when a worm bores a hole into his thigh. Parasurama curses him so he will forget the secret formula at the moment he wishes for the weapon, and that will be the moment of his death.

- In the Medieval Puranas, Parasurama becomes one of the avatars of Vishnu, but there is no indication of that aspect in the epic.

Karna later meets Indra (Arjuna's divine father) in the disguise of a brahmin. Having sworn never to refuse a brahmin's request, he agrees to surrender his divine covering of golden armor given him at birth. He tears off the armor from his skin, bleeding, and trades it for another mighty weapon, which will kill any being but can only be used once.

During their exile, the Pandavas rescue Duryodhana who is captured during battle, to his great humiliation. Honor bids him swear to repay Arjuna one day. (During the war, Arjuna asks Duryodhana to surrender five arrows of Bhishma's meant to kill the Pandavas, and he does so, to keep his vow.) Duryodhana is so depressed after his rescue that he intends to kill himself. The Danavas (a family of demons) need him as their champion (he was born at their request) and appear before him. The demons promise they will possess his armies during the coming war, which will continue to give him false hope.

One day, four of the Pandavas are killed by drinking the water from a poisonous lake. However Yudhishtira brings his brothers back to life by correctly answering the questions which Dharma, disguised as a crane, puts to him.

THE THIRTEENTH YEAR

According to the conditions of the game of dice, the thirteenth year which the Pandavas are to spend in disguise has now arrived. Yudhishtira (who presents himself as a poor brahmin), his brothers and Draupadi (who pass for wandering servants) all find refuge at the court of King Virata. Kicaka, a general in Virata's court becomes infatuated with Draupadi. He goes to great lengths to possess her, even threatening her life. Draupadi implores the mighty Bhima to help her; dressed in woman's clothes, he goes in her stead to a secret rendezvous, and pulverizes the over-amorous general into a bloody mass of flesh.

Meanwhile Duryodhana has launched an attack on Virata's kingdom. The king entrusts his troops to his young son who needs a chariot driver. Draupadi, who seeks war with the Kauravas at all costs, points out Arjuna as the world's best charioteer, despite the fact that he has disguised himself as a eunuch. Arjuna cannot refuse to fight and is decisively victorious, one man against countless armies.

War draws even closer. Duryodhana refuses to give his cousins back their kingdom because he claims they came out of hiding before the appointed time. He tries to win Krishna's support, as does Arjuna. Krishna offers Arjuna first choice: either he can have all of Krishna's armies, or he can have Krishna alone. Arjuna chooses Krishna, allowing Duryodhana to have the armies. When Arjuna asks him to drive his chariot, Krishna accepts.

In the Kaurava court, the blind king also senses the imminence of war. He asks the elderly Bhishma, an unparalleled warrior, to take the supreme command. His duty to the family outweighs his feelings toward the Pandavas, and he reluctantly accepts, but on one condition: that Karna does not fight. Although displeased, Karna bitterly agrees to fight only after Bhishma's death.

Dhritarashtra sends an envoy to Yudhishtira and begs not to fight since he loves righteousness. It would be better to live without his kingdom than risk the lives of so many. Yudhishtira responds that each caste has its own duty, and his is to be a warrior/king, not a brahmin/beggar. However, even he has reservations: "War is evil in any form. To the dead, victory and defeat are the same" (CN 101).

Krishna arrives as an emissary in a final attempt to safeguard peace. He speaks to Duryodhana who does not listen to him, but orders his guards to seize him. Krishna reveals his divine form: "Krishna laughed and as he did, his body suddenly flashed like lightning. He began to grow in size and various gods issued from him. Brahma sprang from his forehead and Shiva from his chest" (KD 492). Krishna allows even the blind Dhritarashtra to see his glory. Finally, he speaks to Karna, going so far as to reveal that he is the brother of those with whom he intends to fight. But Karna feels abandoned by his mother in his very first hours of life; furthermore he senses the end of this world. He will fight alongside the Kauravas, even though he can already foresee their defeat and his own death.

Duryodhana will not listen to warnings. He convinces himself that since the gods had not blessed the Pandavas thus far, they would not protect them during the war. "I can sacrifice my life, my wealth, my kingdom, my everything, but I can never live in peace with the Pandavas. I will not surrender to them even as much land as can be pierced by the point of a needle" (KD 453). He makes excuses for his nature: "I am whatever the gods have made me" (KD 482).

PART THREE: THE WAR

Books 5-10 recount the 18-day war between the Pandavas and the Kauravas.

The Kauravas have eleven divisions to stand against the seven of the Pandavas. The two armies are described as two oceans, crashing against each other. Briefly it's described as a "beautiful sight" (CN 125-6). Kunti tells the narrator Vyasa (in play): "You find too much beauty in men's death. Blood decorates your poem, and the cries of the dying are your music."

Bad omens appear prior to battle as thousands of carrion birds gather "crying in glee" (KD 539). Karna prophesies that his side will lose, that this is nothing but "a great sacrifice of arms" with Krishna as high priest.

Both sides agree to abide by certain rules of war: no fighting humans with celestial weapons, no fighting at night, do not strike someone who's retreating or unarmed, or on the back or legs. All these rules will eventually be broken.

THE BHAGAVAD GITA ("THE LORD'S SONG")

Just as the battle is about to start, Arjuna falters at the sight of his relatives and teachers, now his sworn enemies. He breaks down and refuses to fight.

How can any good come from killing one's own relatives? What value is victory if all our friends and loved ones are killed? ... We will be overcome by sin if we slay such aggressors. Our proper duty is surely to forgive them. Even if they have lost sight of dharma due to greed, we ourselves should not forget dharma in the same way. (KD 544-5)

Arjuna fears that acting out his own dharma as warrior will conflict with universal dharma: how can killing family members be good, and not disrupt the social order? Herein lies an unresolved conflict in Hinduism between universal dharma and svadharma (an individual's duty according to caste and station in life). A warrior must kill to fulfill his duty, whereas a brahmin must avoid harming any living creature. Even demons have their own castes and svadharma, which may run counter to human morality. One person's dharma may be another's sin. This doctrine distinguishes Hindu thought from religions such as Judeo-Christianity and Islam which teach universal or absolute moral codes.

His charioteer Krishna addresses him as they pause in the no-man's land between the two armies. This passage is the celebrated Bhagavad Gita, the guide to firm and resolute action.

- Unlike many epic heroes, at this point Arjuna thinks before he acts. Arjuna hesitates before such killing, wanting to retreat from life and responsibility (tension between dharma and moksha), but Krishna tells him as a warrior it's his dharma to fight. The real conflict today is with the self on the "battlefield of the soul."
- Don't worry about death, which is only one small step in the great and endless cycle of life. One neither kills or is killed. The soul merely casts off old bodies and enters new ones, just as a person changes garments. Death is only illusion (maya).
- How does a warrior perform his duty without doing wrong, polluting himself with the blood of his enemies? The secret is detachment: do your duty without concern for the personal consequences. "Victory and defeat, pleasure and pain are all the same. Act, but don't reflect on the fruits of the act. Forget desire, seek detachment." (play)

- We must always do what is right without desiring success or fearing defeat. “Work without desire for the results, and thus without entangling yourself in karmic reactions” (KD 550). Krishna tells Arjuna that good deeds will not get one to heaven if the desire for heaven is the sole motivation for good deeds. Desire is responsible for rebirth; if any desire remains when we die, we must return to another life.
- Likewise, Yudhishtira told Draupadi during the exile that he performs dharma not for reward but because it is what a good person does; after the battle he has a similar crisis when he temporarily refuses to rule, despairing at all the carnage he has caused.
- “Actions performed under the direct guidance of the Supreme Lord or His representative are called akarma. This type of activity produces neither good nor bad reactions. Just as a soldier may kill under the command of his superior officer and not be held responsible for murder, though if he kills on his own accord he is liable for punishment, similarly, a Krishna-conscious person acts under the Lord’s direction and not for his own sake” (BG as it is: online).
- “Such a person takes no delight in sensual pleasures. He is ever satisfied within himself. No miseries can disturb him, nor any kind of material happiness. He is without attachment, fear and anger, and remains always aloof to the dualities of the world. ... His mind is fixed upon the Supreme and he is always peaceful” (KD 551).
- There are two paths to liberation: renunciation (moksha) and performing one’s duty without desire. Since no one can truly renounce all action in life (this is a pretense of asceticism), it is better to work without attachment (KD 551). Some scholars think that the Bhagavad Gita was composed to combat a religious challenge from Jainism and Buddhism which arose in the sixth century BC, both teaching salvation through renouncing the world, the former by asceticism, the latter by monastic life (Kinsley 31).
- Krishna explains that the knowledge he imparts is ancient, just as he told it millions of years ago. Arjuna asks, “How can I accept this? It appears that you were born in this world only recently.” Krishna explains, birth too is an illusion, as men are born countless times. But in Krishna’s case, he comes into every age: “Whenever righteousness (dharma) becomes lax, O Arjuna, and injustice (adharma) arises, then I send myself forth to protect the good and bring evildoers to destruction. For the secure establishment of dharma, I come into being age after age. ... I was born to destroy the destroyers.”
- Krishna then reveals his divine, universal nature to Arjuna in a magnificent vision of a multitude of gods, stretching out to infinity. Resolved now to perform his duty to his lord, Arjuna leads his troops into battle.

On a hill overlooking the battlefield, Dhritarashtra hears the words of Krishna through his aid Sanjaya, who has been granted the ability to see and hear everything that happens in the battle, to relate these things to the blind king. Dhritarashtra shudders when he hears of Krishna’s theophany, fearing that nothing can stop the Pandavas with such a powerful being on their side. But he takes some comfort in knowing that Krishna cannot accomplish everything he wants, as he failed to arrange a peaceful solution to the conflict.

Before the battle, Yudhishtira goes to both his teachers, Bhishma and Drona: “O invincible one, I bow to you. We will fight with you. Please grant us your permission and give us your blessing.” For this sign of respect, both men pray for the Pandavas’ victory, even though they must out of loyalty fight on the side of the Kauravas.

THE BATTLE BEGINS

Bhishma compares the invincible Arjuna to “the Destroyer himself at the end of the Yuga.” (CN 126) In one confrontation, Arjuna splits Bhishma’s bow with four arrows, and Bhishma praises him: “O son of Pandu, well done! I am pleased with you for this wonderful feat. Now fight your hardest with me” (KD 581). However, he is unable to overcome Bhishma. After nine days of fighting, the Pandavas visit Bhishma by night; they tell him that, unless he is killed in the war, the carnage will carry on until the end of the world.

When asked how he can be defeated, he advises them to place Sikhandi in the front line, from where he will be able to fire freely at Bhishma. Sikhandi is actually a woman, Amba whom Bhishma had refused to marry and who vowed to be his death. Amba practiced asceticism, standing on one toe in the snow for twelve years to learn the secret of Bhishma’s death. Amba threw herself into the fire and was reborn from flames as Drupada’s second daughter, later changing sex with a demon to become a man.

The next day, confronted by Sikhandi, Bhishma refuses to fight a woman, and he abandons his weapons. Against the rules of war, the Pandavas strike the unarmed warrior with thousands of arrows. There is no space on his body thicker than two fingers that is not pierced. He falls from his chariot, and lies fully supported by the arrows, with no part of his body touching the earth. Bhishma does not actually die until much later, at his choosing. He remains lying on a bed of arrows until the end of the battle.

DRONA TAKES COMMAND

Drona positions the armies in a formation known only to him, the iron disc of war, which nobody knows how to break open, apart from Arjuna. If only Arjuna can be diverted away from the central battle, Drona promises victory. Arjuna has a fifteen-year old son, Abhimanyu, who, by listening to his father while still in his mother's womb, has learned to force an entry into Drona's battle formation. As Arjuna is called to a diversionary battle far away, Yudhishtira entrusts Abhimanyu with the task of opening a breach in the disc. Abhimanyu succeeds, but when Bhima and Yudhishtira try to follow him into the opening, they are stopped by Jayadratha, a brother-in-law to the Kauravas, and the breach closes behind the young Abhimanyu. In spite of his bravery, he is killed.

- Earlier during the time of exile, Jayadratha had tried to kidnap Draupadi, thus another reason for the Pandavas to hate him.

At this point Arjuna returns to the camp. Inflamed with rage and grief at the sight of his son's body, he vows to kill Jayadratha before sunset on the following day. He solemnly swears to throw himself into the sacrificial fire, should he fail. Even Krishna is alarmed by this terrible oath. On the next day, Jayadratha is heavily guarded, and Arjuna is unable to reach him. Krishna causes a momentary eclipse of the sun, convincing the enemy that, since night has come, Arjuna must have killed himself because he hasn't kept his vow. Rejoicing, they lay down their arms, leaving Jayadratha vulnerable to Arjuna's arrow.

Jayadratha's father had pronounced a curse on anyone who killed his son, saying that whoever caused his son's head to fall to the ground would die. Using magical mantras, Arjuna causes his arrow not only to sever Jayadratha's head, but to carry it miles away to fall into his father's lap. Being in prayer, he doesn't realize what's happened; he stands up and the head falls, thus he dies from his own curse.

The following day, Karna hurls himself into the battle. Kunti tries to persuade him to join the Pandavas, but Karna is inflexible. However, he does promise Kunti that he will only kill Arjuna, for one of them must die. In this way, she will still have five sons after the war.

Karna possesses a magic lance, the gift of Indra, which will kill any living being but can be used only once. He keeps it in reserve for Arjuna. To dispose of this lance, Krishna calls upon Ghatotkacha, son of Bhima and the rakshasa. During the night, he fights an epic battle against Karna, who can destroy the demon only by resorting to his magic lance. Ghatotkacha is killed, but Krishna dances for joy. With his lance now expended, Karna is vulnerable and Arjuna can kill him.

Drona continues to challenge the Pandava armies, slaying thousands. But the Pandavas know his weakness: the love of his only son Ashvatthama. Bhima slays an elephant, also called Ashvatthama, then deceitfully tells Drona of the death of his son. Suspecting a lie, Drona asks Yudhishtira for the truth: is his son dead or not? Drona will lay down his arms the day an honest man lies. Krishna tells Yudhishtira: "Under such circumstances, falsehood is preferable to truth. By telling a lie to save a life, one is not touched by sin" (CN 157). Yudhishtira speaks a half-lie, "Ashvatthama – (and muttering under his breath) the elephant – is dead." Before his lie, Yudhishtira's chariot rode four inches off the ground, but now it sinks back to earth. Drona lays down his arms. Drupada's son Dhrishtadyumna cuts off Drona's head, having sworn to avenge his father's humiliation.

Meanwhile Bhima sees Duhsasana coming towards him. Bhima had sworn to drink the blood of this avowed enemy for what he had done to Draupadi. Bhima knocks Duhsasana to the ground with his mace and rips open his chest. He drinks his blood, saying that it tastes better than his mother's milk. Bhima, who kills many Rakshasa (and has a son by one), often acts like the man-eating ogres himself—the bloody deaths of Kicaka and Duhsasana, both to avenge Draupadi; Bhima is her most passionate defender. Bhima kills most of the 100 Kauravas, who were demons incarnate.

THE DEATH OF KARNA

Duryodhana asks Karna to avenge his brother Duhsasana, and he finally meets Arjuna in the decisive confrontation.

Arjuna and Karna both have celestial weapons (for example, one shoots arrows of fire to be quenched by arrows of water). Karna has an arrow possessed by a Naga (serpent) spirit who holds a grudge against Arjuna (his family had died in the forest consumed by Agni). When Karna shoots at Arjuna, his charioteer warns him that his aim is too high, but he refuses to listen, and hits Arjuna's coronet only. When the spirit-possessed arrow returns to him and says try again, this time he will not miss, Karna won't admit failure by shooting the same arrow twice, even if he could kill 100 Arjunas.

As the fight continues, the earth opens up and seizes Karna's chariot wheel, in fulfillment of a curse. In desperation, Karna tries to invoke his ultimate weapon, but the magic words escape him. He remembers Parasurama's words: "When your life depends on your most powerful weapon, you will not be able to summon it." In his last moments, Karna questions his beliefs: "Knowers of dharma have always said, 'Dharma protects those devoted to dharma.' But since my wheel sank today, I think dharma does not always protect" (CN 165).

As he struggles to release his chariot, he cries out to Arjuna: "Do not strike an unarmed man. Wait until I can extract my wheel. You are a virtuous warrior. Remember the codes of war." But Krishna taunts him: "Men in distress always call on virtue, forgetting their own evil deeds. Where was your virtue, O Karna, when Draupadi was brought weeping in the Kuru assembly? Where was it when Yudhishtira was robbed of his kingdom?" (KD 780) Karna's head sinks to his chest, and he remains silent, while continuing to struggle with the chariot wheel. Krishna commands Arjuna to shoot, and Karna dies. A bright light rises out of Karna's body and enters the sun.

- Stubborn but loyal, Karna could have been king, as eldest of the Pandavas, but he remained with the Kauravas. He always fights fair, and keeps his promise to Kunti not to kill any brothers but Arjuna. Their rivalry echoes the mythic conflict between their divine fathers Indra and Surya.

THE DEATH OF DURYODHANA

Over the eighteen-day war, Duryodhana has seen his generals and their armies fall to the Pandavas, but to the very end he refuses to surrender. He hides in the waters of a lake, which he has solidified over him by magic. Ever the gambler, Yudhishtira tells Duryodhana that he can fight any brother he chooses, and if he wins, the kingdom will be his again. It says something of Duryodhana that he fights with Bhima rather than one of the weaker brothers. In a close battle between equals, Bhima wins only by treacherously striking Duryodhana on the legs, forbidden in the rules of war. Gandhari had put a protective spell over Duryodhana's body, but because he wore a loin cloth for modesty before his mother, his thighs were not protected.

Duryodhana accuses Krishna of taking sides unfairly and encouraging Bhima's treachery. Krishna responds: "Deceit in battle is acceptable against a deceitful foe. Even Indra used deceit to overcome the mighty asuras Virochana and Vritra." An onlooker remarks, "Bhima has sacrificed dharma for the sake of material gain. This can never lead to success and happiness." Krishna replies that Bhima was merely keeping his earlier vow, a sacred duty: "There is no unrighteousness in Bhima. He has carried out his promise and requited the debt he owed his enemy. Know that the terrible age of Kali is at hand, marked by fierce acts and the loss of dharma" (KD 811-13).

Duryodhana responds bravely: "I am now dying a glorious death. That end which is always sought by virtuous warriors is mine. Who is as fortunate as me? With all my brothers I will ascend to heaven, while you Pandavas will remain here, torn by grief and continuing to suffer" (KD 816).

As Duryodhana lies dying, Ashvatthama, Drona's son, tells him how he sneaked into the camp of the victorious Pandavas at night to perpetrate a hideous massacre, killing the remaining warriors and all the children while asleep, leaving the Pandavas without any heirs. Rather than welcoming the news, Duryodhana dies disheartened that the race of the Kurus appears to have no future.

Thus all those on both sides die in the war, except the five Pandavas. When Yudhishtira learns of the massacre, he mourns: "We the conquerors have been conquered."

When the Pandavas seek revenge, Ashvatthama launches the most fearsome celestial weapon in his arsenal. Arjuna counters with his own weapon, which Drona taught both of them; it was only to be used against divine beings, or else it could destroy the world. Ashvatthama deflects his into the wombs of the remaining Pandava women, making them sterile, but Krishna promises that Arjuna will nonetheless have descendants. As punishment, Ashvatthama is cursed to wander the earth in exile for 3000 years.

THE AFTERMATH

Books 11-18 contain events following the war and teachings by Bhishma.

After the war, when Krishna exits the chariot, it bursts into flames; only his presence kept the celestial weapons from destroying it earlier. Krishna reveals that the gods allowed this war to relieve Earth of her great burden (similar to Troy). Duryodhana was the incarnation of Kali, lord of the fourth age.

Yudhishtira reports the death toll at six million. Appalled at such losses, he has a personal crisis similar to Arjuna before the battle. He doesn't want to rule because it requires the use of force and more violence. He sees that life itself is painful, as men are always searching for more material wealth and power, never satisfied. The man who prizes gold and dirt equally is happiest. The others convince him he must rule and fulfill his duty.

Yudhishtira has a vision of the age to come: “I see the coming of another age, where barbaric kings rule over a vicious, broken world; where puny, fearful, hard men live tiny lives, white hair at sixteen, copulating with animals, their women perfect whores, making love with greedy mouths. The cows dry, trees stunted, no more flowers, no more purity; ambition, corruption, the age of Kali, the black time” (play).

Bhima asks, why has he come this far only to quit, like a man climbing a honey tree but refusing to taste it, or a man in bed with a woman but refusing to make love? Draupadi questions his manhood, as only eunuchs seek tranquility and avoid violence. Arjuna says refusing to rule will only cause more disorder and create for him great amount of bad karma to face in next life of lowly birth. We should accept our role depending on where we are in life: a father has obligation to his family while they are young, likewise a king must first rule, then in the last years of life he may abandon the world, but to do so earlier would be an act of selfishness.

In his dying speech, pierced by many arrows, Bhishma tells Yudhishtira that in the fourth age (our present age), “dharma becomes adharma and adharma, dharma.” Somewhat paradoxically, he continues, “If one fights against trickery, one should oppose him with trickery. But if one fights lawfully, one should check him with dharma ... One should conquer evil with good. Death by dharma is better than victory by evil deeds.”

Bhishma’s dying advice to Yudhishtira lasts fifty days and covers two of the longest books in the epic (12-13); some of the topics:

- “There is no duty higher than Truth,” but five falsehoods are not sinful: lying in jest, lying to a woman, lying at wedding, lying to save a teacher, lying to save one’s life.
- The foremost duty of kings is to revere Brahmins.
- “No creature is more sinful than woman; women are the root of all evil; she is poison, she is a snake, she is fire,” but at the same time, “Righteousness of men depends on women. All pleasures and enjoyments depend on women.”
- Cows constitute the stairs that lead to heaven; cows are goddesses able to grant every wish; nothing in the world superior; one should never go to bed or rise in the morning without reciting the names of cows.” Cows provide cleansing from sin. “There is nothing unattainable for one who is devoted to cows” (this goes on for about fifty pages).
- 1000 names of Vishnu (twenty-six pages)
- Shortly after, Arjuna tells Krishna that he has forgotten his teaching (contained in the Bhagavad Gita), so for thirty-six chapters this advice is repeated.

Now that all her sons are dead, Gandhari’s eyes are so charged with grief that, by looking under her blindfold, her emotion sears the flesh of Yudhishtira’s foot. She curses Krishna, whom she holds responsible for all of the tragedy that has befallen them: the Pandava kingdom will fall in thirty-six years. Even Krishna will die; he shall be killed by a passing stranger. Krishna calmly accepts this curse, then tells her that a light has been saved, even if she cannot see it. Yudhishtira agrees to reign.

Dhritarashtra has one son by another wife who survives the war. Yuyutsu chose to fight on the side of the Pandavas, deciding to follow dharma rather than loyalty to his family. After the war, out of gratitude Yudhishtira makes Yuyutsu king of his old territory Indraprastha.

Thirty-six years pass, and Yudhishtira arrives at the entrance to paradise, carrying a dog in his arms. His brothers and Draupadi, who left the earth with him, have fallen from the mountains into the abyss along the way. A gatekeeper tells him to abandon the dog if he wants to enter paradise. He refuses to leave a creature so faithful, and is permitted to enter, for this was a test, the dog was the god Dharma in disguise. In paradise, further surprises await him. His enemies are there, smiling and contented. His brothers and Draupadi, on the other hand, seem to be in a place of suffering and torment. Why? Yudhishtira decides to stay with his loved ones in hell, rather than enjoy the delights of heaven with his enemies. This too was a test, the “final illusion.” They are all permitted to enter paradise.

- In Hindu thought, neither heaven (svarga) or hell are eternal, but only intervals between rebirths. Everyone must first spend some time in hell (or a hell, as there are many) to pay for the sins of the most recent life. Yudhishtira had to experience hell for only a moment, because of his lie to Drona. Heaven is obtained by good deeds, but only for a limited time until the accumulated merit runs out.
- According to one tradition, there are six planes of existence (lokas) above earth and seven lokas (hells) below. However, no action can occur in these other worlds, so that a person’s karma doesn’t change until he returns to earth.

- “Actions performed in accordance with scriptural injunctions . . . lead the performer to the heavenly planets for prolonged sensual enjoyment. However, when a person’s pious credits are exhausted, he must return to Earth, just as a person returns from a holiday and resumes his work.” (“BG as it is: Online”)

THE MAHABHARATA OF KRISHNA

Dwaipayana Vyas, Translated by Kisari Mohan Ganguli

Book 2

The Dice Game

Section LVIII

Vaisampayana said,—”The sons of Pritha with Yudhishtira at their head, having entered that assembly house, approached all the kings that were present there. And worshipping all those that deserved to be worshipped, and saluting others as each deserved according to age, they seated themselves on seats that were clean and furnished with costly carpets. After they had taken their seats, as also all the kings, Sakuni the son of Suvala addressed Yudhishtira and said, ‘O king, the assembly is full. All had been waiting for thee. Let, therefore, the dice be cast and the rules of play be fixed, O Yudhishtira.’

‘Yudhishtira replied, ‘Deceitful gambling is sinful. There is no Kshatriya prowess in it. There is certainly no morality in it. Why, then, O king, dost thou praise gambling so? The wise applaud not the pride that gamblers feel in deceitful play. O Sakuni, vanquish us, not like a wretch, by deceitful means.’

Sakuni said,—”That high-souled player who knoweth the secrets of winning and losing, who is skilled in baffling the deceitful arts of his confrere, who is united in all the diverse operations of which gambling consisteth, truly knoweth the play, and he suffereth all in course of it. O son of Pritha, it is the staking at dice, which may be lost or won that may injure us. And it is for that reason that gambling is regarded as a fault. Let us, therefore, O king, begin the play. Fear not. Let the stakes be fixed. Delay not!’

‘Yudhishtira said,—’That best of Munis, Devala, the son of Asita, who always instructeth us about all those acts that may lead to heaven, hell, or the other regions, hath said, that it is sinful to play deceitfully with a gambler. To obtain victory in battle without cunning or stratagem is the best sport. Gambling, however, as a sport, is not so. Those that are respectable never use the language of the Mlechhas, nor do they adopt deceitfulness in their behaviour. War carried on without crookedness and cunning, this is the act of men that are honest. Do not, O Sakuni, playing desperately, win of us that wealth with which according to our abilities, we strive to learn how to benefit the Brahmanas. Even enemies should not be vanquished by desperate stakes in deceitful play. I do not desire either happiness or wealth by means of cunning. The conduct of one that is a gambler, even if it be without deceitfulness, should not be applauded.’

‘Sakuni said,—’O Yudhishtira, it is from a desire of winning, which is not a very honest motive, that one high-born person approacheth another (in a contest of race superiority). So also it is from a desire of defeating, which is not a very honest motive, that one learned person approacheth another (in a contest of learning). Such motives, however, are scarcely regarded as really dishonest. So also, O Yudhishtira, a person skilled at dice approacheth one that is not so skilled from a desire of vanquishing him. One also who is conversant with the truths of science approacheth another that is not from desire of victory, which is scarcely an honest motive. But (as I have already said) such a motive is not really dishonest. And, O Yudhishtira, so also one that is skilled in weapons approacheth one that is not so skilled; the strong approacheth the weak. This is the practice in every contest. The motive is victory, O Yudhishtira. If, therefore, thou, in approaching me, regardest me to be actuated by motives that are dishonest, if thou art under any fear, desist then from play.’

‘Yudhishtira said,—’Summoned, I do not withdraw. This is my established vow. And, O king, Fate is all powerful. We all are under the control of Destiny. With whom in this assembly am I to play? Who is there that can stake equally with me? Let the play begin.’

‘Duryodhana said,—’O monarch, I shall supply jewels and gems and every kind of wealth. And it is for me that this Sakuni, my uncle, will play.’

‘Yudhishtira said,—’Gambling for one’s sake by the agency of another seemeth to me to be contrary to rule. Thou also, O learned one, will admit this. If, however, thou art still bent on it, let the play begin.’”

Section LIX

Vaisampayana said,—”When the play commenced, all those kings with Dhritarashtra at their head took their seats in that assembly. And, O Bharata, Bhishma and Drona and Kripa and the high-souled Vidura with cheerless hearts sat behind. And those kings with leonine necks and endued with great energy took their seats separately and in pairs upon many elevated seats of beautiful make and colour. And, O king, that mansion looked resplendent with those assembled kings like heaven itself with a conclave of the celestials of great good fortune. And they were all conversant with the Vedas and brave and of resplendent countenances. And, O great king, the friendly match at dice then commenced.

Yudhishtira said,—”O king, this excellent wealth of pearls of great value, procured from the ocean by churning it (of old), so beautiful and decked with pure gold, this, O king, is my stake. What is thy counter stake, O great king,—the wealth with which thou wishest to play with me?”

“Duryodhana said,—’I have many jewels and much wealth. But I am not vain of them. Win thou this stake.’

Vaisampayana continued,—”Then Sakuni, well-skilled at dice, took up the dice and (casting them) said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo, I have won!’”

Section LX

Yudhishtira said,—”Thou hast won this stake of me by unfair means. But be not so proud, O Sakuni. Let us play staking thousands upon thousands. I have many beautiful jars each full of a thousand Nishkas in my treasury, inexhaustible gold, and much silver and other minerals. This, O king, is the wealth with which I will stake with thee!”

Vaisampayana continued,—”Thus addressed, Sakuni said unto the chief of the perpetrators of the Kuru race, the eldest of the sons of Pandu, king Yudhishtira, of glory incapable of sustaining any diminution. ‘Lo, I have won!’”

Yudhishtira said,—’This my sacred and victorious and royal car which gladdeneth the heart and hath carried us hither, which is equal unto a thousand cars, which is of symmetrical proportions and covered with tiger-skin, and furnished with excellent wheels and flag-staffs which is handsome, and decked with strings of little bells, whose clatter is even like the roar of the clouds or of the ocean, and which is drawn by eight noble steeds known all over the kingdom and which are white as the moon-beam and from whose hoofs no terrestrial creature can escape—this, O king, is my wealth with which I will stake with thee!’”

Vaisampayana continued,—”Hearing these words, Sakuni ready with the dice, and adopting unfair means, said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo, I have won!’

“Yudhishtira said,—’I have a hundred thousand serving-girls, all young, and decked with golden bracelets on their wrists and upper arms, and with nishkas round their necks and other ornaments, adorned with costly garlands and attired in rich robes, daubed with the sandal paste, wearing jewels and gold, and well-skilled in the four and sixty elegant arts, especially versed in dancing and singing, and who wait upon and serve at my command the celestials, the Snataka Brahmanas, and kings. With this wealth, O king, I will stake with thee!’”

Vaisampayana continued,—’Hearing these words, Sakuni ready with the dice, adopting unfair means, said unto Yudhishtira. ‘Lo, I have won!’

Yudhishtira said,—”I have thousands of serving-men, skilled in waiting upon guests, always attired in silken robes, endued with wisdom and intelligence, their senses under control though young, and decked with ear-rings, and who serve all guests night and day with plates and dishes in hand. With this wealth, O king, I will stake with thee!”

Vaisampayana continued,—”Hearing these words, Sakuni, ready with the dice, adopting unfair means said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo, I have won!’

“Yudhishtira said,—’I have, O son of Suvala, one thousand musty elephants with golden girdles, decked with ornaments, with the mark of the lotus on their temples and necks and other parts, adorned with golden garlands, with fine white tusks long and thick as plough-shafts, worthy of carrying kings on their backs, capable of bearing every kind of noise on the field of battle, with huge bodies, capable of battering down the walls of hostile towns, of the colour of new-formed clouds, and each possessing eight she-elephants. With this wealth, O king, I will stake with thee.’”

Vaisampayana continued,—”Unto Yudhishtira who had said so, Sakuni, the son of Suvala, laughingly said, ‘Lo, I have won it!’

Yudhishtira said,—’I have as many cars as elephants, all furnished with golden poles and flag-staffs and well-trained horses and warriors that fight wonderfully and each of whom receiveth a thousand coins as his monthly pay whether he fighteth or not. With this wealth, O king, I will stake with thee!’”

Vaisampayana continued,—”When these words had been spoken, the wretch Sakuni, pledged to enmity, said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo, I have won it.’

Yudhishtira said.—'The steeds of the Tittiri, Kalmasha, and Gandharva breeds, decked with ornaments, which Chitraratha having been vanquished in battle and subdued cheerfully gave unto Arjuna, the wielder of the Gandiva. With this wealth, O king, I will stake with thee.' Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing this, Sakuni, ready at dice, adopting unfair means, said unto Yudhishtira: 'Lo, I have won!'

Yudhishtira said,—'I have ten thousand cars and vehicles unto which are yoked draught animals of the foremost breed. And I have also sixty thousand warriors picked from each order by thousands, who are all brave and endowed with prowess like heroes, who drink milk and eat good rice, and all of whom have broad chests. With this wealth, O king, I will stake with thee.'

Vaisampayana continued,—'Hearing this, Sakuni ready at dice, adopting unfair means said unto Yudhishtira, 'Lo, I have won!'

Yudhishtira said,—'I have four hundred Nidis (jewels of great value) encased in sheets of copper and iron. Each one of them is equal to five draunikas of the costliest and purest leaf gold of the Jatarupa kind. With this wealth, O king, I will stake with thee.'

Vaisampayana continued,—'Hearing this, Sakuni ready at dice, adopting foul means, said unto Yudhishtira, 'Lo, I have won it!'

Section LXI

Vaisampayana said,—'During the course of this gambling, certain to bring about utter ruin (on Yudhishtira), Vidura, that dispeller of all doubts, (addressing Dhritarashtra) said, 'O great king, O thou of the Bharata race, attend to what I say, although my words may not be agreeable to thee, like medicine to one that is ill and about to breathe his last. When this Duryodhana of sinful mind had, immediately after his birth, cried discordantly like a jackal, it was well known that he had been ordained to bring about the destruction of the Bharata race. Know, O king, that he will be the cause of death of ye all. A jackal is living in thy house, O king, in the form of Duryodhana. Thou knowest it not in consequence of thy folly. Listen now to the words of the Poet (Sukra) which I will quote. They that collect honey (in mountains), having received what they seek, do not notice that they are about to fall. Ascending dangerous heights, abstracted in the pursuit of what they seek, they fall down and meet with destruction. This Duryodhana also, maddened with the play at dice, like the collector of honey, abstracted in what he seeketh, marketh not the consequences. Making enemies of these great warriors, he beholdeth not the fall that is before him. It is known to thee, O thou of great wisdom, that amongst the Bhojas, they abandoned, for the good of the citizens a son that was unworthy of their race. The Andhakas, the Yadavas, and the Bhojas uniting together, abandoned Kansa. And afterwards, when at the command of the whole tribe, the same Kansa had been slain by Krishna that slayer of foes, all the men of the tribe became exceedingly happy for a hundred years. So at thy command, let Arjuna slay this Suyodhana. And in consequence of the slaying of this wretch, let the Kurus be glad and pass their days in happiness. In exchange of a crow, O great king, buy these peacocks--the Pandavas; and in exchange of a jackal, buy these tigers. For the sake of a family a member may be sacrificed; for the sake of a village a family may be sacrificed, for the sake of a province a village may be sacrificed and for the sake of one's own soul the whole earth may be sacrificed. Even this was what the omniscient Kavya himself, acquainted with the thoughts of every creature, and a source of terror unto all foes, said unto the great Asuras to induce them to abandon Jambha at the moment of his birth. It is said that a certain king, having caused a number of wild birds that vomited gold to take up their quarters in his own house, afterwards killed them from temptation. O slayer of foes, blinded by temptation and the desire of enjoyment, for the sake of gold, the king destroyed at the same time both his present and future gains. Therefore, O king, prosecute not the Pandavas from desire of profit, even like the king in story. For then, blinded by folly thou wilt have to repent afterwards, even like the person that killed the birds. Like a flower-seller that plucketh (many flowers) in the garden from trees that he cherisheth with affection from day to day, continue, O Bharata, to pluck flowers day by day from the Pandavas. Do not scorch them to their roots like a fire-producing breeze that reduceth everything to black charcoal. Go not, O king, unto the region of Yama, with thy sons and troops, for who is there that is capable of fighting with the sons of Pritha, together? Not to speak of others, is the chief of the celestials at the head of the celestials themselves, capable of doing so?'

Section LXII

"Vidura said,—'Gambling is the root of dissensions. It bringeth about disunion. Its consequences are frightful. Yet having recourse to this, Dhritarashtra's son Duryodhana createth for himself fierce enmity. The descendants of Pratipa and Santanu, with their fierce troops and their allies the Vahlikas, will, for the sins of Duryodhana meet with destruction. Duryodhana, in consequence of this intoxication, forcibly driveth away luck and prosperity from his kingdom, even like an infuriate bull breaking his own horns himself. That brave and learned person who disregarding his own foresight, followeth, O king, (the bent of) another man's heart, sinketh in terrible affliction even like one that goeth into the sea in a boat guided by a child. Duryodhana is gambling with the son of Pandu, and thou art in raptures that he is winning. And it is such success that begeth war, which endeth in the destruction of men. This fascination (of gambling) that thou has well-devised only leadeth to dire results. Thus hast thou simply brought on by these counsels great affliction to thy heart. And this thy quarrel with Yudhishtira, who is so closely related to thee, even if thou hadst not foreseen it, is still approved by thee. Listen, ye sons of Santanu, ye descendants of Pratipa, who are now in this assembly of the Kauravas, to these words of wisdom. Enter ye not into the terrible fire that hath blazed forth following the wretch. When Ajatasatru, the son of Pandu, intoxicated with dice, giveth way to his wrath, and Vrikodara and Arjuna and the twins (do the same), who, in that hour of confusion, will prove your refuge? O great king, thou art thyself a mine of wealth. Thou canst earn (by other means) as much wealth as thou seekest to earn by gambling. What dost thou gain by winning from the Pandavas their vast wealth? Win the Pandavas themselves, who will be to thee more than all the wealth they have. We all know the skill of Suvala in play. This hill-king knoweth many nefarious methods in gambling. Let Sakuni return whence he came. War not, O Bharata, with the sons of Pandu!

Section LXIII

Duryodhana said,—’O Kshatta, thou art always boasting of the fame of our enemies, deprecating the sons of Dhritarashtra. We know, O Vidura, of whom thou art really fond. Thou always disregardest us as children, That man standeth confest, who wisheth for success unto those that are near to him and defeat unto those that are not his favourites. His praise and blame are applied accordingly. Thy tongue and mind betray thy heart. But the hostility thou showeth in speech is even greater than what is in thy heart. Thou hast been cherished by us like a serpent on our lap. Like a cat thou wishest evil unto him that cherisheth thee. The wise have said that there is no sin graver than that of injuring one’s master. How is it, O Kshatta, that thou dost not fear this sin? Having vanquished our enemies we have obtained great advantages. Use not harsh words in respect of us. Thou art always willing to make peace with the foes. And it is for this reason that thou hatest us always. A man becometh a foe by speaking words that are unpardonable. Then again in praising the enemy, the secrets of one’s own party should not be divulged. (Thou however, transgressest this rule). Therefore, O thou parasite, why dost thou obstruct us so? Thou sayest whatever thou wishest. Insult us not. We know thy mind. Go and learn sitting at the feet of the old. Keen up the reputation that thou hast won. Meddle not with the affairs of other men. Do not imagine that thou art our chief. Tell us not harsh words always, O Vidura. We do not ask thee what is for our good. Cease, irritate not those that have already borne too much at thy hands. There is only one Controller, no second. He controlleth even the child that is in the mother’s womb. I am controlled by Him. Like water that always floweth in a downward course, I am acting precisely in the way in which He is directing me. He that breaketh his head against a stone-wall, and he that feedeth a serpent, are guided in those acts of theirs by their own intellect. (Therefore, in this matter I am guided by my own intelligence). He becometh a foe who seeketh to control others by force. When advice, however, is offered in a friendly spirit, the learned bear with it. He again that hath set fire to such a highly inflammable object as camphor, beholdeth not its ashes. If he runneth immediately to extinguish it. One should not give shelter to another who is the friend of his foes, or to another who is ever jealous of his protector or to another who is evil-minded. Therefore, O Vidura, go whither-so-ever thou pleasest. A wife that is unchaste, however well-treated, forsaketh her husband yet.’

“Vidura addressing Dhritarashtra, said, ‘O monarch, tell us (impartially) like a witness what thou thinkest of the conduct of those who abandon their serving-men thus for giving instruction to them. The hearts of kings are, indeed, very fickle. Granting protection at first, they strike with clubs at last. O prince (Duryodhana), thou regardest thyself as mature in intellect, and, O thou of bad heart, thou regardest me as a child. But consider that he is a child who having first accepted one for a friend, subsequently findeth fault with him. An evil-hearted man can never be brought to the path of rectitude, like an unchaste wife in the house of a well-born person. Assuredly, instruction is not agreeable to this bull of the Bharata race like a husband of sixty years to a damsel that is young. After this, O king, if thou wishest to hear words that are agreeable to thee, in respect of all acts good or bad, ask thou women and idiots and cripples or persons of that description. A sinful man speaking words that are agreeable may be had in this world. But a speaker of words that are disagreeable though sound as regimen, or a hearer of the same, is very rare. He indeed, is a king’s true ally who disregarding what is agreeable or disagreeable to his master beareth himself virtuously and uttereth what may be disagreeable but necessary as regimen. O great king, drink thou that which the honest drink and the dishonest shun, even humility, which is like a medicine that is bitter, pungent, burning, unintoxicating, disagreeable, and revolting. And drinking it, O king, regain thou thy sobriety. I always wish Dhritarashtra and his sons affluence and fame. Happen what may unto thee, here I bow to thee (and take my leave). Let the Brahmanas wish me well. O son of Kuru, this is the lesson I carefully inculcate, that the wise should never enrage such as adders as have venom in their very glances!’”

Section LXIV

“Sakuni said,—’Thou hast, O Yudhishtira, lost much wealth of the Pandavas. If thou hast still anything that thou hast not yet lost to us, O son of Kunti, tell us what it is!’”

“Yudhishtira said,—O son of Suvala, I know that I have untold wealth. But why is it, O Sakuni, that thou askest me of my wealth? Let tens of thousands and millions and millions and tens of millions and hundreds of millions and tens of billions and hundreds of billions and trillions and tens of trillions and hundreds of trillions and tens of quadrillions and hundreds of quadrillions and even more wealth be staked by thee. I have as much. With that wealth, O king, I will play with thee.”

Vaisampayana said,—’Hearing this, Sakuni, ready with the dice, adopting unfair means, said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo, I have won!’

Yudhishtira said,—’I have, O son of Suvala, immeasurable kine and horses and milch cows with calves and goats and sheep in the country extending from the Parnasa to the eastern bank of the Sindu. With this wealth, O king, I will play with thee.

Vaisampayana said,—’Hearing this Sakuni, ready with the dice, adopting unfair means, said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo, I have won!’

Yudhishtira said,—’I have my city, the country, land, the wealth of all dwelling therein except of the Brahmanas, and all those persons themselves except Brahmanas still remaining to me. With this wealth, O king, I will play with thee.’

Vaisampayana said,—’Hearing this, Sakuni, ready with the dice, adopting foul means, said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo! I have won.’

“Yudhishtira said,—These princes here, O king, who look resplendent in their ornaments and their ear-rings and Nishkas and all the royal ornaments on their persons are now my wealth. With this wealth, O king, I play with thee.

Vaisampayana said,—’Hearing this, Sakuni, ready with his dice, adopting foul means, said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo! I have won them.’

“Yudhishtira said,—’This Nakula here, of mighty arms and leonine neck, of red eyes and endued with youth, is now my one stake. Know that he is my wealth.’ Sakuni said,—’O king Yudhishtira, prince Nakula is dear to thee. He is already under our subjection. With whom (as stake) wilt thou now play?’”

Vaisampayana said,—’Saying this, Sakuni cast those dice, and said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo! He hath been won by us.’

Yudhishtira said,—’This Sahadeva administereth justice. He hath also acquired a reputation for learning in this world. However undeserving he may be to be staked in play, with him as stake I will play, with such a dear object as it, indeed, he were not so!’”

Vaisampayana said,—’Hearing this, Sakuni, ready with the dice, adopting foul means, said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo! I have won.’

“Sakuni continued,—’O king, the sons of Madri, dear unto thee, have both been won by me. It would seem, however, that Bhimasena and Dhananjaya are regarded very much by thee.’

“Yudhishtira said,—’Wretch! thou actest sinfully in thus seeking to create disunion amongst us who are all of one heart, disregarding morality.’

“Sakuni said,—’One that is intoxicated falleth into a pit (hell) and stayeth there deprived of the power of motion. Thou art, O king, senior to us in age, and possessed of the highest accomplishments. O bull of the Bharata race, I (beg my pardon and) bow to thee. Thou knowest, O Yudhishtira, that gamesters, while excited with play, utter such ravings that they never indulge in the like of them in their waking moments nor even in dream.’

“Yudhishtira said,—He that taketh us like a boat to the other shore of the sea of battle, he that is ever victorious over foes, the prince who is endued with great activity, he who is the one hero in this world, (is here). With that Falguna as stake, however, undeserving of being made so, I will now play with thee.”

Vaisampayana said,—’Hearing this, Sakuni, ready with the dice, adopting foul means, said unto Yudhishtira, ‘Lo! I have won.’

“Sakuni continued,—’This foremost of all wielders of the bow, this son of Pandu capable of using both his hands with equal activity hath now been won by me. O play now with the wealth that is still left unto thee, even with Bhima thy dear brother, as thy stake, O son of Pandu.

“Yudhishtira said,—’O king, however, undeserving he may be of being made a stake, I will now play with thee by staking Bhimasena, that prince who is our leader, who is the foremost in fight,—even like the wielder of the thunder-bolt—the one enemy of the Danavas,—the high-souled one with leonine neck and arched eye-brows and eyes looking askance, who is incapable of putting up with an insult, who hath no equal in might in the world, who is the foremost of all wielders of the mace, and who grindeth all foes,” “Vaisampayana said,—’Hearing this, Sakuni, ready with the dice adopting foul means, said unto Yudhishtira. ‘Lo! I have won.’

Sakuni continued,—’Thou hast, O son of Kunti, lost much wealth, horses and elephants and thy brothers as well.

Say, if thou hast anything which thou hast not lost?

Yudhishtira, said--'I alone, the eldest of all my brothers and dear unto them, am still unwon. Won by thee, I will do what he that is won will have to do.'

Vaisampayana said,—'Hearing this Sakuni, ready with the dice, adopting foul means, said unto Yudhishtira, 'Lo! I have won.'

'Sakuni continued,—'Thou hast permitted thyself to be won. This is very sinful. There is wealth still left to thee, O king. Therefore, thy having lost thyself is certainly sinful.'

Vaisampayana continued,—'Having said this, Sakuni, well-skilled at dice, spoke unto all the brave kings present there of his having won, one after another, all the Pandavas. The son of Suvala then, addressing Yudhishtira said,—'O king, there is still one stake dear to thee that is still unwon. Stake thou Krishna, the princess of Panchala. By her, win thyself back.'

'Yudhishtira said,—'With Draupadi as stake, who is neither short nor tall, neither spare nor corpulent, and who is possessed of blue curly locks, I will now play with thee. Possessed of eyes like the leaves of the autumn lotus, and fragrant also as the autumn lotus, equal in beauty unto her (Lakshmi) who delighteth in autumn lotuses, and unto Sree herself in symmetry and every grace she is such a woman as a man may desire for wife in respect of softness of heart, and wealth of beauty and of virtues. Possessed of every accomplishment and compassionate and sweet-speeched, she is such a woman as a man may desire for wife in respect of her fitness for the acquisition of virtue and pleasure and wealth. Retiring to bed last and waking up first, she looketh after all down to the cowherds and the shepherds. Her face too, when covered with sweat, looketh as the lotus or the jasmine. Of slender waist like that of the wasp, of long flowing locks, of red lips, and body without down, is the princess of Panchala. O king, making the slender-waisted Draupadi, who is even such as my stake, I will play with thee, O son of Suvala.'

Vaisampayana continued,—'When the intelligent king Yudhishtira the just has spoken thus,—'Fie! 'Fie!' were the words that were uttered by all the aged persons that were in the assembly. And the whole conclave was agitated, and the kings who were present there all gave way to grief. And Bhishma and Drona and Kripa were covered with perspiration. And Vidura holding his head between his hands sat like one that had lost his reason. He sat with face downwards giving way to his reflections and sighing like a snake. But Dhritarashtra glad, at heart, asked repeatedly, 'Hath the stake been won?' 'Hath the stake been won?' and could not conceal his emotions. Karna with Dussasana and others laughed aloud, while tears began to flow from the eyes of all other present in the assembly. And the son of Suvala, proud of success and flurried with excitement and repeating. Thou hast one stake, dear to thee, etc. said,—'Lo! I have won' and took up the dice that had been cast.'

Section LXV

Duryodhana said,—'Come, Kshatta, bring hither Draupadi the dear and loved wife of the Pandavas. Let her sweep the chambers, force her thereto, and let the unfortunate one stay where our serving-women are.'

'Vidura said,—'Dost thou not know, O wretch, that by uttering such harsh words thou art tying thyself with cords? Dost thou not understand that thou art hanging on the edge of a precipice? Dost thou not know that being a deer thou provokest so many tigers to rage? Snakes of deadly venom, provoked to ire, are on thy head! Wretch, do not further provoke them lest thou goest to the region of Yama. In my judgement, slavery does not attach to Krishna, in as much as she was staked by the King after he had lost himself and ceased to be his own master. Like the bamboo that beareth fruit only when it is about to die, the son of Dhritarashtra winneth this treasure at play. Intoxicated, he perceiveth nor in these his last moments that dice bring about enmity and frightful terrors. No man should utter harsh speeches and pierce the hearts of the others. No man should subjugate his enemies by dice and such other foul means. No one should utter such words as are disapproved by the Vedas and lead to hell and annoy others. Some one uttereth from his lips words that are harsh. Stung by them another burneth day and night. These words pierce the very heart of another. The learned, therefore, should never utter them, pointing them at others. A goat had once swallowed a hook, and when it was pierced with it, the hunter placing the head of the animal on the ground tore its throat frightfully in drawing it out. Therefore, O Duryodhana, swallow not the wealth of the Pandavas. Make them not thy enemies. The sons of Pritha never use words such as these. It is only low men that are like dogs who use harsh words towards all classes of people, viz., those that have retired to the woods, those leading domestic lives, those employed in ascetic devotions and those that are of great learning. Alas! the son of Dhritarashtra knoweth not that dishonesty is one of the frightful doors of hell. Alas! many of the Kurus with Dussasana amongst them have followed him in the path of dishonesty in the matter of this play at dice. Even gourds may sink and stones may float, and boats also may always sink in water, still this foolish king, the son of Dhritarashtra, listeneth not to my words that are even as regimen unto him. Without doubt, he will be the cause of the destruction of the Kurus. When the words of wisdom spoken by friends and which are even as fit regimen are not listened to, but on the other hand temptation is on the increase, a frightful and universal destruction is sure to overtake all the Kurus.'

Section LXVI

Vaisampayana said,—”Intoxicated with pride, the son of Dhritarashtra spake,—’Fie on Kshatta! and casting his eyes upon the Pratikamin in attendance, commanded him, in the midst of all those reverend seniors, saying,—’Go Pratikamin, and bring thou Draupadi hither. Thou hast no fear from the sons of Pandu. It is Vidura alone that raveth in fear. Besides, he never wisheth our prosperity!’”

Vaisampayana continued,—”Thus commanded, the Pratikamin, who was of the Suta caste, hearing the words of the king, proceeded with haste, and entering the abode of the Pandavas, like a dog in a lion’s den, approached the queen of the sons of Pandu. And he said,—’Yudhishtira having been intoxicated with dice, Duryodhana, O Draupadi, hath won thee. Come now, therefore, to the abode of Dhritarashtra. I will take thee, O Yajnaseni, and put thee in some menial work.’

Draupadi said,—’Why, O Pratikamin, dost thou say so? What prince is there who playeth staking his wife? The king was certainly intoxicated with dice. Else, could he not find any other object to stake?’

“The Pratikamin said,—’When he had nothing else to stake, it was then that Ajatasatru, the son of Pandu, staked thee. The king had first staked his brothers, then himself, and then thee, O princess.’

“Draupadi said,—’O son of the Suta race, go, and ask that gambler present in the assembly, whom he hath lost first, himself, or me. Ascertaining this, come hither, and then take me with thee, O son of the Suta race.’

Vaisampayana continued,—”The messenger coming back to the assembly told all present the words of Draupadi. And he spoke unto Yudhishtira sitting in the midst of the kings, these words,—Draupadi hath asked thee, Whose lord wert thou at the time thou lost me in play? Didst thou lose thyself first or me? Yudhishtira, however sat there like one demented and deprived of reason and gave no answer good or ill to the Suta. “Duryodhana then said,—’Let the princess of Panchala come hither and put her question. Let every one hear in this assembly the words that pass between her and Yudhishtira.’

Vaisampayana continued,—”The messenger, obedient to the command of Duryodhana, going once again to the palace, himself much distressed, said unto Draupadi,—’O princess, they that are in the assembly are summoning thee. It seemeth that the end of the Kauravas is at hand. When Duryodhana, O princess, is for taking thee before the assembly, this weak-brained king will no longer be able to protect his prosperity.’

“Draupadi said,—’The great ordainer of the world hath, indeed, ordained so. Happiness and misery pay their court to both the wise and unwise. Morality, however, it hath been said, is the one highest object in the world. If cherished, that will certainly dispense blessings to us. Let not that morality now abandon the Kauravas. Going back to those that are present in that assembly, repeat these my words consonant with morality. I am ready to do what those elderly and virtuous persons conversant with morality will definitely tell me.

Vaisampayana continued,—”The Suta, hearing these words of Yajnaseni, came back to the assembly and repeated the words of Draupadi. But all sat with faces downwards, uttering not a word, knowing the eagerness and resolution of Dhritarashtra’s son.

“Yudhishtira, however, O bull of the Bharata race, hearing of Duryodhana’s intentions, sent a trusted messenger unto Draupadi, directing that although she was attired in one piece of cloth with her navel itself exposed, in consequence of her season having come, she should come before her father-in-law weeping bitterly. And that intelligent messenger, O king, having gone to Draupadi’s abode with speed, informed her of the intentions of Yudhishtira. The illustrious Pandavas, meanwhile, distressed and sorrowful, and bound by promise, could not settle what they should do. And casting his eyes upon them, king Duryodhana, glad at heart, addressed the Suta and said,—’O Pratikamin, bring her hither. Let the Kauravas answer her question before her face. The Suta, then, obedient to his commands, but terrified at the (possible) wrath of the daughter of Drupada, disregarding his reputation for intelligence, once again said to those that were in the assembly,—what shall I say unto Krishna?’

“Duryodhana, hearing this, said,—’O Dussasana, this son of my Suta, of little intelligence, feareth Vrikodara. Therefore, go thou thyself and forcibly bring hither the daughter of Yajnaseni, Our enemies at present are dependent on our will. What can they do thee?’ Hearing the command of his brother, prince Dussasana rose with blood-red eyes, and entering the abode of those great warriors, spake these words unto the princess, ‘Come, come, O Krishna, princess of Panchala, thou hast been won by us. And O thou of eyes large as lotus leaves, come now and accept the Kurus for thy lords. Thou hast been won virtuously, come to the assembly.’ At these words, Draupadi, rising up in great affliction, rubbed her pale face with her hands, and distressed she ran to the place where the ladies of Dhritarashtra’s household were. At this, Dussasana roaring in anger, ran after her and seized the queen by her locks, so long and blue and wavy. Alas! those locks that had been sprinkled with water sanctified with mantras in the great Rajasuya sacrifice, were now forcibly seized by the son of Dhritarashtra disregarding the prowess of the Pandavas. And Dussasana dragging Krishna of long long locks unto the presence of the assembly—as if she were helpless though having powerful protectors—and pulling at her, made her tremble like the banana plant in a storm.

And dragged by him, with body bent, she faintly cried--'Wretch! it ill behoveth thee to take me before the assembly. My season hath come, and I am now clad in one piece of attire. But Dussasana dragging Draupadi forcibly by her black locks while she was praying piteously unto Krishna and Vishnu who were Narayana and Nara (on earth), said unto her--'Whether thy season hath come or not, whether thou art attired in one piece of cloth or entirely naked, when thou hast been won at dice and made our slave, thou art to live amongst our serving-women as thou pleasest."

Vaisampayana continued,—”With hair dishevelled and half her attire loosened, all the while dragged by Dussasana, the modest Krishna consumed with anger, faintly said--”In this assembly are persons conversant with all the branches of learning devoted to the performance of sacrifices and other rites, and all equal unto Indra, persons some of whom are really my superiors and others who deserve to be respected as such. I can not stay before them in this state. O wretch! O thou of cruel deeds, drag me not so. Uncover me not so. The princes (my lords) will not pardon thee, even if thou hast the gods themselves with Indra as thy allies. The illustrious son of Dharma is now bound by the obligations of morality. Morality, however, is subtle. Those only that are possessed of great clearness of vision can ascertain it. In speech even I am unwilling to admit an atom of fault in my lord forgetting his virtues. Thou draggest me who am in my season before these Kuru heroes. This is truly an unworthy act. But no one here rebuketh thee. Assuredly, all these are of the same mind with thee. O fie! Truly hath the virtue of the Bharata gone! Truly also hath the usage of those acquainted with the Kshatriya practice disappeared! Else these Kurus in this assembly would never have looked silently on this act that transgresseth the limits of their practices. Oh! both Drona and Bhishma have lost their energy, and so also hath the high-souled Kshatta, and so also this king. Else, why do these foremost of the Kuru elders look silently on this great crime?”

Vaisampayana continued,—”Thus did Krishna of slender waist cry in distress in that assembly. And casting a glance upon her enraged lords--the Pandavas--who were filled with terrible wrath, she inflamed them further with that glance of hers. And they were not so distressed at having been robbed of their kingdom, of their wealth, of their costliest gems, as with that glance of Krishna moved by modesty and anger. And Dussasana, beholding Krishna looking at her helpless lords, dragging her still more forcibly, and addressed her, ‘Slave, Slave’ and laughed aloud. And at those words Karna became very glad and approved of them by laughing aloud. And Sakuni, the son of Suvala, the Gandhara king, similarly applauded Dussasana. And amongst all those that were in the assembly except these three and Duryodhana, every one was filled with sorrow at beholding Krishna thus dragged in sight of that assembly. And beholding it all, Bhishma said, ‘O blessed one, morality is subtle. I therefore am unable to duly decide this point that thou hast put, beholding that on the one hand one that hath no wealth cannot stake the wealth belonging to others, while on the other hand wives are always under the orders and at the disposal of their lords. Yudhishtira can abandon the whole world full of wealth, but he will never sacrifice morality. The son of Pandu hath said--’I am won.’ Therefore, I am unable to decide this matter. Sakuni hath not his equal among men at dice-play. The son of Kunti still voluntarily staked with him. The illustrious Yudhishtira doth not himself regard that Sakuni hath played with him deceitfully. Therefore, I can not decide this point.”

“Draupadi said,—”The king was summoned to this assembly and though possessing no skill at dice, he was made to play with skilful, wicked, deceitful and desperate gamblers. How can he be said then to have staked voluntarily? The chief of the Pandavas was deprived of his senses by wretches of deceitful conduct and unholy instincts, acting together, and then vanquished. He could not understand their tricks, but he hath now done so. Here, in this assembly, there are Kurus who are the lords of both their sons and their daughters-in-law! Let all of them, reflecting well upon my words, duly decide the point that I have put.

Vaisampayana continued,—”Unto Krishna who was thus weeping and crying piteously, looking at times upon her helpless lord, Dussasana spake many disagreeable and harsh words. And beholding her who was then in her season thus dragged, and her upper garments loosened, beholding her in that condition which she little deserved, Vrikodara afflicted beyond endurance, his eyes fixed upon Yudhishtira, gave way to wrath.”

Section LXVII

“Bhima said,—’O Yudhishtira, gamblers have in their houses many women of loose character. They do not yet stake those women having kindness for them even. Whatever wealth and other excellent articles the king of Kasi gave, whatever, gems, animals, wealth, coats of mail and weapons that other kings of the earth gave, our kingdom, thyself and ourselves, have all been won by the foes. At all this my wrath was not excited for thou art our lord. This, however, I regard as a highly improper act--this act of staking Draupadi. This innocent girl deserveth not this treatment. Having obtained the Pandavas as her lords, it is for thee alone that she is being thus persecuted by the low, despicable, cruel, and mean-minded Kauravas. It is for her sake, O king, that my anger falleth on thee. I shall burn those hands of thine. Sahadeva, bring some fire.”

‘Arjuna hearing this, said,—’Thou hast never, O Bhimasena, before this uttered such words as these. Assuredly thy high morality hath been destroyed by these cruel foes. Thou shouldst not fulfil the wishes of the enemy. Practise thou the highest morality. Whom doth it behave to transgress his virtuous eldest brother? The king was summoned by the foe, and remembering the usage of the Kshatriyas, he played at dice against his will. That is certainly conducive to our great fame.

'Bhima said,—'If I had not known, O Dhananjaya, that the king had acted according to Kshatriya usage, then I would have, taking his hands together by sheer force, burnt them in a blazing fire.'

Vaisampayana continued,—'Beholding the Pandavas thus distressed and the princess of Panchala also thus afflicted, Vikarna the son of Dhritarashtra said--'Ye kings, answer ye the question that hath been asked by Yajnaseni. If we do not judge a matter referred to us, all of us will assuredly have to go to hell without delay. How is that Bhishma and Dhritarashtra, both of whom are the oldest of the Kurus, as also the high-souled Vidura, do not say anything! The son of Bharadwaja who is the preceptor of us, as also Kripa, is here. Why do not these best of regenerate ones answer the question? Let also those other kings assembled here from all directions answer according to their judgment this question, leaving aside all motives of gain and anger. Ye kings, answer ye the question that hath been asked by this blessed daughter of king Drupada, and declare after reflection on which side each of ye is.' Thus did Vikarna repeatedly appeal to those that were in that assembly. But those kings answered him not one word, good or ill. And Vikarna having repeatedly appealed to all the kings began to rub his hands and sigh like a snake. And at last the prince said--'Ye kings of the earth, ye Kauravas, whether ye answer this question or not, I will say what I regard as just and proper. Ye foremost of men, it hath been said that hunting, drinking, gambling, and too much enjoyment of women, are the four vices of kings. The man, that is addicted to these, liveth forsaking virtue. And people do not regard the acts done by a person who is thus improperly engaged, as of any authority. This son of Pandu, while deeply engaged in one of these vicious acts, urged thereto by deceitful gamblers, made Draupadi a stake. The innocent Draupadi is, besides, the common wife of all the sons of Pandu. And the king, having first lost himself offered her as a stake. And Suvala himself desirous of a stake, indeed prevailed upon the king to stake this Krishna. Reflecting upon all these circumstances, I regard Draupadi as not won.'

"Hearing these words, a loud uproar rose from among those present in that assembly. And they all applauded Vikarna and censured the son of Suvala. And at that sound, the son of Radha, deprived of his senses by anger, waving his well-shaped arms, said these words,—'O Vikarna, many opposite and inconsistent conditions are noticeable in this assembly. Like fire produced from a faggot, consuming the faggot itself, this thy ire will consume thee. These personages here, though urged by Krishna, have not uttered a word. They all regard the daughter of Drupada to have been properly won. Thou alone, O son of Dhritarashtra in consequence of thy immature years, art bursting with wrath, for though but a boy thou speakest in the assembly as if thou wert old. O younger brother of Duryodhana, thou dost not know what morality truly is, for thou sayest like a fool that this Krishna who hath been (justly) won as not won at all. O son of Dhritarashtra, how dost thou regard Krishna as not won, when the eldest of the Pandavas before this assembly staked all his possessions? O bull of the Bharata race, Draupadi is included in all the possessions (of Yudhishtira). Therefore, why regardest thou Krishna who hath been justly won as not won? Draupadi had been mentioned (by Suvala) and approved of as a stake by the Pandavas. For what reason then dost thou yet regard her as not won? Or, if thou thinkest that bringing her hither attired in a single piece of cloth, is an action of impropriety, listen to certain excellent reasons I will give. O son of the Kuru race, the gods have ordained only one husband for one woman. This Draupadi, however, hath many husbands. Therefore, certain it is that she is an unchaste woman. To bring her, therefore, into this assembly attired though she be in one piece of cloth--even to uncover her is not at all an act that may cause surprise. Whatever wealth the Pandavas had--she herself and these Pandavas themselves,--have all been justly won by the son of Suvala. O Dussasana, this Vikarna speaking words of (apparent) wisdom is but a boy. Take off the robes of the Pandavas as also the attire of Draupadi. Hearing these words the Pandavas, O Bharata, took of their upper garments and throwing them down sat in that assembly. Then Dussasana, O king, forcibly seizing Draupadi's attire before the eyes of all, began to drag it off her person.'

Vaisampayana continued,—'When the attire of Draupadi was being thus dragged, the thought of Hari, (And she herself cried aloud, saying), 'O Govinda, O thou who dwellest in Dwaraka, O Krishna, O thou who art fond of cow-herdresses (of Vrindavana). O Kesava, seest thou not that the Kauravas are humiliating me. O Lord, O husband of Lakshmi, O Lord of Vraja (Vrindavana), O destroyer of all afflictions, O Janarddana, rescue me who am sinking in the Kaurava Ocean. O Krishna, O Krishna, O thou great yogin, thou soul of the universe, Thou creator of all things, O Govinda, save me who am distressed,--who am losing my senses in the midst of the Kurus.' Thus did that afflicted lady resplendent still in her beauty, O king covering her face cried aloud, thinking of Krishna, of Hari, of the lord of the three worlds. Hearing the words of Draupadi, Krishna was deeply moved. And leaving his seat, the benevolent one from compassion, arrived there on foot. And while Yajnaseni was crying aloud to Krishna, also called Vishnu and Hari and Nara for protection, the illustrious Dharma, remaining unseen, covered her with excellent clothes of many hues. And, O monarch as the attire of Draupadi was being dragged, after one was taken off, another of the same kind, appeared covering her. And thus did it continue till many clothes were seen. And, O exalted one, owing to the protection of Dharma, hundreds upon hundreds of robes of many hues came off Draupadi's person. And there arose then a deep uproar of many many voices. And the kings present in that assembly beholding that most extraordinary of all sights in the world, began to applaud Draupadi and censure the son of Dhritarashtra. And Bhima then, squeezing his hands, with lips quivering in rage, swore in the midst of all those kings a terrible oath in a loud voice.

“And Bhima said,—Hear these words of mine, ye Kshatriyas of the world. Words such as these were never before uttered by other men, nor will anybody in the future ever utter them. Ye lords of earth, if having spoken these words I do not accomplish them hereafter, let me not obtain the region of my deceased ancestors. Tearing open in battle, by sheer force, the breast of this wretch, this wicked-minded scoundrel of the Bharata race, if I do not drink his life-blood, let me not obtain the region of my ancestors.”

Vaisampayana continued,—“Hearing these terrible words of Bhima that made the down of the auditors to stand on end, everybody present there applauded him and censured the son of Dhritarashtra. And when a mass of clothes had been gathered in that assembly, all dragged from the person of Draupadi, Dussasana, tired and ashamed, sat down. And beholding the sons of Kunti in that state, the persons--those gods among men--that were in that assembly all uttered the word ‘Fie!’ (on the son of Dhritarashtra). And the united voices of all became so loud that they made the down of anybody who heard them stand on end. And all the honest men that were in that assembly began to say,—‘Alas! the Kauravas answer not the question that hath been put to them by Draupadi. And all censuring Dhritarashtra together, made a loud clamour. Then Vidura, that master of the science of morality, waving his hands and silencing every one, spake these words;—‘Ye that are in this assembly, Draupadi having put her question is weeping helplessly. Ye are not answering her. Virtue and morality are being persecuted by such conduct. An afflicted person approacheth an assembly of good men, like one that is being consumed by fire. They that are in the assembly quench that fire and cool him by means of truth and morality. The afflicted person asketh the assembly about his rights, as sanctioned by morality. They that are in the assembly should, unmoved by interest and anger, answer the question. Ye kings, Vikarna hath answered the question, according to his own knowledge and judgment. Ye should also answer it as ye think proper. Knowing the rules of morality, and having attended an assembly, he that doth not answer a query that is put, incurreth half the demerit that attacheth to a lie. He, on the other hand, who, knowing the rules of morality and having joined an assembly answereth falsely, assuredly incurreth the sin of a lie. The learned quote as an example in this connection the old history of Prahlada and the son of Angirasa.

“There was of old a chief of the Daityas of the name Prahlada. He had a son named Virochana. And Virochana, for the sake of obtaining a bride, quarrelled with Sudhanwan, the son of Angiras. It hath been heard by us that they mutually wagered their lives, saying--I am superior,--I am superior,--for the sake of obtaining a bride. And after they had thus quarrelled with each other, they both made Prahlada the arbitrator to decide between them. And they asked him, saying;--Who amongst us is superior (to the other)? Answer this question. Speak not falsely. Frightened at this quarrel, Prahlada cast his eyes upon Sudhanwan. And Sudhanwan in rage, burning like unto the mace of Yama, told him,--If thou answerest falsely, or dost not answer at all thy head will then be split into a hundred pieces by the wielder of the thunderbolt with that bolt of his.--Thus addressed by Sudhanwan, the Daitya, trembling like a leaf of the fig tree, went to Kasyapa of great energy, for taking counsel with him. And Prahlada said,—‘Thou art, O illustrious and exalted one, fully conversant with the rules of morality that should guide both the gods and the Asuras and the Brahmanas as well. Here, however, is a situation of great difficulty in respect of duty. Tell me, I ask thee, what regions are obtainable by them who upon being asked a question, answer it not, or answer it falsely. Kasyapa thus asked answered.—‘He that knoweth, but answereth not a question from temptation, anger or fear, casteth upon himself a thousand nooses of Varuna. And the person who, cited as a witness with respect to any matter of ocular or auricular knowledge, speaketh carelessly, casteth a thousand nooses of Varuna upon his own person. On the completion of one full year, one such noose is loosened. Therefore, he that knoweth, should speak the truth without concealment. If virtue, pierced by sin, repaireth to an assembly (for aid), it is the duty of every body in the assembly to take off the dart, otherwise they themselves would be pierced with it. In an assembly where a truly censurable act is not rebuked, half the demerit of that act attacheth to the head of that assembly, a fourth to the person acting censurably and a fourth unto those others that are there. In that assembly, on the other hand, when he that deserveth censure is rebuked, the head of the assembly becometh freed from all sins, and the other members also incur none. It is only the perpetrator himself of the act that becometh responsible for it. O Prahlada, they who answer falsely those that ask them about morality destroy the meritorious acts of their seven upper and seven lower generations. The grief of one who hath lost all his wealth, of one who hath lost a son, of one who is in debt, of one who is separated from his companions, of a woman who hath lost her husband, of one that hath lost his all in consequence of the king’s demand, of a woman who is sterile, of one who hath been devoured by a tiger (during his last struggles in the tiger’s claws), of one who is a co-wife, and of one who hath been deprived of his property by false witnesses, have been said by the gods to be uniform in degree. These different sorts of grief are his who speaketh false. A person becometh a witness in consequence of his having seen, heard, and understood a thing. Therefore, a witness should always tell the truth. A truth-telling witness never loseth his religious merits and earthly possessions also.’ Hearing these words of Kasyapa, Prahlada told his son, “Sudhanwan is superior to thee, as indeed, (his father) Angiras is superior to me. The mother also of Sudhanwan is superior to thy mother. Therefore, O Virochana, this Sudhanwan is now the lord of the life.” At these words of Prahlada, Sudhanwan said, “Since unmoved by affection for thy child, thou hast adhered to virtue, I command, let this son of thine live for a hundred years.”

“Vidura continued,—Let all the persons, therefore, present in this assembly hearing these high truths of morality, reflect upon what should be the answer to the question asked by Draupadi.”

Vaisampayana continued,—“The kings that were there hearing these words of Vidura, answered not a word, yet Karna alone spoke unto Dussasana, telling him. Take away this serving-woman Krishna into the inner apartments. And thereupon Dussasana began to drag before all the spectators the helpless and modest Draupadi, trembling and crying piteously unto the Pandavas her lords.”

Section LXVIII

Draupadi said,—“Wait a little, thou worst of men, thou wicked-minded Dussasana. I have an act to perform--a high duty that hath not been performed by me yet. Dragged forcibly by this wretch’s strong arms, I was deprived of my senses. I salute these reverend seniors in this assembly of the Kurus. That I could not do this before cannot be my fault.”

Vaisampayana said,—“Dragged with greater force than before, the afflicted and helpless Draupadi, undeserving of such treatment, falling down upon the ground, thus wept in that assembly of the Kurus,—

“Alas, only once before, on the occasion of the Swayamvara, I was beheld by the assembled kings in the amphitheatre, and never even once beheld afterwards. I am to-day brought before this assembly. She whom even the winds and the sun had seen never before in her palace is to-day before this assembly and exposed to the gaze of the crowd. Alas, she whom the sons of Pandu could not, while in her palace, suffer to be touched even by the wind, is to-day suffered by the Pandavas to be seized and dragged by this wretch. Alas, these Kauravas also suffer their daughter-in-law, so unworthy of such treatment, to be thus afflicted before them. It seemeth that the times are out of joint. What can be more distressing to me, than that though high-born and chaste, I should yet be compelled to enter this public court? Where is that virtue for which these kings were noted? It hath been heard that the kings of ancient days never brought their wedded wives into the public court. Alas, that eternal usage hath disappeared from among the Kauravas. Else, how is it that the chaste wife of the Pandavas, the sister of Prishata’s son, the friend of Vasudeva, is brought before this assembly? Ye Kauravas, I am the wedded wife of king Yudhishtira the just, hailing from the same dynasty to which the King belonged. Tell me now if I am a serving-maid or otherwise. I will cheerfully accept your answer. This mean wretch, this destroyer of the name of the Kurus, is afflicting me hard. Ye Kauravas, I cannot bear it any longer. Ye kings, I desire ye to answer whether ye regard me as won or unwon. I will accept your verdict whatever it be.”

“Hearing these words, Bhishma answered, I have already said, O blessed one that the course of morality is subtle. Even the illustrious wise in this world fail to understand it always. What in this world a strong man calls morality is regarded as such by others, however otherwise it may really be; but what a weak man calls morality is scarcely regarded as such even if it be the highest morality. From the importance of the issue involved, from its intricacy and subtlety, I am unable to answer with certitude the question thou hast asked. However, it is certain that as all the Kurus have become the slaves of covetousness and folly, the destruction of this our race will happen on no distant date. O blessed one, the family into which thou hast been admitted as a daughter-in-law, is such that those who are born in it, however much they might be afflicted by calamities, never deviate from the paths of virtue and morality. O Princess of Panchala, this conduct of thine also, viz. that though sunk in distress, thou still easiest thy eyes on virtue and morality, is assuredly worthy of thee. These persons, Drona and others, of mature years and conversant with morality, sit heads downwards like men that are dead, with bodies from which life hath departed. It seemeth to me, however, that Yudhishtira is an authority on this question. It behoveth him to declare whether thou art won or not won.”

Section LXIX

Vaisampayana said,—“The kings present in that assembly, from tear of Duryodhana, uttered not a word, good or ill, although they beheld Draupadi crying piteously in affliction like a female osprey, and repeatedly appealing to them. And the son of Dhritarashtra beholding those kings and sons and grand sons of kings all remaining silent, smiled a little, and addressing the daughter of the king of Panchala, said,—O Yajnaseni, the question thou hast put dependeth on thy husbands--on Bhima of mighty strength, on Arjuna, on Nakula, on Sahadeva. Let them answer thy question. O Panchali, let them for thy sake declare in the midst of these respectable men that Yudhishtira is not their lord, let them thereby make king Yudhishtira the just a liar. Thou shalt then be freed from the condition of slavery. Let the illustrious son of Dharma, always adhering to virtue, who is even like Indra, himself declare whether he is not thy lord. At his words, accept thou the Pandavas or ourselves without delay. Indeed, all the Kauravas present in this assembly are floating in the ocean of thy distress. Endued with magnanimity, they are unable to answer thy question, looking at thy unfortunate husbands.” Vaisampayana continued,—“Hearing these words of the Kuru king, all who were present in the assembly loudly applauded them. And shouting approvingly, they made signs unto one another by motions of their eyes and lips. And amongst some that were there, sounds of distress such as 'O! and 'Alas!' were heard. And at these words of Duryodhana, so delightful (to his partisans), the Kauravas present in that assembly became exceedingly glad. And the kings, with faces turned sideways, looked upon Yudhishtira conversant with the rules of morality, curious to hear what he would say. And every one present in that assembly became curious to hear what Arjuna, the son of Pandu never defeated in battle, and what Bhimasena, and what the twins also would say. And when that busy hum of many voices became still, Bhimasena, waving his strong and well-formed arms smeared with sandalpaste spake these words,—'If this high-souled king Yudhishtira the just, who is our eldest brother, had not been our lord, we would never have forgiven the Kuru race (for all this). He is the lord of all our religious and ascetic merits, the lord of even our lives. If he regardeth himself as won, we too have all been won. If this were not so, who is there amongst creatures touching the earth with their feet and mortal, that would escape from me with his life after having touched those locks of the princess of Panchala? Behold these mighty, well-formed arms of mine, even like maces of iron. Having once come within them, even he of a hundred sacrifices is incapable of effecting an escape. Bound by the ties of virtue and the reverence that is due to our eldest brother, and repeatedly urged by Arjuna to remain silent, I am not doing anything terrible. If however, I am once commanded by king Yudhishtira the just, I would slay these wretched sons of Dhritarashtra, making slaps do the work of swords, like a lion slaying a number of little animals.'

Vaisampayana continued,—'Unto Bhima who had spoken these words Bhishma and Drona and Vidura said, 'Forbear, O Bhima. Everything is possible with thee.'

Section LXX

'Karna said,—'Of all the persons in the assembly, three, viz., Bhishma, Vidura, and the preceptor of the Kurus (Drona) appear to be independent; for they always speak of their master as wicked, always censure him, and never wish for his prosperity. O excellent one, the slave, the son, and the wife are always dependent. They cannot earn wealth, for whatever they earn belongeth to their master. Thou art the wife of a slave incapable of possessing anything on his own account. Repair now to the inner apartments of king Dhritarashtra and serve the king's relatives. We direct that that is now thy proper business. And, O princess, all the sons of Dhritarashtra and not the sons of Pritha are now thy masters. O handsome one, select thou another husband now,—one who will not make thee a slave by gambling. It is well-known that women, especially that are slaves, are not censurable if they proceed with freedom in electing husbands. Therefore let it be done by thee. Nakula hath been won, as also Bhimasena, and Yudhishtira also, and Sahadeva, and Arjuna. And, O Yajnaseni, thou art now a slave. Thy husbands that are slaves cannot continue to be thy lords any longer. Alas, doth not the son of Pritha regards life, prowess and manhood as of no use that he offereth this daughter of Drupada, the king of Panchala, in the presence of all this assembly, as a stake at dice?'

Vaisampayana continued,—'Hearing these words, the wrathful Bhima breathed hard, a very picture of woe. Obedient to the king and bound by the tie of virtue and duty, burning everything with his eyes inflamed by anger, he said,—'O king, I cannot be angry at these words of this son of a Suta, for we have truly entered the state of servitude. But O king, could our enemies have said so unto me, it thou hadst not played staking this princess?'

Vaisampayana continued,—'Hearing these words of Bhimasena king Duryodhana addressed Yudhishtira who was silent and deprived of his senses, saying,—'O king, both Bhima and Arjuna, and the twins also, are under thy sway. Answer thou the question (that hath been asked by Draupadi). Say, whether thou regardest Krishna as unwon.' And having spoken thus unto the son of Kunti, Duryodhana, desirous of encouraging the son of Radha and insulting Bhima, quickly uncovered his left thigh that was like unto the stem of a plantain tree or the trunk of an elephant and which was graced with every auspicious sign and endued with the strength of thunder, and showed it to Draupadi in her very sight. And beholding this, Bhimasena expanding his red eyes, said unto Duryodhana in the midst of all those kings and as if piercing them (with his dart-like words),—'Let not Vrikodara attain to the regions, obtained by his ancestors, if he doth not break that thigh of thine in the great conflict. And sparkles of fire began to be emitted from every organ of sense of Bhima filled with wrath, like those that come out of every crack and orifice in the body of a blazing tree.

Vidura then, addressing everybody, said,—'Ye kings of Pratipa's race, behold the great danger that ariseth from Bhimasena. Know ye for certain that this great calamity that threatens to overtake the Bharatas hath been sent by Destiny itself. The sons of Dhritarashtra have, indeed, gambled disregarding every proper consideration. They are even now disputing in this assembly about a lady (of the royal household). The prosperity of our kingdom is at an end. Alas, the Kauravas are even now engaged in sinful consultations. Ye Kauravas, take to your heart this high precept that I declare. If virtue is persecuted, the whole assembly becometh polluted. If Yudhishtira had staked her before he was himself won, he would certainly have been regarded as her master. If, however a person stake anything at a time when he himself is incapable of holding any wealth, to win it is very like obtaining wealth in a dream. Listening to the words of the king of Gandhara, fall ye not off from this undoubted truth.’

“Duryodhana, hearing Vidura thus speak, said,—’I am willing to abide by the words of Bhima, of Arjuna and of the twins. Let them say that Yudhishtira is not their master. Yajnaseni will then be freed from her state of bondage.”

“Arjuna at this, said,—”This illustrious son of Kunti, king Yudhishtira the just, was certainly our master before he began to play. But having lost himself, let all the Kauravas judge whose master he could be after that.”

Vaisampayana continued,—”Just then, a jackal began to cry loudly in the homa-chamber of king Dhritarashtra’s palace. And, O king, unto the jackal that howled so, the asses began to bray responsively. And terrible birds also, from all sides, began to answer with their cries. And Vidura conversant with everything and the daughter of Suvala, both understood the meaning of those terrible sounds. And Bhishma and Drona and the learned Gautama loudly cried,—Swashti! Swashti! 1 Then Gandhari and the learned Vidura beholding that frightful omen, represented everything, in great affliction, unto the king. And the king (Dhritarashtra) thereupon said,— “Draupadi said,—’O bull of the Bharata race, if thou will grant me a boon, I ask the handsome Yudhishtira, obedient to every duty, be freed from slavery. Let not unthinking children call my child Prativindhya endued with great energy of mind as the son of a slave. Having been a prince, so superior to all men, and nurtured by kings it is not proper that he should be called the child of a slave.

‘Thou wicked-minded Duryodhana, thou wretch, destruction hath all ready overtaken thee when thou insultest in language such as this the wife of these bulls among the Kurus, especially their wedded wife Draupadi. And having spoken those words, the wise Dhritarashtra endued with knowledge, reflecting with the aid of his wisdom and desirous of saving his relatives and friends from destruction, began to console Krishna, the princess of Panchala, and addressing her, the monarch said,—’Ask of me any boon, O princess of Panchala, that thou desirest, Chaste and devoted to virtue, thou art the first of all my daughters-in-law.

“Dhritarashtra said unto her,—’O auspicious one, let it be as thou sayest. O excellent one, ask thou another boon, for I will give it. My heart inclineth to give thee a second boon. Thou dost not deserve only one boon.

“Draupadi said,—’I ask, O king, that Bhimasena and Dhananjaya and the twins also, with their cars and bows, freed from bondage, regain their liberty.’

‘Dhritarashtra said,—’O blessed daughter, let it be as thou desirest. Ask thou a third boon, for thou hast not been sufficiently honoured with two boons. Virtuous in thy behaviour, thou art the foremost of all my daughters-in-law.

Draupadi said,—’O best of kings, O illustrious one, covetousness always bringeth about loss of virtue. I do not deserve a third boon. Therefore I dare not ask any. O king of kings, it hath been said that a Vaisya may ask one boon; a Kshatriya lady, two boons; a Kshatriya male, three, and a Brahmana, a hundred. O king, these my husbands freed from the wretched state of bondage, will be able to achieve prosperity by their own virtuous acts!’”

Section LXXI

“Karna said,—’We have never heard of such an act (as this one of Draupadi), performed by any of the women noted in this world for their beauty. When the sons of both Pandu and Dhritarashtra were excited with wrath, this Draupadi became unto the sons of Pandu as their salvation. Indeed the princess of Panchala, becoming as a boat unto the sons of Pandu who were sinking in a boatless ocean of distress, hath brought them in safety to the shore.”

Vaisampayana continued,—”Hearing these words of Karna in the midst of the Kurus,—viz., that the sons of Pandu were saved by their wife,—the angry Bhimasena in great affliction said (unto Arjuna),—’O Dhananjaya, it hath been said by Devala three lights reside in every person, viz., offspring, acts and learning, for from these three hath sprung creation. When life becometh extinct and the body becometh impure and is cast off by relatives, these three become of service to every person. But the light that is in us hath been dimmed by this act of insult to our wife. How, O Arjuna, can a son born from this insulted wife of ours prove serviceable to us? “Arjuna replied,—’Superior persons, O Bharata, never prate about the harsh words that may or may not be uttered by inferior men. Persons that have earned respect for themselves, even if they are able to retaliate, remember not the acts of hostility done by their enemies, but, on the other hand, treasure up only their good deeds.’

‘Bhima said,—’Shall I, O king, slay, without loss of time all these foes assembled together, even here, or shall I destroy them, O Bharata, by the roots, outside this palace? Or, what need is there of words or of command? I shall slay all these even now, and rule thou the whole earth, O king, without a rival. And saying this, Bhima with his younger brothers, like a lion in the midst of a herd of inferior animals, repeatedly cast his angry glances around. But Arjuna, however, of white deeds, with appealing looks began to pacify his elder brother. And the mighty-armed hero endued with great prowess began to burn with the fire of his wrath. And, O king, this fire began to issue out of Vrikodara’s ears and other senses with smoke and sparks and flames. And his face became terrible to behold in consequence of his furrowed brows like those of Yama himself at the time of the universal destruction. Then Yudhishtira forbade the mighty hero, embracing him with his arms and telling him ‘Be not so. Stay in silence and peace.' And having pacified the mighty-armed one with eyes red in wrath, the king approached his uncle Dhritarashtra, with hands joined in entreaty."

Section LXXII

"Yudhishtira said,—'O king, thou art our master. Command us as to what we shall do. O Bharata, we desire to remain always in obedience to thee.

"Dhritarashtra replied.—'O Ajatasatru, blest be thou. Go thou in peace and safety. Commanded by me, go, rule thy own kingdom with thy wealth. And, O child, take to heart this command of an old man, this wholesome advice that I give, and which is even a nutritive regimen. O Yudhishtira, O child, thou knowest the subtle path of morality. Possessed of great wisdom, thou art also humble, and thou waitest also upon the old. Where there is intelligence, there is forbearance. Therefore, O Bharata, follow thou counsels of peace. The axe falleth upon wood, not upon stone. (Thou art open to advice, not Duryodhana). They are the best of men that remember not the acts of hostility of their foes; that behold only the merits, not the faults, of their enemies; and that never enter into hostilities themselves. They that are good remember only the good deeds of their foes and not the hostile acts their foes might have done unto them. The good, besides, do good unto others without expectation of any good, in return. O Yudhishtira, it is only the worst of men that utter harsh words in quarrelling; while they that are indifferent reply to such when spoken by others. But they that are good and wise never think of or recapitulate such harsh words, little caring whether these may or may not have been uttered by their foes. They that are good, having regard to the state of their own feelings, can understand the feelings of others, and therefore remember only the good deeds and not the acts of hostility of their foes. Thou hast acted even as good men of prepossessing countenance do, who transgress not the limits of virtue, wealth, pleasure and salvation. O child, remember not the harsh words of Duryodhana. Look at thy mother Gandhari and myself also, if thou desirest to remember only what is good. O Bharata, look at me, who am thy father unto you and am old and blind, and still alive. It was for seeing our friends and examining also the strength and weakness of my children, that I had, from motives of policy, suffered this match at dice to proceed. O king those amongst the Kurus that have thee for their ruler, and the intelligent Vidura conversant with every branch of learning for their counsellor, have, indeed, nothing to grieve for. In thee is virtue, in Arjuna is patience, in Bhimasena is prowess, and the twins, those foremost of men, is pure reverence for superiors. Blest be thou, O Ajatasatru. Return to Khandavaprastha, and let there be brotherly love between thee and thy cousins. Let thy heart also be ever fixed on virtue."

Vaisampayana continued,—"That foremost of the Bharatas--king Yudhishtira the just--then, thus addressed by his uncle, having gone through every ceremony of politeness, set out with his brothers for Khandavaprastha. And accompanied by Draupadi and ascending their cars which were all of the hue of the clouds, with cheerful hearts they all set out for that best of cities called Indraprastha."

Section LXXIII

Janamejaya said,—"How did the sons of Dhritarashtra feel, when they came to know that the Pandavas had, with Dhritarashtra's leave, left Hastinapore with all their wealth and jewels?"

Vaisampayana said,—"O king, learning that the Pandavas had been commanded by the wise Dhritarashtra to return to their capital, Dussasana went without loss of time unto his brother. And, O bull of the Bharata race, having arrived before Duryodhana with his counsellor, the prince, afflicted with grief, began to say,—'Ye mighty warriors, that which we had won after so much trouble, the old man (our father) hath thrown away. Know ye that he hath made over the whole of that wealth to the foes. At these words, Duryodhana and Karna and Sakuni, the son of Suvala, all of whom were guided by vanity, united together, and desirous of counteracting the sons of Pandu, approaching in haste saw privately the wise king Dhritarashtra--the son of Vichitravirya and spake unto him these pleasing and artful words. Duryodhana said,—

'Hast thou not heard, O king, what the learned Vrihaspati the preceptor of the celestials, said in course of counselling Sakra about mortals and politics? Even these, O slayer of foes, were the words of Vrihaspati, 'Those enemies that always do wrong by stratagem or force, should be slain by every means.' If, therefore, with the wealth of the Pandavas, we gratify the kings of the earth and then fight with the sons of Pandu, what reverses can overtake us? When one hath placed on the neck and back of venomous snakes full of wrath for encompassing his destruction, is it possible for him to take them off? Equipped with weapon and seated on their cars, the angry sons of Pandu like wrathful and venomous snakes will assuredly annihilate us, O father. Even now Arjuna proceedeth, encased in mail and furnished with his couple of quivers, frequently taking up the Gandiva and breathing hard and casting angry glances around. It hath (also) been heard by us that Vrikodara, hastily ordering his car to be made ready and riding on it, is proceeding along, frequently whirling his heavy mace. Nakula also is going along, with the sword in his grasp and the semi-circular shield in his hand. And Sahadeva and the king (Yudhishtira) have made signs clearly testifying to their intentions. Having ascended their cars that are full of all kinds of arms, they are whipping their horses (for going to Khandava soon) and assembling their forces. Persecuted thus by us they are incapable of forgiving us those injuries. Who is there among them that will forgive that insult to Draupadi? Blest be thou. We will again gamble with the son of Pandu for sending them to exile. O bull among men, we are competent to bring them thus under our sway. Dressed in skins, either we or they defeated at dice, shall repair to the woods for twelve years. The thirteenth year shall have to be spent in some inhabited country unrecognised; and, if recognised, an exile for another twelve years shall be the consequence. Either we or they shall live so. Let the play begin, casting the dice, let the sons of Pandu once more play. O bull of the Bharata race, O king, even this is our highest duty. This Sakuni knoweth well the whole science of dice. Even if they succeed in observing this vow for thirteen years, we shall be in the meantime firmly rooted in the kingdom and making alliances, assemble a vast invincible host and keep them content, so that we shall, O king, defeat the sons of Pandu if they reappear. Let this plan recommend itself to thee, O slayer of foes.

“Dhritarashtra said,—Bring back the Pandavas then, indeed, even if they have gone a great way. Let them come at once again to cast dice.”

Vaisampayana continued,—“Then Drona, Somadatta and Valhika, Gautama, Vidura, the son of Drona, and the mighty son of Dhritarashtra by his Vaisya wife, Bhurisravas, and Bhishma, and that mighty warrior Vikarna,—all said, ‘Let not the play commence. Let there be peace. But Dhritarashtra, partial to his sons, disregarding the counsels of all his wise friends and relatives, summoned the sons of Pandu.’”

Section LXXIV

Vaisampayana said,—‘O monarch, it was then that the virtuous Gandhari, afflicted with grief on account of her affection for her sons, addressed king Dhritarashtra and said, “When Duryodhana was born, Vidura of great intelligence had said, ‘It is well to send this disgrace of the race to the other world. He cried repeatedly and dissonantly like a jackal. It is certain he will prove the destruction of our race. Take this to heart, O king of the Kurus. O Bharata, sink not, for thy own fault, into an ocean of calamity. O lord, accord not thy approbation to the counsels of the wicked ones of immature years. Be not thou the cause of the terrible destruction of this race. Who is there that will break an embankment which hath been completed, or re-ignite a conflagration which hath been extinguished? O bull of the Bharata race, who is there that will provoke the peaceful sons of Pritha? Thou rememberest, O Ajamida, everything, but still I will call thy attention to this. The scriptures can never control the wicked-minded for good or evil. And, O king, a person of immature understanding will never act as one of mature years. Let thy sons follow thee as their leader. Let them not be separated from thee for ever (by losing their lives). Therefore, at my word, O king, abandon this wretch of our race. Thou couldst not, O king, from parental affection, do it before. Know that the time hath come for the destruction of race through him. Err not, O king. Let thy mind, guided by counsels of peace, virtue, and true policy, be what it naturally is. That prosperity which is acquired by the aid of wicked acts, is soon destroyed; while that which is won by mild means taketh root and descendeth from generation to generation.’”

“The king, thus addressed by Gandhari who pointed out to him in such language the path of virtue, replied unto her, saying,—‘If the destruction of our race is come, let it take place freely. I am ill able to prevent it. Let it be as they (these my sons) desire. Let the Pandavas return. And let my sons again gamble with the sons of Pandu.’”

Section LXXV

Vaisampayana said,—‘The royal messenger, agreeably to the commands of the intelligent king Dhritarashtra, coming upon Yudhishtira, the son of Pritha who had by that time gone a great way, addressed the monarch and said,—‘Even these are the words of thy father-like uncle, O Bharata, spoken unto thee, ‘The assembly is ready. O son of Pandu, O king Yudhishtira, come and cast the dice.’

Yudhishtira said,—‘Creatures obtain fruits good and ill according to the dispensation of the Ordainer of the creation. Those fruits are inevitable whether I play or not. This is a summons to dice; it is, besides the command of the old king. Although I know that it will prove destructive to me, yet I cannot refuse.’

Vaisampayana continued,—“Although (a living) animal made of gold was an impossibility, yet Rama suffered himself to be tempted by a (golden) deer. Indeed, the minds of men over whom calamities hang, became deranged and out of order. Yudhishtira, therefore, having said these words, retraced his steps along with his brothers. And knowing full well the deception practised by Sakuni, the son of Pritha came back to sit at dice with him again. These mighty warriors again entered that assembly, afflicting the hearts of all their friends. And compelled by Fate they once more sat down at ease for gambling for the destruction of themselves.”

“Sakuni then said,—‘The old king hath given ye back all your wealth. That is well. But, O bull of the Bharata race, listen to me, there is a stake of great value. Either defeated by ye at dice, dressed in deer skins we shall enter the great forest and live there for twelve years passing the whole of the thirteenth year in some inhabited region, unrecognised, and if recognised return to an exile of another twelve years; or vanquished by us, dressed in deer skins ye shall, with Krishna, live for twelve years in the woods passing the whole of the thirteenth year unrecognised, in some inhabited region. If recognised, an exile of another twelve years is to be the consequence. On the expiry of the thirteenth year, each is to have his kingdom surrendered by the other. O Yudhishtira, with this resolution, play with us, O Bharata, casting the dice.' "At these words, they that were in that assembly, raising up their arms said in great anxiety of mind, and from the strength of their feelings these words,—'Alas, fie on the friends of Duryodhana that they do not apprise him of his great danger. Whether he, O bull among the Bharatas, (Dhritarashtra) understandeth or not, of his own sense, it is thy duty to tell him plainly."

"Vaisampayana continued,—King Yudhishtira, even hearing these various remarks, from shame and a sense of virtue again sat at dice. And though possessed of great intelligence and fully knowing the consequences, he again began to play, as if knowing that the destruction of the Kurus was at hand.

"And Yudhishtira said,—'How can, O Sakuni, a king like me, always observant of the uses of his own order, refuse, when summoned to dice? Therefore I play with thee."

"Sakuni answered,—'We have many kine and horses, and milch cows, and an infinite number of goats and sheep; and elephants and treasures and gold and slaves both male and female. All these were staked by us before but now let this be our one stake, viz., exile into the woods,—being defeated either ye or we will dwell in the woods (for twelve years) and the thirteenth year, unrecognised, in some inhabited place. Ye bulls among men, with this determination, will we play."

"O Bharata, this proposal about a stay in the woods was uttered but once. The son of Pritha, however, accepted it and Sakuni took up the dice. And casting them he said unto Yudhishtira,—'Lo, I have won."

Section LXXVI

Vaisampayana said,—"Then the vanquished sons of Pritha prepared for their exile into the woods. And they, one after another, in due order, casting off their royal robes, attired themselves in deer-skins. And Dussasana, beholding those chastisers of foes, dressed in deer-skins and deprived of their kingdom and ready to go into exile, exclaimed "The absolute sovereignty of the illustrious king Duryodhana hath commenced. The sons of Pandu have been vanquished, and plunged into great affliction. Now have we attained the goal either by broad or narrow paths. For today becoming superior to our foes in point of prosperity as also of duration of rule have we become praiseworthy of men. The sons of Pritha have all been plunged by us into everlasting hell. They have been deprived of happiness and kingdom for ever and ever. They who, proud of their wealth, laughed in derision at the son of Dhritarashtra, will now have to go into the woods, defeated and deprived by us of all their wealth. Let them now put off their variegated coats of mail, their resplendent robes of celestial make, and let them all attire themselves in deer-skins according to the stake they had accepted of the son of Suvala. They who always used to boast that they had no equals in all the world, will now know and regard themselves in this their calamity as grains of sesame without the kernel. Although in this dress of theirs the Pandavas seem like unto wise and powerful persons installed in a sacrifice, yet they look like persons not entitled to perform sacrifices, wearing such a guise. The wise Yajnasena of the Somake race, having bestowed his daughter--the princess of Panchala--on the sons of Pandu, acted most unfortunately for the husbands of Yajnaseni--these sons of Pritha are as eunuchs. And O Yajnaseni, what joy will be thine upon beholding in the woods these thy husbands dressed in skins and thread-bare rags, deprived of their wealth and possessions. Elect thou a husband, whomsoever thou likest, from among all these present here. These Kurus assembled here, are all forbearing and self-controlled, and possessed of great wealth. Elect thou one amongst these as thy lord, so that these great calamity may not drag thee to wretchedness. "The sons of Pandu now are even like grains of sesame without the kernel, or like show-animals encased in skins, or like grains of rice without the kernel. Why shouldst thou then longer wait upon the fallen sons of Pandu? Vain is the labour used upon pressing the sesame grain devoid of the kernel!"

"Thus did Dussasana, the son of Dhritarashtra, utter in the hearing of the Pandavas, harsh words of the most cruel import. And hearing them, the unforbearing Bhima, in wrath suddenly approaching that prince like a Himalayan lion upon a jackal, loudly and chastisingly rebuked him in these words,—'Wicked-minded villain, ravest thou so in words that are uttered alone by the sinful? Boatest thou thus in the midst of the kings, advanced as thou art by the skill of the king of Gandhara. As thou piercest our hearts hear with these thy arrowy words, so shall I pierce thy heart in battle, recalling all this to thy mind. And they also who from anger or covetousness are walking behind thee as thy protectors,—them also shall I send to the abode of Yama with their descendants and relatives."

Vaisampayana continued,—'Unto Bhima dressed in deer-skins and uttering these words of wrath without doing any thing, for he could not deviate from the path of virtue, Dussasana abandoning all sense of shame, dancing around the Kurus, loudly said, 'O cow! O cow!'

Bhima at this once more said,—'Wretch darest thou, O Dussasana, use harsh words as these? Whom doth it behove to boast, thus having won wealth by foul means? I tell thee that if Vrikodara, the son of Pritha, drinketh not thy life-blood, piercing open thy breast in battle, let him not attain to regions of blessedness, I tell thee truly that by slaying the sons of Dhritarashtra in battle, before the very eyes of all the warriors, I shall pacify this wrath of mine soon enough.”

Vaisampayana continued,—“And as the Pandavas were going away from the assembly, the wicked king Duryodhana from excess of joy mimicked by his own steps the playful leonine trade of Bhima. Then Vrikodara, half turning towards the king said, Think not ye fool that by this thou gainest any ascendancy over me slay thee shall I soon with all thy followers, and answer thee, recalling all this to thy mind. And beholding this insult offered to him, the mighty and proud Bhima, suppressing his rising rage and following the steps of Yudhishtira, also spake these words while going out of the Kaurava court, ‘I will slay Duryodhana, and Dhananjaya will slay Karna, and Sahadeva will slay Sakuni that gambler with dice. I also repeat in this assembly these proud words which the gods will assuredly make good, if ever we engage in battle with the Kurus, I will slay this wretched Duryodhana in battle with my mace, and prostrating him on the ground I will place my foot on his head. And as regards this (other) wicked person--Dussasana who is audacious in speech, I will drink his blood like a lion.

“And Arjuna said,—O Bhima, the resolutions of superior men are not known in words only. On the fourteenth year from this day, they shall see what happeneth.

“And Bhima again said,—‘The earth shall drink the blood of Duryodhana, and Karna, and the wicked Sakuni, and Dussasana that maketh the fourth.’

“And Arjuna said,—‘O Bhima, I will, as thou directest, slay in battle this Karna so malicious and jealous and harsh-speeched and vain. For doing what is agreeable to Bhima, Arjuna voweth that he will slay in battle with his arrows this Karna with all his followers. And I will send unto the regions of Yama also all those other kings that will from foolishness fight against me. The mountains of Himavat might be removed from where they are, the maker of the day lose his brightness, the moon his coldness, but this vow of mine will ever be cherished. And all this shall assuredly happen if on the fourteenth year from this, Duryodhana doth not, with proper respect, return us our kingdom.”

Vaisampayana continued,—“After Arjuna had said this, Sahadeva the handsome son of Madri, endued with great energy, desirous of slaying Sakuni, waving his mighty arms and sighing like snake, exclaimed, with eyes red with anger--‘Thou disgrace of the Gandhara kings, those whom thou thinkest as defeated are not really so. Those are even sharp-pointed arrows from whose wounds thou hast run the risk in battle. I shall certainly accomplish all which Bhima hath said adverting to thee with all thy followers. If therefore thou hast anything to do, do it before that day cometh. I shall assuredly slay thee in battle with all thy followers soon enough, it thou, O son of Suvala, stayest in the light pursuant to the Kshatriya usage.’

“Then, O monarch hearing these words of Sahadeva, Nakula the handsomest of men spake these words,—‘I shall certainly send unto the abode of Yama all those wicked sons of Dhritarashtra, who desirous of death and impelled by Fate, and moved also by the wish of doing what is agreeable to Duryodhana, have used harsh and insulting speeches towards this daughter of Yajnasena at the gambling match. Soon enough shall I, at the command of Yudhishtira and remembering the wrongs to Draupadi, make the earth destitute of the sons of Dhritarashtra.’

Vaisampayana continued,—“And those tigers among men, all endued with long arms, having thus pledged themselves to virtuous promises approached king Dhritarashtra.”

Section LXXVII

Yudhishtira said,—‘I bid farewell unto all the Bharatas, unto my old grand-sire (Bhisma), king Somadatta, the great king Vahlika, Drona, Kripa, all the other kings, Aswathaman, Vidura, Dhritarashtra, all the sons of Dhritarashtra, Yayutsu, Sanjaya, and all the courtiers, I bid fare well, all of ye and returning again I shall see you.’

Vaisampayana continued,—“Overcome with shame none of those that were present there, could tell Yudhishtira anything. Within their hearts, however, they prayed for the welfare of that intelligent prince.

Vidura then said,—The reverend Pritha is a princess by birth. It behoveth her not to go into the woods. Delicate and old and ever known to happiness the blessed one will live, respected by me, in my abode. Known this, ye sons of Pandu. And let safety be always yours.’

Vaisampayana continued,—“The Pandavas thereupon said,—O sinless one, let it be as thou sayest. Thou art our uncle, and, therefore like as our father. We also are all obedient to thee. Thou art, O learned one, our most respected superior. We should always obey what thou chooseth to command. And, O high-souled one, order thou whatever else there is that remaineth to be done.

“Vidura replied,—‘O Yudhishtira, O bull of the Bharata race, know this to be my opinion, that one that is vanquished by sinful means need not be pained by such defeat. Thou knowest every rule of morality; Dhananjaya is ever victorious in battle; Bhimasena is the slayer of foes; Nakula is the gatherer of wealth; Sahadeva hath administrative talents, Dhaumya is the foremost of all conversant with the vedas; and the well-behaved Draupadi is conversant with virtue and economy. Ye are attached to one another and feel delight at one another’s sight and enemies can not separate you from one another, and ye are contented. Therefore, who is there that will not envy ye? O Bharata, this patient abstraction from the possession of the world will be of great benefit to thee. No foe, even if he were equal to sakra himself, will be able to stand it. Formerly thou wert instructed on the mountains of Himavat by Meru Savarni; in the town of Varanavata by Krishna Dwaipayana; on the cliff of Bhrigu by Rama; and on the banks of the Dhrishadwati by Sambhu himself. Thou hast also listened to the instruction of the great Rishi Asita on the hills of Anjana; and thou becamest a disciple of Bhrigu on the banks of the Kalmashi. Narada and this thy priest Dhaumya will now become thy instructors. In the matter of the next world, abandon not these excellent lessons thou hast obtained from the Rishis. O son of Pandu, thou surpasses in intelligence even Pururavas, the son of Ila; in strength, all other monarchs, and in virtue, even the Rishis. Therefore, resolve thou earnestly to win victory, which belongeth to Indra; to control thy wrath, which belongeth to Yama; to give in charity, which belongeth to Kuvera; and to control all passions, which belongeth to Varuna. And, O Bharata, obtain thou the power of gladdening from the moon, the power of sustaining all from water; forbearance from the earth; energy from the entire solar disc; strength from the winds, and affluence from the other elements. Welfare and immunity from ailment be thine; I hope to see thee return. And, O Yudhishtira, act properly and duly in all seasons,—in those of distress—in those of difficulty,—indeed, in respect of everything, O son of Kunti, with our leave go hence. O Bharata, blessing be thine. No one can say that ye have done anything sinful before. We hope to see thee, therefore, return in safety and crowned with success.”

Vaisampayana continued,—”Thus addressed by Vidura, Yudhishtira the son of Pandu, of prowess incapable of being baffled, saying, ‘So be it,’ bowing low unto Bhishma and Drona, went away.”

Battle of Kurukshetra: Bhishma

Section CXVI

Dhritarashtra said, “How, O Sanjaya, did Santanu’s son Bhishma of mighty energy fight on the tenth day of battle, with the Pandavas and the Srinjayas? How also did the Kurus resist the Pandavas in battle? Describe to me the great battle fought by Bhishma, that ornament of battle.”

Sanjaya said, “I will presently describe to thee, O Bharata, how the Kauravas fought with the Pandavas, and how that battle took place. Day after day many mighty car-warriors of thy army, excited with wrath, were despatched to the other world by the diadem-decked (Arjuna) with his great weapons. The ever-victorious Kuru warrior Bhishma also, agreeably to his vow, always caused a great carnage among the Partha army. O chastiser of foes, beholding Bhishma, fighting at the head of the Kurus, and Arjuna also fighting at the head of the Panchalas, we could not say truly on which side the victory would declare itself. On the tenth day of battle, when Bhishma and Arjuna encountered each other, awful was the carnage that took place. On that day, O scorcher of foes, Santanu’s son, Bhishma, conversant with high and mighty weapons, repeatedly slew thousands upon thousands of warriors. Many, O Bharata, whose names and families were not known, but who, endued with great bravery, were unretreating from battle, were on that day slain by Bhishma. Scorching the Pandava army for ten days, Bhishma of virtuous soul, gave up all desire of protecting his life. Wishing his own slaughter presently at the head of his troops,—No more shall I slay large numbers of foremost of warriors.—thought thy mighty-armed sire Devavrata. And seeing Yudhishtira near him, O king, he addressed him, saying, ‘O Yudhishtira, O thou of great wisdom, O thou that art acquainted with every branch of learning, listen to these righteous and heaven-leading words, O sire, that I say. O Bharata, I no longer desire to protect, O sire, this body of mine. I have passed much time in slaying large numbers of men in battle. If thou wishest to do what is agreeable to me, strive to slay me, placing Partha with the Panchalas and the Srinjayas at thy van.’ Ascertaining this to be his intention, king Yudhishtira of true sight proceeded to battle with the Srinjayas (for his support). Then Dhrishtadyumna, O king, and Pandu’s son Yudhishtira, having heard those words of Bhishma urged their array on. And Yudhishtira said, ‘Advance! Fight! Vanquish Bhishma in battle. Ye all will be protected by that conqueror of foes, viz., Jishnu of unbaffled aim. And this great bowman, this generalissimo (of our forces), viz., the son of Prishata, as also Bhima, will assuredly protect you. Ye Srinjayas, entertain no fear today of Bhishma in battle. Without doubt, we will vanquish Bhishma today, placing Sikhandin in our van.’ Having, on the tenth day of battle, made such a vow, the Pandavas, resolved to (conquer or) go to heaven, advanced, blinded by rage, with Sikhandin and Dhananjaya the son of Pandu to the fore. And they made the most vigorous efforts for the overthrow of Bhishma. Then diverse kings, of great might, urged by thy son, and accompanied by Drona and his son and a large force, and the mighty Dussasana at the head of all his uterine brothers, proceeded towards Bhishma staying in the midst of that battle. Then those brave warriors of thy army, placing Bhishma of high vows in their van, battled with the Parthas headed by Sikhandin. Supported by the Chedis and the Panchalas, the ape-bannered Arjuna, placing Sikhandin ahead, proceeded towards Bhishma, the son of Santanu. And the grand-son of Sini battled with Drona’s son, and Dhrishtaketu with the descendant of Puru, and Yudhamanyu with thy son Duryodhana at the head of his followers. And Virata, at the head of his forces, encountered Jayadratha supported by his own troops. And Vardhakshatra's heir, O chastiser of foes, encountered thy son Chitrasena armed with excellent bow and arrows. 1 And Yudhishtira proceeded against the mighty bowman Salya at the head of his troops. And Bhimasena, well-protected, proceeded against the elephant-division (of the Kaurava army). And Dhrishtadyumna, the prince of Panchala, excited with fury and accompanied by his brothers, proceeded against Drona, that foremost of all wielders of weapons, invincible, and irresistible. That chastiser of foes, viz., prince Vrihadvala, bearing on his standard the device of the lion, proceeded against Subhadra's son whose standard bore the device of the Karnikara flower. Thy sons, accompanied by many kings, proceeded against Sikhandin and Dhananjaya the son of Pritha, from desire of slaughtering both of them. When the combatants of both armies rushed against each other with awful prowess, the earth shook (under their tread). Beholding Santanu's son in battle, the divisions of thy army and of the foe, O Bharata, became mingled with one another. Tremendous was the din, O Bharata, that arose there of those warriors burning with rage and rushing against each other. And it was heard on all sides, O king. With the blare of conchs and the leonine shouts of the soldiers, the uproar became awful. The splendour, equal to that of either the Sun or the Moon, of bracelets and diadems of all the heroic kings, became dimmed. And the dust that rose looked like a cloud, the flash of bright weapons constituting its lightning. And the twang of bows, the whiz of arrows, the blare of conchs, the loud beat of drums, and the rattle of cars, of both the armies, constituted the fierce roar of those clouds. And the welkin, over the field of battle, in consequence of the bearded darts, the javelins, the swords and showers of arrows of both armies, was darkened. And car-warriors, and horsemen felled horsemen, in that dreadful battle. And elephants killed elephants, and foot-soldiers slew foot-soldiers. And the battle that took place there for Bhishma's sake, between the Kurus and the Pandavas, O tiger among men, was fierce in the extreme, like that between two hawks for a piece of flesh. Engaged in battle, that encounter between those combatants desirous of slaughtering and vanquishing one another, was extremely dreadful."

Section CXVII

Sanjaya said, "Abhimanyu, O king, displaying his prowess for the sake of Bhishma, fought with thy son who was supported by a large force. Then Duryodhana, excited with wrath, struck Abhimanyu in the chest with rune straight arrows, and once more with three. Then in that battle, Arjuna's son, inflamed with wrath, hurled at Duryodhana's car a terrible dart resembling the rod of Death himself. Thy son, however, that mighty car-warrior, O king, with a broad-headed arrow of great sharpness, cut off in twain that dart of terrible force coursing towards him with great speed. Beholding that dart of his drop down on the earth, Arjuna's wrathful son pierced Duryodhana with three shafts in his arms and chest. And once more, O Chief of the Bharatas, that mighty car-warrior of Bharata's race struck the Kuru king with ten fierce shafts in the centre of his chest. And the battle, O Bharata, that took place between those two heroes, viz., Subhadra's son, and that bull of Kuru's race, the former fighting for compassing Bhishma's death and the latter for Arjuna's defeat, was fierce and interesting to behold, and gratifying to the senses, and was applauded by all the kings. That bull among Brahmanas and chastiser of foes, viz., the son of Drona, excited with wrath in that battle, forcibly struck Satyaki in the chest with fierce arrow. The grandson of Sini also, that hero of immeasurable soul, struck the preceptor's son in every vital limbs with nine shafts winged with the feathers of the Kanka bird. Aswatthaman then, in that battle, struck Satyaki (in return) with nine shafts, and once more, quickly, with thirty, in his arms and chest. Then that great bowman Of the Satwata race, possessed of great fame, deeply pierced by Drona's son, pierced the latter (in return) with arrows. The mighty car-warrior Paurava, covering Dhrishtaketu in that battle with his shafts, mangled that great bowman exceedingly. The mighty car-warrior Dhrishtaketu, endued with great strength, quickly pierced the former with thirty arrows. Then the mighty car-warrior Paurava cut off Dhrishtaketu's bow, and uttering a loud shout, pierced him with whetted shafts. Dhrishtaketu then taking up another bow, pierced Paurava, O king, with three and seventy shafts of great sharpness. Those two great bowmen and mighty car-warriors, both of gigantic stature, pierced each other with showers of arrows. Each succeeded in cutting off the other's bow, and each slew the other's steeds. And both of them, thus deprived of their cars, then encountered each other in a battle with swords. And each took up a beautiful shield made of bull's hide and docked with a hundred moons and graced with a hundred stars. And each of them also took up a polished sword of brilliant lustre. And thus equipt, they rushed, O king at each other, like two lions in the deep forest, both seeking the companionship of the same lioness in her season. They wheeled in beautiful circles, advanced and retreated, and displayed other movements, seeking to strike each other. Then Paurava, excited with wrath, addressed Dhrishtaketu, saying--Wait, Wait,--and struck him on the frontal bone with that large scimitar of his. The king of the Chedis also, in that battle, struck Paurava, that bull among men, on his shoulder-joint, with his large scimitar of sharp edge. Those two repressors of foes thus encountering each other in dreadful battle and thus striking each other, O king, both fell down on the field. Then thy son Jayatsena, taking Paurava up on his car, removed him from the field of battle on that vehicle. And as regards Dhrishtaketu, the valiant and heroic Sahadeva, the son of Madri, possessed of great prowess, bore him away from the field.

“Chitrasena, having pierced Susarman with many arrows made wholly of iron, once more pierced him with sixty arrows and once more with nine. Susarman, however, excited with wrath in battle, pierced thy son, O king, with hundreds of arrows. Chitrasena then, O monarch, excited with rage, pierced his adversary with thirty straight shafts. Susarman, however, pierced Chitrasena again in return.

“In that battle for the destruction of Bhishma, Subhadra’s son, enhancing his fame and honour, fought with prince Vrihadvala, putting forth his prowess for aiding (his sire) Partha and then proceeded towards Bhishma’s front. The ruler of the Kosalas, having pierced the son of Arjuna with five shafts made of iron, once more pierced him with twenty straight shafts. Then the son of Subhadra pierced the ruler of Kosalas with eight shafts made wholly of iron. He succeeded not, however, in making the ruler of the Kosalas to tremble, and, therefore, he once more pierced him with many arrows. And Phalguni’s son then cut off Vrihadvala’s bow, and struck him again with thirty arrows winged with feathers of the Kanka bird. Prince Vrihadvala then, taking up another bow, angrily pierced the son of Phalguni in that battle with many arrows. Verily, O scorcher of foes, the battle, for Bhishma’s sake, that took place between them, both excited with rage and both conversant with every mode of fight, was like the encounter of Vali and Vasava in days of old on the occasion of the battle between the gods and the Asuras.

“Bhimasena, fighting against the elephant-division, looked highly resplendent like Sakra armed with the thunder after splitting large mountains. 1 Indeed, elephants, huge as hills, slaughtered by Bhimasena in battle, fell down in numbers on the field, filling the earth with their shrieks. Resembling massive heaps of antimony, and of mountain-like proportions, those elephants with frontal globes split open, lying prostrate on the earth, seemed like mountains strewn over the earth’s surface. The mighty Bowman Yudhishtira, protected by a large force, afflicted the ruler of the Madras, encountering him in that dreadful battle. The ruler of the Madras, in return, displaying his prowess for the sake of Bhishma, afflicted the son of Dharma, that mighty car-warrior, in battle. The king of Sindhus, having pierced Virata with nine straight arrows of keen points, once more struck him with thirty. Virata, however, O king, that commander of a large division, struck Jayadratha in the centre of his chest with thirty shafts of keen points. The ruler of the Matsyas and the ruler of the Sindhus, both armed with beautiful bows and beautiful scimitars, both decked with handsome coats of mail and weapons and standards, and both of beautiful forms looked resplendent in that battle.

“Drona, encountering Dhrishtadyumna the prince of the Panchalas in dreadful battle, fought fiercely with his straight shafts. Then Drona, O king, having cut off the large bow of Prishata’s son, pierced him deeply with fifty arrows. Then that slayer of hostile heroes, viz., the son of Prishata, taking up another bow, sped at Drona who was contending with him, many arrows. The mighty car-warrior Drona however, cut off all those arrows, striking them with his own. And then Drona sped at Drupada’s son five fierce shafts. Then that slayer of hostile heroes, viz., the son of Prishata, excited with rage, hurled at Drona in that battle a mace resembling the rod of Death himself. Drona however, with fifty arrows checked that mace decked with gold as it coursed impetuously towards him. Thereupon that mace, cut into fragments, O king, by those shafts shot from Drona’s bow, fell down on the earth. Then that scorcher of foes, viz., the son of Prishata, beholding his mace baffled, hurled at Drona an excellent dart made wholly of iron. Drona, however, O Bharata, cut that dart with nine shafts in that battle and then afflicted that great bowman, viz., the son of Prishata. Thus took place, O king, that fierce and awful battle between Drona and the son of Prishata, for the sake of Bhishma.

“Arjuna, getting at the son of Ganga, afflicted him with many arrows of keen points, and rushed at him like an infuriate elephant in the forest upon another. King Bhagadatta, however, of great prowess then rushed at Arjuna, and checked his course in battle with showers of arrows. Arjuna then, in that dreadful battle, pierced Bhagadatta’s elephant coming towards him, with many polished arrows of iron, that were all bright as silver and furnished with keen points. The son of Kunti, meanwhile, O king, urged Sikhandin, saying,--Proceed, proceed, towards Bhishma, and slay him!--Then, O elder brother of Pandu, the ruler of Pragjyotishas, abandoning that son of Pandu, quickly proceeded, O king, against the car of Drupada. Then Arjuna, O monarch, speedily proceeded towards Bhishma, placing Sikhandin ahead. And then there took place a fierce battle, for all the brave combatants of thy army rushed with great vigour against Arjuna, uttering loud shouts. And all this seemed extremely wonderful. Like the wind dispersing in the summer masses of clouds in the welkin, Arjuna dispersed, O king, all those diverse divisions of thy sons. Sikhandin, however, without any anxiety, coming up at the grandsire of the Bharatas, quickly pierced him with great many arrows. As regards Bhishma, his car was then his fire-chamber. His bow was the flame of that fire. And swords and darts and maces constituted the fuel of that fire. And the showers of arrows he shot were the blazing sparks of that fire with which he was then consuming Kshatriyas in that battle. As a raging conflagration with constant supply of fuel, wandereth amid masses of dry grass when aided by the wind, so did Bhishma blaze up with his flames, scattering his celestial weapons. And the Kuru hero slew the Somakas that followed Partha in that battle. Indeed that mighty car-warrior checked also the other forces of Arjuna, by means of his straight and whetted shafts furnished with wings of gold. Filling in that dreadful battle all the points of the compass, cardinal and subsidiary, with his leonine shouts, Bhishma felled many car-warriors, O king, (from their cars) and many steeds along with their riders. And he caused large bodies of cars to look like forests of palmyras shorn of their leafy heads. That foremost of all wielders of weapons, in that battle, deprived cars and steeds and elephants, of their riders. Hearing the twang of his bow and the slap of his palms, both resembling the roll of the thunder, the troops, O king, trembled all over the field. The shafts, O chief of men, of thy sire were never bootless as they fell. Indeed, shot from Bhishma's bow they never fell only touching the bodies of the foe (but pierced them through in every case). We saw crowds of cars, O king, deprived of riders, but unto which were yoked fleet steeds, dragged on all sides with the speed of the wind. Full fourteen thousand great car-warriors of noble parentage, prepared to lay down their lives, unretreating and brave, and possessed of standards decked with gold, belonging to the Chedis, the Kasis, and the Karushas, approaching Bhishma, that hero who resembled the Destroyer himself with wide-open mouth, were despatched to the other world, with their steeds, cars and elephants. There was not, O king, a single great car-warrior among the Somakas, who, having approached Bhishma in that battle, returned with life from that engagement. Beholding Bhishma's prowess, people regarded all those warriors (who approached him) as already despatched to the abode of the king of the Dead. Indeed, no car-warrior ventured to approach Bhishma in battle, except the heroic Arjuna having white steeds (yoked unto his car) and owning Krishna for his charioteer, and Sikhandin, the prince of Panchala, of immeasurable energy."

Section CXVIII

Sanjaya said,--Sikhandin, O bull among men, approaching Bhishma in battle, struck him in the centre of the chest with ten broad-headed arrows. The son of Ganga, however, O Bharata, only looked at Sikhandin with wrath and as if consuming the Panchala prince with that look. Remembering his femininity, O king, Bhishma, in the very sight of all, struck him not. Sikhandin, however, understood it not. Then Arjuna, O monarch, addressed Sikhandin, saying,—'Rush quickly and slay the grandsire. What needst thou say, O hero? Slay the mighty car-warrior Bhishma. I do not see any other warrior in Yudhishthira's army who is competent to fight with Bhishma in battle, save thee, O tiger among men. I say this truly.' Thus addressed by Partha, Sikhandin, O bull of Bharata's race, quickly covered the grandsire with diverse kinds of weapons. Disregarding those shafts, thy sire Devavrata began, with his shafts, to check the angry Arjuna only in that battle. And that mighty car-warrior, O sire, began also to despatch, with his shafts of keen points, the whole army of the Pandavas to the other world. The Pandavas also, O king, after the same manner, supported by their vast host, began to overwhelm Bhishma like the clouds covering the maker of day. O bull of Bharata's race, surrounded on all sides, that Bharata hero consumed many brave warriors in that battle like a raging conflagration in the forest (consuming numberless trees). The prowess that we then beheld there of thy son (Dussasana) was wonderful, inasmuch as he battled with Partha and protected the grandsire at the same time. With that feat of thy son Dussasana, that illustrious bowman, all the people there were highly gratified. Alone he battled with all the Pandavas having Arjuna amongst them; and he fought with such vigour that the Pandavas were unable to resist him. Many car-warriors were in that battle deprived of their cars by Dussasana. And many mighty bowmen on horseback and many mighty-warriors, elephants, pierced with Dussasana's keen shafts, fell down on the earth. And many elephants, afflicted with his shafts, ran away in all directions. As a fire fiercely blazeth forth with bright flames when fed with fuel, so did thy son blaze forth, consuming the Pandava host. And no car-warrior, O Bharata, of the Pandava host ventured to vanquish or even proceed against that warrior of gigantic proportions, save Indra's son (Arjuna) owning white steeds and having Krishna for his charioteer. Then Arjuna also called Vijaya, vanquishing Dussasana in battle, O king, in the very sight of all the troops, proceeded against Bhishma. Though vanquished, thy son, however, relying upon the might of Bhishma's arms, repeatedly comforted his own side and battled with the Pandavas with great fierceness. Arjuna, O king, fighting with his foes in that battle, looked exceedingly resplendent. Then Sikhandin, in that battle, O king, pierced the grandsire with many arrows whose touch resembled that of the bolts of heaven and which were as fatal as the poison of the snake. These arrows, however, O monarch, caused thy sire little pain, for the son of Ganga received them laughingly. Indeed, as a person afflicted with heat cheerfully receives torrents of rain, even so did the son of Ganga receive those arrows of Sikhandin. And the Kshatriyas there, O king, beheld Bhishma in that great battle as a being of fierce visage who was incessantly consuming the troops of the high-souled Pandavas.

"Then thy son (Duryodhana), addressing all his warriors, said unto them, 'Rush ye against Phalguni from all sides. Bhishma, acquainted with the duties of a commander, will protect you.' Thus addressed, the Kaurava troops casting off all fear, fought with the Pandavas. (And once more, Duryodhana said unto them). 'With his tall standard bearing the device of the golden palmyra, Bhishma stayeth, protecting the honour and the armour of all the Dharatarashtra warriors. The very gods, striving vigorously, cannot vanquish the illustrious and mighty Bhishma. What need be said, therefore, of the Parthas who are mortals? Therefore, ye warriors, fly not away from the field, getting Phalguni for a foe. I myself, striving vigorously, will today fight with the Pandavas.. uniting with all of you, ye lords of earth, exerting yourselves actively.' Hearing these words, O monarch, of thy son with bow in hand, many mighty combatants, excited with rage, belonging to the Videhas, the Kalingas, and the diverse tribes of the Daserkas, fell upon Phalguni. And many combatants also, belonging to the Nishadas, the Sauviras, the Valhikas, the Daradas, the Westerners, the Northerners, the Malavas, the Abhighatas, the Surasenas, the Sivis, the Vasatis, the Salwas, the Sakas, the Trigartas, the Amvasthas, and the Kekayas, similarly fell upon Partha, like flights of insects upon a fire. The mighty Dhananjaya, otherwise called Vibhatsu, then, O monarch, calling to mind diverse celestial weapons and aiming them at those great car-warriors at the heads of their respective divisions, I quickly consumed them all, by means of those weapons of great force, like fire consuming a flight of insects. And while that firm Bowman was (by means of his celestial weapons) creating thousands upon thousands of arrows, his Gandiva looked highly resplendent in the welkin. Then those Kshatriyas, O monarch, afflicted with those arrows with their tall standards torn and overthrown, could not even together, approach the ape-bannered (Partha). Car-warriors fell down with their standards, and horsemen with their horses, and elephant-riders with their elephants, attacked by Kiritin with his shafts. And the earth was soon covered all on all sides with the retreating troops of those kings, routed in consequence of the shafts shot from Arjuna's arms. Partha then, O monarch, having routed the Kaurava army, sped many arrows at Dussasana. Those arrows with iron heads, piercing thy son Dussasana through, all entered the earth like snakes through ant-hills. Arjuna then slew Dussasana's steeds and then felled his charioteer. And the lord Arjuna, with twenty shafts, deprived Vivingsati of his car, and struck him five straight shafts. And piercing Kripa and Vikarna and Salya with many arrows made wholly of iron, Kunti's son owning white steeds deprived all of them of their cars. Thus deprived of their cars and vanquished in battle by Savyasachin, Kripa and Salya, O sire, and Dussasana, and Vikarna and Vivingsati, all fled away. Having vanquished those mighty car-warriors, O chief of the Bharatas, in the forenoon, Partha blazed up in that battle like a smokeless conflagration. Scattering his shafts all around like the Sun shedding rays of light, Partha felled many other kings, O monarch. Making those mighty car-warriors turn their backs upon the field by means of his arrowy showers, Arjuna caused a large river of bloody current to flow in that battle between the hosts of the Kurus and the Pandavas, O Bharata. Large numbers of elephants and steeds and car-warriors were slain by car-warriors. And many were the car-warriors slain by elephants, and many also were the steeds slain by foot-soldiers. And the bodies of many elephant-riders and horsemen and car-warriors, cut off in the middle, as also their heads, fell down on every part of the field. And the field of battle, O king, was strewn with (slain) princes,--mighty car-warriors,--falling or fallen, decked with ear-rings and bracelets. And it was also strewn with the bodies of many warriors cut off by car-wheels, or trodden down by elephants. And foot-soldiers ran away, and horsemen also with their horses. And many elephants and car-warriors fell down on all sides. And many cars, with wheels and yokes and standards broken, lay scattered all about on the field. And the field of battle, dyed with the gore of large numbers of elephants, steeds, and car-warriors, looked beautiful like a red cloud, in the autumnal sky. Dogs, and crows, and vultures, and wolves, and jackals, and many other frightful beasts and birds, set up loud howls, at the sight of the food that lay before them. Diverse kinds of winds blew along all directions. And Rakshasas and evil spirits were seen there, uttering loud roars. And strings, embroidered with gold, and costly banners, were seen to wave, moved by the wind. And thousands of umbrellas and great cars with standards attached to them, were seen lying scattered about on the field. Then Bhishma, O king, invoking a celestial weapon, rushed at the son of Kunti, in the very sight of all the bowmen. Thereupon Sikhandin, clad in mail, rushed at Bhishma who was dashing towards Arjuna. At this, Bhishma withdrew that weapon resembling fire (in effulgence and energy). Meanwhile Kunti's son owning white steeds slaughtered thy troops, confounding the grandsire."

Section CXIX

Sanjaya said, "When the combatants of both armies, strong in number, were thus disposed in battle array, all those unretreating heroes, O Bharata, set their heart upon the region of Brahma. In course of the general engagement that followed, the same class of combatants did not fight with the same class of combatants. Car-warriors fought not with car-warriors, or foot-soldiers with foot-soldiers, or horsemen with horsemen, or elephant-warriors with elephant-warriors. On the other hand, O monarch, the combatants fought with one another like mad men. Great and dreadful was the calamity that overtook both the armies. In that fierce slaughter when elephants and men spread themselves on the field, all distinctions between them ceased, for they fought indiscriminately.

"Then Salya and Kripa, and Chitrasena, O Bharata, and Dussasana, and Vikarna, those heroes mounted on their bright cars, caused the Pandava host to tremble. Slaughtered in battle by those high-souled warriors, the Pandava army began to reel in diverse ways, O king, like a boat on the waters tossed by the wind. As the wintry cold cuts kine to the quick, so did Bhishma cut the sons of Pandu to the quick. As regards thy army also, many elephants, looking like newly-risen clouds, were felled by the illustrious Partha. And many foremost of warriors too were seen to be crushed by that hero. And struck with arrows and long shafts in thousands, many huge elephants fell down, uttering frightful shrieks of pain. And the field of battle looked beautiful, strewn with the bodies, still decked with ornaments of high-souled warriors deprived of life and with heads still decked with ear-rings. And in that battle, O king, which was destructive of great heroes, when Bhishma and Dhananjaya the son of Pandu put forth their prowess, thy sons, O monarch, beholding the grandsire exert himself vigorously, approached him, with all their troops placed ahead. Desirous of laying down their lives in battle and making heaven itself their goal, they approached the Pandavas in that battle, which was fraught with great carnage. The brave Pandavas also, O king, bearing in mind the many injuries of diverse kinds inflicted upon them before by thee and thy son, O monarch, and casting off all fear, and eager to win the highest heavens, cheerfully fought with thy son and the other warriors of thy army.

“Then the generalissimo of the Pandava army, viz., the mighty car-warrior Dhrishtadyumna, addressing his soldiers, said, ‘Ye Somakas, accompanied by the Srinjayas, rush ye at Ganga’s son.’ Hearing those words of their commander the Somakas and the Srinjayas, though afflicted with showers of arrows, rushed at the son of Ganga. Thus attacked, O king, thy sire Bhishma, influenced by wrath, began to fight with the Srinjayas. In days of old, O sire, the intelligent Rama had imparted to Bhishma of glorious achievements that instruction in weapons which was so destructive of hostile ranks. Relying on that instruction and causing a great havoc among the troops of the foe, that slayer of hostile heroes, viz., the old Kuru grandsire Bhishma, day after day, slew ten thousand warriors of the Ratha. On the tenth day, however, O bull of Bharata’s race, Bhishma, single-handed, slew ten thousand elephants. And then he slew seven great car-warriors among the Matsyas and the Panchalas. In addition to all this, in that dreadful battle five thousand foot-soldiers, and one thousand tuskers, and ten thousand steeds, were also slain by thy sire, O king, through skill acquired by education. Then having thinned the ranks of all the kings, he slew Satanika, the dear brother of Virata. And the valiant Bhishma, having slain Satanika in battle, felled, O king, full one thousand Kshatriyas with his broad-headed shafts. Besides these, all the Kshatriyas of the Pandava army who followed Dhananjaya, as soon as they approached Bhishma, had to go to Yama’s abode. Covering the Pandava host from every side with showers of arrows, Bhishma stayed in battle at the head of the Kaurava army. Achieving the most glorious feats on the tenth day, as he stayed between the two armies, bow in hand, none of the kings, O monarch, could even look at him, for he then resembled the hot mid-day Sun in the summer sky. As Sakra scorched the Daitya host in battle, even so, O Bharata, did Bhishma scorch the Pandava host. Beholding him thus put forth his prowess, the slayer of Madhu, viz., the son of Devaki, cheerfully addressing Dhananjaya, said, ‘There, Bhishma, the son of Santanu, stayeth between the two armies. Slaying him by putting forth thy might, thou mayst win victory. There, at that spot, whence he breaketh our ranks, check him, putting forth thy strength. O lord, none else, save thee, ventureth to bear the arrows of Bhishma. Thus urged, the ape-bannered Arjuna at that moment made Bhishma with his car, steeds, and standard, invisible by means of his arrows. That bull, however, among the foremost of Kurus, by means of his own arrowy showers, pierced those showers of shafts shot by the son of Pandu. Then the king of the Panchalas the valiant Dhrishtaketu, Bhimasena the son of Pandu, Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata’s race, the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), Chekitana, and the five Kaikaya brothers, and the mighty-armed Satyaki and Subhadra’s son, and Ghatotkacha, and the (five) sons of Draupadi, and Sikhandin, and the valiant Kuntibhoja, and Susarman, and Virata, these and many other powerful warriors of the Pandava army, afflicted by the shafts of Bhishma, seemed to sink in an ocean of grief, Phalguni, however, rescued them all. Then Sikhandin, taking up a mighty weapon and protected by Kiritin, rushed impetuously towards Bhishma alone. The unvanquished Vibhatsu then, knowing what should be done after what, slew all those that followed Bhishma, and then himself rushed at him. And Satyaki, and Chekitana, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata’s race, and Virata, and Drupada, and the twin sons of Madri by Pandu, all protected by that firm Bowman (viz., Arjuna) rushed against Bhishma alone in that battle. And Abhimanyu, and the five sons of Draupadi also, with mighty weapons upraised, rushed against Bhishma in battle. All those firm bowmen, unretreating from battle, pierced Bhishma in diverse parts of his body with well-aimed shafts. Disregarding all those shafts, large in number, shot by those foremost of princes belonging to the Pandava host, Bhishma of undepressed soul penetrated into the Pandava ranks. And the grandsire baffled all those arrows, as if sporting the while. Frequently looking at Sikhandin the prince of the Panchalas with a laugh, he aimed not a single arrow at him, recollecting his femininity. On the other hand, he slew seven great car-warriors belonging to Drupada’s division. Then confused cries of woe soon arose amongst the Matsyas, the Panchalas, and the Chedis, who were together rushing at that single hero. With large numbers of foot-soldiers and steeds and cars, and with showers of arrows, O scorcher of foes, they overwhelmed that single warrior, viz., Bhishma the son of Bhagirathi, that scorcher of foes, like the clouds overwhelming the maker of day. Then in that battle between him and them, which resembled the battle between the gods and the Asuras in days of old, the diadem-decked (Arjuna), placing Sikhandin before him, pierced Bhishma (repeatedly).’

Section CXX

Sanjaya said, “Thus all the Pandavas, placing Sikhandin before them pierced Bhishma in that battle repeatedly surrounding him on all sides. And all the Srinjayas, uniting together, struck him with dreadful Sataghnis, and spiked maces, and battle-axes, and mallets, and short thick clubs, and bearded darts, and other missiles, and arrows furnished with golden wing, and darts and lances and kampanas; and with long shafts, and arrows furnished with heads shaped like the calf-tooth, and rockets. Thus afflicted by many, his coat of mail was pierced everywhere. But though pierced in every vital part, Bhishma felt no pain. On the other hand, he then seemed to his enemies to resemble in appearance the (all-destructive) fire that rises at the end of Yuga. His bow and arrows constituted the blazing flames (of that fire). The flight of his weapons constituted its (friendly) breeze. The rattle of his car-wheels constituted its heat and mighty weapons constituted its splendour. His beautiful bow formed its fierce tongue, and the bodies of heroic warriors, its profuse fuel. And Bhishma was seen to roll through the midst of crowds of cars belonging to those kings, or to come out (of the press) at times, or course once more through their midst. Then, disregarding the king of the Panchalas and Dhrishtaketu, he penetrated, O monarch, into the midst of the Pandava army. He then pierced the six Pandava warriors, viz., Satyaki, and Bhima, and Dhananjaya the son of Pandu, and Drupada, and Virata, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race, with many excellent arrows of great sharpness and dreadful whizz and exceeding impetuosity, and capable of piercing through every kind of armour. Those mighty car-warriors, however, checking those keen shafts, afflicted Bhishma with great force, each of them striking him with ten shafts. Those mighty shafts, whetted on stone and furnished with golden wings, which the great car-warrior Sikhandin shot, quickly penetrated into Bhishma's body. Then the diadem-decked (Arjuna), excited with wrath, and placing Sikhandin ahead rushed at Bhishma and cut off the latter's bow. Thereupon mighty car-warriors, seven in number, viz., Drona and Kritavarman, and Jayadratha the ruler of the Sindhus, and Bhurisravas, and Sala, and Salya, and Bhagadatta could not brook that act of Arjuna. Inflamed with rage, they rushed at him. Indeed, those mighty car-warriors, invoking into existence celestial weapons, fell with great wrath upon that son of Pandu, and covered him with their arrows. And as they rushed towards Phalguni's car, the noise made by them was heard to resemble that made by the ocean itself when it swelleth in rage at the end of the Yuga, Kill, Bring up (our forces), Take, Pierce, Cut off, this was the furious uproar heard about Phalguni's car. Hearing that furious uproar, the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava army rushed forward, O bull of Bharata's race, for protecting Arjuna. They were Satyaki, and Bhimasena, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race, and both Virata and Drupada, and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, and the wrathful Abhimanyu. These seven, inflamed with rage, and armed with excellent bows, rushed with great speed. And the battle that took place between these and the Kaurava warriors was fierce, making the hair stand on end, and resembling O chief of the Bharatas, the battle of the gods with the Danavas. Sikhandin, however, that foremost of car-warriors, protected in the battle by the diadem-decked (Arjuna), pierced Bhishma, in that encounter, with ten shafts after the latter's bow had been cut off. And he struck Bhishma's charioteer with other shafts, and cut off the latter's standard with one shaft. Then the son of Ganga took up another bow that was tougher. That even was cut off by Phalguni with three sharp shafts. Indeed, that chastiser of foes, viz., Arjuna, who was capable of drawing the bow with even his left hand, excited with rage, one after another, cut off all the bows that Bhishma took up. Then Bhishma, whose bows were thus cut off, excited with rage, and licking the corners of his mouth, took up a dart that was capable of riving a hill. In rage he hurled it at Phalguni's car. Beholding its course towards him like the blazing bolt of heaven, the delighter of the Pandavas fixed five sharp broad-headed arrows (on his bow-string). And with those five arrows, O chief of the Bharatas, the angry Arjuna cut off into five fragments that dart hurled from Bhishma's arms. Thus cut off by the angry Arjuna, that dart then fell down like a flash of lightning separated from a mass of clouds. Beholding his dart cut off, Bhishma became filled with rage. That hero, that subjugator of hostile cities, then began to reflect. And he said unto himself, 'With only a single bow I could slay all the Pandavas, if the mighty Vishnu himself had not been their protector. For two reasons, however, I will not fight with the Pandavas, viz., their unslayableness, and the femininity of Sikhandin. Formerly, when my sire wedded Kali, he pleased (with me) gave me two boons, viz., that I should be incapable of being slain in battle, and that my death should depend on my own choice. I should, however, now wish my own death, this being the proper hour.' Ascertain this to be the resolve of Bhishma of immeasurable energy, the Rishis and the Vasus stationed in the firmament, said, 'That which hath been resolved by thee is approved by us also, O son! Act according to thy resolution, O king. Withdraw thy heart from battle.' On the conclusion, of those words, fragrant and auspicious breeze charged with particles of water, began to blow along a natural direction. 1 And celestial cymbals of loud sounds began to beat. And a flowery shower fell upon Bhishma, O sire. The words spoken by the Rishis and the Vasus, however, O king, were not heard by any one save Bhishma himself. I also heard them, through the power conferred on me by the Muni. Great was the grief, O monarch, that filled the hearts of the celestials at the thought of Bhishma, that favourite of all the worlds, falling down from his car. Having listened to these words of the celestials, Santanu's son Bhishma of great ascetic merit rushed out at Vibhatsu, even though he was then being pierced with sharp arrows capable of penetrating through every armour. Then Sikhandin, O king, excited with rage, struck the grandsire of the Bharatas in the chest with nine sharp arrows. The Kuru grandsire Bhishma, however, though struck by him in battle, thus, trembled not, O monarch, but remained unmoved like a mountain during an earthquake. Then Vibhatsu, drawing his bow Gandiva with a laugh, pierced the son of Ganga with five and twenty arrows. And once more, Dhananjaya, with great speed and excited with wrath struck him in every vital part with hundreds of arrows. Thus pierced by others, also with thousands of arrows, the mighty car-warrior Bhishma pierced those others in return with great speed. And as regards the arrows shot by those warriors, Bhishma, possessed of prowess in battle that was incapable of being baffled, equally checked them all with his own straight arrows. Those arrows, however, endowed with wings of gold and whetted on stone, which the mighty car-warrior Sikhandin shot in that battle, scarcely caused Bhishma any pain. Then the diadem-decked (Arjuna), excited with rage and placing Sikhandin to the fore, approached Bhishma (nearer) and once more cut off his bow. And then piercing Bhishma with ten arrows, he cut off the latter's standard with one. And striking Bhishma's chariot with ten arrows, Arjuna caused him to tremble. The son of Ganga then took up another bow that was stronger.

Within, however, the twinkling of an eye, as soon,

in fact, as it was taken up, Arjuna cut that bow also into three fragments with three broad-headed shafts. And thus the son of Pandu cut off in that battle even all the bows of Bhishma. After that, Bhishma the son of Santanu, no longer desired to battle with Arjuna. The latter, however, then pierced him with five and twenty arrows. That great Bowman, thus pierced greatly, then addressed Dussasana, and said, 'Behold, Partha, that great car-warrior of the Pandavas, excited with wrath in battle, pierceth me alone with many thousands of arrows. He is incapable of being vanquished in battle by the wielder of the thunder-bolt himself. As regards myself also, O hero, the very gods, Danavas and Rakshasas united together, are incapable of vanquishing me. What I shall say then of mighty car-warriors among men?' While Bhishma was thus speaking to Dussasana, Phalguni with sharp shafts, and placing Sikhandin to the fore, pierced Bhishma in that battle. Then Bhishma, deeply and excessively pierced by the wielder of Gandiva with keen-pointed shafts, once more addressed Dussasana with a smile and said, 'These arrows coursing towards me in one continuous line, whose touch resembleth that of heaven's bolt, have been shot by Arjuna. These are not Sikhandin's. Cutting me to the quick, piercing through even my hard coat of mail, and striking me with the force of mushalas, these arrows are not Sikhandin's. Of touch as hard as that of the Brahmana's rod (of chastisement), 1 and of impetus unbearable as that of the thunder-bolt, these arrows are afflicting my vital forces. These are not Sikhandin's. Of the touch of maces and spiked bludgeons, those arrows are destroying my vital forces like messengers of Death commissioned (by the grim king himself). These are not Sikhandin's. Like angry snakes of virulent poison, projecting their tongues out, these are penetrating into my vitals. These are not Sikhandin's--these that cut me to the quick like the cold of winter cutting kine to the quick. Save the heroic wielder of Gandiva, viz., the ape-bannered Jishnu, even all other kings united together cannot cause me pain. Saying these words, Bhishma, the valiant son of Santanu, as if for the object of consuming the Pandavas, hurled a dart at Partha. Partha, however, caused that dart to drop down, cutting it into three fragments with three shafts, in the very sight, O Bharata, of all the Kuru heroes of thy army. Desirous of obtaining either death or victory, the son of Ganga then took up a sword and a shield decked with gold. Before, however, he could come down from his car, Arjuna cut off by means of his arrows, that shield into a hundred fragments. And that feat of his seemed exceedingly wonderful. Then the king Yudhishtira urged his own troops, saying, 'Rush ye at Ganga's son. Do not entertain the slightest fear.' Then, armed with bearded darts, and lances, and arrows, from all sides, with axes, and excellent scimitars, and long shafts of great sharpness, with calf-toothed arrows, and broad-headed shafts, they all rushed at that single warrior. Then arose from among the Pandava host a loud shout. Then thy sons also, O king, desirous of Bhishma's victory, surrounded him and uttered leonine shouts. Fierce was the battle fought there between thy troops and those of the enemy on that the tenth day, O king, when Bhishma and Arjuna met together. Like unto the vortex that occurs at the spot where the Ganga meets the Ocean, for a short while a vortex occurred there where the troops of both armies met and struck one another down. And the Earth, wet with gore, assumed a fierce form. And the even and the uneven spots on her surface could no longer be distinguished. Although Bhishma was pierced in all his vital limbs, yet on that the tenth day he stayed (calmly) in battle, having slain ten thousand warriors. Then that great Bowman, Partha, stationed at the head of his troops, broke the centre of the Kuru army. Ourselves then, afraid of Kunti's son Dhananjaya having white steeds attached to his car, and afflicted by him with polished weapons, fled away from the battle. The Sauviras, the Kitavas, the Easterners, the Westerners, the Northerners, the Malavas, the Abhishahas, the Surasenas, the Sivils, the Vasatis, the Salwas, the Sayas, the Trigartas, the Amvashthas, and the Kaikeyas. 1--these and many other illustrious warriors,--afflicted with arrows and pained by their wounds, abandoned Bhishma in that battle while he was fighting with the diadem-decked (Arjuna). Then a great many warriors, surrounding that single warrior on all sides, defeated the Kurus (that protected him) and covered him with shower of arrows. Throw down, Seize, Fight, Cut into pieces,--this was the furious uproar, O king, heard in the vicinity of Bhishma's car. Having slain in that battle, O monarch, (his foes) by hundreds and thousands, there was not in Bhishma's body space of even two fingers' breadth that was not pierced with arrows. Thus was thy sire mangled with arrows of keen points by Phalguni in that battle. And then he fell down from his car with his head to the east, a little before sunset, in the very sight of thy sons. And while Bhishma fell, loud cries of alas and oh, O Bharata, were heard in the welkin uttered by the celestials and the kings of the earth. And beholding the high-souled grandsire falling down (from his car), the hearts of all of us fell with him. That foremost of all bowmen, that mighty-armed hero, fell down, like an uprooted standard of Indra, making the earth tremble the while. 2 Pierced all over with arrows, his body touched not the ground. At that moment, O bull of Bharata's race, a divine nature took possession of that great Bowman lying on a bed of arrows. The clouds poured a (cool) shower (over him) and the Earth trembled. While falling he had marked that the Sun was then in the southern solstice. That hero, therefore, permitted not his senses to depart, thinking of that (inauspicious) season (of death). And all around in the welkin he heard celestial voices saying, 'Why, Oh why, should Ganga's son, that foremost of all warriors of weapons, yield up his life during the southern declension?' Hearing these words, the son of Ganga answered, 'I am alive!' Although fallen upon the earth, the Kuru grandsire Bhishma, expectant of the northern declension, suffered not his life to depart. Ascertain- ing that to be his resolve, Ganga, the daughter of Himavat, sent unto him the great Rishis in swanlike form. Then those Rishis in the forms of swans inhabiting the Manasa lake, quickly rose up, and came together, for obtaining a sight of the Kuru grandsire Bhishma, to that spot where that foremost of men was lying on his bed of arrows. Then those Rishis in swanlike forms, coming to Bhishma, beheld that perpetuator of Kuru's race lying on his bed of arrows. Beholding that high-souled son of Ganga, that chief of the Bharatas, they walked round him, and the Sun being then in the southern solstice, they said, addressing one another, these words, 'Being a high-souled person, why should Bhishma pass out (of the world) during the southern declension?' Having said these words, those swans went away, proceeding towards the southern direction. Endued with great intelligence, Bhishma, O Bharata, beholding them, reflected for a moment. And the son of Santanu then said unto them. 'I will never pass out (of the world) as long as the Sun is in the southern solstice. Even this is my resolve. I will proceed to my own ancient abode when the Sun reacheth the northern solstice. Ye swans, I tell you this truly. Expectant of the northern declension I will hold my life. Since I have the fullest control over the yielding up of my life, I will, therefore, hold life, expectant of death during the northern declension. The boon that was granted to me by my illustrious sire, to the effect that my death would depend on my own wish O, let that boon become true. I will hold my life, since I have control in the matter of laying it down.' Having said these words to those swans, he continued to lie down on his bed of arrows.

"When that crest of the Kuru race, viz., Bhishma of great energy, fell down, the Pandavas and the Srinjayas uttered leonine shouts. When the grandsire of the Bharatas who was endued with great might was overthrown, thy son, O bull of Bharata's race, knew not what to do. And all the Kurus were entirely deprived of their senses. And the Kurus headed by Kripa, and Duryodhana, sighed and wept. And from grief they remained for a long while deprived of their senses. And they remained perfectly still, O monarch, without setting their hearts on battle. As if seized by thighs, they stood motionless, without proceeding against the Pandavas. When Santanu's son Bhishma of mighty energy, who was (regarded as) unslayable, was slain, all of us thought that the destruction of the Kuru king was at hand. 1 Vanquished by Savyasachin, with our foremost heroes slain, and ourselves mangled with sharp arrows, we knew not what to do. And the heroic Pandavas possessed of massive arms that looked like spiked maces, having obtained the victory and won a highly blessed state in the other world, 1 all blew their great conches. And the Somakas and the Panchalas all rejoiced, O king. Then when thousands of trumpets were blown, the mighty Bhimase- na slapped his arm-pits and uttered loud shouts. When the all-powerful son of Ganga was slain, the heroic warriors of both armies, laying down their weapons, began to reflect thoughtfully. And some uttered loud shrieks and some fled away, and some were deprived of their senses. And some censured the practices of the Kshatriya order and some applauded Bhishma. And the Rishis and the Pitris all applauded Bhishma of high vows. And the deceased ancestors of the Bharatas also praised Bhishma. Meanwhile the valiant and intelligent Bhishma, the son of Santanu, having recourse to that Yoga which is taught in the great Upanishads and engaged in mental prayers, remained quiet, expectant of his hour."

Battle of Kurukshetra: Drona
Section CXCI

“Sanjaya said, ‘Then Drona caused a great carnage among the Panchalas, like the slaughter caused by Sakra himself in rage amongst the Danavas in the days of yore. The great car-warriors of the Pandava army, endued with might and energy, though slaughtered, O king, by Drona’s weapons, were not yet afraid of Drona in that battle. Indeed, O monarch, those mighty car-warriors, viz., the Panchalas and the Srinjayas, all rushed against Drona himself, for fighting with him. Loud and fierce were the yells they uttered as they rushed towards Drona for encompassing him on all sides and were slaughtered by him with shafts and darts. Beholding the slaughter of the Panchalas in that battle by the illustrious Drona, and seeing his, weapons overwhelm all sides, fear entered the hearts of the Pandavas. Beholding that dreadful carnage of steeds and human beings in that battle, the Pandavas, O monarch, became hopeless of victory. (They began to say unto each other) ‘Is it not evident that Drona, that warrior conversant with the mightiest of weapons, will consume us all like a raging conflagration consuming a heap of straw in the season of spring? There is none competent to even look at him in battle. Conversant with the ways of morality, Arjuna (who alone is a match for him) will not fight with him.’ Beholding the sons of Kunti afflicted with the shafts of Drona and inspired with fear, Kesava, endued with great intelligence and, devoted to their welfare, addressed Arjuna and said, ‘This foremost of all bowmen is incapable of being ever vanquished by force in battle, by the very gods with Vasava at their head. When, however, he lays aside his weapons, he becomes capable of being slain on the field even by human beings. Casting aside virtue, ye sons of Pandu, adopt now some contrivance for gaining the victory, so that Drona of the golden car may not slay us all in battle. Upon the fall of (his son) Aswatthaman he will cease to fight, I think. Let some man, therefore, tell him that Aswatthaman, hath been slain in battle.’ This advice, however, O king was not approved by Kunti’s son, Dhananjaya. Others approved of it. But Yudhishtira accepted it with great difficulty. Then the mighty-armed Bhima, O king, slew with a mace a foe-crushing, terrible and huge elephant named Aswatthaman, of his own army, belonging to Indrarvarman, the chief of the Malavas. Approaching Drona then in that battle with some bashfulness Bhimasena began to exclaim aloud, ‘Aswatthaman hath been slain.’ That elephant named Aswatthaman having been thus slain, Bhima spoke of Aswatthaman’s slaughter. Keeping the true fact within his mind, he said what was untrue, Hearing those highly disagreeable words of Bhima and reflecting upon them, Drona’s limbs seemed to dissolve like sands in water. Recollecting however, the prowess of his son, he soon came to regard that intelligence as false. Hearing, therefore, of his slaughter, Drona did not become unmanned. Indeed, soon recovering his senses, he became comforted, remembering that his son was incapable of being resisted by foes. Rushing towards the son of Prishata and desirous of slaying that hero who had been ordained as his slayer, he covered him with a thousand keen shafts, equipped with kanka feathers. Then twenty thousand Panchala car-warriors of great energy covered him, while he was thus careering in battle, with their shafts. Completely shrouded with those shafts, we could not any longer see that great car-warrior who then resembled, O monarch, the sun, covered with clouds in the season of rains. Filled with wrath and desirous of compassing the destruction of those brave Panchalas, that mighty car-warrior, that scorcher of foes, viz., Drona, dispelling all those shafts of the Panchalas, then invoked into existence the Brahma weapon. At that time, Drona looked resplendent like a smokeless, blazing fire. Once more filled with rage the valiant son of Bharadwaja slaughtering all the Somakas, seemed to be invested with great splendour. In that dreadful battle, he felled the heads of the Panchalas and cut off their massive arms, looking like spiked maces and decked with golden ornaments. Indeed, those Kshatriyas, slaughtered in battle by Bharadwaja’s son fell down on the earth and lay scattered like trees uprooted by the tempest. In consequence of fallen elephants and steeds, O Bharata, the earth, miry with flesh and blood, became impassable. Having slain twenty thousand Panchala car-warriors, Drona, in that battle, shone resplendent like a smokeless, blazing fire. Once more filled with rage, the valiant son of Bharadwaja cut off, with a broad-headed arrow, the head of Vasudana from his trunk. Once more slaying five hundred Matsyas, and six thousand elephants, he slew ten thousand steeds. Beholding Drona stationed on the field for the extermination of the Kshatriya race, the Rishis Viswamitra, and Jamadagni, and Bharadwaja, and Gautama, and Vasishtha, and Kasyapa, and Atri, and the Srikatas, the Prishnis, Garga, the Valkhilyas, the Marichis, the descendants of Bhrigu and Angiras, and diverse other sages of subtle forms quickly came thither, with the Bearer of sacrificial libations at their head, and, desirous of taking Drona unto the region of Brahman, addressed Drona, that ornament of battle, and said, ‘Thou art fighting unrighteously. The hour of thy death is come. Laying aside thy weapons in battle, O Drona, behold us stationed here. After this, it behoveth thee not to perpetrate such exceedingly cruel deeds. Thou art versed in the Vedas and their branches. Thou art devoted to the duties enjoined by truth, especially, thou art a Brahmana. Such acts do not become thee. Lay aside thy weapons. Drive away the film of error that shrouds thee. Adhere now to the eternal path. The period for which thou art to dwell in the world of men is now full. Thou hast, with the Brahma weapon, burnt men on earth that are unacquainted with weapons. This act that thou hast perpetrated, O regenerate one, is not righteous. Lay aside thy weapons in battle without delay, O Drona, do not wait longer on earth. Do not, O regenerate one, perpetrate such a sinful act.' Hearing these words of their as also those spoken by Bhimasena, and beholding Dhrishtadyumna before him, Drona became exceedingly cheerless in battle. Burning with grief and exceedingly afflicted, he enquired of Kunti's son Yudhishtira as to whether his son (Aswatthaman) had been slain or not. Drona firmly believed that Yudhishtira would never speak an untruth even for the sake of the sovereignty of the three worlds. For this reason, that bull among Brahmanas asked Yudhishtira and not any body else. He had hoped for truth from Yudhishtira from the latter's infancy.

"Meanwhile, O monarch, Govinda, knowing that Drona, that foremost of warriors, was capable of sweeping all the Pandavas off the face of the earth, became much distressed. Addressing Yudhishtira he said, 'If Drona fighteth, filled with rage, for even half-a-day, I tell thee truly, thy army will then be annihilated. Save us, then, from Drona. under such circumstances, falsehood is better than truth. By telling an untruth for saving a life, one is not touched by sin. There is no sin in untruth spoken unto women, or in marriages, or for saving king, or for rescuing a Brahmana.' 1 While Govinda and Yudhishtira were thus talking with each other, Bhimasena (addressing the king) said, 'As soon, O monarch, as I heard of the means by which the high-souled Drona might be slain, putting forth my prowess in battle, I immediately slew a mighty elephant, like unto the elephant of Sakra himself, belonging to Indravarman, the chief of the Malavas, who was standing within thy army. I then went to Drona and told him, 'Aswatthaman has been slain, O Brahmana! Cease, then, to fight. Verily, O bull among men, the preceptor did not believe in the truth of words. Desirous of victory as thou art, accept the advice of Govinda. Tell Drona, O King, that the son of Saradwat's daughter is no more. Told by thee, that bull among Brahmanas will never fight. Thou, O ruler of men, art reputed to be truthful in the three worlds.' Hearing those words of Bhima and induced by the counsels of Krishna, and owing also to the inevitability of destiny, O monarch, Yudhishtira made up his mind to say what he desired. Fearing to utter an untruth, but earnestly desirous of victory, Yudhishtira distinctly said that Aswatthaman was dead, adding indistinctly the world elephant (after the name), Before this, Yudhishtira's car had stayed at a height of four fingers' breadth from the surface of the earth; after, however, he had said that untruth, his (vehicle and) animals touched the earth. Hearing those words from Yudhishtira, the mighty car-warrior Drona, afflicted with grief, for the (supposed) death of his son, yielded to the influence of despair. By the words, again, of the Rishis, he regarded himself a great offender against the high-souled Pandavas. Hearing now about the death of his son, he became perfectly cheerless and filled with anxiety; upon beholding Dhrishtadyumna, O king, that chastiser of foes could not fight as before."

Section CXCII

"Sanjaya said, 'Beholding Drona filled with great anxiety and almost deprived of his senses by grief, Dhrishtadyumna, the son of the Panchala king, rushed at him. That hero had, for the destruction of Drona, been obtained by Drupada, that ruler of men, at a great sacrifice, from the Bearer of sacrificial libations. Desirous of slaying Drona, he now took up a victory-giving and formidable bow whose twang resembled the roll of the clouds, whose string was possessed of great strength, and which was irrefragable and celestial. And he fixed on it a fierce arrow, resembling a snake of virulent poison and possessed of the splendour of fire. That arrow, resembling a fire of fierce flame, while within the circle of his bow, looked like the autumnal sun of great splendour within a radiant circle. Beholding that blazing bow bent with force by Prishata's son, the troops regarded that to be the last hour (of the world). Seeing that arrow aimed at him, the valiant son of Bharadwaja thought that the last hour of his body had come. The preceptor prepared with care to baffle that shaft. The weapons, however, of that high-souled one, O monarch, no longer appeared at his bidding. 1 His weapons had not been exhausted although he had shot them ceaselessly for four days and one night. On the expiry, however, of the third part of that of the fifth day, his arrows became exhausted. Seeing the exhaustion of his arrows and afflicted with grief on account of his son's death, and in consequence also of the unwillingness of the celestial weapons to appear at his bidding, he desired to lay aside his weapons, as requested by the words of the Rishis also. Though filled with great energy, he could not however, fight as before. Then taking up another celestial bow that Angiras had given him, and certain arrows that resembled a Brahmana's curse, he continued to fight with Dhrishtadyumna. He covered the Panchala prince with a thick shower of arrows, and filled with rage, mangled his angry antagonist. With his own keen shafts he cut off in a hundred fragments those of the prince as also the latter's standard and bow. He then his antagonist's driver. Then Dhrishtadyumna, smiling, took up another bow, and pierced Drona with a keen shaft in the centre of the chest. Deeply pierced therewith and losing his self-possession in that encounter, that mighty Bowman, then, with a sharp and broad-headed arrow, once more cut off Dhrishtadyumna's bow. Indeed, the invincible Drona then cut off all the weapons, O king, and all the bows that his antagonist had, with the exception only of his mace and sword. Filled with rage, he then pierced the angry Dhrishtadyumna, O chastiser of foes, nine keen arrows, capable of taking the life of every foe. Then the mighty car-warrior Dhrishtadyumna, of immeasurable soul, invoking into existence the Brahma weapon, caused the steeds of his own car to be mingled with those of his foes. Endued with the speed of the wind, those steeds that were red and of the hue of pigeons, O bull of Bharata's race, thus mingled together, looked exceedingly beautiful. Indeed, O king, those steeds thus mingled together on the field of battle, looked beautiful like roaring clouds in the season of rains, charged with lightning. Then that twice-born one of immeasurable soul cut off the shaft-joints, the wheel-joints, and (other) car-joints of Dhrishtadyumna. Deprived of his bow, and made carless and heedless and driverless, the heroic Dhrishtadyumna, fallen into great distress, grasped a mace. Filled with rage, the mighty car-warrior, Drona, of unbaffled prowess, by means of a number of keen shafts, cut off that mace, while it was on the point of being hurled at him. Beholding his mace cut off by Drona with arrows, that tiger among men, (viz., the Panchala prince), took up a spotless sword and a bright shield decked with a hundred moons. Without doubt, under those circumstances, the Panchala prince determined to make an end of that foremost of preceptors, that high-souled warrior. Sometimes, sheltering himself in his car-box and sometimes riding on his car-shafts, the prince moved about, uplifting his swords and whirling his bright shield. The mighty car-warrior Dhrishtadyumna, desirous of achieving, from folly, a difficult feat, hoped to pierce the chest of Bharadwaja's son in that battle. Sometimes, he stayed upon the yoke, and sometimes under the haunches of Drona's red steeds. These movements of his were highly applauded by all the troops. Indeed, while he stayed amid the trappings of the yoke or behind those red steeds, Drona found no opportunity to strike him. All this seemed exceedingly wonderful. The movements of both Drona and Prishata's son in that battle resembled the fight of hawk careering through the welkin for a piece of meat. Then Drona, by means of a dart pierced the white steeds of his antagonist, one after another, not striking, however, the red ones amongst them (that belonged to himself) 1. Deprived of life, those steeds of Dhrishtadyumna fell down upon the earth. Thereupon, the red steeds of Drona himself, O king, were freed from the entanglements of Dhrishtadyumna's car. Beholding his steeds slain by that foremost of Brahmanas, Prishata's sons, that mighty car-warrior, that foremost of fighters, could not brook it. Though deprived of his car, still that foremost of all swordsmen, armed with his sword, sprang towards Drona, O monarch, like Vinata's son (Garuda) making a swoop at a snake. The form, O king, of Dhrishtadyumna at that time, when he sought to slay the son of Bharadwaja, resembled the form of Vishnu himself in days of yore when at the point of slaying Hiranyakasipu. He performed diverse evolutions, in fact. O Kauravya, the son of Prishata, careering in that battle, exhibited the well-known one and twenty different kinds of motion. Armed with the sword, and shield in hand, Prishata's son wheeled about and whirled his sword on high, and made side thrusts, and rushed forward, and ran sideways, and leapt high, and assailed the flanks of his antagonists and receded backwards, and closed with his foes, and pressed them hard. Having practised them well, he also showed the evolutions called Bharata, Kausika Satwata, as he careened in that battle for compassing the destruction of Drona, Beholding those beautiful evolutions of Dhrishtadyumna, as he careered on the field, sword and shield in hand, all the warriors, as also the celestials assembled there, were filled with wonder. The regenerate Drona then, shooting a thousand arrows in the thick of fight, cut off the sword of Dhrishtadyumna as also his shield, decked with a hundred moons. Those arrows that Drona shot, while fighting from such a near point, were of the length of a span. Such arrows are used only in close fight. None else have arrows of that kind, except Kripa, and Partha, and Aswatthaman and Karna, Pradyumna and Yuyudhana; Abhimanyu also had such arrows. Then the preceptor, desirous of slaying his disciple who was unto him even as his own son, fixed on his bow-string a shaft endued with great impetuosity. That shaft, however, Satyaki cut off by means of ten arrows, in the very sight of thy son as also of the high-souled Karna, as thus rescued Dhrishtadyumna who was on the point of succumbing to Drona. Then Kesava and Dhananjaya beheld Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled, who, O Bharata, was thus careering in the car-tracks (of the Kuru warriors) and within the range of the shafts of Drona and Karna and Kripa. Saying, 'Excellent, Excellent!' both of them loudly applauded Satyaki of unfading glory, who was thus destroying the celestial weapons of all those warriors. Then Kesava and Dhananjaya rushed towards the Kurus. Addressing Krishna, Dhananjaya said, 'Behold, O Kesava, that perpetuator of Madhu's race, viz., Satyaki of true prowess, sporting before the preceptor and those mighty car-warriors and gladdening me and the twins and Bhima and king Yudhishtira. With skill acquired by practice and without insolence, behold that enhancer of the fame of the Vrishnis, viz., Satyaki, careering in battle, sporting the while with those mighty car-warriors. All these troops, as also the Siddhas (in the welkin), beholding him invincible in battle, are filled with wonder, and applauding him, saying, 'Excellent, Excellent!' Indeed, O king, the warriors of both armies all applauded the Satwata hero, for his feats."

Section CXCI

"Sanjaya said, 'Beholding those feats of the Satwata hero, Duryodhana and others, filled with rage, quickly encompassed the grandson of Sini on all sides. Kripa and Karna, of also thy sorts, O sire, in that battle, quickly approaching the grandson of Sini, began to strike him with keen arrows. Then king Yudhishtira, and the two other Pandavas, viz., the two sons of Madri and Bhimasena of great might surrounded Satyaki (for protecting him). Karna, and the mighty car-warrior Kripa, and Duryodhana and others, all resisted Satyaki, pouring showers of arrows on him. The grand son of Sini, however, contending with all those car-warriors, baffled, O monarch, that terrible downpour of arrows, so suddenly created by his foes. Indeed, in that dreadful battle, Satyaki, by means of his own celestial weapons, duly resisted all those celestial weapons aimed at him by those illustrious warriors. The field of battle became full of many cruel sights upon that encounter of those royal combatants, resembling that scene of yore when Rudra, filled with rage, had destroyed all creatures. Human arms and heads and bows, O Bharata, and umbrellas displaced (from cars), and yak-tails, were seen lying in heaps on the field of battle. The earth became quickly strewn with broken wheels and cars, and massive arms lopped off from trunks, and brave horsemen deprived of life. And, O foremost one among the Kurus, large number of warriors, mangled with falling arrows, were seen in that great battle to roll and writhe on the ground in agony of the last spasms of death. During the progress of that terrible battle, resembling the encounter in days of old between the celestials and the Asuras, king Yudhishtira the just, addressing his warriors, said, Putting forth all your vigour, rush, ye great car-warriors, against the Pot-born! Yonder the heroic son of Prishata is engaged with Drona! He is endeavouring to the utmost of his might, to slay the son of Bharadwaja. Judging from the aspect he is presenting in this great battle, it is evident that filled with rage, he will today overthrow Drona. Uniting together, all of you fight with the Pot-born.' Thus ordered by Yudhishtira, the mighty car-warriors of the Srinjayas all rushed with great vigour to slay the son of Bharadwaja. That mighty car-warrior, viz., Bharadwaja's son, quickly rushed against those advancing warriors, knowing for certain that he would die. When Drona, of sure aim, thus proceeded, the earth trembled violently. Fierce winds began to blow, inspiring the (hostile) ranks with fear. Large meteors fell, seemingly issuing out of the sun, blazing fiercely as they fell and foreboding great terrors. The weapons of Drona, O sire, seemed to blaze forth. Cars seemed to produce loud rattles, and steeds to shed tears. The mighty car-warrior, Drona, seemed to be divested of his energy, His left eye and left hand began to twitch. Beholding Prishata's son, again, before him, and bearing in mind the words of the Rishis about his leaving the world for heaven, he became cheerless. He then desired to give up life by fighting fairly. Encompassed on all sides by the troops of Drupada's son, Drona began to career in battle, consuming large numbers of Kshatriyas. That grinder of foes, having slain four and twenty thousand Kshatriyas, then despatched to Yama's abode ten times ten thousand, by means of his shafts of keen points. Exerting himself with care, he seemed to stand in that battle like a smokeless fire. For the extermination of the Kshatriya race, he then had recourse to the Brahma weapon. Then the mighty Bhima, beholding the illustrious and irresistible prince of the Panchalas carless and weaponless, quickly proceeded towards him. Beholding him striking at Drona from a near point, that grinder of foes took up Dhrishtadyumna on his own car and said unto him, 'Save thee there is no other man that can venture to fight with the preceptor. Be quick to slay him. The burden of his slaughter rests upon thee.' Thus addressed by Bhima, the mighty-armed Dhrishtadyumna speedily took up a strong, a new and a superb bow capable of bearing a great strain. Filled with rage, and shooting his arrows in that battle at the irresistible Drona, Dhrishtadyumna covered the preceptor, desirous of withstanding him. Those two ornaments of battle then, both foremost of fighters and both filled with rage, invoked into existence the Brahma and diverse other celestial weapons. Indeed, O king, Dhrishtadyumna covered Drona with many mighty weapons in that encounter. Destroying all the weapons of Bharadwaja's son, the Panchala prince, that warrior of unfading glory, began to slay the Vasatis, the Sivas, the Valhikas and the Kurus, that is, them, who protected Drona in that battle. Indeed, O king, shooting showers of arrows on all sides, Dhrishtadyumna at that time looked resplendent like the sun himself shedding his thousands of rays. Drona, however, once more cut off the prince's bow and pierced the vitals of the prince himself with many arrows. Thus pierced, the prince felt great pain. Then Bhima, of great wrath, holding the car of Drona, O monarch, slowly said these words unto him: If wretches amongst Brahmanas, discontented with the avocations of their own order, but well-versed in arms, did not fight, the Kshatriya order then would not have been thus exterminated. Abstention from injury to all creatures hath been said to be the highest of all virtues. The Brahmana is the root of that virtue. As regards thyself, again, thou art the foremost of all persons acquainted with Brahma. Slaying all those Mlecchas and other warriors, who, however, are all engaged in the proper avocations of their order, moved thereto by ignorance and folly, O Brahmana, and by the desire of wealth for benefiting sons and wives; indeed, for the sake of an only son, why dost thou not feel ashamed? He for whom thou hast taken up weapons, and for whom thou livest, he, deprived of life, lieth today on the field of battle, unknown to thee and behind thy back. King Yudhishtira the just hath told thee this. It behoveth thee not to doubt this fact.' Thus addressed by Bhima, Drona laid aside his bow. Desirous of laying aside all his weapons also, Bharadwaja's son of virtuous soul said aloud, 'O Karna, Karna, O great bowman, O Kripa, O Duryodhana, I tell you repeatedly, exert yourselves carefully in battle. Let no injury happen to you from the Pandayas. As regards myself, I lay aside my weapons.' Saying these words, he began loudly to take the name of Aswatthaman. Laying aside his weapons then in that battle, and sitting down on the terrace of his car, he devoted himself to Yoga and assured all creatures, dispelling their fears. Beholding that opportunity, Dhrishtadyumna mustered all his energy. Laying down on the car his formidable bow, with arrow fixed on the bow-string, he took up a sword, and jumping down from his vehicle, rushed quickly against Drona. All creatures, human beings and others, uttered exclamation of woe, beholding Drona thus brought under Dhrishta-dyumna's power. Loud cries of Oh and Alas were uttered, as also those of Oh and Fie. As regards Drona himself, abandoning his weapons, he was then in a supremely tranquil state. Having said those words he had devoted himself to Yoga. Endued with great effulgence and possessed of high ascetic merit, he had fixed his heart on that Supreme and Ancient Being, viz., Vishnu. Bending his face slightly down, and heaving his breast forward, and closing his eyes, and resting on the quality of goodness, and disposing his heart to contemplation, and thinking on the monosyllable Om, representing Brahma, and remembering the puissant, supreme, and indestructible God of gods, the radiant Drona or high ascetic merit, the preceptor (of the Kurus and the Pandavas) repaired to heaven that is so difficult of being attained even by the pious. Indeed, when Drona thus proceeded to heaven it seemed to us that there were then two suns in the firmament. The whole welkin was ablaze and seemed to be one vast expanse of equal light when the sun-like Bharadwaja, of solar effulgence, disappeared. Confused sounds of joy were heard, uttered by the delighted celestials. When Drona thus repaired to the region of Brahman, Dhrishtadyumna stood, unconscious of it all, beside him. Only we five amongst men beheld the high-souled Drona rapt in Yoga proceed to the highest region of blessedness. These five were myself, Dhananjaya, the son of Pritha, and Drona's son, Aswatthaman, and Vasudeva of Vishnu's race, and king Yudhishtira the just, the son of Pandu. Nobody else, O king, could see that glory of the wise Drona, devoted to Yoga, while passing out of the world. In fact, all human beings were unconscious of the fact that the preceptor attained to the supreme region of Brahman, a region mysterious to the very gods, and one that is the highest of all. Indeed, none of them could see the preceptor, that chastiser of foes, proceed to the region of Brahman, devoted to Yoga in the company of the foremost of Rishis, his body mangled with arrows and bathed in blood, after he had laid aside his weapons. As regards Prishata's son, though everybody cried fie on him, yet casting his eyes on the lifeless Drona's head, he began to drag it. With his sword, then, he lopped off from his foe's trunk that head,--his foe remained speechless the while. Having slain Bharadwaja's son, Dhrishtadyumna was filled with great joy, and uttered leonine shouts, whirling his sword. Of a dark complexion, with white locks hanging down to his ears, that old man of five and eighty years of age, used, for thy sake only, to career on the field of battle with the activity of a youth of sixteen. The mighty-armed Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti, (before Drona's head was cut off) had said, 'O son of Drupada, bring the preceptor alive, do not slay him. He should not be slain.' Even thus all the troops also had cried out. Arjuna, in particular, melted with pity, had cried out repeatedly. Disregarding, however, the cries of Arjuna as also these of all the kings, Dhrishtadyumna slew Drona, that bull among men, on the terrace of his car. Covered with Drona's blood, Dhrishtadyumna then jumped from the car down upon the ground. Looking red like the sun, he then seemed to be exceedingly fierce. Thy troops beheld Drona slain even thus in that battle. Then Dhrishtadyumna, that great bowman, O king, threw down that large head of Bharadwaja's son before the warriors of thy army. Thy soldiers, O monarch, beholding the head of Bharadwaja's son, set their hearts on flight and ran away in all directions. Meanwhile Drona, ascending the skies, entered the stellar path. Through the grace of the Rishis Krishna (Dwaipayana), the son of Satyawati, I witnessed, O king, the (true circumstances about the) death of Drona. I beheld that illustrious one proceeding, after he had ascended the sky, like a smokeless brand of blazing splendour. Upon the fall of Drona, the Kurus, the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, all became cheerless and ran away with great speed. The army then broke up. Many had been slain, and many wounded by means of keen shafts. Thy warriors (in particular), upon the fall of Drona, seemed to be deprived of life. Having sustained a defeat, and being inspired with fear about the future, the Kurus regarded themselves deprived of both the worlds. Indeed, they lost all self-control. I Searching for the body of Bharadwaja's son, O monarch, on the field covered with thousands of headless trunks, the kings could not find it. The Pandavas, having gained the victory and great prospects of renown in the future, began to make loud sounds with their arrows and conchs and uttered loud leonine roars. Then Bhimasena, O king, and Dhrishtadyumna, the son of Prishata, were seen in the midst of the (Pandava) host to embrace each other. Addressing the son of Prishata, that scorcher of foes, viz., Bhima said, 'I will again embrace thee, O son of Prishata, as one crowned with victory, when that wretch of a Suta's son shall be slain in battle, as also that other wretch, viz., Duryodhana.' Having said these words, Bhimasena, the son of Pandu, filled with transports of joy, caused the earth to tremble with slaps on his armpits. Terrified by that sound, thy troops ran away from battle, forgetting the duties of the Kshatriyas and setting their hearts on flight. The Pandavas, having become victors, became very glad, O monarch, and they felt great happiness, derived from the destruction of their foes in battle."

Battle of Kurukshetra: Karna

Section XC

"Sanjaya said, 'Flying away in consequence of the falling of Arjuna's arrows, the broken divisions of the Kauravas, staying at a distance, continued to gaze at Arjuna's weapon swelling with energy and careering around with the effulgence of lightning. Then Karna, with showers of terrible shafts, baffled that weapon of Arjuna while it was still careering in the welkin and which Arjuna had shot with great vigour in that fierce encounter for the destruction of his foe. Indeed, that weapon (of Partha) which, swelling with energy, had been consuming the Kurus, the Suta's son now crushed with his shafts winged with gold. Bending then his own loud-sounding bow of irrefragable string, Karna shot showers of shafts. The Suta's son destroyed that burning weapon of Arjuna with his own foe-killing weapon of great power which he had obtained from Rama, and which resembled (in efficacy) an Atharvan rite. And he pierced Partha also with numerous keen shafts. The encounter then, O king, that took place between Arjuna and the son of Adhiratha, became a very dreadful one. They continued to strike each other with arrows like two fierce elephants striking each other with their tusks. All the points of the compass then became shrouded with weapons and the very sun became invisible. Indeed, Karna and Partha, with their arrowy downpours, made the welkin one vast expanse of arrows without any space between. All the Kauravas and the Somakas then beheld a wide-spread arrowy net. In that dense darkness caused by arrows, they were unable to see anything else. Those two foremost of men, both accomplished in weapons, as they incessantly aimed and shot innumerable arrows, O king, displayed diverse kinds of beautiful manoeuvres. While they were thus contending with each other in battle, sometimes the Suta's son prevailed over his rival and sometimes the diadem-decked Partha prevailed over his, in prowess and weapons and lightness of hands. Beholding that terrible and awful passage-at-arms between those two heroes each of whom was desirous of availing himself of the other's lapses, all the other warriors on the field of battle became filled with wonder. The beings in the welkin, O king, applauded Karna and Arjuna. Indeed, many of them at a time, filled with joy, cheerfully shouted, sometimes saying, "Excellent, O Karna!" and sometimes saying, "Excellent, O Arjuna!" During the progress of that fierce encounter, while the earth was being pressed deep with the weight of cars and the tread of steeds and elephants, the snake Aswasena, who was hostile to Arjuna, was passing his time in the nether region. Freed from the conflagration at Khandava, O king, he had, from anger, penetrated through the earth (for going to the subterranean region). That brave snake, recollecting the death of his mother and the enmity he on that account harboured against Arjuna, now rose from the lower region. Endued with the power of ascending the skies, he soared up with great speed upon beholding that fight between Karna and Arjuna. Thinking that that was the time for gratifying his animosity towards, as he thought, the wicked-souled Partha, he quickly entered into Karna's quiver, O king, in the form of an arrow. At that time a net of arrows was seen, shedding its bright arrows around. Karna and Partha made the welkin one dense mass of arrows by means of their arrowy downpours. Beholding that wide-spread expanse of arrows, all the Kauravas and the Somakas became filled with fear. In that thick and awful darkness caused by arrows they were unable to see anything else. Then those two tigers among men, those two foremost of all bowmen in the world, those two heroes, fatigued with their exertions in battle, looked at each other. Both of them were then fanned with excellent and waving fans made of young (palm) leaves and sprinkled with fragrant sandal-water by many Apsaras staying in the welkin. And Sakra and Surya, using their hands, gently brushed the faces of those two heroes. When at last Karna found that he could not prevail over Partha and was exceedingly scorched with the shafts of the former, that hero, his limbs very much mangled, set his heart upon that shaft of his which lay singly within a quiver. The Suta's son then fixed on his bow-string that foe-killing, exceedingly keen, snake-mouthed, blazing, and fierce shaft, which had been polished according to rule, and which he had long kept for the sake of Partha's destruction. Stretching his bow-string to his ear, Karna fixed that shaft of fierce energy and blazing splendour, that ever-worshipped weapon which lay within a golden quiver amid sandal dust, and aimed it at Partha. Indeed, he aimed that blazing arrow, born in Airavata's race, for cutting off Phalgunas's head in battle. All the points of the compass and the welkin became ablaze and terrible meteors, and thunderbolts fell. When that snake of the form of an arrow was fixed on the bow-string, the Regents of the world, including Sakra, set up loud wails. The Suta's son did not know that the snake Aswasena had entered his arrow by the aid of his Yoga powers. Beholding Vaikartana aim that arrow, the high-souled ruler of the Madras, addressing Karna, said, "This arrow, O Karna, will not succeed in striking off Arjuna's head. Searching carefully, fix another arrow that may succeed in striking off thy enemy's head." Endued with great activity, the Suta's son, with eyes burning in wrath, then said unto the ruler of the Madras, "O Shalya, Karna never aimeth an arrow twice. Persons like us never become crooked warriors." Having said these words, Karna, with great care, let off that shaft which he had worshipped for many long years. Bent upon winning the victory, O king, he quickly said unto his rival, "Thou art slain, O Phalgunas!" Sped from Karna's arms, that shaft of awful whizz, resembling fire or the sun in splendour, as it left the bow-string, blazed up in the welkin and seemed to divide it by a line such as is visible on the crown of a woman dividing her tresses. Beholding that shaft blazing in the welkin, the slayer of Kamsa, Madhava, with great speed and the greatest ease, pressed down with his feet that excellent car, causing it to sink about a cubit deep. At this, the steeds, white as the rays of the moon and decked in trappings of gold, bending their knees, laid themselves down on the ground. Indeed, seeing that snake (in the form of an arrow) aimed by Karna, Madhava, that foremost of all persons endued with might, put forth his strength and thus pressed down with his feet that car into the earth, whereat the steeds, (as already said) bending down their knees, laid themselves down upon the earth when the car itself had sank into it. Then loud sounds arose in the welkin in applause of Vasudeva. Many celestial voices were heard, and celestial flowers were showered upon Krishna, and leonine shouts also were uttered. When the car had thus been pressed down into the earth through the exertions of the slayer of Madhu, the excellent ornament of Arjuna's head, celebrated throughout the earth, the welkin, heaven, and the waters, the Suta's son swept off from the crown of his rival, with that arrow, in consequence of the very nature of that snaky weapon and the great care and wrath with which it had been shot. That diadem, endued with the splendour of the sun or the moon or fire or a planet, and adorned with gold and pearls and gems and diamonds, had with great care been made by the puissant Self-born himself for Purandara. Costly as its appearance indicated, it was inspiring terror in the hearts of foes, contributing to the happiness of him that wore it, and shedding a fragrance, that ornament had been given by the chief of the celestials himself with a cheerful heart unto Partha while the latter had proceeded to slaughter the foes of the gods. That diadem was incapable of being crushed by Rudra and the Lord of waters and Kuvera with Pinaka and noose and thunderbolt and the very foremost of shafts. It could not be endured by even the foremost ones among the gods. Vrisha, however, now broke it forcibly with his snake-inspired shaft. Endued with great activity, that wicked-natured snake of fierce form and false vows, falling upon that diadem-decked with gold and gems, swept it away from Arjuna's head. That snake, O king, forcibly tore it away from Partha's head, quickly reducing into fragments that well-made ornament set over with many a gem and blazing with beauty, like the thunderbolt riving a mountain summit decked with lofty and beautiful trees graced with flowers. Crushed by that excellent weapon, possessed of splendour, and blazing with the fire of (the snake's) poison, that beautiful and much-liked diadem of Partha fell down on the earth like the blazing disc of the Sun from the Asta hills. Indeed, that snake forcibly swept away from Arjuna's head that diadem adorned with many gems, like the thunder of Indra felling a beautiful mountain summit adorned with lofty trees bearing budding leaves and flowers. And the earth, welkin, heaven, and the waters, when agitated by a tempest, roar aloud, O Bharata, even such was the roar that arose in all the worlds at that time. Hearing that tremendous noise, people, notwithstanding their efforts to be calm, became extremely agitated and reeled as they stood. Reft of diadem, the dark complexioned and youthful Partha looked beautiful like a blue mountain of lofty summit. Binding then his locks with a white cloth, Arjuna stood perfectly unmoved. With that white gear on his head, he looked like the Udaya hill illumined with the rays of the sun. Thus that she-snake (whom Arjuna had killed at Khandava) of excellent mouth, through her son in the form of an arrow, sped by Surya's son, beholding Arjuna of exceeding energy and might standing with his head at a level with the reins of the steeds, took away his diadem only, that well-made ornament (formerly) owned by Aditi's son and endued with the effulgence of Surya himself. But Arjuna also (as will appear in the sequel) did not return from that battle without causing the snake to succumb to the power of Yama. Sped from Karna's arms, that costly shaft resembling fire or the sun in effulgence, viz., that mighty snake who from before had become the deadly foe of Arjuna, thus crushing the latter's diadem, went away. Having burnt the gold-decked diadem of Arjuna displayed on his head, he desired to come to Arjuna once more with great speed. Asked, however, by Karna (who saw him but knew him not), he said these words, "Thou hadst sped me, O Karna, without having seen me. It was for this that I could not strike off Arjuna's head. Do thou quickly shoot me once again, after seeing me well. I shall then slay thy foe and mine too." Thus addressed in that battle by him, the Suta's son said, "Who are you possessed of such fierce form?" The snake answered, saying, "Know me as one that has been wronged by Partha. My enmity towards him is due to his having slain my mother. If the wielder of the thunderbolt himself were to protect Partha, the latter would still have to go to the domains of the king of the pitris. Do not disregard me. Do my bidding. I will slay thy foe. Shoot me without delay." Hearing those words, Karna said, "Karna, O snake, never desires to have victory in battle today by relying on another's might. Even if I have to slay a hundred Arjunas, I will not, O snake, still shoot the same shaft twice." Once more addressing him in the midst of battle, that best of men, viz., Surya's son, Karna, said, "Aided by the nature of my other snaky weapons, and by resolute effort and wrath, I shall slay Partha. Be thou happy and go elsewhere." Thus addressed, in battle, by Karna, that prince of snakes, unable from rage to bear those words, himself proceeded, O king, for the slaughter of Partha, having assumed the form of an arrow. Of fierce form, the desire he ardently cherished was the destruction of his enemy. Then Krishna, addressing Partha in that encounter, said into him, "Slay that great snake inimical to thee." Thus addressed by the slayer of Madhu, the wielder of Gandiva, that bowman who was always fierce unto foes, enquired of him, saying, "Who is that snake that advanceth of his own accord against me, as if, indeed he advanceth right against the mouth of Garuda?" Krishna replied, "Whilst thou, armed with bow, wert engaged at Khandava in gratifying the god Agni, this snake was then in the sky, his body ensconced within his mother's. Thinking that it was only a single snake that was so staying in the sky, thou killedest the mother. Remembering that act of hostility done by thee, he cometh towards thee today for thy destruction. O resister of foes, behold him coming like a blazing meteor, falling from the firmament!"

"Sanjaya continued, "Then Jishnu, turning his face in rage, cut off, with six keen shafts, that snake in the welkin as the latter was coursing in a slanting direction. His body thus cut off, he fell down on the earth. After that snake had been cut off by Arjuna, the lord Keshava himself, O king, of massive arms, that foremost of beings, raised up with his arms that car from the earth. At that time, Karna, glancing obliquely at Dhananjaya, pierced that foremost of persons, viz., Krishna, with ten shafts whetted on stone and equipped with peacock feathers. Then Dhananjaya, piercing Karna with a dozen well-shot and keen arrows equipped with heads like the boar's ear, sped a cloth-yard shaft endued with the energy of a snake of virulent poison and shot from his bow-string stretched to his ear. That foremost of shafts, well shot by Arjuna, penetrated through Karna's armour, and as if suspending his life breaths, drank his blood and entered the earth, its wings also having been drenched with gore. Endued with great activity, Vrisha, enraged at the stroke of the shaft, like a snake beaten with stick, shot many mighty shafts, like snakes of virulent poison vomiting venom. And he pierced Janardana with a dozen shafts and Arjuna with nine and ninety. And once more piercing the son of Pandu with a terrible shaft, Karna laughed and uttered a loud roar. The son of Pandu, however, could not endure his enemy's joy. Acquainted with all the vital parts of the human body, Partha, possessed of prowess like that of Indra, pierced those vital limbs with hundreds of arrows even as Indra had struck Vala with great energy. Then Arjuna sped ninety arrows, each resembling the rod of Death at Karna. Deeply pierced with those shafts, Karna trembled like a mountain riven with thunder. The head-gear of Karna, adorned with costly gems and precious diamonds and pure gold, as also his earrings, cut off by Dhananjaya with his winged arrows, fell down on the earth. The costly and bright armour also of the Suta's son that had been forged with great care by many foremost of artists working for a long time, the son of Pandu cut off within a moment in many fragments. After thus divesting him of his armour, Partha then, in rage, pierced Karna with four whetted shafts of great energy. Struck forcibly by his foe, Karna suffered great pain like a diseased person afflicted by bile, phlegm, wind, and fever. Once more Arjuna, with great speed, mangled Karna, piercing his very vitals, with numerous excellent shafts, of great keenness, and sped from his circling bow with much force and speed and care. Deeply struck by Partha with those diverse arrows of keen points and fierce energy, Karna (covered with blood) looked resplendent like a mountain of red chalk with streams of red water running adown its breast. Once more Arjuna pierced Karna in the centre of the chest with many straight-coursing and strong shafts made entirely of iron and equipped with wings of gold and each resembling the fiery rod of the Destroyer, like the son of Agni piercing the Krauncha mountains. Then the Suta's son, casting aside his bow that resembled the very bow of Sakra, as also his quiver, felt great pain, and stood inactive, stupefied, and reeling, his grasp loosened and himself in great anguish. The virtuous Arjuna, observant of the duty of manliness, wished not to slay his enemy while fallen into such distress. The younger brother of Indra then, with great excitement, addressed him, saying, "Why, O son of Pandu, dost thou become so forgetful? They that are truly wise never spare their foes, however weak, even for a moment. He that is learned earneth both merit and fame by slaying foes fallen into distress. Lose no time in precipitately crushing Karna who is always inimical to thee and who is the first of heroes. The Suta's son, when able, will once more advance against thee as before. Slay him, therefore, like Indra slaying the Asura Namuci." Saying, "So be it, O Krishna!" and worshipping Janardana, Arjuna, that foremost of all persons in Kuru's race once more quickly pierced Karna with many excellent arrows like the ruler of heaven, piercing the Asura, Samvara. The diadem-decked Partha, O Bharata, covered Karna and his car and steeds with many calf-toothed arrows, and putting forth all his vigour he shrouded all the points of the compass with shafts equipped with wings of gold. Pierced with those arrows equipped with heads like the calf's tooth, Adhiratha's son of broad chest looked resplendent like an Asoka or Palasa or Salmali decked with its flowery load or a mountain overgrown with a forest of sandal trees. Indeed, with those numerous arrows sticking to his body, Karna, O monarch, in that battle, looked resplendent like the prince of mountains with its top and glens overgrown with trees or decked with flowering Karnikaras. Karna also shooting repeated showers of arrows, looked, with those arrows constituting his rays, like the sun coursing towards the Asta hills, with disc bright with crimson rays. Shafts, however, of keen points, sped from Arjuna's arms, encountering in the welkin the blazing arrows, resembling mighty snakes, sped from the arms of Adhiratha's son, destroyed them all. Recovering his coolness, and shooting many shafts that resembled angry snakes, Karna then pierced Partha with ten shafts and Krishna with half a dozen, each of which looked like an angry snake. Then Dhananjaya desired to shoot a mighty and terrible arrow, made wholly of iron, resembling the poison of snake or fire in energy, and whose whizz resembling the peal of Indra's thunder, and which was inspired with the force of a high (celestial) weapon. At that time, when the hour of Karna's death had come, Kala, approaching invisibly, and alluding to the Brahmana's curse, and desirous of informing Karna that his death was near, told him, "The Earth is devouring thy wheel!" Indeed, O foremost of men, when the hour of Karna's death came, the high brahmastra that the illustrious Bhargava had imparted unto him, escaped from his memory. And the earth also began to devour the left wheel of his car. Then in consequence of the curse of that foremost of Brahmanas, Karna's car began to reel, having sunk deep into the earth and having been transfixed at that spot like a sacred tree with its load of flowers standing upon an elevated platform. When his car began to reel from the curse of the Brahmana, and when the high weapon he had obtained from Rama no longer shone in him through inward light, and when his terrible snake-mouthed shaft also had been cut off by Partha, Karna became filled with melancholy. Unable to endure all those calamities, he waved his arms and began to rail at righteousness saying, "They that are conversant with righteousness always say that righteousness protects those that are righteous. As regards ourselves, we always endeavour, to the best of our ability and knowledge to practise righteousness. That righteousness, however, is destroying us now instead of protecting us that are devoted to it. I, therefore, think that righteousness does not always protect its worshippers.” While saying these words, he became exceedingly agitated by the strokes of Arjuna’s arrows. His steeds and his driver also were displaced from their usual position. His very vitals having been struck, he became indifferent as to what he did, and repeatedly railed at righteousness in that battle. He then pierced Krishna in the arm with three terrible arrows, and Partha, too, with seven. Then Arjuna sped seven and ten terrible arrows, perfectly straight and of fierce impetuosity, resembling fire in splendour and like unto Indra’s thunder in force. Endued with awful impetuosity, those arrows pierced Karna and passing out of his body fell upon the surface of the earth. Trembling at the shock, Karna then displayed his activity to the utmost of his power. Steadying himself by a powerful effort he invoked the brahmastra. Beholding the brahmastra, Arjuna invoked the Aindra weapon with proper mantras. Inspiring gandiva, its string, and his shafts also, with mantras, that scorcher of foes poured showers like Purandara pouring rain in torrents. Those arrows endued with great energy and power, issuing out of Partha’s car, were seen to be displayed in the vicinity of Karna’s vehicle. The mighty car-warrior Karna baffled all those shafts displayed in his front. Seeing that weapon thus destroyed, the Vrishni hero, addressing Arjuna, said, “Shoot high weapons, O Partha! The son of Radha baffles thy shafts.” With proper mantras, Arjuna then fixed the brahmastra on his string, and shrouding all the points of the compass with arrows, Partha struck Karna (with many) arrows. Then Karna, with a number of whetted shafts endued with great energy, cut off the string of Arjuna’s bow. Similarly he cut off the second string, and then the third, and then the fourth, and then the fifth. The sixth also was cut off by Vrisha, and then the seventh, then the eighth, then the ninth, then the tenth, and then at last the eleventh. Capable of shooting hundreds upon hundreds of arrows, Karna knew not that Partha had a hundred strings to his bow. Tying another string to his bow and shooting many arrows, the son of Pandu covered Karna with shafts that resembled snakes of blazing mouths. So quickly did Arjuna replace each broken string that Karna could not mark when it was broken and when replaced. The feat seemed to him to be exceedingly wonderful. The son of Radha baffled with his own weapons those of Savyasaci. Displaying also his own prowess, he seemed to get the better of Dhananjaya at that time. Then Krishna, beholding Arjuna afflicted with the weapons of Karna, said these words unto Partha: “Approaching Karna, strike him with superior weapons.” Then Dhananjaya, filled with rage, inspiring with mantras another celestial weapons that looked like fire and that resembled the poison of the snake and that was as hard as the essence of adamant, and uniting the Raudra weapon with it, became desirous of shooting it at his foe. At that time, O king, the earth swallowed up one of wheels of Karna’s car. Quickly alighting then from his vehicle, he seized his sunken wheel with his two arms and endeavoured to lift it up with a great effort. Drawn up with force by Karna, the earth, which had swallowed up his wheel, rose up to a height of four fingers’ breadth, with her seven islands and her hills and waters and forests. Seeing his wheel swallowed, the son of Radha shed tears from wrath, and beholding Arjuna, filled with rage he said these words, “O Partha, O Partha, wait for a moment, that is, till I lift this sunken wheel. Beholding, O Partha, the left wheel of my car swallowed through accident by the earth, abandon (instead of cherishing) this purpose (of striking and slaying me) that is capable of being harboured by only a coward. Brave warriors that are observant of the practices of the righteous, never shoot their weapons at persons with dishevelled hair, or at those that have turned their faces from battle, or at a Brahmana, or at him who joins his palms, or at him who yields himself up or beggeth for quarter or at one who has put up his weapon, or at one whose arrows are exhausted, or at one whose armour is displaced, or at one whose weapon has fallen off or been broken! Thou art the bravest of men in the world. Thou art also of righteous behaviour, O son of Pandu! Thou art well-acquainted with the rules of battle. For these reasons, excuse me for a moment, that is, till I extricate my wheel, O Dhananjaya, from the earth. Thyself staying on thy car and myself standing weak and languid on the earth, it behoveth thee not to slay me now. Neither Vasudeva, nor thou, O son of Pandu, inspire me with the slightest fear. Thou art born in the Kshatriya order. Thou art the perpetuator of a high race. Recollecting the teachings of righteousness, excuse me for a moment, O son of Pandu!””

“Sanjaya said, “Then Vasudeva, stationed on the car, addressed Karna, saying, “By good luck it is, O son of Radha, that thou rememberest virtue! It is generally seen that they that are mean, when they sink into distress, rail at Providence but never at their own misdeeds. Thyself and Suyodhana and Duhshasana and Shakuni, the son of Subala, had caused Draupadi, clad in a single piece of raiment, to be brought into the midst of the assembly. On that occasion, O Karna, this virtue of thine did not manifest itself. When at the assembly Shakuni, an adept in dice, vanquished Kunti’s son Yudhishtira who was unacquainted with it, whither had this virtue of thine gone? When the Kuru king (Duryodhana), acting under thy counsels, treated Bhimasena in that way with the aid of snakes and poisoned food, whither had this virtue of thine then gone? When the period of exile into the woods was over as also the thirteenth year, thou didst not make over to the Pandavas their kingdom. Whither had this virtue of thine then gone? Thou didst set fire to the house of lac at Varanavata for burning to death the sleeping Pandavas. Whither then, O son of Radha, had this virtue of thine gone? Thou laughedest at Krishna while she stood in the midst of the assembly, scantily dressed because in her season and obedient to Duhshasana's will, whither, then, O Karna, had this virtue of thine gone? When from the apartment reserved for the females innocent Krishna was dragged, thou didst not interfere. Whither, O son of Radha, had this virtue of thine gone? Thyself addressing the princess Draupadi, that lady whose tread is as dignified as that of the elephant, in these words, viz., 'The Pandavas, O Krishna, are lost. They have sunk into eternal hell. Do thou choose another husband!' thou lookedest on the scene with delight. Whither then, O Karna, had this virtue of thine gone? Covetous of kingdom and relying on the ruler of the Gandharvas, thou summonedest the Pandavas (to a match of dice). Whither then had this virtue of thine gone? When many mighty car-warriors, encompassing the boy Abhimanyu in battle, slew him, whither had this virtue of thine then gone? If this virtue that thou now invokest was nowhere on those occasions, what is the use then of parching thy palate now, by uttering that word? Thou art now for the practice of virtue, O Suta, but thou shalt not escape with life. Like Nala who was defeated by Pushkara with the aid of dice but who regained his kingdom by prowess, the Pandavas, who are free from cupidity, will recover their kingdom by the prowess of their arms, aided with all their friends. Having slain in battle their powerful foes, they, with the Somakas, will recover their kingdom. The Dhartarashtras will meet with destruction at the hands of those lions among men (viz., the sons of Pandu), that are always protected by virtue!"

"Sanjaya continued, 'Thus addressed, O Bharata, by Vasudeva, Karna hung down his head in shame and gave no answer. With lips quivering in rage, he raised his bow, O Bharata, and, being endued with great energy and prowess, he continued to fight with Partha. Then Vasudeva, addressing Phalguna, that bull among men, said, "O thou of great might, piercing Karna with a celestial weapon, throw him down." Thus addressed by the holy one, Arjuna became filled with rage. Indeed, remembering the incidents alluded to by Krishna, Dhananjaya blazed up with fury. Then, O king, blazing flames of fire seemed to emanate from all the pores of the angry Partha's body. The sight seemed to be exceedingly wonderful. Beholding it, Karna, invoking the brahmastra, showered his shafts upon Dhananjaya, and once more made an effort to extricate his car. Partha also, by the aid of the brahmastra, poured arrowy downpours upon Karna. Baffling with his own weapon the weapon of his foe, the son of Pandu continued to strike him. The son of Kunti then, aiming at Karna sped another favourite weapon of his that was inspired with the energy of Agni. Sped by Arjuna, that weapon blazed up with its own energy. Karna, however, quenched that conflagration with the Varuna weapon. The Suta's son also, by the clouds he created, caused all the points of the compass to be shrouded with a darkness such as may be seen on a rainy day. The son of Pandu, endued with great energy, fearlessly dispelled those clouds by means of the Vayavya weapon in the very sight of Karna. The Suta's son then, for slaying the son of Pandu, took up a terrible arrow blazing like fire. When that adored shaft was fixed on the bow-string, the earth, O king, trembled with her mountains and waters and forests. Violent winds began to blow, bearing hard pebbles. All the points of the compass became enveloped with dust. Wails of grief, O Bharata, arose among the gods in the welkin. Beholding that shaft aimed by the Suta's son, O sire, the Pandavas, with cheerless hearts, gave themselves up to great sorrow. That shaft of keen point and endued with the effulgence of Sakra's thunder, sped from Karna's arms, fell upon Dhananjaya's chest and penetrated it like a mighty snake penetrating an ant-hill. That grinder of foes, viz., the high-souled Vibhatsu, thus deeply pierced in that encounter, began to reel. His grasp became loosened, at which his bow Gandiva dropped from his hand. He trembled like the prince of mountains in an earthquake. Availing himself of that opportunity, the mighty car-warrior Vrisha, desirous of extricating his car-wheel that had been swallowed up by the earth, jumped down from his vehicle. Seizing the wheel with his two arms he endeavoured to drag it up, but though possessed of great strength, he failed in his efforts, as destiny would have it. Meanwhile the diadem-decked and high-souled Arjuna, recovering his senses, took up a shaft, fatal as the rod of Death, and called anjalika. Then Vasudeva, addressing Partha, said, "Cut off with thy arrow the head of this enemy of thine, viz., Vrisha, before he succeeds in getting upon his car." Applauding those words of the lord Vasudeva, and while the wheel of his enemy was still sunk, the mighty car-warrior Arjuna took up a razor-headed arrow of blazing effulgence and struck the standard (of Karna) bearing the elephant's rope and bright as the spotless sun. That standard bearing the device of the costly elephant's rope, was adorned with gold and pearls and gems and diamonds, and forged with care by foremost of artists excelling in knowledge, and possessed of great beauty, and variegated with pure gold. That standard always used to fill thy troops with high courage and the enemy with fear. Its form commanded applause. Celebrated over the whole world, it resembled the sun in splendour. Indeed, its effulgence was like that of fire or the sun or the moon. The diadem-decked Arjuna, with that razor-headed shaft, exceedingly sharp, equipped with wings of gold, possessed of the splendour of fire when fed with libations of clarified butter, and blazing with beauty, cut off that standard of Adhiratha's son, that great car-warrior. With that standard, as it fell, the fame, pride, hope of victory, and everything dear, as also the hearts of the Kurus, fell, and loud wails of "Oh!" and "Alas!" arose (from the Kuru army). Beholding that standard cut off and thrown down by that hero of Kuru's race possessed of great lightness of hand, thy troops, O Bharata, were no longer hopeful of Karna's victory. Hastening then for Karna's destruction, Partha took out from his quiver an excellent Anjalika weapon that resembled the thunder of Indra or the rod of fire and that was possessed of the effulgence of the thousand-rayed Sun. Capable of penetrating the very vitals, besmeared with blood and flesh, resembling fire or the sun, made of costly materials, destructive of men, steeds, and elephants, of straight course and fierce impetuosity, it measured three cubits and six feet. Endued with the force of the thousand-eyed Indra's thunder, irresistible as Rakshasas in the night, resembling Pinaka or Narayana's discus, it was exceedingly terrible and destructive of all living creatures. Partha cheerfully took up that great weapon, in the shape of an arrow, which could not be resisted by the very gods, that high-souled being which was always adored by the son of Pandu, and which was capable of vanquishing the very gods and the Asuras. Beholding that shaft grasped by Partha in that battle, the entire universe shook with its mobile and immobile creatures. Indeed, seeing that weapon raised (for being sped) in that dreadful battle, the Rishis loudly cried out, "Peace be to the universe!" The wielder of Gandiva then fixed on his bow that unrivalled arrow, uniting it with a high and mighty weapon. Drawing his bow Gandiva, he quickly said, "Let this shaft of mine be like a mighty weapon capable of quickly destroying the body and heart of my enemy, if I have ever practised ascetic austerities, gratified my superiors, and listened to the counsels of well-wishers. Let this shaft, worshipped by me and possessed of great sharpness, slay my enemy Karna by that Truth." Having said these words Dhananjaya let off that terrible shaft for the destruction of Karna, that arrow fierce and efficacious as a rite prescribed in the Atharvan of Angiras, blazing with effulgence, and incapable of being endured by Death himself in battle. And the diadem-decked Partha, desirous of slaying Karna, with great cheerfulness, said, "Let this shaft conduce to my victory. Shot by me, let this arrow possessed of the splendour of fire or the sun take Karna to the presence of Yama." Saying these words, Arjuna, decked with diadem and garlands, cherishing feelings of hostility towards Karna and desirous of slaying him, cheerfully struck his foe with that foremost of shafts which was possessed of the splendour of the sun or the moon and capable of bestowing victory. Thus sped by that mighty warrior, that shaft endued with the energy of the sun caused all the points of the compass to blaze up with light. With that weapon Arjuna struck off his enemy's head like Indra striking off the head of Vritra with his thunder. Indeed, O king, with that excellent Anjalika weapon inspired with mantras into a mighty weapon, the son of Indra cut off the head of Vaikartana in the afternoon. Thus cut off with that Anjalika, the trunk of Karna fell down on the earth. The head also of that commander of the (Kaurava) army, endued with splendour equal to that of the risen sun and resembling the meridian sun of autumn, fell down on the earth like the sun of bloody disc dropped down from the Asta hills. Indeed, that head abandoned with great unwillingness the body, exceedingly beautiful and always nursed in luxury, of Karna of noble deeds, like an owner abandoning with great unwillingness his commodious mansion filled with great wealth. Cut off with Arjuna's arrow, and deprived of life, the tall trunk of Karna endued with great splendour, with blood issuing from every wound, fell down like the thunder-riven summit of a mountain of red chalk with crimson streams running down its sides after a shower. Then from that body of the fallen Karna a light passing through the welkin penetrated the sun. This wonderful sight, O king, was beheld by the human warriors after the fall of Karna. Then the Pandavas, beholding Karna slain by Phalgunna, loudly blew their conchs. Similarly, Krishna and Dhananjaya also, filled with delight, and losing no time, blew their conchs. The Somakas beholding Karna slain and lying on the field, were filled with joy and uttered loud shouts with the other troops (of the Pandava army). In great delight they blew their trumpets and waved their arms and garments. All the warriors, O king, approaching Partha, began to applaud him joyfully. Others, possessed of might, danced, embracing each other, and uttering loud shouts, said, "By good luck, Karna hath been stretched on the earth and mangled with arrows." Indeed, the severed head of Karna looked beautiful like a mountain summit loosened by a tempest, or a quenched fire after the sacrifice is over, or the image of the sun after it has reached the Asta hills. The Karna-sun, with arrows for its rays, after having scorched the hostile army, was at last caused to be set by the mighty Arjuna-time. As the Sun, while proceeding towards the Asta hills, retires taking away with him all his rays, even so that shaft (of Arjuna) passed out, taking with it Karna's life breaths. The death hour of the Suta's son, O sire, was the afternoon of that day. Cut off with the Anjalika weapon in that battle, the head of Karna fell down along with his body. Indeed, that arrow of Arjuna, in the very sight of the Kaurava troops, quickly took away the head and the body of Karna. Beholding the heroic Karna thrown down stretched on the earth, pierced with arrows and bathed in blood, the king of the Madras, went away on that car deprived of its standard. After the fall of Karna, the Kauravas, deeply pierced with shafts in that battle, and afflicted with fear, fled away from the field, frequently casting their eyes on that lofty standard of Arjuna that blazed with splendour. The beautiful head, graced with a face that resembled a lotus of a 1,000 petals, of Karna whose feats were like those of the thousand-eyed Indra, fell down on the earth like the thousand-rayed sun as he looks at the close of day."

End of Reign

Section I

Om! Having bowed down unto Narayana, and to Nara, the foremost of men, as also to the goddess Sarasvati, should the word "Jaya" be uttered.

Janamejaya said: "Having heard of that encounter with iron bolts between the heroes of the Vrishni and the Andhaka races, and having been informed also of Krishna's ascension to Heaven, what did the Pandavas do?"

Vaishampayana said: "Having heard the particulars of the great slaughter of the Vrishnis, the Kaurava king set his heart on leaving the world. He addressed Arjuna, saying, 'O thou of great intelligence, it is Time that cooks every creature (in his cauldron). I think that what has happened is due to the cords of Time (with which he binds us all). It behoveth thee also to see it.'

"Thus addressed by his brother, the son of Kunti only repeated the word 'Time, Time!' and fully endorsed the view of his eldest brother gifted with great intelligence. Ascertaining the resolution of Arjuna, Bhimasena and the twins fully endorsed the words that Arjuna had said. Resolved to retire from the world for earning merit, they brought Yuyutsu before them. Yudhishtira made over the kingdom to the son of his uncle by his Vaisya wife. Installing Parikshit also on their throne, as king, the eldest brother of the Pandavas, filled with sorrow, addressed Subhadra, saying, 'This son of thy son will be the king of the Kurus. The survivor of the Yadus, Vajra, has been made a king. Parikshit will rule in Hastinapura, while the Yadava prince, Vajra, will rule in Shakraprastha. He should be protected by thee. Never set thy heart on unrighteousness.'

"Having said these words, king Yudhishtira the just, along with his brothers, promptly offered oblations of water unto Vasudeva of great intelligence, as also unto his old maternal uncle and Rama and others. He then duly performed the Sraddhas of all those deceased kinsmen of his. The king, in honour of Hari and naming him repeatedly, fed the Island-born Vyasa, and Narada, and Markandeya possessed of wealth of penances, and Yajnavalkya of Bharadwaja's race, with many delicious viands. In honour of Krishna, he also gave away many jewels and gems, and robes and clothes, and villages, and horses and cars, and female slaves by hundreds and thousands unto foremost of Brahmanas. Summoning the citizens. Kripa was installed as the preceptor and Parikshit was made over to him as his disciple, O chief of Bharata's race.

"Then Yudhishtira once more summoned all his subjects. The royal sage informed them of his intentions. The citizens and the inhabitants of the provinces, hearing the king's words, became filled with anxiety and disapproved of them. 'This should never be done,' said they unto the king. The monarch, well versed with the changes brought about by time, did not listen to their counsels. Possessed of righteous soul, he persuaded the people to sanction his views. He then set his heart on leaving the world. His brothers also formed the same resolution. Then Dharma's son, Yudhishtira, the king of the Kurus, casting off his ornaments, wore barks of trees. Bhima and Arjuna and the twins, and Draupadi also of great fame, similarly clad themselves in bark of trees, O king. Having caused the preliminary rites of religion, O chief of Bharata's race, which were to bless them in the accomplishment of their design, those foremost of men cast off their sacred fires into the water. The ladies, beholding the princes in that guise, wept aloud. They seemed to look as they had looked in days before, when with Draupadi forming the sixth in number they set out from the capital after their defeat at dice. The brothers, however, were all very cheerful at the prospect of retirement. Ascertaining the intentions of Yudhishtira and seeing the destruction of the Vrishnis, no other course of action could please them then.

"The five brothers, with Draupadi forming the sixth, and a dog forming the seventh, set out on their journey. Indeed, even thus did king Yudhishtira depart, himself the head of a party of seven, from the city named after the elephant. The citizen and the ladies of the royal household followed them for some distance. None of them, however, could venture to address the king for persuading him to give up his intention. The denizens of the city then returned; Kripa and others stood around Yuyutsu as their centre. Ulupi, the daughter of the Naga chief, O thou of Kunti's race, entered the waters of Ganga. The princess Chitrangada set out for the capital of Manipura. The other ladies who were the grandmothers of Parikshit centered around him. Meanwhile the high-souled Pandavas, O thou of Kuru's race, and Draupadi of great fame, having observed the preliminary fast, set out with their faces towards the east. Setting themselves on Yoga, those high-souled ones, resolved to observe the religion of Renunciation, traversed through various countries and reached diverse rivers and seas. Yudhishtira, proceeded first. Behind him was Bhima; next walked Arjuna; after him were the twins in the order of their birth; behind them all, O foremost one of Bharata's race, proceeded Draupadi, that first of women, possessed of great beauty, of dark complexion, and endowed with eyes resembling lotus petals. While the Pandavas set out for the forest, a dog followed them.

"Proceeding on, those heroes reached the sea of red waters. Dhananjaya had not cast off his celestial bow Gandiva, nor his couple of inexhaustible quivers, actuated, O king, by the cupidity that attaches one to things of great value. The Pandavas there beheld the deity of fire standing before them like a hill. Closing their way, the god stood there in his embodied form. The deity of seven flames then addressed the Pandavas, saying, 'Ye heroic sons of Pandu, know me for the deity of fire. O mighty-armed Yudhishtira, O Bhimasena that art a scorcher of foes, O Arjuna, and ye twins of great courage, listen to what I say! Ye foremost ones of Kuru's race, I am the god of fire. The forest of Khandava was burnt by me, through the puissance of Arjuna and of Narayana himself. Let your brother Phalgunas proceed to the woods after casting off Gandiva, that high weapon. He has no longer any need of it. That precious discus, which was with the high-souled Krishna, has disappeared (from the world). When the time again comes, it will come back into his hands. This foremost of bows, Gandiva, was procured by me from Varuna for the use of Partha. Let it be made over to Varuna himself.

“At this, all the brothers urged Dhananjaya to do what the deity said. He then threw into the waters (of the sea) both the bow and the couple of inexhaustible quivers. After this, O chief of Bharata’s race, the god of the fire disappeared then and there. The heroic sons of Pandu next proceeded with their faces turned towards the south. Then, by the northern coast of the salt sea, those princes of Bharata’s race proceeded to the south-west. Turning next towards the west, they beheld the city of Dwaraka covered by the ocean. Turning next to the north, those foremost ones proceeded on. Observant of Yoga, they were desirous of making a round of the whole Earth.”

Section II

Vaishampayana said: “Those princes of restrained souls and devoted to Yoga, proceeding to the north, beheld Himavat, that very large mountain. Crossing the Himavat, they beheld a vast desert of sand. They then saw the mighty mountain Meru, the foremost of all high-peaked mountains. As those mighty ones were proceeding quickly, all rapt in Yoga, Yajnaseni, falling of from Yoga, dropped down on the Earth. Beholding her fallen down, Bhimasena of great strength addressed king Yudhishtira the just, saying, ‘O scorcher of foes, this princess never did any sinful act. Tell us what the cause is for which Krishna has fallen down on the Earth!’

“Yudhishtira said: ‘O best of men, though we were all equal unto her she had great partiality for Dhananjaya. She obtains the fruit of that conduct today, O best of men.’”

Vaishampayana continued: “Having said this, that foremost one of Bharata’s race proceeded on. Of righteous soul, that foremost of men, endued with great intelligence, went on, with mind intent on itself. Then Sahadeva of great learning fell down on the Earth. Beholding him drop down, Bhima addressed the king, saying, ‘He who with great humility used to serve us all, alas, why is that son of Madravati fallen down on the Earth?’

“Yudhishtira said, ‘He never thought anybody his equal in wisdom. It is for that fault that this prince has fallen down.’

Vaishampayana continued: “Having said this, the king proceeded, leaving Sahadeva there. Indeed, Kunti’s son Yudhishtira went on, with his brothers and with the dog. Beholding both Krishna and the Pandava Sahadeva fallen down, the brave Nakula, whose love for kinsmen was very great, fell down himself. Upon the falling down of the heroic Nakula of great personal beauty, Bhima once more addressed the king, saying, ‘This brother of ours who was endued with righteousness without incompleteness, and who always obeyed our behests, this Nakula who was unrivalled for beauty, has fallen down.’

“Thus addressed by Bhimasena, Yudhishtira, said, with respect to Nakula, these words: ‘He was of righteous soul and the foremost of all persons endued with intelligence. He, however, thought that there was nobody that equalled him in beauty of person. Indeed, he regarded himself as superior to all in that respect. It is for this that Nakula has fallen down. Know this, O Vrikodara. What has been ordained for a person, O hero, must have to be endured by him.’

“Beholding Nakula and the others fall down, Pandu’s son Arjuna of white steeds, that slayer of hostile heroes, fell down in great grief of heart. When that foremost of men, who was endued with the energy of Shakra, had fallen down, indeed, when that invincible hero was on the point of death, Bhima said unto the king, ‘I do not recollect any untruth uttered by this high-souled one. Indeed, not even in jest did he say anything false. What then is that for whose evil consequence this one has fallen down on the Earth?’

“Yudhishtira said, ‘Arjuna had said that he would consume all our foes in a single day. Proud of his heroism, he did not, however, accomplish what he had said. Hence has he fallen down. This Phalguna disregarded all wielders of bows. One desirous of prosperity should never indulge in such sentiments.’”

Vaishampayana continued: “Having said so, the king proceeded on. Then Bhima fell down. Having fallen down, Bhima addressed king Yudhishtira the just, saying, ‘O king, behold, I who am thy darling have fallen down. For what reason have I dropped down? Tell me if thou knowest it.’

“Yudhishtira said, ‘Thou wert a great eater, and thou didst use to boast of thy strength. Thou never didst attend, O Bhima, to the wants of others while eating. It is for that, O Bhima, that thou hast fallen down.’

“Having said these words, the mighty-armed Yudhishtira proceeded on, without looking back. He had only one companion, the dog of which I have repeatedly spoken to thee, that followed him now.

Section III

Vaishampayana said: “Then Shakra, causing the firmament and the Earth to be filled by a loud sound, came to the son of Pritha on a car and asked him to ascend it. Beholding his brothers fallen on the Earth, king Yudhishtira the just said unto that deity of a 1,000 eyes these words: ‘My brothers have all dropped down here. They must go with me. Without them by me I do not wish to go to Heaven, O lord of all the deities. The delicate princess (Draupadi) deserving of every comfort, O Purandara, should go with us. It behoveth thee to permit this.’

“Shakra said, ‘Thou shalt behold thy brothers in Heaven. They have reached it before thee. Indeed, thou shalt see all of them there, with Krishna. Do not yield to grief, O chief of the Bharatas. Having cast off their human bodies they have gone there, O chief of Bharata’s race. As regards thee, it is ordained that thou shalt go thither in this very body of thine.’

“Yudhishtira said, ‘This dog, O lord of the Past and the Present, is exceedingly devoted to me. He should go with me. My heart is full of compassion for him.’

“Shakra said, ‘Immortality and a condition equal to mine, O king, prosperity extending in all directions, and high success, and all the felicities of Heaven, thou hast won today. Do thou cast off this dog. In this there will be no cruelty.’

“Yudhishtira said, ‘O thou of a 1,000 eyes. O thou that art of righteous behaviour, it is exceedingly difficult for one that is of righteous behaviour to perpetrate an act that is unrighteous. I do not desire that union with prosperity for which I shall have to cast off one that is devoted to me.’

“Indra said, ‘There is no place in Heaven for persons with dogs. Besides, the (deities called) Krodhavasas take away all the merits of such persons. Reflecting on this, act, O king Yudhishtira the just. Do thou abandon this dog. There is no cruelty in this.’

“Yudhishtira said, ‘It has been said that the abandonment of one that is devoted is infinitely sinful. It is equal to the sin that one incurs by slaying a Brahmana. Hence, O great Indra, I shall not abandon this dog today from desire of my happiness. Even this is my vow steadily pursued, that I never give up a person that is terrified, nor one that is devoted to me, nor one that seeks my protection, saying that he is destitute, nor one that is afflicted, nor one that has come to me, nor one that is weak in protecting oneself, nor one that is solicitous of life. I shall never give up such a one till my own life is at an end.’

“Indra said, ‘Whatever gifts, or sacrifices spread out, or libations poured on the sacred fire, are seen by a dog, are taken away by the Krodhavasas. Do thou, therefore, abandon this dog. By abandoning this dog thou wilt attain to the region of the deities. Having abandoned thy brothers and Krishna, thou hast, O hero, acquired a region of felicity by thy own deeds. Why art thou so stupefied? Thou hast renounced everything. Why then dost thou not renounce this dog?’ “Yudhishtira said, ‘This is well known in all the worlds that there is neither friendship nor enmity with those that are dead. When my brothers and Krishna died, I was unable to revive them. Hence it was that I abandoned them. I did not, however, abandon them as long as they were alive. To frighten one that has sought protection, the slaying of a woman, the theft of what belongs to a Brahmana, and injuring a friend, each of these four, O Shakra, is I think equal to the abandonment of one that is devoted.’”

Vaishampayana continued: “Hearing these words of king Yudhishtira the just, (the dog became transformed into) the deity of Righteousness, who, well pleased, said these words unto him in a sweet voice fraught with praise.

“Dharma said: ‘Thou art well born, O king of kings, and possessed of the intelligence and the good conduct of Pandu. Thou hast compassion for all creatures, O Bharata, of which this is a bright example. Formerly, O son, thou wert once examined by me in the woods of Dwaita, where thy brothers of great prowess met with (an appearance of) death. Disregarding both thy brothers Bhima and Arjuna, thou didst wish for the revival of Nakula from thy desire of doing good to thy (step-) mother. On the present occasion, thinking the dog to be devoted to thee, thou hast renounced the very car of the celestials instead of renouncing him. Hence, O king, there is no one in Heaven that is equal to thee. Hence, O Bharata, regions of inexhaustible felicity are thine. Thou hast won them, O chief of the Bharatas, and thine is a celestial and high goal.’”

Vaishampayana continued: “Then Dharma, and Shakra, and the Maruts, and the Ashvins, and other deities, and the celestial Rishis, causing Yudhishtira to ascend on a car, proceeded to Heaven. Those beings crowned with success and capable of going everywhere at will, rode their respective cars. King Yudhishtira, that perpetuator of Kuru’s race, riding on that car, ascended quickly, causing the entire welkin to blaze with his effulgence. Then Narada, that foremost of all speakers, endued with penances, and conversant with all the worlds, from amidst that concourse of deities, said these words: ‘All those royal sages that are here have their achievements transcended by those of Yudhishtira. Covering all the worlds by his fame and splendour and by his wealth of conduct, he has attained to Heaven in his own (human) body. None else than the son of Pandu has been heard to achieve this.’

“Hearing these words of Narada, the righteous-souled king, saluting the deities and all the royal sages there present, said, ‘Happy or miserable, whatever the region be that is now my brothers’, I desire to proceed to. I do not wish to go anywhere else.’

“Hearing this speech of the king, the chief of the deities, Purandara, said these words fraught with noble sense: ‘Do thou live in this place, O king of kings, which thou hast won by thy meritorious deeds. Why dost thou still cherish human affections? Thou hast attained to great success, the like of which no other man has ever been able to attain. Thy brothers, O delighter of the Kurus, have succeeded in winning regions of felicity. Human affections still touch thee. This is Heaven. Behold these celestial Rishis and Siddhas who have attained to the region of the gods.’

“Gifted with great intelligence, Yudhishtira answered the chief of the deities once more, saying, ‘O conqueror of Daityas, I venture not to dwell anywhere separated from them. I desire to go there, where my brothers have gone. I wish to go there where that foremost of women, Draupadi, of ample proportions and darkish complexion and endowed with great intelligence and righteous of conduct, has gone.’”

The Last Illusions

Section I

Om! Having bowed down into Narayana, and to Nara, the foremost of men, as also to the goddess Sarasvati, should the word “Jaya” be uttered.

Janamejaya said, “Having attained to Heaven, what regions were respectively attained by my grandsires of old, viz., the Pandavas and the sons of Dhritarashtra? I desire to hear this. I think that thou art conversant with everything, having been taught by the great Rishi Vyasa of wonderful feats.

Vaishampayana said, “Listen now to what thy grandsires, Yudhishtira and others, did after having attained to Heaven, that place of the deities. Arrived at Heaven, king Yudhishtira the just, beheld Duryodhana endowed with prosperity and seated on an excellent seat. He blazed with effulgence like the sun and wore all those signs of glory which belong to heroes. And he was in the company of many deities of blazing effulgence and of Sadhyas of righteous deeds. Yudhishtira, beholding Duryodhana and his prosperity, became suddenly filled with rage and turned back from the sight.

“He loudly addressed his companions, saying, ‘I do not desire to share regions of felicity with Duryodhana who was stained by cupidity and possessed of little foresight. It was for him that friends, and kinsmen, over the whole Earth were slaughtered by us whom he had afflicted greatly in the deep forest. It was for him that the virtuous princess of Pancala, Draupadi of faultless features, our wife, was dragged into the midst of the assembly before all our seniors. Ye gods, I have no desire to even behold Suyodhana. I wish to go there where my brothers are.’

“Narada, smiling, told him, ‘It should not be so, O king of kings. While residing in Heaven, all enmities cease. O mighty-armed Yudhishtira, do not say so about king Duryodhana. Hear my words. Here is king Duryodhana. He is worshipped with the gods by those righteous men and those foremost of kings who are now denizens of Heaven. By causing his body to be poured as a libation on the fire of battle, he has obtained the end that consists in attainment of the region for heroes. You and your brothers, who were veritable gods on Earth, were always persecuted by this one. Yet through his observance of Kshatriya practices he has attained to this region. This lord of Earth was not terrified in a situation fraught with terror.

“O son, thou shouldst not bear in mind the woes inflicted on thee on account of the match at dice. It behoveth thee not to remember the afflictions of Draupadi. It behoveth thee not to remember the other woes which were yours in consequence of the acts of your kinsmen,—the woes, viz., that were due to battle or to other situations. Do thou meet Duryodhana now according to the ordinances of polite intercourse. This is Heaven, O lord of men. There can be no enmities here.’

“Though thus addressed by Narada, the Kuru king Yudhishtira, endowed with great intelligence, enquired about his brothers and said, ‘If these eternal regions reserved for heroes be Duryodhana’s, that unrighteous and sinful wight, that man who was the destroyer of friends and of the whole world, that man for whose sake the entire Earth was devastated with all her horses and elephants and human beings, that wight for whose sake we were burnt with wrath in thinking of how best we might remedy our wrongs, I desire to see what regions have been attained by those high-souled heroes, my brothers of high vows, steady achievers of promises, truthful in speech, and distinguished for courage. The high-souled Karna, the son of Kunti, incapable of being baffled in battle, Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, the sons of Dhrishtadyumna and those other Kshatriyas who met with death in the observance of Kshatriya practices, where are those lords of Earth, O Brahmana? I do not see them here, O Narada. I desire to see, O Narada, Virata and Drupada and the other great Kshatriyas headed by Dhrishtaketu, as also Shikhandi, the Pancala prince, the sons of Draupadi, and Abhimanyu, irresistible in battle.’

Section II

“Yudhishtira said, ‘Ye deities, I do not see here Radha’s son of immeasurable prowess, as also my high-souled brothers, and Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, those great car-warriors that poured their bodies (as libations) on the fire of battle, those kings and princes that met with death for my sake in battle. Where are those great car-warriors that possessed the prowess of tigers? Have those foremost of men acquired this region? If those great car-warriors have obtained these regions, then only do you know, ye gods, that I shall reside here with those high-souled ones.

If this auspicious and eternal region has not been acquired by those kings, then know, ye gods, that without those brothers and kinsmen of mine, I shall not live here. At the time of performing the water rites (after the battle), I heard my mother say, 'Do thou offer oblations of water unto Karna.' Since hearing those words of my mother, I am burning with grief. I grieve also incessantly at this, ye gods, that when I marked the resemblance between the feet of my mother and those of Karna of immeasurable soul, I did not immediately place myself under orders of that afflicter of hostile ranks. Ourselves joined with Karna, Shakra himself would have been unable to vanquish in battle. Wherever may that child of Surya be, I desire to see him. Alas, his relationship with us being unknown, I caused him to be slain by Arjuna. Bhima also of terrible prowess and dearer to me than my life-breaths, Arjuna too, resembling Indra himself, the twins also that resembled the Destroyer himself in prowess, I desire to behold. I wish to see the princess of Pancala, whose conduct was always righteous. I wish not to stay here. I tell you the truth. Ye foremost ones among the deities, what is Heaven to me if I am dissociated from my brothers? That is Heaven where those brothers of mine are. This, in my opinion, is not Heaven.'

"The gods said, 'If thou longest to be there, go then, O son, without delay. At the command of the chief of the deities, we are ready to do what is agreeable to thee.'

Vaishampayana continued: Having said so, the gods then ordered the celestial messenger, O scorcher of foes, saying, 'Do thou show unto Yudhishtira his friends and kinsmen.' Then the royal son of Kunti and the celestial messenger proceeded together, O foremost of kings, to that place where those chiefs of men (whom Yudhishtira had wished to see) were. The celestial messenger proceeded first, the king followed him behind. The path was inauspicious and difficult and trodden by men of sinful deeds. It was enveloped in thick darkness, and covered with hair and moss forming its grassy vesture. Polluted with the stench of sinners, and miry with flesh and blood, it abounded with gadflies and stinging bees and gnats and was endangered by the inroads of grisly bears. Rotting corpses lay here and there. Overspread with bones and hair, it was noisome with worms and insects. It was skirted all along with a blazing fire. It was infested by crows and other birds and vultures, all having beaks of iron, as also by evil spirits with long mouths pointed like needles. And it abounded with inaccessible fastnesses like the Vindhya mountains. Human corpses were scattered over it, smeared with fat and blood, with arms and thighs cut off, or with entrails torn out and legs severed.

"Along that path so disagreeable with the stench of corpses and awful with other incidents, the righteous-souled king proceeded, filled with diverse thoughts. He beheld a river full of boiling water and, therefore, difficult to cross, as also a forest of trees whose leaves were sharp swords and razors. There were plains full of fine white sand exceedingly heated, and rocks and stones made of iron. There were many jars of iron all around, with boiling oil in them. Many a Kuta-salmalika was there, with sharp thorns and, therefore, exceedingly painful to the touch. The son of Kunti beheld also the tortures inflicted upon sinful men.

"Beholding that inauspicious region abounding with every sort of foulness, Yudhishtira asked the celestial messenger, saying, 'How far shall we proceed along a path like this? It behoveth thee to tell me where those brothers of mine are. I desire also to know what region is this of the gods?'

"Hearing these words of king Yudhishtira the just, the celestial messenger stopped in his course and replied, saying, 'Thus far is your way. The denizens of Heaven commanded me that having come thus far, I am to stop. If thou art tired, O king of kings, thou mayst return with me.'

"Yudhishtira, however, was exceedingly disconsolate and stupefied by the foul odour. Resolved to return, O Bharata, he retraced his steps. Afflicted by sorrow and grief, the righteous-souled monarch turned back. Just at that moment he heard piteous lamentations all around, 'O son of Dharma, O royal sage, O thou of sacred origin, O son of Pandu, do thou stay a moment for favouring us. At thy approach, O invincible one, a delightful breeze hath begun to blow, bearing the sweet scent of thy person. Great hath been our relief at this. O foremost of kings, beholding thee, O first of men, great hath been our happiness. O son of Pritha, let that happiness last longer through thy stay here, for a few moments more. Do thou remain here, O Bharata, for even a short while. As long as thou art here, O thou of Kuru's race, torments cease to afflict us.' These and many similar words, uttered in piteous voices by persons in pain, the king heard in that region, wafted to his ears from every side.

"Hearing those words of beings in woe, Yudhishtira of compassionate heart exclaimed aloud, 'Alas, how painful!' And the king stood still. The speeches of those woe-begone and afflicted persons seemed to the son of Pandu to be uttered in voices that he had heard before although he could not recognise them on that occasion.

"Unable to recognise voices, Dharmas son, Yudhishtira, enquired, saying, 'Who are you? Why also do you stay here?'

"Thus addressed, they answered him from all sides, saying, 'I am Karna!' 'I am Bhimasena!' 'I am Arjuna!' 'I am Nakula!' 'I am Sahadeva!' 'I am Dhrishtadyumna!' 'I am Draupadi!' 'We are the sons of Draupadi!' Even thus, O king, did those voices speak.

"Hearing those exclamations, O king, uttered in voices of pain suitable to that place, the royal Yudhishtira asked himself 'What perverse destiny is this? What are those sinful acts which were committed by those high-souled beings, Karna and the sons of Draupadi, and the slender-waisted princess of Pancala, so that their residence has been assigned in this region of foetid smell and great woe? I am not aware of any transgression that can be attributed to these persons of righteous deeds. What is that act by doing which Dhritarashtra's son, king Suyodhana, with all his sinful followers, has become invested with such prosperity? Endued with prosperity like that of the great Indra himself, he is highly adored. What is that act through the consequence of which these (high-souled ones) have fallen into Hell? All of them were conversant with every duty, were heroes, were devoted to truth and the Vedas; were observant of Kshatriya practices; were righteous in their acts; were performers of sacrifices; and givers of large presents unto brahmanas. Am I asleep or awake? Am I conscious or unconscious? Or, is all this a mental delusion due to disorders of the brain?

“Overwhelmed by sorrow and grief, and with his senses agitated by anxiety, king Yudhishtira indulged in such reflections for a long time. The royal son of Dharma then gave way to great wrath. Indeed, Yudhishtira then censured the gods, as also Dharma himself. Afflicted by the very foul odour, he addressed the celestial messenger, saying, ‘Return to the presence of those whose messenger thou art. Tell them that I shall not go back to where they are, but shall stay even here, since, in consequence of my companionship, these afflicted brothers of mine have become comforted.’ Thus addressed by the intelligent son of Pandu, the celestial messenger returned to the place where the chief of the deities was, viz., he of a hundred sacrifices. He represented unto him the acts of Yudhishtira. Indeed, O ruler of men, he informed Indra of all that Dharma's son had said!

Section III

Vaishampayana said, “King Yudhishtira the just, the son of Pritha, had not stayed there for more than a moment when, O thou of Kuru's race, all the gods with Indra at their head came to that spot. The deity of Righteousness in his embodied form also came to that place where the Kuru king was, for seeing that monarch. Upon the advent of those deities of resplendent bodies and sanctified and noble deeds, the darkness that had overwhelmed that region immediately disappeared. The torments undergone by beings of sinful deeds were no longer seen. The river Vaitarani, the thorny Salmali, the iron jars, and the boulders of rock, so terrible to behold, also vanished from sight. The diverse repulsive corpses also, which the Kuru king had seen, disappeared at the same time. Then a breeze, delicious and fraught with pleasant perfumes, perfectly pure and delightfully cool, O Bharata, began to blow on that spot in consequence of the presence of the gods. The Maruts, with Indra, the Vasus with the twin Ashvinis, the Sadhyas, the Rudras, the Adityas, and the other denizens of Heaven, as also the Siddhas and the great Rishis, all came there where Dharma's royal son of great energy was.

“Then Shakra, the lord of the deities, endued with blazing prosperity, addressed Yudhishtira and comforting him, said, ‘O Yudhishtira of mighty arms, come, come, O chief of men. These illusions have ended, O puissant one. Success has been attained by thee, O mighty-armed one, and eternal regions (of felicity) have become thine. Thou shouldst not yield to wrath. Listen to these words of mine. Hell, O son, should without doubt be beheld by every king. Of both good and bad there is abundance, O chief of men. He who enjoys first the fruits of his good acts must afterwards endure Hell. He, on the other hand, who first endures Hell, must afterwards enjoy Heaven. He whose sinful acts are many enjoys Heaven first. It is for this, O king, that desirous of doing thee good, I caused thee to be sent for having a view of Hell. Thou hadst, by a pretence, deceived Drona in the matter of his son. Thou hast, in consequence thereof, been shown Hell by an act of deception. After the manner of thyself, Bhima and Arjuna, and Draupadi, have all been shown the place of sinners by an act of deception. Come, O chief of men, all of them have been cleansed of their sins. All those kings who had aided thee and who have been slain in battle, have all attained to Heaven. Come and behold them, O foremost one of Bharata's race.

“Karna, the mighty bowman, that foremost of all wielders of weapons for whom thou art grieving, has also attained to high success. Behold, O puissant one, that foremost of men, viz., the son of Surya. He is in that place which is his own, O mighty-armed one. Kill this grief of thine, O chief of men. Behold thy brothers and others, those kings, that is, who had espoused thy side. They have all attained to their respective places (of felicity). Let the fever of thy heart be dispelled. Having endured a little misery first, from this time, O son of Kuru's race, do thou sport with me in happiness, divested of grief and all thy ailments dispelled. O mighty-armed one, do thou now enjoy, O king, the rewards of all thy deeds of righteousness of those regions which thou hast acquired thyself by thy penances and of all thy gifts. Let deities and Gandharvas, and celestial Apsaras, decked in pure robes and excellent ornaments, wait upon and serve thee for thy happiness. Do thou, O mighty-armed one, enjoy now those regions (of felicity) which have become thine through the Rajasuya sacrifice performed by thee and whose felicities have been enhanced by the sacrificial scimitar employed by thee. Let the high fruits of thy penances be enjoyed by thee. Thy regions, O Yudhishtira, are above, those of kings. They are equal to those of Hariscandra, O son of Pritha. Come, and sport there in bliss. There where the royal sage Mandhatri is, there where king Bhagiratha is, there where Dushmanta's son Bharata is, there wilt thou sport in bliss. Here is the celestial river, sacred and sanctifying the three worlds. It is called Heavenly Ganga. Plunging into it, thou wilt go to thy own regions. Having bathed in this stream, thou wilt be divested of thy human nature. Indeed, thy grief dispelled, thy ailments conquered, thou wilt be freed from all enmities.’

“While, O Kuru king, the chief of the gods was saying so unto Yudhishtira, the deity of Righteousness, in his embodied form, then addressed his own son and said, ‘O king, I am greatly pleased, O thou of great wisdom, with thee, O son, by thy devotion to me, by thy truthfulness of speech, and forgiveness, and self-restraint. This, indeed, is the third test, O king, to which I put thee. Thou art incapable, O son of Pritha, of being swerved from thy nature or reason. Before this, I had examined thee in the Dwaita woods by my questions, when thou hadst come to that lake for recovering a couple of fire sticks. Thou stoodst it well. Assuming the shape of a dog, I examined thee once more, O son, when thy brothers with Draupadi had fallen down. This has been thy third test; thou hast expressed thy wish to stay at Hell for the sake of thy brothers. Thou hast become cleansed, O highly blessed one. Purified of sin, be thou happy.

O son of Pritha, thy brothers, O king, were not such as to deserve Hell. All this has been an illusion created by the chief of the gods. Without doubt, all kings, O son, must once behold Hell. Hence hast thou for a little while been subjected to this great affliction. O king, neither Arjuna, nor Bhima, nor any of those foremost of men, viz., the twins, nor Karna, ever truthful in speech and possessed of great courage, could be deserving of Hell for a long time. The princess Krishna too, O Yudhishtira, could not be deserving of that place of sinners. Come, come, O foremost one of the Bharatas, behold Ganga who spreads her current over the three worlds.’

“Thus addressed, that royal sage, viz., thy grandsire, proceeded with Dharma and all the other gods. Having bathed in the celestial river Ganga, sacred and sanctifying and ever adored by the Rishis, he cast off his human body. Assuming then a celestial form, king Yudhishtira the just, in consequence of that bath, became divested of all his enmities and grief. Surrounded by the deities, the Kuru king Yudhishtira then proceeded from that spot. He was accompanied by Dharma, and the great Rishis uttered his praises. Indeed, he reached that place where those foremost of men, those heroes, viz., the Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras, freed from (human) wrath, were enjoying each his respective status.

Section IV

Vaishampayana said, “King Yudhishtira, thus praised by the gods, the Maruts and the Rishis, proceeded to that place where those foremost ones of Kuru’s race were. He beheld Govinda endued with his Brahma-form. It resembled that form of his which had been seen before and which, therefore, helped the recognition. Blazing forth in that form of his, he was adorned with celestial weapons, such as the terrible discus and others in their respective embodied forms. He was being adored by the heroic Phalgunas, who also was endued with a blazing effulgence. The son of Kunti beheld the slayer of Madhu also in his own form. Those two foremost of Beings, adored by all the gods, beholding Yudhishtira, received him with proper honours.

“In another place, the delighter of the Kurus beheld Karna, that foremost one among all wielders of weapons, resembling a dozen Suryas in splendour. In another part he beheld Bhimasena of great puissance, sitting in the midst of the Maruts, and endued with a blazing form. He was sitting by the side of the God of Wind in his embodied form. Indeed, he was then in a celestial form endued with great beauty, and had attained to the highest success. In place belonging to the Ashvins, the delighter of the Kurus beheld Nakula and Sahadeva, each blazing with his own effulgence.

“He also beheld the princess of Pancala, decked in garlands of lotuses. Having attained to Heaven, she was sitting there, endued with a form possessed of solar splendour. King Yudhishtira suddenly wished to question her. Then the illustrious Indra, the chief of the gods, spoke to him, ‘This one is Sree herself. It was for your sake that she took birth, as the daughter of Drupada, among human beings, issuing not from any mother’s womb, O Yudhishtira, endued with agreeable perfume and capable of delighting the whole world. For your pleasure, she was created by the wielder of the trident. She was born in the race of Drupada and was enjoyed by you all. These five highly blessed Gandharvas endued with the effulgence of fire, and possessed of great energy, were, O king, the sons of Draupadi and yourself.

“Behold Dhritarashtra, the king of the Gandharvas, possessed of great wisdom. Know that this one was the eldest brother of thy sire. This one is thy eldest brother, the son of Kunti, endued with effulgence of fire. The son of Surya, thy eldest brother, the foremost of men, even this one was known as the son of Radha. He moves in the company of Surya. Behold this foremost of Beings. Among the tribes of the Saddhyas, the gods, the Viswedivas, and the Maruts, behold, O king of kings, the mighty car-warriors of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, viz., those heroes having Satyaki for their first, and those mighty ones among the Bhojas. Behold the son of Subhadra, invincible in battle, now staying with Soma. Even he is the mighty bowman Abhimanyu, now endued with the gentle effulgence of the great luminary of the night. Here is the mighty bowman Pandu, now united with Kunti and Madri. Thy sire frequently comes to me on his excellent car. Behold the royal Bhishma, the son of Santanu, now in the midst of the Vasus. Know that this one by the side of Brihaspati is thy preceptor Drona. These and other kings, O son of Pandu, who had warred on thy side now walk with the Gandharvas or Yakshas or other sacred beings. Some have attained to the status of Guhyakas, O king. Having cast off their bodies, they have conquered Heaven by the merit they had acquired through word, thought and deed.’

Section V

Janamejaya said, “Bhishma and Drona, those two high-souled persons, king Dhritarashtra, and Virata and Drupada, and Sankha and Uttara. Dhrishtaketu and Jayatsena and king Satyajit, the sons of Duryodhana, and Shakuni the son of Subala, Karna’s sons of great prowess, king Jayadratha, Ghatotkaca and others whom thou hast not mentioned, the other heroic kings of blazing forms—tell me for what period they remained in Heaven. O foremost of regenerate persons, was theirs an eternal place in Heaven? What was the end attained to by those foremost of men when their acts came to an end? I desire to hear this, O foremost of regenerate persons, and therefore have I asked thee. Through thy blazing penances thou seest all things.

Sauti said: Thus questioned, that regenerate Rishi, receiving the permission of the high-souled Vyasa, set himself to answer the question of the king.

Vaishampayana said, “Every one, O king of men, is not capable of returning to his own nature at the end of his deeds. Whether this is so or not, is, indeed a good question asked by thee. Hear, O king, this which is a mystery of the gods, O chief of Bharata’s race. It was explained (to us) by Vyasa of mighty energy, celestial vision and great prowess, that ancient ascetic, O Kauravya, who is the son of Parasara and who always observes high vows, who is of immeasurable understanding, who is omniscient, and who, therefore knows the end attached to all acts.

“Bhishma of mighty energy and great effulgence attained to the status of the Vasus. Eight Vasus, O chief of Bharata’s race, are now seen. Drona entered into Brihaspati, that foremost one of Angirasa’s descendants. Hridika’s son Kritavarma entered the Maruts. Pradyumna entered Sanatkumara whence he had issued. Dhritarashtra obtained the regions, so difficult of acquisition, that belong to the Lord of treasures. The famous Gandhari obtained the same regions with her husband Dhritarashtra. With his two wives, Pandu proceeded to the abode of the great Indra. Both Virata and Drupada, the king Dhrishtaketu, as also Nishatha, Akura, Samva, Bhanukampa, and Viduratha, and Bhurishrava and Sala and king Bhuri, and Kansa, and Ugrasena, and Vasudeva, and Uttara, that foremost of men, with his brother Sankha—all these foremost of persons entered the deities. Soma’s son of great prowess, named Varchas of mighty energy, became Abhimanyu, the son of Phalguna, that lion among men. Having fought, agreeably to Kshatriya practices, with bravery such as none else had ever been able to show, that mighty-armed and righteous-souled being entered Soma. Slain on the field of battle, O foremost of men, Karna entered Surya. Shakuni obtained absorption into Dwapara, and Dhristadyumna into the deity of fire. The sons of Dhritarashtra were all Rakshasas of fierce might. Sanctified by death caused by weapons, those high-souled beings of prosperity all succeeded in attaining to Heaven. Both Kshatri and king Yudhishtira entered into the god of Righteousness. The holy and illustrious Ananta (who had taken birth as Balarama) proceeded to the region below the Earth. Through the command of the Grandsire, he, aided by his Yoga power, supported the Earth. Vasudeva was a portion of that eternal god of gods called Narayana. Accordingly, he entered into Narayana. 16,000 women had been married to Vasudeva as his wives. When the time came, O Janamejaya, they, plunged into the Sarasvati. Casting off their (human) bodies there, they re-ascended to Heaven. Transformed into Apsaras, they approached the presence of Vasudeva. Those heroic and mighty car-warriors, Ghatotkaca and others, who were slain in the great battle, attained to the status, some of gods and some of Yakshas. Those that had fought on the side of Duryodhana are said to have been Rakshasas. Gradually, O king, they have all attained to excellent regions of felicity. Those foremost of men have proceeded, some to the abode of Indra, some to that of Kuvera of great intelligence, and some to that of Varuna. I have now told thee, O thou of great splendour, everything about the acts, O Bharata, of both the Kurus and the Pandavas.

Sauti said: Hearing this, ye foremost of regenerate ones, at the intervals of sacrificial rites, king Janamejaya became filled with wonder. The sacrificial priests then finished the rites that remained to be gone through. Astika, having rescued the snakes (from fiery death), became filled with joy. King Janamejaya then gratified all the Brahmanas with copious presents. Thus worshipped by the king, they returned to their respective abodes. Having dismissed those learned Brahmanas, king Janamejaya came back from Takshasila to the city named after the elephant.

I have now told everything that Vaishampayana narrated, at the command of Vyasa, unto the king at his snake sacrifice. Called a history, it is sacred, sanctifying and excellent. It has been composed by the ascetic Krishna, O Brahmana, of truthful speech. He is omniscient, conversant with all ordinances, possessed of a knowledge of all duties, endued with piety, capable of perceiving what is beyond the ken of the senses, pure, having a soul cleansed by penances, possessed of the six high attributes, and devoted to Sankhya Yoga. He has composed this, beholding everything with a celestial eye that has been cleansed (strengthened) by varied lore. He has done this, desiring to spread the fame, throughout the world, of the high-souled Pandavas, as also of other Kshatriyas possessed of abundant wealth of energy.

That learned man who recites this history of sacred days in the midst of a listening auditory becomes cleansed of every sin, conquers Heaven, and attains to the status of Brahma. Of that man who listens with rapt attention to the recitation of the whole of this Veda composed by (the Island-born) Krishna, a million sins, numbering such grave ones as Brahmanicide and the rest, are washed off. The Pitris of that man who recites even a small portion of this history at a Sraddha, obtain inexhaustible food and drink. The sins that one commits during the day by one’s senses or the mind are all washed off before evening by reciting a portion of the Mahabharata. Whatever sins a Brahmana may commit at night in the midst of women are all washed off before dawn by reciting a portion of the Mahabharata.

The high race of the Bharatas is its topic. Hence it is called Bharata. And because of its grave import, as also of the Bharatas being its topic, it is called Mahabharata. He who is versed in interpretations of this great treatise, becomes cleansed of every sin. Such a man lives in righteousness, wealth, and pleasure, and attains to Emancipation also, O chief of Bharata's race.

That which occurs here occurs elsewhere. That which does not occur here occurs nowhere else. This history is known by the name of Jaya. It should be heard by every one desirous of Emancipation. It should be read by Brahmanas, by kings, and by women quick with children. He that desires Heaven attains to Heaven; and he that desires victory attains to victory. The woman quick with child gets either a son or a daughter highly blessed. The puissant Island-born Krishna, who will not have to come back, and who is Emancipation incarnate, made an abstract of the Bharata, moved by the desire of aiding the cause of righteousness. He made another compilation consisting of sixty lakhs of verses. Thirty lakhs of these were placed in the region of the deities. In the region of the Pitris fifteen lakhs, it should be known, are current; while in that of the Yakshas fourteen lakhs are in vogue. One lakh is current among human beings.

Narada recited the Mahabharata to the gods; Asita-Devala to the Pitris; Suka to the Rakshasas and the Yakshas; and Vaishampayana to human beings. This history is sacred, and of high import, and regarded as equal to the Vedas. That man, O Saunaka, who hears this history, placing a Brahmana before him, acquires both fame and the fruition of all his wishes. He who, with fervid devotion, listens to a recitation of the Mahabharata, attains (hereafter) to high success in consequence of the merit that becomes his through understanding even a very small portion thereof. All the sins of that man who recites or listens to this history with devotion are washed off.

In former times, the great Rishi Vyasa, having composed this treatise, caused his son Suka to read it with him, along with these four Verses. —Thousands of mothers and fathers, and hundreds of sons and wives arise in the world and depart from it. Others will (arise and) similarly depart. There are thousands of occasions for joy and hundreds of occasions for fear. These affect only him that is ignorant but never him that is wise. With uplifted arms I am crying aloud but nobody hears me. From Righteousness is Wealth as also Pleasure. Why should not Righteousness, therefore, be courted? For the sake neither of pleasure, nor of fear, nor of cupidity should any one cast off Righteousness. Indeed, for the sake of even life one should not cast off Righteousness. Righteousness is eternal. Pleasure and Pain are not eternal. Jiva is eternal. The cause, however, of Jiva's being invested with a body is not so.

That man who, waking up at dawn, reads this Savitri of the Bharata, acquires all the rewards attached to a recitation of this history and ultimately attains to the highest Brahma. As the sacred Ocean, as the Himavat mountain, are both regarded as mines of precious gems, even so is this Bharata (regarded as a mine of precious gems). The man of learning, by reciting to others this Veda or Agama composed by (the Island-born) Krishna, earns wealth. There is no doubt in this that he who, with rapt attention, recites this history called Bharata, attains to high success. What need has that man of a sprinkling of the waters of Pushkara who attentively listens to this Bharata, while it is recited to him? It represents the nectar that fell from the lips of the Island-born. It is immeasurable, sacred, sanctifying, sin-cleansing, and auspicious.

The Ramayana is the story of Rama, who is the seventh avatar of the god Vishnu. In times of trouble, Vishnu sends down a human avatar to defeat evil; the avatar, therefore, is the embodiment (literally) of divine intervention. Rama has the opportunity to fight evil when his wife, Sita, is kidnapped by the demon Ravana. Sita is the avatar of the goddess Lakshmi, wife of Vishnu, and her human incarnation is identified as the daughter of the earth goddess, since she was found in a plowed field by King Janaka (her name means "furrow"). When Rama and his brothers rescue Sita, they have the help of one of the most popular figures in Indian mythology: the monkey god Hanuman, who is the eleventh avatar of Shiva, and whose monkey incarnation is the son of the wind god Vayu. The action that follows is in keeping with the divine nature and power of the characters.

Valmiki, Translated by Kate Milner Rabb

Brahma, creator of the universe, though all powerful, could not revoke a promise once made. For this reason, Ravana, the demon god of Ceylon, stood on his head in the midst of five fires for ten thousand years, and at the end of that time boldly demanded of Brahma as a reward that he should not be slain by gods, demons, or genii. He also requested the gift of nine other heads and eighteen additional arms and hands.

These having been granted, he began by the aid of his evil spirits, the Rakshasas, to lay waste the earth and to do violence to the good, especially to the priests.

At the time when Ravana's outrages were spreading terror throughout the land, and Brahma, looking down from his throne, shuddered to see the monster he had gifted with such fell power, there reigned in Ayodhya, now the city of Oude, a good and wise raja, Dasaratha, who had reigned over the splendid city for nine thousand years without once growing weary. He had but one grief,—that he was childless,—and at the opening of the story he was preparing to make the great sacrifice, Asva-medha, to propitiate the gods, that they might give him a son.

The gods, well pleased, bore his request to Brahma in person, and incidentally preferred a request that he provide some means of destroying the monster Ravana that was working such woe among their priests, and disturbing their sacrifices.

Brahma granted the first request, and, cudgeling his brains for a device to destroy Ravana, bethought himself that while he had promised that neither gods, genii, nor demons should slay him, he had said nothing of man. He accordingly led the appealing gods to Vishnu, who proclaimed that the monster should be slain by men and monkeys, and that he would himself be re-incarnated as the eldest son of Dasaratha and in this form compass the death of Ravana.

In course of time, as a reward for his performance of the great sacrifice, four sons were born to Dasaratha, Rama by Kausalya, his oldest wife, Bharata, whose mother was Kaikeyi, and twin sons, Lakshmana and Satrugna, whose mother was Sumitra.

Rama, the incarnation of Vishnu, destined to destroy Ravana, grew daily in grace, beauty, and strength. When he was but sixteen years old, having been sent for by a sage to destroy the demons who were disturbing the forest hermits in their religious rites, he departed unattended, save by his brother Lakshmana and a guide, into the pathless forests, where he successfully overcame the terrible Rakshasa, Tarika, and conveyed her body to the grateful sage.

While he was journeying through the forests, destroying countless Rakshasas, he chanced to pass near the kingdom of Mithila and heard that its king, Janaka, had offered his peerless daughter, Sita, in marriage to the man who could bend the mighty bow of Siva the destroyer, which, since its owner's death, had been kept at Janaka's court.

Rama at once determined to accomplish the feat, which had been essayed in vain by so many suitors. When he presented himself at court Janaka was at once won by his youth and beauty; and when the mighty bow, resting upon an eight-wheeled car, was drawn in by five thousand men, and Rama without apparent effort bent it until it broke, he gladly gave him his beautiful daughter, and after the splendid wedding ceremonies were over, loaded the happy pair with presents to carry back to Ayodhya.

When Dasaratha, who had attended the marriage of his son at Mithila, returned home, he began to feel weary of reigning, and bethought himself of the ancient Hindu custom of making the eldest son and heir apparent a Yuva-Raja,—that is appointing him assistant king. Rama deserved this honor, and would, moreover, be of great assistance to him.

His happy people received the announcement of his intention with delight; the priests approved of it as well, and the whole city was in the midst of the most splendid preparations for the ceremony, when it occurred to Dasaratha that all he lacked was the congratulations of his youngest and favorite wife, Kaikeyi, on this great event. The well-watered streets and the garlanded houses had already aroused the suspicions of Kaikeyi,—suspicions speedily confirmed by the report of her maid. Angered and jealous because the son of Kausalya and not her darling Bharata, at that time absent from the city, was to be made Yuva-Raja, she fled to the "Chamber of Sorrows," and was there found by the old Raja.

Though Kaikeyi was his youngest and most beautiful wife, her tears, threats, and entreaties would have been of no avail had she not recalled that, months before, the old Raja, in gratitude for her devoted nursing during his illness, had granted her two promises. She now demanded the fulfilment of these before she would consent to smile upon him, and the consent won, she required him, first, to appoint Bharata Yuva-Raja; and, second, to exile Rama for fourteen years to the terrible forest of Dandaka.

The promise of a Hindu, once given, cannot be revoked. In spite of the grief of the old Raja, of Kausalya, his old wife, and of all the people, who were at the point of revolt at the sudden disgrace of their favorite prince, the terrible news was announced to Rama, and he declared himself ready to go, to save his father from dishonor.

He purposed to go alone, but Sita would not suffer herself to be thus deserted. Life without him, she pleaded, was worse than death; and so eloquent was her grief at the thought of parting that she was at last permitted to don the rough garment of bark provided by the malicious Kaikeyi.

The people of Ayodhya, determined to share the fate of their favorites, accompanied them from the city, their tears laying the dust raised by Rama's chariot wheels. But when sleep overcame them, Rama, Sita, and Lakshmana escaped from them, dismissed their charioteer, and, crossing the Ganges, made their way to the mountain of Citra-kuta, where they took up their abode.

No more beautiful place could be imagined. Flowers of every kind, delicious fruits, and on every side the most pleasing prospects, together with perfect love, made their hermitage a paradise on earth. Here the exiles led an idyllic existence until sought out by Bharata, who, learning from his mother on his return home the ruin she had wrought in the Raj, had indignantly spurned her, and hastened to Dandaka. The old Raja had died from grief soon after the departure of the exiles, and Bharata now demanded that Rama should return to Ayodhya and become Raja, as was his right, as eldest son.

When Rama refused to do this until the end of his fourteen years of exile, Bharata vowed that for fourteen years he would wear the garb of a devotee and live outside the city, committing the management of the Raj to a pair of golden sandals which he took from Rama's feet. All the affairs of state would be transacted under the authority of the sandals, and Bharata, while ruling the Raj, would pay homage to them.

Soon after the departure of Bharata the exiles were warned to depart from their home on Citra-kuta and seek a safer hermitage, for terrible rakshasas filled this part of the forest. They accordingly sought the abode of Atri the hermit, whose wife Anasuya was so pleased with Sita's piety and devotion to her husband that she bestowed upon her the crown of immortal youth and beauty. They soon found a new abode in the forest of Pancarati, on the banks of the river Godavari, where Lakshmana erected a spacious bamboo house.

Their happiness in this elysian spot was destined to be short-lived. Near them dwelt a horrible rakshasa, Surpanakha by name, who fell in love with Rama. When she found that he did not admire the beautiful form she assumed to win him, and that both he and Lakshmana laughed at her advances, she attempted to destroy Sita, only to receive in the attempt a disfiguring wound from the watchful Lakshmana. Desiring revenge for her disfigured countenance and her scorned love, she hastened to the court of her brother Ravana, in Ceylon, and in order to induce him to avenge her wrongs, dwelt upon the charms of the beautiful wife of Rama.

Some days after, Sita espied a golden fawn, flecked with silver, among the trees near their home. Its shining body, its jewel-like horns, so captivated her fancy that she implored Rama, if possible, to take it alive for her; if not, at least to bring her its skin for a couch. As Rama departed, he warned Lakshmana not to leave Sita for one moment; he would surely return, since no weapon could harm him. In the depths of the forest the fawn fell by his arrow, crying as it fell, "O Sita! O Lakshmana!" in Rama's very tones.

When Sita heard the cry she reproached Lakshmana for not going to his brother's aid, until he left her to escape her bitter words. He had no sooner disappeared in the direction of the cry than a hermit appeared and asked her to minister unto his wants.

Sita carried him food, bathed his feet, and conversed with him until, able no longer to conceal his admiration for her, he revealed himself in his true form as the demon god of Ceylon.

When she indignantly repulsed him he seized her, and mounting his chariot drove rapidly towards Ceylon.

When Rama and Lakshmana returned home, soon after, they found the house empty. As they searched through the forest for traces of her they found a giant vulture dying from wounds received while endeavoring to rescue the shrieking Sita. Going farther, they encountered the monkey king Sugriva and his chiefs, among whom Sita had dropped from the chariot her scarf and ornaments.

Sugriva had been deposed from his kingdom by his brother Bali, who had also taken his wife from him. Rama agreed to conquer Bali if Sugriva would assist in the search for Sita; and, the agreement made, they at once marched upon Kishkindha, together slew Bali, and gained possession of the wealthy city and the queen Tara. They were now ready to search for the lost Sita.

In his quest through every land, Hanuman, the monkey general, learned from the king of the vultures that she had been carried to Ceylon. He immediately set out for the coast with his army, only to find a bridgeless ocean stretching between them and the island. Commanding his soldiers to remain where they were, Hanuman expanded his body to enormous proportions, leaped the vast expanse of water, and alighted upon a mountain, from which he could look down upon Lanka, the capital city of Ceylon. Perceiving the city to be closely guarded, he assumed the form of a cat, and thus, unsuspected, crept through the barriers and examined the city. He found the demon god in his apartments, surrounded by beautiful women, but Sita was not among them. Continuing his search, he at last discovered her, her beauty dimmed by grief, seated under a tree in a beautiful asoka grove, guarded by hideous rakshasas with the faces of buffaloes, dogs, and swine.

Assuming the form of a tiny monkey, Hanuman crept down the tree, and giving her the ring of Rama, took one from her. He offered to carry her away with him, but Sita declared that Rama must himself come to her rescue. While they were talking together, the demon god appeared, and, after fruitless wooing, announced that if Sita did not yield herself to him in two months he would have her guards "mince her limbs with steel" for his morning repast.

In his rage, Hanuman destroyed a mango grove and was captured by the demon's guards, who were ordered to set his tail on fire. As soon as this was done, Hanuman made himself so small that he slipped from his bonds, and, jumping upon the roofs, spread a conflagration through the city of Lanka.

He leaped back to the mainland, conveyed the news of Sita's captivity to Rama and Sugriva, and was soon engaged in active preparations for the campaign.

As long as the ocean was unbridged it was impossible for any one save Hanuman to cross it. In his anger at being so thwarted, Rama turned his weapons against it, until from the terrified waves rose the god of the ocean, who promised him that if Nala built a bridge, the waves should support the materials as firmly as though it were built on land.

Terror reigned in Lanka at the news of the approach of Rama. Vibishana, Ravana's brother, deserted to Rama, because of the demon's rage when he advised him to make peace with Rama. Fiercely fought battles ensued, in which even the gods took part, Vishnu and Indra taking sides with Rama, and the evil spirits fighting with Ravana.

After the war had been carried on for some time, with varying results, it was decided to determine it by single combat between Ravana and Rama. Then even the gods were terrified at the fierceness of the conflict. At each shot Rama's mighty bow cut off a head of the demon, which at once grew back, and the hero was in despair until he remembered the all-powerful arrow given him by Brahma.

As the demon fell by this weapon, flowers rained from heaven upon the happy victor, and his ears were ravished with celestial music.

Touched by the grief of Ravana's widows, Rama ordered his foe a splendid funeral, and then sought the conquered city.

Sita was led forth, beaming with happiness at finding herself re-united to her husband; but her happiness was destined to be of short duration. Rama received her with coldness and with downcast eyes, saying that she could no longer be his wife, after having dwelt in the zenana of the demon. Sita assured him of her innocence; but on his continuing to revile her, she ordered her funeral pyre to be built, since she would rather die by fire than live despised by Rama. The sympathy of all the bystanders was with Sita, but Rama saw her enter the flames without a tremor. Soon Agni, the god of fire, appeared, bearing the uninjured Sita in his arms. Her innocence thus publicly proved by the trial by fire, she was welcomed by Rama, whose treatment she tenderly forgave.

The conquest made, the demon destroyed, and Sita restored, Rama returned in triumph to Ayodhya, and assumed the government. The city was prosperous, the people were happy, and for a time all went well. It was not long, however, before whispers concerning Sita's long abode in Ceylon spread abroad, and some one whispered to Rama that a famine in the country was due to the guilt of Sita, who had suffered the caresses of the demon while in captivity in Ceylon. Forgetful of the trial by fire, forgetful of Sita's devotion to him through weal and woe, the ungrateful Rama immediately ordered her to the forest in which they had spent together the happy years of their exile.

Without a murmur the unhappy Sita, alone and unbefriended, dragged herself to the forest, and, torn with grief of body and spirit, found the hermitage of Valmiki, where she gave birth to twin sons, Lava and Kuça. Here she reared them, with the assistance of the hermit, who was their teacher, and under whose care they grew to manhood, handsome and strong.

It chanced about the time the youths were twenty years old, that Rama, who had grown peevish and disagreeable with age, began to think the gods were angered with him because he had killed Ravana, who was the son of a Brahman. Determined to propitiate them by means of the great sacrifice, he caused a horse to be turned loose in the forest. When his men went to retake it, at the end of the year, it was caught by two strong and beautiful youths who resisted all efforts to capture them. In his rage Rama went to the forest in person, only to learn that the youths were his twin sons, Lava and Kuça. Struck with remorse, Rama recalled the sufferings of his wife Sita, and on learning that she was at the hermitage of Valmiki, ordered her to come to him, that he might take her to him again, having first caused her to endure the trial by fire to prove her innocence to all his court.

A mark for scorn and general blame,
Reproached himself in bitter shame.
For to each class his equal mind
With sympathy and love inclined

Most fully of the princely four, 45
So greatest love to him they bore.

His circling course the hero bent
Round shrine and altar, reverent,
Round homes of Gods, where cross-roads met,
Where many a sacred tree was set. 50

Near to his father’s house he drew
Like Indra’s beautiful to view,
And with the light his glory gave
Within the royal palace drove.
Through three broad courts, where bowmen kept 55
Their watch and ward, his coursers swept,
Then through the two remaining went
On foot the prince preëminent.

Through all the courts the hero passed,
And gained the ladies’ bower at last; 60
Then through the door alone withdrew,
And left without his retinue.
When thus the monarch’s noble boy

Had gone his sire to meet,
The multitude, elate with joy, 65
Stood watching in the street,

And his return with eager eyes
Expected at the gates,
As for his darling moon to rise
The King of Rivers waits. 70

Canto XVIII. The Sentence.

With hopeless eye and pallid mien
 There sat the monarch with the queen.
 His father's feet with reverence due
 He clasped, and touched Kaikeyí's too. 5
 The king, with eyes still brimming o'er,
 Cried Ráma! and could do no more.
 His voice was choked, his eye was dim,
 He could not speak or look on him.
 Then sudden fear made Ráma shake 10
 As though his foot had roused a snake,
 Soon as his eyes had seen the change
 So mournful, terrible, and strange.
 For there his reason well-nigh fled,
 Sighing, with soul disquieted,
     To torturing pangs a prey, 15
 Dismayed, despairing, and distraught,
 In a fierce whirl of wildering thought
     The hapless monarch lay,
 Like Ocean wave-engarlanded
 Storm-driven from his tranquil bed, 20
     The Sun-God in eclipse,
 Or like a holy seer, heart-stirred
 With anguish, when a lying word
     Has passed his heedless lips.
 The sight of his dear father, pained 25
 With woe and misery unexplained
     Filled Ráma with unrest,
 As Ocean's pulses rise and swell
 When the great moon he loves so well
     Shines full upon his breast. 30
 So grieving for his father's sake,
 To his own heart the hero spake:
 "Why will the king my sire to-day
 No kindly word of greeting say?
 At other times, though wroth he be, 35
 His eyes grow calm that look on me.
 Then why does anguish wring his brow
 To see his well-beloved now?"
 Sick and perplexed, distraught with woe,
 To Queen Kaikeyí bowing low, 40
 While pallor o'er his bright cheek spread,
 With humble reverence he said:
 "What have I done, unknown, amiss
 To make my father wroth like this?
 Declare it, O dear Queen, and win 45
 His pardon for my heedless sin.
 Why is the sire I ever find
 Filled with all love to-day unkind?
 With eyes cast down and pallid cheek
 This day alone he will not speak. 50
 Or lies he prostrate neath the blow
 Of fierce disease or sudden woe?
 For all our bliss is dashed with pain,
 And joy unmixed is hard to gain.
 Does stroke of evil fortune smite 55
 Dear Bharat, charming to the sight,

Or on the brave Śatrughna fall,
 Or consorts, for he loves them all?
 Against his words when I rebel,
 Or fail to please the monarch well, 60
 When deeds of mine his soul offend,
 That hour I pray my life may end.
 How should a man to him who gave
 His being and his life behave?
 The sire to whom he owes his birth 65
 Should be his deity on earth.
 Hast thou, by pride and folly moved,
 With bitter taunt the king reproved?
 Has scorn of thine or cruel jest
 To passion stirred his gentle breast? 70
 Speak truly, Queen, that I may know
 What cause has changed the monarch so.”

Thus by the high-souled prince addressed,
 Of Raghu’s sons the chief and best,
 She cast all ruth and shame aside, 75
 And bold with greedy words replied:
 “Not wrath, O Ráma, stirs the king,
 Nor misery stabs with sudden sting;
 One thought that fills his soul has he,
 But dares not speak for fear of thee. 80
 Thou art so dear, his lips refrain
 From words that might his darling pain.
 But thou, as duty bids, must still
 The promise of thy sire fulfil.
 He who to me in days gone by 85
 Vouchsafed a boon with honours high,
 Dares now, a king, his word regret,
 And caitiff-like disowns the debt.
 The lord of men his promise gave
 To grant the boon that I might crave, 90
 And now a bridge would idly throw
 When the dried stream has ceased to flow.
 His faith the monarch must not break
 In wrath, or e’en for thy dear sake.
 From faith, as well the righteous know, 95
 Our virtue and our merits flow.
 Now, be they good or be they ill,
 Do thou thy father’s words fulfil:
 Swear that his promise shall not fail,
 And I will tell thee all the tale. 100
 Yes, Ráma, when I hear that thou
 Hast bound thee by thy father’s vow,
 Then, not till then, my lips shall speak,
 Nor will he tell what boon I seek.”

He heard, and with a troubled breast 105
 This answer to the queen addressed:
 “Ah me, dear lady, canst thou deem
 That words like these thy lips beseem?
 I, at the bidding of my sire,
 Would cast my body to the fire, 110
 A deadly draught of poison drink,

Or in the waves of ocean sink:
 If he command, it shall be done,—
 My father and my king in one.
 Then speak and let me know the thing 115
 So longed for by my lord the king.
 It shall be done: let this suffice;
 Rāma ne'er makes a promise twice."

He ended. To the princely youth
 Who loved the right and spoke the truth, 120
 Cruel, abominable came
 The answer of the ruthless dame:
 "When Gods and Titans fought of yore,
 Transfixed with darts and bathed in gore
 Two boons to me thy father gave 125
 For the dear life 'twas mine to save.
 Of him I claim the ancient debt,
 That Bharat on the throne be set,
 And thou, O Rāma, go this day
 To Daṇḍak forest far away. 130
 Now, Rāma, if thou wilt maintain
 Thy father's faith without a stain,
 And thine own truth and honour clear,
 Then, best of men, my bidding hear.
 Do thou thy father's word obey, 135
 Nor from the pledge he gave me stray.
 Thy life in Daṇḍak forest spend
 Till nine long years and five shall end.
 Upon my Bharat's princely head
 Let consecrating drops be shed, 140
 With all the royal pomp for thee
 Made ready by the king's decree.
 Seek Daṇḍak forest and resign
 Rites that would make the empire thine,
 For twice seven years of exile wear 145
 The coat of bark and matted hair.
 Then in thy stead let Bharat reign
 Lord of his royal sire's domain,
 Rich in the fairest gems that shine,
 Cars, elephants, and steeds, and kine. 150
 The monarch mourns thy altered fate
 And vails his brow compassionate:
 Bowed down by bitter grief he lies
 And dares not lift to thine his eyes.
 Obey his word: be firm and brave, 155
 And with great truth the monarch save."

While thus with cruel words she spoke,
 No grief the noble youth betrayed;
 But forth the father's anguish broke,
 At his dear Rāma's lot dismayed. 160

Canto XIX. Rāma's Promise

Calm and unmoved by threatened woe
 The noble conqueror of the foe
 Answered the cruel words she spoke,
 Nor quailed beneath the murderous stroke:

And to the distant forest fled,
He will not bathe nor call for bread.”

“Woe! woe!” from the sad monarch burst,
In surging floods of grief immersed;
Then swooning, with his wits astray, 225
Upon the gold-wrought couch he lay,
And Rāma raised the aged king:
But the stern queen, unpitying,
Checked not her needless words, nor spared
The hero for all speed prepared, 230
But urged him with her bitter tongue,
Like a good horse with lashes stung,
She spoke her shameful speech. Serene
He heard the fury of the queen,
And to her words so vile and dread 235
Gently, unmoved in mind, he said:
“I would not in this world remain
A grovelling thrall to paltry gain,
But duty’s path would fain pursue,
True as the saints themselves are true. 240
From death itself I would not fly
My father’s wish to gratify,
What deed soe’er his loving son
May do to please him, think it done.
Amid all duties, Queen, I count 245
This duty first and paramount,
That sons, obedient, aye fulfil
Their honoured fathers’ word and will.
Without his word, if thou decree,
Forth to the forest will I flee, 250
And there shall fourteen years be spent
Mid lonely wilds in banishment.
Methinks thou couldst not hope to find
One spark of virtue in my mind,
If thou, whose wish is still my lord, 255
Hast for this grace the king implored.
This day I go, but, ere we part,
Must cheer my Sítá’s tender heart,
To my dear mother bid farewell;
Then to the woods, a while to dwell. 260
With thee, O Queen, the care must rest
That Bharat hear his sire’s behest,
And guard the land with righteous sway,
For such the law that lives for aye.”

In speechless woe the father heard, 265
Wept with loud cries, but spoke no word.
Then Rāma touched his senseless feet,
And hers, for honour most unmeet;
Round both his circling steps he bent,
Then from the bower the hero went. 270
Soon as he reached the gate he found
His dear companions gathered round.
Behind him came Sumitrá’s child
With weeping eyes so sad and wild.
Then saw he all that rich array 275

Of vases for the glorious day, Round them with reverent stops he paced, Nor veiled his eye, nor moved in haste. The loss of empire could not dim The glory that encompassed him.	280
So will the Lord of Cooling Rays On whom the world delights to gaze, Through the great love of all retain Sweet splendour in the time of wane. Now to the exile's lot resigned He left the rule of earth behind: As though all worldly cares he spurned No trouble was in him discerned.	285
The chouries that for kings are used, And white umbrella, he refused, Dismissed his chariot and his men, And every friend and citizen. He ruled his senses, nor betrayed The grief that on his bosom weighed, And thus his mother's mansion sought To tell the mournful news he brought.	290
Nor could the gay-clad people there Who flocked round Ráma true and fair, One sign of altered fortune trace Upon the splendid hero's face. Nor had the chieftain, mighty-armed, Lost the bright look all hearts that charmed, As e'en from autumn moons is thrown A splendour which is all their own.	295
With his sweet voice the hero spoke Saluting all the gathered folk, Then righteous-souled and great in fame Close to his mother's house he came. Lakshman the brave, his brother's peer In princely virtues, followed near, Sore troubled, but resolved to show No token of his secret woe.	300
Thus to the palace Ráma went Where all were gay with hope and joy; But well he knew the dire event That hope would mar, that bliss destroy.	305
So to his grief he would not yield Lest the sad change their hearts might rend, And, the dread tiding unrevealed, Spared from the blow each faithful friend.	310

Canto XXVI. Alone With Sítá

So Ráma, to his purpose true, To Queen Kauśalyá bade adieu, Received the benison she gave, And to the path of duty clave. As through the crowded street he passed, A radiance on the way he cast, And each fair grace, by all approved, The bosoms of the people moved.	5
--	---

Now of the woeful change no word
 The fair Videhan bride had heard; 10
 The thought of that imperial rite
 Still filled her bosom with delight.
 With grateful heart and joyful thought
 The Gods in worship she had sought,
 And, well in royal duties learned, 15
 Sat longing till her lord returned,
 Not all unmarked by grief and shame
 Within his sumptuous home he came,
 And hurried through the happy crowd
 With eye dejected, gloomy-browed. 20
 Up Sítá sprang, and every limb
 Trembled with fear at sight of him.
 She marked that cheek where anguish fed,
 Those senses care-disquieted.
 For, when he looked on her, no more 25
 Could his heart hide the load it bore,
 Nor could the pious chief control
 The paleness o'er his cheek that stole.
 His altered cheer, his brow bedewed
 With clammy drops, his grief she viewed, 30
 And cried, consumed with fires of woe,
 "What, O my lord, has changed thee so?
 Vrihaspati looks down benign,
 And the moon rests in Pushya's sign,
 As Bráhmans sage this day declare: 35
 Then whence, my lord, this grief and care?
 Why does no canopy, like foam
 For its white beauty, shade thee home,
 Its hundred ribs spread wide to throw
 Splendour on thy fair head below? 40
 Where are the royal fans, to grace
 The lotus beauty of thy face,
 Fair as the moon or wild-swan's wing,
 And waving round the new-made king?
 Why do no sweet-toned bards rejoice 45
 To hail thee with triumphant voice?
 No tuneful heralds love to raise
 Loud music in their monarch's praise?
 Why do no Bráhmans, Scripture-read,
 Pour curds and honey on thy head, 50
 Anointed, as the laws ordain,
 With holy rites, supreme to reign?
 Where are the chiefs of every guild?
 Where are the myriads should have filled
 The streets, and followed home their king 55
 With merry noise and triumphing?
 Why does no gold-wrought chariot lead
 With four brave horses, best for speed?
 No elephant precede the crowd
 Like a huge hill or thunder cloud, 60
 Marked from his birth for happy fate,
 Whom signs auspicious decorate?
 Why does no henchman, young and fair,
 Precede thee, and delight to bear
 Entrusted to his reverent hold 65

The burthen of thy throne of gold? Why, if the consecrating rite Be ready, why this mournful plight? Why do I see this sudden change, This altered mien so sad and strange?"	70
To her, as thus she weeping cried, Raghu's illustrious son replied: "Sítá, my honoured sire's decree Commands me to the woods to flee. O high-born lady, nobly bred In the good paths thy footsteps tread, Hear, Janak's daughter, while I tell The story as it all befell. Of old my father true and brave Two boons to Queen Kaikeyí gave. Through these the preparations made For me to-day by her are stayed, For he is bound to disallow This promise by that earlier vow. In Daṇḍak forest wild and vast Must fourteen years by me be passed. My father's will makes Bharat heir, The kingdom and the throne to share. Now, ere the lonely wild I seek, I come once more with thee to speak. In Bharat's presence, O my dame, Ne'er speak with pride of Ráma's name: Another's eulogy to hear Is hateful to a monarch's ear. Thou must with love his rule obey To whom my father yields the sway. With love and sweet observance learn His grace, and more the king's, to earn. Now, that my father may not break The words of promise that he spake, To the drear wood my steps are bent: Be firm, good Sítá, and content. Through all that time, my blameless spouse, Keep well thy fasts and holy vows. Rise from thy bed at break of day, And to the Gods due worship pay. With meek and lowly love revere The lord of men, my father dear, And reverence to Kauśalyá show, My mother, worn with eld and woe: By duty's law, O best of dames, High worship from thy love she claims, Nor to the other queens refuse Observance, rendering each her dues: By love and fond attention shown They are my mothers like mine own. Let Bharat and Śatrughna bear In thy sweet love a special share: Dear as my life, O let them be Like brother and like son to thee. In every word and deed refrain	75 80 85 90 95 100 105 110 115 120

From aught that Bharat's soul may pain:
 He is Ayodhyá's king and mine,
 The head and lord of all our line. 125
 For those who serve and love them much
 With weariless endeavour, touch
 And win the gracious hearts of kings.
 While wrath from disobedience springs.
 Great monarchs from their presence send
 Their lawful sons who still offend, 130
 And welcome to the vacant place
 Good children of an alien race.
 Then, best of women, rest thou here,
 And Bharat's will with love revere.
 Obedient to thy king remain, 135
 And still thy vows of truth maintain.
     To the wide wood my steps I bend:
     Make thou thy dwelling here;
     See that thy conduct ne'er offend,
     And keep my words, my dear." 140

Canto XXVII. Sítá's Speech

His sweetly-speaking bride, who best
 Deserved her lord, he thus addressed.
 Then tender love bade passion wake,
 And thus the fair Videhan spake: 5
 "What words are these that thou hast said?
 Contempt of me the thought has bred.
 O best of heroes, I dismiss
 With bitter scorn a speech like this:
 Unworthy of a warrior's fame 10
 It taints a monarch's son with shame,
 Ne'er to be heard from those who know
 The science of the sword and bow.
 My lord, the mother, sire, and son
 Receive their lots by merit won; 15
 The brother and the daughter find
 The portions to their deeds assigned.
 The wife alone, whate'er await,
 Must share on earth her husband's fate.
 So now the king's command which sends
 Thee to the wild, to me extends. 20
 The wife can find no refuge, none,
 In father, mother, self, or son:
 Both here, and when they vanish hence,
 Her husband is her sole defence.
 If, Raghu's son, thy steps are led 25
 Where Daṇḍak's pathless wilds are spread,
 My foot before thine own shall pass
 Through tangled thorn and matted grass.
 Dismiss thine anger and thy doubt:
 Like refuse water cast them out, 30
 And lead me, O my hero, hence—
 I know not sin—with confidence.
 Whate'er his lot, 'tis far more sweet
 To follow still a husband's feet
 Than in rich palaces to lie, 35

Or roam at pleasure through the sky.
 My mother and my sire have taught
 What duty bids, and trained each thought,
 Nor have I now mine ear to turn
 The duties of a wife to learn. 40
 I'll seek with thee the woodland dell
 And pathless wild where no men dwell,
 Where tribes of silvan creatures roam,
 And many a tiger makes his home. 45
 My life shall pass as pleasant there
 As in my father's palace fair.
 The worlds shall wake no care in me;
 My only care be truth to thee.
 There while thy wish I still obey,
 True to my vows with thee I'll stray, 50
 And there shall blissful hours be spent
 In woods with honey redolent.
 In forest shades thy mighty arm
 Would keep a stranger's life from harm,
 And how shall Sítá think of fear 55
 When thou, O glorious lord, art near?
 Heir of high bliss, my choice is made,
 Nor can I from my will be stayed.
 Doubt not; the earth will yield me roots,
 These will I eat, and woodland fruits; 60
 And as with thee I wander there
 I will not bring thee grief or care.
 I long, when thou, wise lord, art nigh,
 All fearless, with delighted eye
 To gaze upon the rocky hill, 65
 The lake, the fountain, and the rill;
 To sport with thee, my limbs to cool,
 In some pure lily-covered pool,
 While the white swan's and mallard's wings
 Are plashing in the water-springs. 70
 So would a thousand seasons flee
 Like one sweet day, if spent with thee.
 Without my lord I would not prize
 A home with Gods above the skies:
 Without my lord, my life to bless, 75
 Where could be heaven or happiness?
 Forbid me not: with thee I go
     The tangled wood to tread.
 There will I live with thee, as though
 This roof were o'er my head. 80
 My will for thine shall be resigned;
     Thy feet my steps shall guide.
 Thou, only thou, art in my mind:
     I heed not all beside.
 Thy heart shall ne'er by me be grieved; 85
     Do not my prayer deny:
 Take me, dear lord; of thee bereaved
     Thy Sítá swears to die."
 These words the duteous lady spake,
 Nor would he yet consent 90
 His faithful wife with him to take
     To share his banishment.

He soothed her with his gentle speech;
 To change her will he strove;
 And much he said the woes to teach 95
 Of those in wilds who rove.

Canto XXVIII. The Dangers Of The Wood

Thus Sítá spake, and he who knew
 His duty, to its orders true,
 Was still reluctant as the woes
 Of forest life before him rose.
 He sought to soothe her grief, to dry 5
 The torrent from each brimming eye,
 And then, her firm resolve to shake,
 These words the pious hero spake:

“O daughter of a noble line,
 Whose steps from virtue ne’er decline, 10
 Remain, thy duties here pursue,
 As my fond heart would have thee do.
 Now hear me, Sítá, fair and weak,
 And do the words that I shall speak.

Attend and hear while I explain 15
 Each danger in the wood, each pain.
 Thy lips have spoken: I condemn
 The foolish words that fell from them.

This senseless plan, this wish of thine 20
 To live a forest life, resign.
 The names of trouble and distress
 Suit well the tangled wilderness.

In the wild wood no joy I know,
 A forest life is nought but woe.
 The lion in his mountain cave 25
 Answers the torrents as they rave,
 And forth his voice of terror throws:

The wood, my love, is full of woes.
 There mighty monsters fearless play,
 And in their maddened onset slay 30
 The hapless wretch who near them goes:

The wood, my love, is full of woes.
 ‘Tis hard to ford each treacherous flood,
 So thick with crocodiles and mud,
 Where the wild elephants repose: 35

The wood, my love, is full of woes.
 Or far from streams the wanderer strays
 Through thorns and creeper-tangled ways,
 While round him many a wild-cock crows:

The wood, my love, is full of woes. 40
 On the cold ground upon a heap
 Of gathered leaves condemned to sleep,
 Toil-wearied, will his eyelids close:

The wood, my love, is full of woes.
 Long days and nights must he content 45
 His soul with scanty aliment,
 What fruit the wind from branches blows:

The wood, my love, is full of woes.
 O Sítá, while his strength may last,

The ascetic in the wood must fast, Coil on his head his matted hair, And bark must be his only wear. To Gods and spirits day by day The ordered worship he must pay, And honour with respectful care	50
Each wandering guest who meets him there. The bathing rites he ne'er must shun At dawn, at noon, at set of sun, Obedient to the law he knows: The wood, my love, is full of woes.	55
To grace the altar must be brought The gift of flowers his hands have sought— The debt each pious hermit owes: The wood, my love, is full of woes. The devotee must be content	60
To live, severely abstinent, On what the chance of fortune shows: The wood, my love, is full of woes. Hunger afflicts him evermore: The nights are black, the wild winds roar;	65
And there are dangers worse than those: The wood, my love, is full of woes. There creeping things in every form Infest the earth, the serpents swarm, And each proud eye with fury glows:	70
The wood, my love, is full of woes. The snakes that by the rives hide In sinuous course like rivers glide, And line the path with deadly foes: The wood, my love, is full of woes.	75
Scorpions, and grasshoppers, and flies Disturb the wanderer as he lies, And wake him from his troubled doze: The wood, my love, is full of woes. Trees, thorny bushes, intertwined,	80
Their branched ends together bind, And dense with grass the thicket grows: The wood, my dear, is full of woes, With many ills the flesh is tried, When these and countless fears beside	85
Vex those who in the wood remain: The wilds are naught but grief and pain. Hope, anger must be cast aside, To penance every thought applied: No fear must be of things to fear:	90
Hence is the wood for ever drear. Enough, my love: thy purpose quit: For forest life thou art not fit. As thus I think on all, I see The wild wood is no place for thee.”	95

Canto XXIX. Sítá's Appeal

Thus Ráma spake. Her lord's address
The lady heard with deep distress,
And, as the tear bedimmed her eye,

In soft low accents made reply:
 "The perils of the wood, and all 5
 The woes thou countest to appal,
 Led by my love I deem not pain;
 Each woe a charm, each loss a gain.
 Tiger, and elephant, and deer,
 Bull, lion, buffalo, in fear, 10
 Soon as thy matchless form they see,
 With every silvan beast will flee.
 With thee, O Râma, I must go:
 My sire's command ordains it so.
 Bereft of thee, my lonely heart 15
 Must break, and life and I must part.
 While thou, O mighty lord, art nigh,
 Not even He who rules the sky,
 Though He is strongest of the strong,
 With all his might can do me wrong. 20
 Nor can a lonely woman left
 By her dear husband live bereft.
 In my great love, my lord, I ween,
 The truth of this thou mayst have seen.
 In my sire's palace long ago 25
 I heard the chief of those who know,
 The truth-declaring Brâhmans, tell
 My fortune, in the wood to dwell.
 I heard their promise who divine
 The future by each mark and sign, 30
 And from that hour have longed to lead
 The forest life their lips decreed.
 Now, mighty Râma, I must share
 Thy father's doom which sends thee there;
 In this I will not be denied, 35
 But follow, love, where thou shalt guide.
 O husband, I will go with thee,
 Obedient to that high decree.
 Now let the Brâhmans' words be true,
 For this the time they had in view. 40
 I know full well the wood has woes;
 But they disturb the lives of those
 Who in the forest dwell, nor hold
 Their rebel senses well controlled.
 In my sire's halls, ere I was wed, 45
 I heard a dame who begged her bread
 Before my mother's face relate
 What griefs a forest life await.
 And many a time in sport I prayed
 To seek with thee the greenwood shade, 50
 For O, my heart on this is set,
 To follow thee, dear anchoret.
 May blessings on thy life attend:
 I long with thee my steps to bend,
 For with such hero as thou art 55
 This pilgrimage enchants my heart.
 Still close, my lord, to thy dear side
 My spirit will be purified:
 Love from all sin my soul will free:
 My husband is a God to me. 60

So, love, with thee shall I have bliss And share the life that follows this. I heard a Bráhmaṇ, dear to fame, This ancient Scripture text proclaim: “The woman whom on earth below	65
Her parents on a man bestow, And lawfully their hands unite With water and each holy rite, She in this world shall be his wife, His also in the after life.”	70
Then tell me, O beloved, why Thou wilt this earnest prayer deny, Nor take me with thee to the wood, Thine own dear wife so true and good. But if thou wilt not take me there	75
Thus grieving in my wild despair, To fire or water I will fly, Or to the poisoned draught, and die.”
So thus to share his exile, she Besought him with each earnest plea, Nor could she yet her lord persuade To take her to the lonely shade. The answer of the strong-armed chief Smote the Videha’s soul with grief, And from her eyes the torrents came bathing the bosom of the dame.	80 85

Canto XXX. The Triumph Of Love

The daughter of Videha’s king, While Ráma strove to soothe the sting Of her deep anguish, thus began Once more in furtherance of her plan: And with her spirit sorely tried By fear and anger, love and pride, With keenly taunting words addressed Her hero of the stately breast: “Why did the king my sire, who reigns O’er fair Videha’s wide domains, Hail Ráma son with joy unwise, A woman in a man’s disguise? Now falsely would the people say, By idle fancies led astray, That Ráma’s own are power and might, As glorious as the Lord of Light. Why sinkest thou in such dismay? What fears upon thy spirit weigh, That thou, O Ráma, fain wouldst flee From her who thinks of naught but thee? To thy dear will am I resigned In heart and body, soul and mind, As Sávitrí gave all to one, Satyaván, Dyumatsena’s son. Not èen in fancy can I brook To any guard save thee to look: Let meaner wives their houses shame,	5 10 15 20 25
--	---------------------------

To go with thee is all my claim.
 Like some low actor, deemst thou fit
 Thy wife to others to commit—
 Thine own, espoused in maiden youth, 30
 Thy wife so long, unblamed for truth?
 Do thou, my lord, his will obey
 For whom thou lovest royal sway,
 To whom thou wouldst thy wife confide—
 Not me, but thee, his wish may guide. 35
 Thou must not here thy wife forsake,
 And to the wood thy journey make,
 Whether stern penance, grief, and care,
 Or rule or heaven await thee there.
 Nor shall fatigue my limbs distress 40
 When wandering in the wilderness:
 Each path which near to thee I tread
 Shall seem a soft luxurious bed.
 The reeds, the bushes where I pass,
 The thorny trees, the tangled grass 45
 Shall feel, if only thou be near,
 Soft to my touch as skins of deer.
 When the rude wind in fury blows,
 And scattered dust upon me throws,
 That dust, beloved lord, to me 50
 Shall as the precious sandal be.
 And what shall be more blest than I,
 When gazing on the wood I lie
 In some green glade upon a bed
 With sacred grass beneath us spread? 55
 The root, the leaf, the fruit which thou
 Shalt give me from the earth or bough,
 Scanty or plentiful, to eat,
 Shall taste to me as Amrit sweet.
 As there I live on flowers and roots 60
 And every season's kindly fruits,
 I will not for my mother grieve,
 My sire, my home, or all I leave.
 My presence, love, shall never add
 One pain to make the heart more sad; 65
 I will not cause thee grief or care,
 Nor be a burden hard to bear.
 With thee is heaven, where'er the spot;
 Each place is hell where thou art not.
 Then go with me, O Râma; this 70
 Is all my hope and all my bliss.
 If thou wilt leave thy wife who still Entreats thee with undaunted will,
 This very day shall poison close
 The life that spurns the rule of foes. 75
 How, after, can my soul sustain
 The bitter life of endless pain,
 When thy dear face, my lord, I miss?
 No, death is better far than this.
 Not for an hour could I endure 80
 The deadly grief that knows not cure,
 Far less a woe I could not shun
 For ten long years, and three, and one."

While fires of woe consumed her, such
 Her sad appeal, lamenting much; 85
 Then with a wild cry, anguish-wrung,
 About her husband's neck she clung.
 Like some she-elephant who bleeds
 Struck by the hunter's venomed reeds,
 So in her quivering heart she felt 90
 The many wounds his speeches dealt.
 Then, as the spark from wood is gained,
 Down rolled the tear so long restrained:
 The crystal moisture, sprung from woe,
 From her sweet eyes began to flow, 95
 As runs the water from a pair
 Of lotuses divinely fair.
 And Sítá's face with long dark eyes,
 Pure as the moon of autumn skies,
 Faded with weeping, as the buds 100
 Of lotuses when sink the floods.
 Around his wife his arms he strained,
 Who senseless from her woe remained,
 And with sweet words, that bade her wake
 To life again, the hero spake: 105
 "I would not with thy woe, my Queen,
 Buy heaven and all its blissful sheen.
 Void of all fear am I as He,
 The self-existent God, can be.
 I knew not all thy heart till now, 110
 Dear lady of the lovely brow,
 So wished not thee in woods to dwell;
 Yet there mine arm can guard thee well.
 Now surely thou, dear love, wast made
 To dwell with me in green wood shade. 115
 And, as a high saint's tender mind
 Clings to its love for all mankind,
 So I to thee will ever cling,
 Sweet daughter of Videha's king.
 The good, of old, O soft of frame, 120
 Honoured this duty's sovereign claim,
 And I its guidance will not shun,
 True as light's Queen is to the Sun.
 I cannot, pride of Janak's line,
 This journey to the wood decline: 125
 My sire's behest, the oath he sware,
 The claims of truth, all lead me there.
 One duty, dear the same for aye,
 Is sire and mother to obey:
 Should I their orders once transgress 130
 My very life were weariness.
 If glad obedience be denied
 To father, mother, holy guide,
 What rites, what service can be done
 That stern Fate's favour may be won? 135
 These three the triple world comprise,
 O darling of the lovely eyes.
 Earth has no holy thing like these
 Whom with all love men seek to please.
 Not truth, or gift, or bended knee,

Not honour, worship, lordly fee, 140
 Storms heaven and wins a blessing thence
 Like sonly love and reverence.
 Heaven, riches, grain, and varied lore,
 With sons and many a blessing more, 145
 All these are made their own with ease
 By those their elders' souls who please.
 The mighty-souled, who nêr forget,
 Devoted sons, their filial debt,
 Win worlds where Gods and minstrels are,
 And Brahmá's sphere more glorious far. 150
 Now as the orders of my sire,
 Who keeps the way of truth, require,
 So will I do, for such the way
 Of duty that endures for aye:
 To take thee, love, to Daṇḍak's wild 155
 My heart at length is reconciled,
 For thee such earnest thoughts impel
 To follow, and with me to dwell.
 O faultless form from feet to brows,
 Come with me, as my will allows, 160
 And duty there with me pursue,
 Trembler, whose bright eyes thrill me through.
 In all thy days, come good come ill,
 Preserve unchanged such noble will,
 And thou, dear love, wilt ever be 165
 The glory of thy house and me.
 Now, beauteous-armed, begin the tasks
 The woodland life of hermits asks.
 For me the joys of heaven above
 Have charms no more without thee, love. 170
 And now, dear Sítá, be not slow:
 Food on good mendicants bestow,
 And for the holy Bráhmans bring
 Thy treasures and each precious thing.
 Thy best attire and gems collect, 175
 The jewels which thy beauty decked,
 And every ornament and toy
 Prepared for hours of sport and joy:
 The beds, the cars wherein I ride,
 Among our followers, next, divide." 180

She conscious that her lord approved
 Her going, with great rapture moved,
 Hastened within, without delay,
 Prepared to give their wealth away.

Canto XXXI. Lakshman's Prayer

When Lakshman, who had joined them there,
 Had heard the converse of the pair,
 His mien was changed, his eyes o'erflowed,
 His breast no more could bear its load.
 The son of Raghu, sore distressed, 5
 His brother's feet with fervour pressed,
 While thus to Sítá he complained,
 And him by lofty vows enchained:

“If thou wilt make the woods thy home,  Where elephant and roebuck roam,  I too this day will take my bow  And in the path before thee go.  Our way will lie through forest ground  Where countless birds and beasts are found,  I heed not homes of Gods on high,  I heed not life that cannot die,  Nor would I wish, with thee away,  O’er the three worlds to stretch my sway.”	10
Thus Lakshman spake, with earnest prayer  His brother’s woodland life to share.  As Ráma still his prayer denied  With soothing words, again he cried:  “When leave at first thou didst accord,  Why dost thou stay me now, my lord?  Thou art my refuge: O, be kind,  Leave me not, dear my lord, behind.  Thou canst not, brother, if thou choose  That I still live, my wish refuse.”	20
The glorious chief his speech renewed  To faithful Lakshman as he sued,  And on the eyes of Ráma gazed  Longing to lead, with hands upraised:  “Thou art a hero just and dear,  Whose steps to virtue’s path adhere,  Loved as my life till life shall end,  My faithful brother and my friend.  If to the woods thou take thy way  With Sítá and with me to-day,  Who for Kauśalyá will provide,  And guard the good Sumitrá’s side?  The lord of earth, of mighty power,  Who sends good things in plenteous shower,  As Indra pours the grateful rain,  A captive lies in passion’s chain.  The power imperial for her son  Has Aśvapati’s daughter won,  And she, proud queen, will little heed  Her miserable rivals’ need.  So Bharat, ruler of the land,  By Queen Kaikeyi’s side will stand,  Nor of those two will ever think,  While grieving in despair they sink.  Now, Lakshman, as thy love decrees,  Or else the monarch’s heart to please,  Follow this counsel and protect  My honoured mother from neglect.  So thou, while not to me alone  Thy great affection will be shown,  To highest duty wilt adhere  By serving those thou shouldst revere.  Now, son of Raghu, for my sake  Obey this one request I make,  Or, of her darling son bereft,  Kauśalyá has no comfort left.”	30

The faithful Lakshman, thus addressed In gentle words which love expressed, To him in lore of language learned, His answer, eloquent, returned:	65
“Nay, through thy might each queen will share Attentive Bharat’s love and care, Should Bharat, raised as king to sway This noblest realm, his trust betray, Nor for their safety well provide, Seduced by ill-suggesting pride, Doubt not my vengeful hand shall kill The cruel wretch who counsels ill— Kill him and all who lend him aid, And the three worlds in league arrayed. And good Kauśalyā well can fee A thousand champions like to me. A thousand hamlets rich in grain The station of that queen maintain. She may, and my dear mother too, Live on the ample revenue. Then let me follow thee: herein: Is naught that may resemble sin. So shall I in my wish succeed, And aid, perhaps, my brother’s need. My bow and quiver well supplied With arrows hanging at my side, My hands shall spade and basket bear, And for thy feet the way prepare. I’ll bring thee roots and berries sweet. And woodland fare which hermits eat. Thou shall with thy Videhan spouse Recline upon the mountain’s brows; Be mine the toil, be mine to keep Watch o’er thee waking or asleep.”	70 75 80 85 90 95
Filled by his speech with joy and pride, Rāma to Lakshman thus replied: “Go then, my brother, bid adieu To all thy friends and retinue. And those two bows of fearful might, Celestial, which, at that famed rite, Lord Varuṇ gave to Janak, king Of fair Vedeha with thee bring, With heavenly coats of sword-proof mail, Quivers, whose arrows never fail, And golden-hilted swords so keen, The rivals of the sun in sheen. Tended with care these arms are all Preserved in my preceptor’s hall. With speed, O Lakshman, go, produce, And bring them hither for our use.” So on a woodland life intent, To see his faithful friends he went, And brought the heavenly arms which lay By Rāma’s teacher stored away. And Raghu’s son to Rāma showed Those wondrous arms which gleamed and glowed,	100 105 110 115 120

Well kept, adorned with many a wreath
 Of flowers on case, and hilt, and sheath.
 The prudent Ráma at the sight
 Addressed his brother with delight: 125
 “Well art thou come, my brother dear,
 For much I longed to see thee here.
 For with thine aid, before I go,
 I would my gold and wealth bestow
 Upon the Bráhmans sage, who school 130
 Their lives by stern devotion’s rule.
 And for all those who ever dwell
 Within my house and serve me well,
 Devoted servants, true and good,
 Will I provide a livelihood.
 Quick, go and summon to this place 135
     The good Vaśishṭha’s son,
 Suyajña, of the Bráhman race
     The first and holiest one.
 To all the Bráhmans wise and good
     Will I due reverence pay, 140
 Then to the solitary wood
     With thee will take my way.”

Book III

Canto XLII. Márícha Transformed

Márícha thus in wild unrest
 With bitter words the king addressed.
 Then to his giant lord in dread,
 “Arise, and let us go,” he said. 5
 “Ah, I have met that mighty lord
 Armed with his shafts and bow and sword,
 And if again that bow he bend
 Our lives that very hour will end.
 For none that warrior can provoke
 And think to fly his deadly stroke. 10
 Like Yáma with his staff is he,
 And his dread hand will slaughter thee.
 What can I more? My words can find
 No passage to thy stubborn mind.
 I go, great King, thy task to share, 15
 And may success attend thee there.”

With that reply and bold consent
 The giant king was well content.
 He strained Márícha to his breast
 And thus with joyful words addressed: 20
 “There spoke a hero dauntless still,
 Obedient to his master’s will,
 Márícha’s proper self once more:
 Some other took thy shape before.
 Come, mount my jewelled car that flies. 25
 Will-governed, through the yielding skies.
 These asses, goblin-faced, shall bear
 Us quickly through the fields of air.

Attract the lady with thy shape,
Then through the wood, at will, escape. 30
And I, when she has no defence,
Will seize the dame and bear her thence.”

Again Mārīcha made reply,
Consent and will to signify. 35
With rapid speed the giants two
From the calm hermit dwelling flew,
Borne in that wondrous chariot, meet
For some great God’s celestial seat.
They from their airy path looked down
On many a wood and many a town, 40
On lake and river, brook and rill,
City and realm and towering hill.
Soon he whom giant hosts obeyed,
Mārīcha by his side, surveyed
The dark expanse of Daṇḍak wood 45
Where Rāma’s hermit cottage stood.
They left the flying car, whereon
The wealth of gold and jewels shone,
And thus the giant king addressed
Mārīcha as his hand he pressed: 50

“Mārīcha, look! before our eyes
Round Rāma’s home the plantains rise.
His hermitage is now in view:
Quick to the work we came to do!”

Thus Rāvaṇ spoke, Mārīcha heard 55
Obedient to his master’s word,
Threw off his giant shape and near
The cottage strayed a beauteous deer.
With magic power, by rapid change,
His borrowed form was fair and strange. 60
A sapphire tipped each horn with light;
His face was black relieved with white.
The turkis and the ruby shed
A glory from his ears and head.
His arching neck was proudly raised, 65
And lazulites beneath it blazed.
With roseate bloom his flanks were dyed,
And lotus tints adorned his hide.
His shape was fair, compact, and slight;
His hoofs were carven lazulite. 70
His tail with every changing glow
Displayed the hues of Indra’s bow.
With glossy skin so strangely flecked,
With tints of every gem bedecked.
A light o’er Rāma’s home he sent, 75
And through the wood, where’er he went.
The giant clad in that strange dress
That took the soul with loveliness,
To charm the fair Videhan’s eyes
With mingled wealth of mineral dyes, 80
Moved onward, cropping in his way,
The grass and grain and tender spray.

His coat with drops of silver bright, A form to gaze on with delight, He raised his fair neck as he went To browse on bud and filament.	85
Now in the Cassia grove he strayed, Now by the cot in plantains' shade. Slowly and slowly on he came To catch the glances of the dame, And the tall deer of splendid hue Shone full at length in Sítá's view. He roamed where'er his fancy chose Where Ráma's leafy cottage rose.	90
Now near, now far, in careless ease, He came and went among the trees. Now with light feet he turned to fly, Now, reassured, again drew nigh: Now gambolled close with leap and bound, Now lay upon the grassy ground:	95
Now sought the door, devoid of fear, And mingled with the troop of deer; Led them a little way, and thence Again returned with confidence.	100
Now flying far, now turning back Emboldened on his former track, Seeking to win the lady's glance He wandered through the green expanse. Then thronging round, the woodland deer Gazed on his form with wondering fear;	105
A while they followed where he led, Then snuffed the tainted gale and fled. The giant, though he longed to slay The startled quarry, spared the prey, And mindful of the shape he wore To veil his nature, still forbore.	110
Then Sítá of the glorious eye, Returning from her task drew nigh; For she had sought the wood to bring Each loveliest flower of early spring.	115
Now would the bright-eyed lady choose Some gorgeous bud with blending hues, Now plucked the mango's spray, and now The bloom from an Aśoka bough.	120
She with her beauteous form, unmeet For woodland life and lone retreat, That wondrous dappled deer beheld Gemmed with rich pearls, unparalleled,	125
His silver hair the lady saw, His radiant teeth and lips and jaw, And gazed with rapture as her eyes Expanded in their glad surprise.	130
And when the false deer's glances fell On her whom Ráma loved so well, He wandered here and there, and cast A luminous beauty as he passed; And Janak's child with strange delight Kept gazing on the unwonted sight.	135

Canto XLIII. The Wondrous Deer

She stooped, her hands with flowers to fill,
 But gazed upon the marvel still:
 Gazed on its back and sparkling side
 Where silver hues with golden vie.
 Joyous was she of faultless mould, 5
 With glossy skin like polished gold.
 And loudly to her husband cried
 And bow-armed Lakshmaṇ by his side:
 Again, again she called in glee:
 "O come this glorious creature see; 10
 Quick, quick, my lord, this deer to view.
 And bring thy brother Lakshmaṇ too."
 As through the wood her clear tones rang,
 Swift to her side the brothers sprang.
 With eager eyes the grove they scanned, 15
 And saw the deer before them stand.
 But doubt was strong in Lakshmaṇ's breast,
 Who thus his thought and fear expressed:

 "Stay, for the wondrous deer we see
 The fiend Mārīcha's self may be. 20
 Ere now have kings who sought this place
 To take their pastime in the chase,
 Met from his wicked art defeat,
 And fallen slain by like deceit.
 He wears, well trained in magic guile, 25
 The figure of a deer a while,
 Bright as the very sun, or place
 Where dwell the gay Gandharva race.
 No deer, O Rāma, e'er was seen
 Thus decked with gold and jewels' sheen. 30
 'Tis magic, for the world has ne'er,
 Lord of the world, shown aught so fair."

But Sítá of the lovely smile,
 A captive to the giant's wile,
 Turned Lakshmaṇ's prudent speech aside 35
 And thus with eager words replied:
 "My honoured lord, this deer I see
 With beauty rare enraptures me.
 Go, chief of mighty arm, and bring
 For my delight this precious thing. 40
 Fair creatures of the woodland roam
 Untroubled near our hermit home.
 The forest cow and stag are there,
 The fawn, the monkey, and the bear,
 Where spotted deer delight to play, 45
 And strong and beauteous Kinnars stray.
 But never, as they wandered by,
 Has such a beauty charmed mine eye
 As this with limbs so fair and slight,
 So gentle, beautiful and bright. 50
 O see, how fair it is to view
 With jewels of each varied hue:
 Bright as the rising moon it glows,
 Lighting the wood where'er it goes.

As from a cloud the lightning darts.	110
O see his sunlike forehead shine With emerald tints and almandine, While pearly light and roseate glow Of shells adorn his neck below.
No eye on such a deer can rest	115
But soft enchantment takes the breast: No man so fair a thing behold Ablaze with light of radiant gold, Celestial, bright with jewels' sheen, Nor marvel when his eyes have seen.	120
A king equipped with bow and shaft Delights in gentle forest craft, And as in boundless woods he strays The quarry for the venison slays.
There as he wanders with his train	125
A store of wealth he oft may gain. He claims by right the precious ore, He claims the jewels' sparkling store. Such gains are dearer in his eyes Than wealth that in his chamber lies,	130
The dearest things his spirit knows, Dear as the bliss which Śukra chose. But oft the rich expected gain Which heedless men pursue in vain,	135
The sage, who prudent counsels know, Explain and in a moment show. This best of deer, this gem of all, To yield his precious spoils must fall, And tender Sítá by my side Shall sit upon the golden hide.	140
Néer could I find so rich a coat On spotted deer or sheep or goat. No buck or antelope has such, So bright to view, so soft to touch.
This radiant deer and one on high	145
That moves in glory through the sky, Alike in heavenly beauty are, One on the earth and one a star. But, brother, if thy fears be true, And this bright creature that we view	150
Be fierce Márícha in disguise, Then by this hand he surely dies. For that dire fiend who spurns control With bloody hand and cruel soul, Has roamed this forest and dismayed	155
The holiest saints who haunt the shade. Great archers, sprung of royal race, Pursuing in the wood the chase, Have fallen by his wicked art, And now my shaft shall strike his heart.	160
Vatápi, by his magic power Made heedless saints his flesh devour, Then, from within their frames he rent Forth bursting from imprisonment. But once his art in senseless pride Upon the mightiest saint he tried,	165

Agastya's self, and caused him taste
 The baited meal before him placed.
 Vátápi, when the rite was o'er,
 Would take the giant form he wore, 170
 But Saint Agastya knew his wile
 And checked the giant with smile.
 "Vátápi, thou with cruel spite
 Hast conquered many an anchorite
 The noblest of the Bráhman caste,— 175
 And now thy ruin comes at last."
 Now if my power he thus defies,
 This giant, like Vátápi dies,
 Daring to scorn a man like me,
 A self subduing devotee. 180
 Yea, as Agastya slew the foe,
 My hand shall lay Márícha low
 Clad in thine arms thy bow in hand,
 To guard the Maithil lady stand,
 With watchful eye and thoughtful breast 185
 Keeping each word of my behest
 I go, and hunting through the brake
 This wondrous deer will bring or take.
 Yea surely I will bring the spoil
 Returning from my hunter's toil 190
 See, Lakshmaṇ how my consort's eyes
 Are longing for the lovely prize.
 This day it falls, that I may win
 The treasure of so fair a skin.
 Do thou and Sítá watch with care 195
 Lest danger seize you unaware.
 Swift from my bow one shaft will fly;
 The stricken deer will fall and die
 Then quickly will I strip the game
 And bring the trophy to my dame. 200
 Jaṭáyus, guardian good and wise,
 Our old and faithful friend,
 The best and strongest bird that flies,
 His willing aid will lend
 The Maithil lady well protect, 205
 For every chance provide,
 And in thy tender care suspect
 A foe on every side."

Canto XLIV. Márícha's Death

Thus having warned his brother bold
 He grasped his sword with haft of gold,
 And bow with triple flexure bent,
 His own delight and ornament;
 Then bound two quivers to his side, 5
 And hurried forth with eager stride.
 Soon as the antlered monarch saw
 The lord of monarchs near him draw,
 A while with trembling heart he fled,
 Then turned and showed his stately head. 10
 With sword and bow the chief pursued
 Where'er the fleeing deer he viewed
 Sending from dell and lone recess

The splendour of his loveliness. 15
 Now full in view the creature stood
 Now vanished in the depth of wood;
 Now running with a languid flight,
 Now like a meteor lost to sight.
 With trembling limbs away he sped;
 Then like the moon with clouds oerspread 20
 Gleamed for a moment bright between
 The trees, and was again unseen.
 Thus in the magic deer's disguise
 Márícha lured him to the prize,
 And seen a while, then lost to view, 25
 Far from his cot the hero drew.
 Still by the flying game deceived
 The hunter's heart was wroth and grieved,
 And wearied with the fruitless chase
 He stayed him in a shady place. 30
 Again the rover of the night
 Enraged the chieftain, full in sight,
 Slow moving in the coppice near,
 Surrounded by the woodland deer.
 Again the hunter sought the game 35
 That seemed a while to court his aim:
 But seized again with sudden dread,
 Beyond his sight the creature fled.
 Again the hero left the shade,
 Again the deer before him strayed. 40
 With surer hope and stronger will
 The hunter longed his prey to kill.
 Then as his soul impatient grew,
 An arrow from his side he drew,
 Resplendent at the sunbeam's glow, 45
 The crusher of the smitten foe.
 With skillful heed the mighty lord
 Fixed well shaft and strained the cord.
 Upon the deer his eyes he bent,
 And like a fiery serpent went 50
 The arrow Brahma's self had framed,
 Alive with sparks that hissed and flamed,
 Like Indra's flashing levin, true
 To the false deer the missile flew
 Cleaving his flesh that wonderous dart 55
 Stood quivering in Márícha's heart.
 Scarce from the ground one foot he sprang,
 Then stricken fell with deadly pang.
 Half lifeless, as he pressed the ground,
 He gave a roar of awful sound 60
 And ere the wounded giant died
 He threw his borrowed form aside
 Remembering still his lord's behest
 He pondered in his heart how best
 Sítá might send her guard away, 65
 And Rávaṇ seize the helpless prey.
 The monster knew the time was nigh,
 And called aloud with eager cry,
 "Ho, Sítá, Lakshmaṇ" and the tone
 He borrowed was like Ráma's own. 70

So by that matchless arrow cleft,
 The deer's bright form Márícha left,
 Resumed his giant shape and size
 And closed in death his languid eyes. 75
 When Ráma saw his awful foe
 Gasp, smeared with blood, in deadly throe,
 His anxious thoughts to Sítá sped,
 And the wise words that Lakshmaṇ said,
 That this was false Márícha's art,
 Returned again upon his heart. 80
 He knew the foe he triumphed o'er
 The name of great Márícha bore.
 "The fiend," he pondered, 'ere he died,
 "Ho, Lakshmaṇ! ho, my Sítá!" cried
 Ah, if that cry has reached her ear, 85
 How dire must be my darling's fear!
 And Lakshmaṇ of the mighty arm,
 What thinks he in his wild alarm?
 As thus he thought in sad surmise,
 Each startled hair began to rise, 90
 And when he saw the giant slain
 And thought upon that cry again,
 His spirit sank and terror pressed
 Full sorely on the hero's breast.
 Another deer he chased and struck, 95
 He bore away the the fallen buck,
 To Janasthán then turned his face
 And hastened to his dwelling place.

Canto XLV. Lakshman's Departure

But Sítá hearing as she thought,
 Her husband's cry with anguish fraught,
 Called to her guardian, "Lakshmaṇ, run
 And in the wood seek Raghu's son.
 Scarce can my heart retain its throne, 5
 Scarce can my life be called mine own,
 As all my powers and senses fail
 At that long, loud and bitter wail.
 Haste to the wood with all thy speed
 And save thy brother in his need. 10
 Go, save him in the distant glade
 Where loud he calls, for timely aid.
 He falls beneath some giant foe—
 A bull whom lions overthrow."

Deaf to her prayer, no step he stirred 15
 Obedient to his mother's word,
 Then Janak's child, with ire inflamed,
 In words of bitter scorn exclaimed

"Sumitrá's son, a friend in show,
 Thou art in truth thy brother's foe, 20
 Who canst at such any hour deny
 Thy succour and neglect his cry.
 Yes, Lakshmaṇ, smit with love of me
 Thy brother's death thou fain wouldst see.
 This guilty love thy heart has swayed 25

And makes thy feet so loth to aid.
 Thou hast no love for Râma, no:
 Thy joy is vice, thy thoughts are low
 Hence thus unmoved thou yet canst stay
 While my dear lord is far away. 30
 If aught of ill my lord betide
 Who led thee here, thy chief and guide,
 Ah, what will be my hapless fate
 Left in the wild wood desolate!"

Thus spoke the lady sad with fear, 35
 With many a sigh and many a tear,
 Still trembling like a captured doe:
 And Lakshman spoke to calm her woe:

"Videhan Queen, be sure of this,—
 And at the thought thy fear dismiss,— 40
 Thy husband's mightier power defies
 All Gods and angels of the skies,
 Gandharvas, and the sons of light,
 Serpents, and rovers of the night.
 I tell thee, of the sons of earth, 45
 Of Gods who boast celestial birth,
 Of beasts and birds and giant hosts,
 Of demigods, Gandharvas, ghosts,
 Of awful fiends, O thou most fair,
 There lives not one whose heart would dare 50
 To meet thy Râma in the fight,
 Like Indra's self unmatched in might.
 Such idle words thou must not say
 Thy Râma lives whom none may slay.
 I will not, cannot leave thee here 55
 In the wild wood till he be near.
 The mightiest strength can ne'er withstand
 His eager force, his vigorous hand.
 No, not the triple world allied
 With all the immortal Gods beside. 60
 Dismiss thy fear, again take heart,
 Let all thy doubt and woe depart.
 Thy lord, be sure, will soon be here
 And bring thee back that best of deer.
 Not his, not his that mournful cry, 65
 Nor haply came it from the sky.
 Some giant's art was busy there
 And framed a castle based on air.
 A precious pledge art thou, consigned
 To me by him of noblest mind, 70
 Nor can I fairest dame, forsake
 The pledge which Râma bade me take.
 Upon our heads, O Queen, we drew
 The giants' hate when Râma slew
 Their chieftain Khara, and the shade 75
 Of Janasthân in ruin laid.
 Through all this mighty wood they rove
 With varied cries from grove to grove
 On rapine bent they wander here:
 But O, dismiss thy causeless fear." 80

- Bright flashed her eye as Lakshman spoke
 And forth her words of fury broke Upon her truthful guardian, flung
 With bitter taunts that pierced and stung:
 "Shame on such false compassion, base
 Defiler of thy glorious race!
 'Twere joyous sight I ween to thee
 My lord in direst strait to see.
 Thou knowest Ráma sore bested,
 Or word like this thou ne'er hadst said.
 No marvel if we find such sin
 In rivals false to kith and kin.
 Wretches like thee of evil kind,
 Concealing crime with crafty mind.
 Thou, wretch, thine aid wilt still deny,
 And leave my lord alone to die.
 Has love of me unnerved thy hand,
 Or Bharat's art this ruin planned?
 But be the treachery his or thine,
 In vain, in vain the base design.
 For how shall I, the chosen bride
 Of dark-hued Ráma, lotus-eyed,
 The queen who once called Ráma mine,
 To love of other men decline?
 Believe me, Lakshman, Ráma's wife
 Before thine eyes will quit this life,
 And not a moment will she stay
 If her dear lord have passed away."
- The lady's bitter speech, that stirred
 Each hair upon his frame, he heard.
 With lifted hands together laid,
 His calm reply he gently made:
- "No words have I to answer now:
 My deity, O Queen, art thou.
 But 'tis no marvel, dame, to find
 Such lack of sense in womankind.
 Throughout this world, O Maithil dame,
 Weak women's hearts are still the same.
 Inconstant, urged by envious spite,
 They sever friends and hate the right.
 I cannot brook, Videhan Queen,
 Thy words intolerably keen.
 Mine ears thy fierce reproaches pain
 As boiling water seethes the brain.
 And now to bear me witness all
 The dwellers in the wood I call,
 That, when with words of truth I plead,
 This harsh reply is all my meed.
 Ah, woe is thee! Ah, grief, that still Eager to do my brother's will,
 Mourning thy woman's nature, I
 Must see thee doubt my truth and die.
 I fly to Ráma's side, and Oh,
 May bliss attend thee while I go!
 May all attendant wood-gods screen

Thy head from harm, O large-eyed Queen!
 And though dire omens meet my sight
 And fill my soul with wild affright,
 May I return in peace and see
 The son of Raghu safe with thee!" 140

The child of Janak heard him speak,
 And the hot tear-drops down her cheek,
 Increasing to a torrent, ran,
 As thus once more the dame began:
 "O Lakshman, if I widowed be 145
 Godávari's flood shall cover me,
 Or I will die by cord, or leap,
 Life weary, from yon rocky steep;
 Or deadly poison will I drink,
 Or 'neath the kindled flames will sink, 150
 But never, reft of Ráma, can Consent to touch a meaner man."

The Maithil dame with many sighs,
 And torrents pouring from her eyes,
 The faithful Lakshman thus addressed, 155
 And smote her hands upon her breast.
 Sumitrá's son, oerwhelmed by fears,

Looked on the large-eyed queen:
 He saw that flood of burning tears,
 He saw that piteous mien. 160

He yearned sweet comfort to afford,
 He strove to soothe her pain;
 But to the brother of her lord
 She spoke no word again.
 His reverent hands once more he raised, 165
 His head he slightly bent,
 Upon her face he sadly gazed,
 And then toward Ráma went.

Canto XLVI. The Guest

The angry Lakshman scarce could brook
 Her bitter words, her furious look.
 With dark forebodings in his breast
 To Ráma's side he quickly pressed.

Then ten necked Rávan saw the time 5
 Propitious for his purposed crime.

A mendicant in guise he came
 And stood before the Maithil dame.
 His garb was red, with tufted hair
 And sandalled feet a shade he bare, 10

And from the fiend's left shoulder slung
 A staff and water-vessel hung.
 Near to the lovely dame he drew,
 While both the chiefs were far from view,
 As darkness takes the evening air 15
 When neither sun nor moon is there.
 He bent his eye upon the dame,
 A princess fair, of spotless fame:

So might some baleful planet be Near Moon-forsaken Rohiṇí.	20
As the fierce tyrant nearer drew, The trees in Janasthán that grew Waved not a leaf for fear and woe, And the hushed wind forbore to blow.
Godávari's waters as they fled,	25
Saw his fierce eye-balls flashing red, And from each swiftly-gliding wave A melancholy murmur gave.
Then Rávaṇ, when his eager eye Beheld the longed-for moment nigh,	30
In mendicant's apparel dressed Near to the Maithil lady pressed. In holy guise, a fiend abhorred, He found her mourning for her lord.
Thus threatening draws Śaniśchar nigh To Chitrá in the evening sky;	35
Thus the deep well by grass concealed Yawns treacherous in the verdant field. He stood and looked upon the dame Of Ráma, queen of spotless fame	40
With her bright teeth and each fair limb Like the full moon she seemed to him, Sitting within her leafy cot, Weeping for woe that left her not.
Thus, while with joy his pulses beat,	45
He saw her in her lone retreat, Eyed like the lotus, fair to view In silken robes of amber hue. Pierced to the core by Káma's dart
He murmured texts with lying art,	50
And questioned with a soft address The lady in her loneliness. The fiend essayed with gentle speech The heart of that fair dame to reach,
Pride of the worlds, like Beauty's Queen Without her darling lotus seen:	55
“O thou whose silken robes enfold A form more fair than finest gold, With lotus garland on thy head, Like a sweet spring with bloom o'erspread,	60
Who art thou, fair one, what thy name, Beauty, or Honour, Fortune, Fame, Spirit, or nymph, or Queen of love Descended from thy home above?
Bright as the dazzling jasmine shine Thy small square teeth in level line.	65
Like two black stars aglow with light Thine eyes are large and pure and bright. Thy charms of smile and teeth and hair And winning eyes, O thou most fair,
Steal all my spirit, as the flow Of rivers mines the bank below. How bright, how fine each flowing tress! How firm those orbs beneath thy dress!	70

The stranger even as he seemed To her deluded eyes. Intent on hospitable care, She brought her best of woodland fare, And showed her guest a seat.	135
She bade the saintly stranger lave His feet in water which she gave, And sit and rest and eat. He kept his eager glances bent On her so kindly eloquent, Wife of the noblest king;	140
And longed in heart to steal her thence, Preparing by the dire offence, Death on his head to bring. The lady watched with anxious face For Ráma coming from the chase With Lakshman by his side:	145
But nothing met her wandering glance Save the wild forest's green expanse Extending far and wide.	150

Canto XLVII. Rávan's Wooing

As, clad in mendicant's disguise, He questioned thus his destined prize, She to the seeming saintly man The story of her life began. "My guest is he," she thought, "and I, To 'scape his curse, must needs reply:"	5
"Child of a noble sire I spring From Janak, fair Videha's king. May every good be thine! my name Is Sítá, Ráma's cherished dame. Twelve winters with my lord I spent Most happily with sweet content In the rich home of Raghu's line, And every earthly joy was mine. Twelve pleasant years flew by, and then His peers advised the king of men, Ráma, my lord, to consecrate Joint ruler of his ancient state. But when the rites were scarce begun, To consecrate Ikshváku's son, The queen Kaikeyí, honoured dame, Sought of her lord an ancient claim. Her plea of former service pressed, And made him grant her new request, To banish Ráma to the wild And consecrate instead her child. This double prayer on him, the best And truest king, she strongly pressed: "Mine eyes in sleep I will not close, Nor eat, nor drink, nor take repose. This very day my death shall bring If Ráma be anointed king." As thus she spake in envious ire, The aged king, my husband's sire,	10 15 20 25 30

Besought with fitting words; but she 35
 Was cold and deaf to every plea.
 As yet my days are few; eighteen
 The years of life that I have seen;
 And Rāma, best of all alive,
 Has passed of years a score and five— 40
 Rāma the great and gentle, through
 All region famed as pure and true,
 Large-eyed and mighty-armed and tall,
 With tender heart that cares for all.
 But Daśaratha, led astray 45
 By woman's wile and passion's sway,
 By his strong love of her impelled,
 The consecrating rites withheld.
 When, hopeful of the promised grace,
 My Rāma sought his father's face, 50
 The queen Kaikeyī, ill at ease,
 Spoke to my lord brief words like these:
 "Hear, son of Raghu, hear from me
 The words thy father says to thee:
 "I yield this day to Bharat's hand, 55
 Free from all foes, this ancient land.
 Fly from this home no longer thine,
 And dwell in woods five years and nine.
 Live in the forest and maintain
 Mine honour pure from falsehood's stain.'"
 Then Rāma spoke, untouched by dread:
 "Yea, it shall be as thou hast said."
 And answered, faithful to his vows,
 Obeying Daśaratha's spouse:
 "The offered realm I would not take, 65
 But still keep true the words he spake."
 Thus, gentle Brāhman, Rāma still Clung to his vow with firmest will.
 And valiant Lakshmaṇ, dear to fame,
 His brother by a younger dame, 70
 Bold victor in the deadly fray,
 Would follow Rāma on his way.
 On sternest vows his heart was set,
 And he, a youthful anchoret,
 Bound up in twisted coil his hair 75
 And took the garb which hermits wear;
 Then with his bow to guard us, he Went forth with Rāma and with me.
 By Queen Kaikeyī's art bereft
 The kingdom and our home we left, 80
 And bound by stern religious vows
 We sought this shade of forest boughs.
 Now, best of Brāhman, here we tread
 These pathless regions dark and dread.
 But come, refresh thy soul, and rest 85
 Here for a while an honoured guest,
 For he, my lord, will soon be here
 With fresh supply of woodland cheer,
 Large store of venison of the buck,
 Or some great boar his hand has struck. 90
 Meanwhile, O stranger, grant my prayer:

Thy name, thy race, thy birth declare,
And why with no companion thou
Roamest in Daṇḍak forest now.”

Thus questioned Sítá, Ráma's dame. 95

Then fierce the stranger's answer came:

“Lord of the giant legions, he
From whom celestial armies flee,—
The dread of hell and earth and sky,
Rávan the Rákshas king am I. 100

Now when thy gold-like form I view
Arrayed in silks of amber hue,
My love, O thou of perfect mould,
For all my dames is dead and cold. 105

A thousand fairest women, torn
From many a land my home adorn.
But come, loveliest lady, be
The queen of every dame and me.

My city Lanká, glorious town,
Looks from a mountain's forehead down 110
Where ocean with his flash and foam
Beats madly on mine island home.

With me, O Sítá, shalt thou rove
Delighted through each shady grove,
Nor shall thy happy breast retain Fond memory of this life of pain. 115

In gay attire, a glittering band,
Five thousand maids shall round thee stand,
And serve thee at thy beck and sign,
If thou, fair Sítá, wilt be mine.” 120

Then forth her noble passion broke

As thus in turn the lady spoke:

“Me, me the wife of Ráma, him
The lion lord with lion's limb,
Strong as the sea, firm as the rock, 125
Like Indra in the battle shock.

The lord of each auspicious sign,
The glory of his princely line,
Like some fair Bodh tree strong and tall,
The noblest and the best of all, 130

Ráma, the heir of happy fate
Who keeps his word inviolate,
Lord of the lion gait, possessed
Of mighty arm and ample chest, 135

Ráma the lion-warrior, him
Whose moon bright face no fear can dim,
Ráma, his bridled passions' lord,
The darling whom his sire adored,—

Me, me the true and loving dame
Of Ráma, prince of deathless fame— 140
Me wouldst thou vainly woo and press?
A jackal woo a lioness!

Steal from the sun his glory! such
Thy hope Lord Ráma's wife to touch. 145
Ha! Thou hast seen the trees of gold,
The sign which dying eyes behold,

Thus seeking, weary of thy life,
 To win the love of Rāma's wife.
 Fool! wilt thou dare to rend away
 The famished lion's bleeding prey, 150
 Or from the threatening jaws to take
 The fang of some envenomed snake?
 What, wouldst thou shake with puny hand
 Mount Mandar, towering o'er the land,
 Put poison to thy lips and think 155
 The deadly cup a harmless drink?
 With pointed needle touch thine eye,
 A razor to thy tongue apply,
 Who wouldst pollute with impious touch
 The wife whom Rāma loves so much? 160
 Be round thy neck a millstone tied,
 And swim the sea from side to side;
 Or raising both thy hands on high
 Pluck sun and moon from yonder sky;
 Or let the kindled flame be pressed, 165
 Wrapt in thy garment, to thy breast;
 More wild the thought that seeks to win
 Rāma's dear wife who knows not sin.
 The fool who thinks with idle aim
 To gain the love of Rāma's dame, 170
 With dark and desperate footing makes
 His way o'er points of iron stakes.
 As Ocean to a bubbling spring,
 The lion to a fox, the king
 Of all the birds that ply the wing 175
     To an ignoble crow
 As gold to lead of little price,
 As to the drainings of the rice
 The drink they quaff in Paradise,
     The Amrit's heavenly flow, 180
 As sandal dust with perfume sweet
 Is to the mire that soils our feet,
     A tiger to a cat,
 As the white swan is to the owl,
 The peacock to the waterfowl, 185
     An eagle to a bat,
 Such is my lord compared with thee;
 And when with bow and arrows he,
 Mighty as Indra's self shall see
     His foeman, armed to slay, 190
 Thou, death-doomed like the fly that sips
 The oil that on the altar drips,
 Shalt cast the morsel from thy lips
     And lose thy half-won prey."
 Thus in high scorn the lady flung 195
 The biting arrows of her tongue
 In bitter words that pierced and stung
     The rover of the night.
 She ceased. Her gentle cheek grew pale,
 Her loosened limbs began to fail, 200
 And like a plantain in the gale
     She trembled with affright.
 He terrible as Death stood nigh,

And watched with fierce exulting eye
 The fear that shook her frame. 205
 To terrify the lady more,
 He counted all his triumphs o'er,
 Proclaimed the titles that he bore,
 His pedigree and name.

Canto XLVIII. Rávan's Speech

With knitted brow and furious eye
 The stranger made his fierce reply:
 "In me O fairest dame, behold
 The brother of the King of Gold. 5
 The Lord of Ten Necks my title, named
 Rávan, for might and valour famed.
 Gods and Gandharva hosts I scare;
 Snakes, spirits, birds that roam the air
 Fly from my coming, wild with fear,
 Trembling like men when Death is near. 10
 Vaiśravaṇ once, my brother, wrought
 To ire, encountered me and fought,
 But yielding to superior might
 Fled from his home in sore affright.
 Lord of the man-drawn chariot, still 15
 He dwells on famed Kailása's hill.
 I made the vanquished king resign
 The glorious car which now is mine,—
 Pushpak, the far-renowned, that flies
 Will-guided through the buxom skies. 20
 Celestial hosts by Indra led
 Flee from my face disquieted,
 And where my dreaded feet appear
 The wind is hushed or breathless is fear.
 Where'er I stand, where'er I go 25
 The troubled waters cease to flow,
 Each spell-bound wave is mute and still
 And the fierce sun himself is chill.
 Beyond the sea my Lanká stands
 Filled with fierce forms and giant bands, 30
 A glorious city fair to see
 As Indra's Amarávatí.
 A towering height of solid wall,
 Flashing afar, surrounds it all,
 Its golden courts enchant the sight, 35
 And gates aglow with lazulite.
 Steeds, elephants, and cars are there,
 And drums' loud music fills the air,
 Fair trees in lovely gardens grow
 Whose boughs with varied fruitage glow. 40
 Thou, beauteous Queen, with me shalt dwell
 In halls that suit a princess well,
 Thy former fellows shall forget
 Nor think of women with regret,
 No earthly joy thy soul shall miss, 45
 And take its fill of heavenly bliss.
 Of mortal Ráma think no more,
 Whose terms of days will soon be o'er.

King Daśaratha looked in scorn
 On Râma though the eldest born, 50
 Sent to the woods the weakling fool,
 And set his darling son to rule.
 What, O thou large-eyed dame, hast thou
 To do with fallen Râma now,
 From home and kingdom forced to fly, 55
 A wretched hermit soon to die?
 Accept thy lover, nor refuse
 The giant king who fondly woos.
 O listen, nor reject in scorn
 A heart by Kâma's arrows torn. 60
 If thou refuse to hear my prayer,
 Of grief and coming woe beware;
 For the sad fate will fall on thee
 Which came on hapless Urvaśi,
 When with her foot she chanced to touch 65
 Purúravas, and sorrowed much.
 My little finger raised in fight
 Were more than match for Râma's might.
 O fairest, blithe and happy be
 With him whom fortune sends to thee." 70

Such were the words the giant said,
 And Sítâ's angry eyes were red.
 She answered in that lonely place
 The monarch of the giant race:

"Art thou the brother of the Lord 75
 Of Gold by all the world adored,
 And sprung of that illustrious seed
 Wouldst now attempt this evil deed?
 I tell thee, impious Monarch, all
 The giants by thy sin will fall, 80
 Whose reckless lord and king thou art,
 With foolish mind and lawless heart.
 Yea, one may hope to steal the wife
 Of Indra and escape with life.
 But he who Râma's dame would tear 85
 From his loved side must needs despair.
 Yea, one may steal fair Śachí, dame
 Of Him who shoots the thunder flame,
 May live successful in his aim
 And length of day may see; 90
 But hope, O giant King, in vain,
 Though cups of Amrit thou may drain,
 To shun the penalty and pain
 Of wronging one like me."

Canto XLIX. The Rape Of Sítâ

The Rákshas monarch, thus addressed,
 His hands a while together pressed,
 And straight before her startled eyes
 Stood monstrous in his giant size.
 Then to the lady, with the lore 5
 Of eloquence, he spoke once more:

“Thou scarce,” he cried, “hast heard aright
 The glories of my power and might.
 I borne sublime in air can stand
 And with these arms upheave the land, 10
 Drink the deep flood of Ocean dry
 And Death with conquering force defy,
 Pierce the great sun with furious dart
 And to her depths cleave earth apart.
 See, thou whom love and beauty blind, 15
 I wear each form as wills my mind.”

As thus he spake in burning ire
 His glowing eyes were red with fire.
 His gentle garb aside was thrown
 And all his native shape was shown. 20
 Terrific, monstrous, wild, and dread
 As the dark God who rules the dead,
 His fiery eyes in fury rolled,
 His limbs were decked with glittering gold.
 Like some dark cloud the monster showed, 25
 And his fierce breast with fury glowed.
 The ten-faced rover of the night,
 With twenty arms exposed to sight,
 His saintly guise aside had laid
 And all his giant height displayed. 30
 Attired in robes of crimson dye
 He stood and watched with angry eye
 The lady in her bright array
 Resplendent as the dawn of day
 When from the east the sunbeams break, 35
 And to the dark-haired lady spake:
 “If thou would call that lord thine own
 Whose fame in every world is known,
 Look kindly on my love, and be
 Bride of a consort meet for thee. 40
 With me let blissful years be spent,
 For neer thy choice shalt thou repent.
 No deed of mine shall e'er displease
 My darling as she lives at ease.
 Thy love for mortal man resign, 45
 And to a worthier lord incline.
 Ah foolish lady, seeming wise
 In thine own weak and partial eyes,
 By what fair graces art thou held
 To Ráma from his realm expelled? 50
 Misfortunes all his life attend,
 And his brief days are near their end.
 Unworthy prince, infirm of mind!
 A woman spoke and he resigned
 His home and kingdom and withdrew 55
 From troops of friends and retinue.
 And sought this forest dark and dread
 By savage beasts inhabited.”

Thus Rávan urged the lady meet
 For love, whose words were soft and sweet. 60
 Near and more near the giant pressed

As love's hot fire inflamed his breast.
 The leader of the giant crew
 His arm around the lady threw:
 Thus Budha with ill-omened might 65
 Steals Rohiṇí's delicious light.
 One hand her glorious tresses grasped,
 One with its ruthless pressure clasped
 The body of his lovely prize,
 The Maithil dame with lotus eyes. 70
 The silvan Gods in wild alarm
 Marked his huge teeth and ponderous arm,
 And from that Death-like presence fled,
 Of mountain size and towering head.
 Then seen was Rávan's magic car 75
 Aglow with gold which blazed afar,—
 The mighty car which asses drew
 Thundering as it onward flew.
 He spared not harsh rebuke to chide
 The lady as she moaned and cried, 80
 Then with his arm about her waist
 His captive in the car he placed.
 In vain he threatened: long and shrill
 Rang out her lamentation still,
 O Ráma! which no fear could stay: 85
 But her dear lord was far away.
 Then rose the fiend, and toward the skies
 Bore his poor helpless struggling prize:
 Hurrying through the air above
 The dame who loathed his proffered love. 90
 So might a soaring eagle bear
 A serpent's consort through the air.
 As on he bore her through the sky
 She shrieked aloud her bitter cry.
 As when some wretch's lips complain 95
 In agony of maddening pain;
 "O Lakshmaṇ, thou whose joy is still
 To do thine elder brother's will,
 This fiend, who all disguises wears,
 From Ráma's side his darling tears. 100
 Thou who couldst leave bliss, fortune, all,
 Yea life itself at duty's call,
 Dost thou not see this outrage done
 To hapless me, O Raghu's son?
 'Tis thine, O victor of the foe, 105
 To bring the haughtiest spirit low,
 How canst thou such an outrage see
 And let the guilty fiend go free?
 Ah, seldom in a moment's time
 Comes bitter fruit of sin and crime, 110
 But in the day of harvest pain
 Comes like the ripening of the grain.
 So thou whom fate and folly lead
 To ruin for this guilty deed,
 Shalt die by Ráma's arm ere long 115
 A dreadful death for hideous wrong.
 Ah, too successful in their ends
 Are Queen Kaikeyí and her friends,

When virtuous Ráma, dear to fame, Is mourning for his ravished dame.	120
Ah me, ah me! a long farewell To lawn and glade and forest dell In Janasthán's wild region, where The Cassia trees are bright and fair With all your tongues to Ráma say That Rávaṇ bears his wife away.	125
Farewell, a long farewell to thee, O pleasant stream Godávarí, Whose rippling waves are ever stirred By many a glad wild water-bird!	130
All ye to Ráma's ear relate The giant's deed and Sítá's fate. O all ye Gods who love this ground Where trees of every leaf abound, Tell Ráma I am stolen hence, I pray you all with reverence.	135
On all the living things beside That these dark boughs and coverts hide, Ye flocks of birds, ye troops of deer, I call on you my prayer to hear.	140
All ye to Ráma's ear proclaim That Rávaṇ tears away his dame With forceful arms,—his darling wife, Dearer to Ráma than his life.	145
O, if he knew I dwelt in hell, My mighty lord, I know full well, Would bring me, conqueror, back to-day, Though Yáma's self reclaimed his prey."
Thus from the air the lady sent With piteous voice her last lament, And as she wept she chanced to see The vulture on a lofty tree. As Rávaṇ bore her swiftly by, On the dear bird she bent her eye, And with a voice which woe made faint Renewed to him her wild complaint:	150
"O see, the king who rules the race Of giants, cruel, fierce and base, Rávaṇ the spoiler bears me hence The helpless prey of violence.	160
This fiend who roves in midnight shade By thee, dear bird, can nêr be stayed, For he is armed and fierce and strong Triumphant in the power to wrong.	165
For thee remains one only task, To do, kind friend, the thing I ask. To Ráma's ear by thee be borne How Sítá from her home is torn, And to the valiant Lakshmaṇ tell The giant's deed and what befell."	170

Canto L. Jatáyus

The vulture from his slumber woke
 And heard the words which Sítá spoke
 He raised his eye and looked on her,
 Looked on her giant ravisher.
 That noblest bird with pointed beak,
 Majestic as a mountain peak, 5
 High on the tree addressed the king
 Of giants, wisely counselling:
 "O Ten-necked lord, I firmly hold
 To faith and laws ordained of old,
 And thou, my brother, shouldst refrain 10
 From guilty deeds that shame and stain.
 The vulture king supreme in air,
 Jatáyus is the name I bear.
 Thy captive, known by Sítá's name,
 Is the dear consort and the dame 15
 Of Ráma, Daśaratha's heir
 Who makes the good of all his care.
 Lord of the world in might he vies
 With the great Gods of seas and skies.
 The law he boasts to keep allows 20
 No king to touch another's spouse,
 And, more than all, a prince's dame
 High honour and respect may claim.
 Back to the earth thy way incline,
 Nor think of one who is not thine. 25
 Heroic souls should hold it shame
 To stoop to deeds which others blame,
 And all respect by them is shown
 To dames of others as their own.
 Not every case of bliss and gain 30
 The Scripture's holy texts explain,
 And subjects, when that light is dim,
 Look to their prince and follow him.
 The king is bliss and profit, he
 Is store of treasures fair to see, 35
 And all the people's fortunes spring,
 Their joy and misery, from the king.
 If, lord of giant race, thy mind
 Be fickle, false, to sin inclined,
 How wilt thou kingly place retain? 40
 High thrones in heaven no sinners gain.
 The soul which gentle passions sway
 Néer throws its nobler part away,
 Nor will the mansion of the base
 Long be the good man's dwelling-place. 45
 Prince Ráma, chief of high renown,
 Has wronged thee not in field or town.
 Néer has he sinned against thee: how
 Canst thou resolve to harm him now?
 If moved by Śúrpaṅakhá's prayer 50
 The giant Khara sought him there,
 And fighting fell with baffled aim,
 His and not Ráma's is the blame.
 Say, mighty lord of giants, say
 What fault on Ráma canst thou lay? 55

What has the world's great master done
 That thou should steal his precious one?
 Quick, quick the Maithil dame release;
 Let Ráma's consort go in peace,
 Lest scorched by his terrific eye 60
 Beneath his wrath thou fall and die
 Like Vritra when Lord Indra threw
 The lightning flame that smote and slew.
 Ah fool, with blinded eyes to take Home to thy heart a venomed snake! 65
 Ah foolish eyes, too blind to see
 That Death's dire coils entangle thee!
 The prudent man his strength will spare,
 Nor lift a load too great to bear.
 Content is he with wholesome food 70
 Which gives him life and strength renewed,
 But who would dare the guilty deed
 That brings no fame or glorious meed,
 Where merit there is none to win
 And vengeance soon o'ertakes the sin? 75
 My course of life, Pulastya's son,
 For sixty thousand years has run.
 Lord of my kind I still maintain
 Mine old hereditary reign.
 I, worn by years, am older far 80
 Than thou, young lord of bow and car,
 In coat of glittering mail encased
 And armed with arrows at thy waist,
 But not unchallenged shalt thou go,
 Or steal the dame without a blow. 85
 Thou canst not, King, before mine eyes
 Bear off unchecked thy lovely prize,
 Safe as the truth of Scripture bent
 By no close logic's argument.
 Stay if thy courage let thee, stay 90
 And meet me in the battle fray,
 And thou shalt stain the earth with gore
 Falling as Khara fell before.
 Soon Ráma, clothed in bark, shall smite
 Thee, his proud foe, in deadly fight,— 95
 Ráma, from whom have oft times fled
 The Daitya hosts discomfited.
 No power have I to kill or slay:
 The princely youths are far away,
 But soon shalt thou with fearful eye 100
 Struck down beneath their arrows lie.
 But while I yet have life and sense,
 Thou shalt not, tyrant, carry hence
 Fair Sítá, Ramá's honoured queen,
 With lotus eyes and lovely mien. 105
 Whate'er the pain, whate'er the cost,
 Though in the struggle life be lost,
 The will of Raghu's noblest son
 And Daśaratha must be done.
 Stay for a while, O Rávan, stay, 110
 One hour thy flying car delay,
 And from that glorious chariot thou

Shalt fall like fruit from shaken bough,
 For I to thee, while yet I live,
 The welcome of a foe will give.” 115

Canto LI. The Combat.

Rávan’s red eyes in fury rolled:
 Bright with his armlets’ flashing gold,
 In high disdain, by passion stirred
 He rushed against the sovereign bird. 5
 With clash and din and furious blows
 Of murderous battle met the foes:
 Thus urged by winds two clouds on high
 Meet warring in the stormy sky.
 Then fierce the dreadful combat raged 10
 As fiend and bird in war engaged,
 As if two winged mountains sped
 To dire encounter overhead.
 Keen pointed arrows thick and fast,
 In never ceasing fury cast,
 Rained hurtling on the vulture king 15
 And smote him on the breast and wing.
 But still that noblest bird sustained
 The cloud of shafts which Rávan rained,
 And with strong beak and talons bent
 The body of his foeman rent. 20
 Then wild with rage the ten-necked king
 Laid ten swift arrows on his string,— Dread as the staff of Death were they,
 So terrible and keen to slay.
 Straight to his ear the string he drew, 25
 Straight to the mark the arrows flew,
 And pierced by every iron head
 The vulture’s mangled body bled.
 One glance upon the car he bent
 Where Sítá wept with shrill lament, 30
 Then heedless of his wounds and pain
 Rushed at the giant king again.
 Then the brave vulture with the stroke
 Of his resistless talons broke
 The giant’s shafts and bow whereon 35
 The fairest pearls and jewels shone.
 The monster paused, by rage unmanned:
 A second bow soon armed his hand,
 Whence pointed arrows swift and true
 In hundreds, yea in thousands, flew. 40
 The monarch of the vultures, plied
 With ceaseless darts on every side,
 Showed like a bird that turns to rest
 Close covered by the branch-built nest.
 He shook his pinions to repel 45
 The storm of arrows as it fell;
 Then with his talons snapped in two
 The mighty bow which Rávan drew.
 Next with terrific wing he smote
 So fiercely on the giant’s coat, 50
 The harness, glittering with the glow

Of fire, gave way beneath the blow.
 With storm of murderous strokes he beat
 The harnessed asses strong and fleet,—
 Each with a goblin's monstrous face 55
 And plates of gold his neck to grace.
 Then on the car he turned his ire,—
 The will-moved car that shone like fire,
 And broke the glorious chariot, broke
 The golden steps and pole and yoke. 60
 The chouris and the silken shade
 Like the full moon to view displayed,
 Together with the guards who held
 Those emblems, to the ground he felled.
 The royal vulture hovered o'er 65
 The driver's head, and pierced and tore
 With his strong beak and dreaded claws
 His mangled brow and cheek and jaws.
 With broken car and sundered bow,
 His charioteer and team laid low, 70
 One arm about the lady wound,
 Sprang the fierce giant to the ground.
 Spectators of the combat, all
 The spirits viewed the monster's fall:
 Lauding the vulture every one 75
 Cried with glad voice, Well done! well done!
 But weak with length of days, at last
 The vulture's strength was failing fast.
 The fiend again assayed to bear
 The lady through the fields of air. 80
 But when the vulture saw him rise
 Triumphant with his trembling prize,
 Bearing the sword that still was left
 When other arms were lost or cleft,
 Once more, impatient of repose, 85
 Swift from the earth her champion rose,
 Hung in the way the fiend would take,
 And thus addressing Rávan spake:
 "Thou, King of giants, rash and blind,
 Wilt be the ruin of thy kind, 90
 Stealing the wife of Ráma, him
 With lightning scars on chest and limb.
 A mighty host obeys his will
 And troops of slaves his palace fill;
 His lords of state are wise and true, 95
 Kinsmen has he and retinue.
 As thirsty travellers drain the cup,
 Thou drinkest deadly poison up.
 The rash and careless fool who heeds
 No coming fruit of guilty deeds, 100
 A few short years of life shall see,
 And perish doomed to death like thee.
 Say whither wilt thou fly to loose
 Thy neck from Death's entangling noose,
 Caught like the fish that finds too late 105
 The hook beneath the treacherous bait?
 Never, O King—of this be sure—
 Will Raghu's fiery sons endure,

Terrific in their vengeful rage,
 This insult to their hermitage. 110
 Thy guilty hands this day have done
 A deed which all reprove and shun,
 Unworthy of a noble chief,
 The pillage loved by coward thief.
 Stay, if thy heart allow thee, stay 115
 And meet me in the deadly fray.
 Soon shall thou stain the earth with gore,
 And fall as Khara fell before.
 The fruits of former deeds o'erpower
 The sinner in his dying hour: 120
 And such a fate on thee, O King,
 Thy tyranny and madness bring.
 Thy tyranny and madness bring.
 Not e'en the Self-existent Lord,
 Who reigns by all the worlds adored,
 Would dare attempt a guilty deed 125
 Which the dire fruits of crime succeed."

Thus brave Jaṭáyus, best of birds,
 Addressed the fiend with moving words,
 Then ready for the swift attack
 Swooped down upon the giant's back. 130
 Down to the bone the talons went;
 With many a wound the flesh was rent:
 Such blows infuriate drivers deal
 Their elephants with pointed steel.
 Fixed in his back the strong beak lay, 135
 The talons stripped the flesh away.
 He fought with claws and beak and wing,
 And tore the long hair of the king.
 Still as the royal vulture beat
 The giant with his wings and feet, 140
 Swelled the fiend's lips, his body shook
 With furious rage too great to brook.
 About the Maithil dame he cast
 One huge left arm and held her fast.
 In furious rage to frenzy fanned 145
 He struck the vulture with his hand.
 Jaṭáyus mocked the vain assay,
 And rent his ten left arms away.
 Down dropped the severed limbs: anew
 Ten others from his body grew: 150
 Thus bright with pearly radiance glide
 Dread serpents from the hillock side,
 Again in wrath the giant pressed
 The lady closer to his breast,
 And foot and fist sent blow on blow 155
 In ceaseless fury at the foe.
 So fierce and dire the battle, waged
 Between those mighty champions, raged:
 Here was the lord of giants, there
 The noblest of the birds of air. 160
 Thus, as his love of Rāma taught,
 The faithful vulture strove and fought.
 But Rávan seized his sword and smote
 His wings and side and feet and throat.

At mangled side and wing he bled; 165
 He fell, and life was almost fled.
 The lady saw her champion lie,
 His plumes distained with gory dye,
 And hastened to the vulture's side
 Grieving as though a kinsman died. 170
 The lord of Lanká's island viewed
     The vulture as he lay:
 Whose back like some dark cloud was hued,
     His breast a paly grey,
 Like ashes, when by none renewed, 175
     The flame has died away.
 The lady saw with mournful eye,
     Her champion press the plain,—
 The royal bird, her true ally
     Whom Rávan's might had slain. 180
 Her soft arms locked in strict embrace
     Around his neck she kept,
 And lovely with her moon-bright face
     Bent o'er her friend and wept.

Canto LII. Rávan's Flight

Fair as the lord of silvery rays
 Whom every star in heaven obeys,
 The Maithil dame her plaint renewed
 O'er him by Rávan's might subdued:
 "Dreams, omens, auguries foreshow
 Our coming lot of weal and woe: 5
 But thou, my Ráma, couldst not see
 The grievous blow which falls on thee.
 The birds and deer desert the brakes
 And show the path my captor takes,
 And thus e'en now this royal bird 10
 Flew to mine aid by pity stirred.
 Slain for my sake in death he lies,
 The broad-winged rover of the skies.
 O Ráma, haste, thine aid I crave:
 O Lakshman, why delay to save? 15
 Brave sons of old Ikshváku, hear
 And rescue in this hour of fear."

Her flowery wreath was torn and rent,
 Crushed was each sparkling ornament.
 She with weak arms and trembling knees 20
 Clung like a creeper to the trees,
 And like some poor deserted thing
 With wild shrieks made the forest ring.
 But swift the giant reached her side,
 As loud on Ráma's name she cried. 25
 Fierce as grim Death one hand he laid
 Upon her tresses' lovely braid.
 "That touch, thou impious King, shall be
 The ruin of thy race and thee."
 The universal world in awe 30
 That outrage on the lady saw,
 All nature shook convulsed with dread,

And darkness o'er the land was spread.
 The Lord of Day grew dark and chill,
 And every breath of air was still. 35
 The Eternal Father of the sky
 Beheld the crime with heavenly eye,
 And spake with solemn voice, "The deed,
 The deed is done, of old decreed."
 Sad were the saints within the grove, 40
 But triumph with their sorrow strove.
 They wept to see the Maithil dame
 Endure the outrage, scorn, and shame:
 They joyed because his life should pay
 The penalty incurred that day. 45
 Then Rávan raised her up, and bare
 His captive through the fields of air,
 Calling with accents loud and shrill
 On Râma and on Lakshman still.
 With sparkling gems on arm and breast, 50
 In silk of paly amber dressed,
 High in the air the Maithil dame
 Gleamed like the lightning's flashing flame.
 The giant, as the breezes blew
 Upon her robes of amber hue, 55
 And round him twined that gay attire,
 Showed like a mountain girt with fire.
 The lady, fairest of the fair,
 Had wreathed a garland round her hair;
 Its lotus petals bright and sweet 60
 Rained down about the giant's feet.
 Her vesture, bright as burning gold,
 Gave to the wind each glittering fold,
 Fair as a gilded cloud that gleams
 Touched by the Day-God's tempered beams. 65
 Yet struggling in the fiend's embrace,
 The lady with her sweet pure face,
 Far from her lord, no longer wore
 The light of joy that shone before.
 Like some sad lily by the side 70
 Of waters which the sun has dried;
 Like the pale moon uprising through
 An autumn cloud of darkest hue,
 So was her perfect face between
 The arms of giant Rávan seen: 75
 Fair with the charm of braided tress
 And forehead's finished loveliness;
 Fair with the ivory teeth that shed
 White lustre through the lips' fine red, 80
 Fair as the lotus when the bud
 Is rising from the parent flood.
 With faultless lip and nose and eye,
 Dear as the moon that floods the sky
 With gentle light, of perfect mould, 85
 She seemed a thing of burnished gold,
 Though on her cheek the traces lay
 Of tears her hand had brushed away.
 But as the moon-beams swiftly fade
 Ere the great Day-God shines displayed, 90

So in that form of perfect grace
 Still trembling in the fiend's embrace,
 From her beloved Ráma reft,
 No light of pride or joy was left. 95
 The lady with her golden hue
 O'er the swart fiend a lustre threw,
 As when embroidered girths enfold
 An elephant with gleams of gold.
 Fair as the lily's bending stem,—
 Her arms adorned with many a gem, 100
 A lustre to the fiend she lent
 Gleaming from every ornament,
 As when the cloud-shot flashes light
 The shadows of a mountain height.
 Whene'er the breezes earthward bore 105
 The tinkling of the zone she wore,
 He seemed a cloud of darkness hue
 Sending forth murmurs as it flew.
 As on her way the dame was sped
 From her sweet neck fair flowers were shed, 110
 The swift wind caught the flowery rain
 And poured it o'er the fiend again.
 The wind-stirred blossoms, sweet to smell,
 On the dark brows of Rávan fell,
 Like lunar constellations set 115
 On Meru for a coronet.
 From her small foot an anklet fair
 With jewels slipped, and through the air,
 Like a bright circlet of the flame
 Of thunder, to the valley came. 120
 The Maithil lady, fair to see
 As the young leaflet of a tree
 Clad in the tender hues of spring,
 Flashed glory on the giant king,
 As when a gold-embroidered zone 125
 Around an elephant is thrown.
 While, bearing far the lady, through
 The realms of sky the giant flew,
 She like a gleaming meteor cast
 A glory round her as she passed. 130
 Then from each limb in swift descent
 Dropped many a sparkling ornament:
 On earth they rested dim and pale
 Like fallen stars when virtues fail.
 Around her neck a garland lay 135
 Bright as the Star-God's silvery ray:
 It fell and flashed like Gangá sent
 From heaven above the firmament.
 The birds of every wing had flocked
 To stately trees by breezes rocked: 140
 These bowed their wind-swept heads and said:
 "My lady sweet, be comforted."
 With faded blooms each brook within
 Whose waters moved no gleamy fin,
 Stole sadly through the forest dell 145
 Mourning the dame it loved so well.
 From every woodland region near

Came lions, tigers, birds, and deer,
 And followed, each with furious look,
 The way her flying shadow took. 150
 For Sítá's loss each lofty hill
 Whose tears were waterfall, and rill,
 Lifting on high each arm-like steep,
 Seemed in the general woe to weep.
 When the great sun, the lord of day, 155
 Saw Rávan tear the dame away,
 His glorious light began to fail
 And all his disk grew cold and pale.
 "If Rávan from the forest flies
 With Ráma's Sítá as his prize, 160
 Justice and truth have vanished hence,
 Honour and right and innocence."
 Thus rose the cry of wild despair
 From spirits as they gathered there.
 In trembling troops in open lawns 165
 Wept, wild with woe, the startled fawns,
 And a strange terror changed the eyes
 They lifted to the distant skies.
 On silvan Gods who love the dell
 A sudden fear and trembling fell, 170
 As in the deepest woe they viewed
 The lady by the fiend subdued.
 Still in loud shrieks was heard afar
 That voice whose sweetness naught could mar,
 While eager looks of fear and woe 175
 She bent upon the earth below.
 The lady of each winning wile
 With pearly teeth and lovely smile,
 Seized by the lord of Lanká's isle,
 Looked down for friends in vain. 180
 She saw no friend to aid her, none,
 Not Ráma nor the younger son
 Of Daśaratha, and undone
 She swooned with fear and pain.

Canto LIII. Sítá's Threats

Soon as the Maithil lady knew
 That high through air the giant flew,
 Distressed with grief and sore afraid
 Her troubled spirit sank dismayed. 5
 Then, as anew the waters welled
 From those red eyes which sorrow swelled,
 Forth in keen words her passion broke,
 And to the fierce-eyed fiend she spoke:
 "Canst thou attempt a deed so base,
 Untroubled by the deep disgrace,— 10
 To steal me from my home and fly,
 When friend or guardian none was nigh?
 Thy craven soul that longed to steal,
 Fearing the blows that warriors deal,
 Upon a magic deer relied 15
 To lure my husband from my side,
 Friend of his sire, the vulture king

Lies low on earth with mangled wing,
 Who gave his aged life for me
 And died for her he sought to free. 20
 Ah, glorious strength indeed is thine,
 Thou meanest of thy giant line,
 Whose courage dared to tell thy name
 And conquer in the fight a dame.
 Does the vile deed that thou hast done 25
 Cause thee no shame, thou wicked one—
 A woman from her home to rend
 When none was near his aid to lend?
 Through all the worlds, O giant King,
 The tidings of this deed will ring, 30
 This deed in law and honour's spite
 By one who claims a hero's might.
 Shame on thy boasted valour, shame!
 Thy prowess is an empty name.
 Shame, giant, on this cursed deed 35
 For which thy race is doomed to bleed!
 Thou fliest swifter than the gale,
 For what can strength like thine avail?
 Stay for one hour, O Rávan, stay;
 Thou shalt not flee with life away. 40
 Soon as the royal chieftains' sight
 Falls on the thief who roams by night,
 Thou wilt not, tyrant, live one hour
 Though backed by all thy legions' power.
 Ne'er can thy puny strength sustain 45
 The tempest of their arrowy rain:
 Have e'er the trembling birds withstood
 The wild flames raging in the wood?
 Hear me, O Rávan, let me go,
 And save thy soul from coming woe. 50
 Or if thou wilt not set me free,
 Wroth for this insult done to me.
 With his brave brother's aid my lord
 Against thy life will raise his sword.
 A guilty hope inflames thy breast 55
 His wife from Ráma's home to wrest.
 Ah fool, the hope thou hast is vain;
 Thy dreams of bliss shall end in pain.
 If torn from all I love by thee
 My godlike lord no more I see, 60
 Soon will I die and end my woes,
 Nor live the captive of my foes.
 Ah fool, with blinded eyes to choose
 The evil and the good refuse!
 So the sick wretch with stubborn will 65
 Turns fondly to the cates that kill,
 And madly draws his lips away
 From medicine that would check decay.
 About thy neck securely wound
 The deadly coil of Fate is bound, 70
 And thou, O Rávan, dost not fear
 Although the hour of death is near.
 With death-doomed sight thine eyes behold
 The gleaming of the trees of gold,—

See dread Vaitaraṇi, the flood 75
 That rolls a stream of foamy blood,—
 See the dark wood by all abhorred—
 Its every leaf a threatening sword.
 The tangled thickets thou shall tread
 Where thorns with iron points are spread. 80
 For never can thy days be long,
 Base plotter of this shame and wrong
 To Râma of the lofty soul:
 He dies who drinks the poisoned bowl.
 The coils of death around thee lie: 85
 They hold thee and thou canst not fly.
 Ah whither, tyrant, wouldst thou run
 The vengeance of my lord to shun?
 By his unaided arm alone
 Were twice seven thousand fiends o'erthrown: 90
 Yes, in the twinkling of an eye
 He forced thy mightiest fiends to die.
 And shall that lord of lion heart,
 Skilled in the bow and spear and dart,
 Spare thee, O fiend, in battle strife, 95
 The robber of his darling wife?"

These were her words, and more beside,
 By wrath and bitter hate supplied.
 Then by her woe and fear o'erthrown
 She wept again and made her moan. 100
 As long she wept in grief and dread,
 Scarce conscious of the words she said,
 The wicked giant onward fled
 And bore her through the air.
 As firm he held the Maithil dame, 105
 Still wildly struggling, o'er her frame
 With grief and bitter misery came
 The trembling of despair.

Canto LIV. Lanká

He bore her on in rapid flight,
 And not a friend appeared in sight.
 But on a hill that o'er the wood
 Raised its high top five monkeys stood. 5
 From her fair neck her scarf she drew,
 And down the glittering vesture flew.
 With earring, necklet, chain, and gem,
 Descending in the midst of them:
 "For these," she thought, "my path may show,
 And tell my lord the way I go." 10
 Nor did the fiend, in wild alarm,
 Mark when she drew from neck and arm
 And foot the gems and gold, and sent
 To earth each gleaming ornament.
 The monkeys raised their tawny eyes 15
 That closed not in their first surprise,
 And saw the dark-eyed lady, where
 She shrieked above them in the air.
 High o'er their heads the giant passed

Holding the weeping lady fast. 20
 O'er Pampa's flashing flood he sped
 And on to Lanká's city fled.
 He bore away in senseless joy
 The prize that should his life destroy,
 Like the rash fool who hugs beneath 25
 His robe a snake with venom'd teeth.
 Swift as an arrow from a bow,
 Speeding o'er lands that lay below,
 Sublime in air his course he took
 O'er wood and rock and lake and brook. 30
 He passed at length the sounding sea
 Where monstrous creatures wander free,—
 Seat of Lord Varuṇ's ancient reign,
 Controller of the eternal main.
 The angry waves were raised and tossed 35
 As Rávan with the lady crossed,
 And fish and snake in wild unrest
 Showed flashing fin and gleaming crest.
 Then from the blessed troops who dwell
 In air celestial voices fell: 40
 "O ten-necked King," they cried, "attend:
 This guilty deed will bring thine end."

Then Rávan speeding like the storm,
 Bearing his death in human form,
 The struggling Sítá, lighted down 45
 In royal Lanká's glorious town;
 A city bright and rich, that showed
 Well-ordered street and noble road;
 Arranged with just division, fair
 With multitudes in court and square. 50
 Thus, all his journey done, he passed
 Within his royal home at last.
 There in a queenly bower he placed
 The black-eyed dame with dainty waist:
 Thus in her chamber Máyá laid 55
 The lovely Máyá, demon maid.
 Then Rávan gave command to all
 The dread she-fiends who filled the hall:
 "This captive lady watch and guard
 From sight of man and woman barred. 60
 But all the fair one asks beside
 Be with unsparing hand supplied:
 As though 'twere I that asked, withhold
 No pearls or dress or gems or gold.
 And she among you that shall dare 65
 Of purpose or through want of care
 One word to vex her soul to say,
 Throws her unvalued life away."

Thus spake the monarch of their race
 To those she-fiends who thronged the place, 70
 And pondering on the course to take
 Went from the chamber as he spake.
 He saw eight giants, strong and dread,
 On flesh of bleeding victims fed,

Proud in the boon which Brahmá gave, 75
 And trusting in its power to save.
 He thus the mighty chiefs addressed
 Of glorious power and strength possessed:
 “Arm, warriors, with the spear and bow;
 With all your speed from Lanká go, 80
 For Janasthán, our own no more,
 Is now defiled with giants’ gore;
 The seat of Khara’s royal state
 Is left unto us desolate.
 In your brave hearts and might confide, 85
 And cast ignoble fear aside.
 Go, in that desert region dwell
 Where the fierce giants fought and fell.
 A glorious host that region held,
 For power and might unparalleled, 90
 By Dúshaṇ and brave Khara led,—
 All, slain by Ráma’s arrows, bled.
 Hence boundless wrath that spurns control
 Reigns paramount within my soul,
 And naught but Ráma’s death can sate 95
 The fury of my vengeful hate.
 I will not close my slumbering eyes
 Till by this hand my foeman dies.
 And when mine arm has slain the foe
 Who laid those giant princes low, 100
 Long will I triumph in the deed,
 Like one enriched in utmost need.
 Now go; that I this end may gain,
 In Janasthán, O chiefs, remain.
 Watch Ráma there with keenest eye, 105
 And all his deeds and movements spy.
 Go forth, no helping art neglect,
 Be brave and prompt and circumspect,
 And be your one endeavour still
 To aid mine arm this foe to kill. 110
 Oft have I seen your warrior might Proved in the forehead of the fight,
 And sure of strength I know so well
 Send you in Janasthán to dwell.”
 The giants heard with prompt assent 115
     The pleasant words he said,
 And each before his master bent
     For meet salute, his head.
 Then as he bade, without delay,
     From Lanká’s gate they passed, 120
 And hurried forward on their way
     Invisible and fast.

Canto LV. Sítá In Prison

Thus Rávaṇ his commandment gave
 To those eight giants strong and brave,
 So thinking in his foolish pride
 Against all dangers to provide.
 Then with his wounded heart aflame 5
 With love he thought upon the dame,

And took with hasty steps the way
 To the fair chamber where she lay.
 He saw the gentle lady there
 Weighed down by woe too great to bear, 10
 Amid the throng of fiends who kept
 Their watch around her as she wept:
 A pinnacle sinking neath the wave
 When mighty winds around her rave: 15
 A lonely herd-forsaken deer,
 When hungry dogs are pressing near.
 Within the bower the giant passed:
 Her mournful looks were downward cast.
 As there she lay with streaming eyes
 The giant bade the lady rise, 20
 And to the shrinking captive showed
 The glories of his rich abode,
 Where thousand women spent their days
 In palaces with gold ablaze;
 Where wandered birds of every sort, 25
 And jewels flashed in hall and court.
 Where noble pillars charmed the sight
 With diamond and lazulite,
 And others glorious to behold
 With ivory, crystal, silver, gold. 30
 There swelled on high the tambour's sound,
 And burnished ore was bright around
 He led the mournful lady where
 Resplendent gold adorned the stair,
 And showed each lattice fair to see 35
 With silver work and ivory:
 Showed his bright chambers, line on line,
 Adorned with nets of golden twine.
 Beyond he showed the Maithil dame
 His gardens bright as lightning's flame, 40
 And many a pool and lake he showed
 Where blooms of gayest colour glowed.
 Through all his home from view to view
 The lady sunk in grief he drew.
 Then trusting in her heart to wake 45
 Desire of all she saw, he spake:
 "Three hundred million giants, all
 Obedient to their master's call,
 Not counting young and weak and old,
 Serve me with spirits fierce and bold. 50
 A thousand culled from all of these
 Wait on the lord they long to please.
 This glorious power, this pomp and sway,
 Dear lady, at thy feet I lay:
 Yea, with my life I give the whole, 55
 O dearer than my life and soul.
 A thousand beauties fill my hall:
 Be thou my wife and rule them all.
 O hear my supplication! why
 This reasonable prayer deny? 60
 Some pity to thy suitor show,
 For love's hot flames within me glow.
 This isle a hundred leagues in length,

Encompassed by the ocean's strength,
 Would all the Gods and fiends defy 65
 Though led by Him who rules the sky.
 No God in heaven, no sage on earth,
 No minstrel of celestial birth,
 No spirit in the worlds I see
 A match in power and might for me. 70
 What wilt thou do with Rāma, him
 Whose days are short, whose light is dim,
 Expelled from home and royal sway,
 Who treads on foot his weary way?
 Leave the poor mortal to his fate, 75
 And wed thee with a worthier mate.
 My timid love, enjoy with me
 The prime of youth before it flee.
 Do not one hour the hope retain
 To look on Rāma's face again. 80
 For whom would wildest thought beguile
 To seek thee in the giants' isle?
 Say who is he has power to bind
 In toils of net the rushing wind.
 Whose is the mighty hand will tame 85
 And hold the glory of the flame?
 In all the worlds above, below,
 Not one, O fair of form, I know
 Who from this isle in fight could rend
 The lady whom these arms defend. 90
 Fair Queen, o'er Lankā's island reign,
 Sole mistress of the wide domain.
 Gods, rovers of the night like me,
 And all the world thy slaves will be.
 O'er thy fair brows and queenly head 95
 Let consecrating balm be shed,
 And sorrow banished from thy breast,
 Enjoy my love and take thy rest.
 Here never more thy soul shall know
 The memory of thy former woe, 100
 And here shall thou enjoy the meed
 Deserved by every virtuous deed.
 Here garlands glow of flowery twine,
 With gorgeous hues and scent divine.
 Take gold and gems and rich attire: 105
 Enjoy with me thy heart's desire.
 There stand, of chariots far the best,
 The car my brother once possessed.
 Which, victor in the stricken field,
 I forced the Lord of Gold to yield. 110
 'Tis wide and high and nobly wrought,
 Bright as the sun and swift as thought.
 Therein O Sítá, shalt thou ride
 Delighted by thy lover's side.
 But sorrow mars with lingering trace 115
 The splendour of thy lotus face.
 A cloud of woe is o'er it spread,
 And all the light of joy is fled."

The lady, by her woe distressed, One corner of her raiment pressed To her sad cheek like moonlight clear, And wiped away a falling tear. The rover of the night renewed His eager pleading as he viewed	120
The lady stand like one distraught, Striving to fix her wandering thought:	125
“Think not, sweet lady, of the shame Of broken vows, nor fear the blame. The saints approve with favouring eyes This union knit with marriage ties. O beauty, at thy radiant feet I lay my heads, and thus entreat. One word of grace, one look I crave: Have pity on thy prostrate slave. These idle words I speak are vain,	130
Wrung forth by love’s consuming pain, And ne’er of Rávan be it said He wooed a dame with prostrate head.” Thus to the Maithil lady sued	135
The monarch of the giant brood, And “She is now mine own,” he thought, In Death’s dire coils already caught.	140

Canto LVI. Sítá’s Disdain

His words the Maithil lady heard Oppressed by woe but undeterred. Fear of the fiend she cast aside, And thus in noble scorn replied: “His word of honour never stained King Daśaratha nobly reigned, The bridge of right, the friend of truth. His eldest son, a noble youth, Is Ráma, virtue’s faithful friend, Whose glories through the worlds extend. Long arms and large full eyes has he, My husband, yea a God to me. With shoulders like the forest king’s, From old Ikshváku’s line he springs. He with his brother Lakshman’s aid Will smite thee with the vengeful blade. Hadst thou but dared before his eyes To lay thine hand upon the prize, Thou stretched before his feet hadst lain In Janasthán like Khara slain. Thy boasted rovers of the night With hideous shapes and giant might,— Like serpents when the feathered king Swoops down with his tremendous wing,— Will find their useless venom fail When Ráma’s mighty arms assail. The rapid arrows bright with gold, Shot from the bow he loves to hold, Will rend thy frame from flank to flank	5

As Gangá's waves erode the bank. 30
 Though neither God nor fiend have power
 To slay thee in the battle hour,
 Yet from his hand shall come thy fate,
 Struck down before his vengeful hate.
 That mighty lord will strike and end 35
 The days of life thou hast to spend.
 Thy days are doomed, thy life is sped
 Like victims to the pillar led.
 Yea, if the glance of Rāma bright
 With fury on thy form should light, 40
 Thou scorched this day wouldst fall and die
 Like Kāma slain by Rudra's eye.
 He who from heaven the moon could throw,
 Or bid its bright rays cease to glow,—
 He who could drain the mighty sea 45
 Will set his darling Sítá free.
 Fled is thy life, thy glory, fled
 Thy strength and power: each sense is dead.
 Soon Lanká widowed by thy guilt
 Will see the blood of giants spilt. 50
 This wicked deed, O cruel King,
 No triumph, no delight will bring.
 Thou with outrageous might and scorn
 A woman from her lord hast torn.
 My glorious husband far away, 55
 Making heroic strength his stay,
 Dwells with his brother, void of fear,
 In Daṇḍak forest lone and drear.
 No more in force of arms confide:
 That haughty strength, that power and pride 60
 My hero with his arrowy rain
 From all thy bleeding limbs will drain.
 When urged by fate's dire mandate, nigh
 Comes the fixt hour for men to die.
 Caught in Death's toils their eyes are blind, 65
 And folly takes each wandering mind.
 So for the outrage thou hast done
 The fate is near thou canst not shun,—
 The fate that on thyself and all
 Thy giants and thy town shall fall. 70
 I spurn thee: can the altar dight
 With vessels for the sacred rite,
 O'er which the priest his prayer has said,
 Be sullied by an outcaste's tread?
 So me, the consort dear and true 75
 Of him who clings to virtue too,
 Thy hated touch shall ne'er defile,
 Base tyrant lord of Lanká's isle.
 Can the white swan who floats in pride
 Through lilies by her consort's side, 80
 Look for one moment, as they pass,
 On the poor diver in the grass?
 This senseless body waits thy will,
 To torture, chain, to wound or kill.
 I will not, King of giants, strive 85
 To keep this fleeting soul alive

But never shall they join the name
Of Sítá with reproach and shame.”

Thus as her breast with fury burned
Her bitter speech the dame returned. 90
Such words of rage and scorn, the last
She uttered, at the fiend she cast.

Her taunting speech the giant heard,
And every hair with anger stirred. 95
Then thus with fury in his eye

He made in threats his fierce reply:
“Hear Maithil lady, hear my speech:
List to my words and ponder each.
If o’er thy head twelve months shall fly 100
And thou thy love wilt still deny,
My cooks shall mince thy flesh with steel
And serve it for my morning meal.”

Thus with terrific threats to her
Spake Rávan, cruel ravener. 105
Mad with the rage her answer woke

He called the fiendish train and spoke:
“Take her, ye Rákshas dames, who fright
With hideous form and mien the sight,
Who make the flesh of men your food,—
And let her pride be soon subdued.” 110

He spoke, and at his word the band
Of fiendish monsters raised each hand
In reverence to the giant king,
And pressed round Sítá in a ring. 115
Rávan once more with stern behest

To those she-fiends his speech addressed:
Shaking the earth beneath his tread,
He stamped his furious foot and said:
“To the Aśoka garden bear 120
The dame, and guard her safely there
Until her stubborn pride be bent
By mingled threat and blandishment.
See that ye watch her well, and tame,
Like some she-elephant, the dame.”

They led her to that garden where 125

The sweetest flowers perfumed the air,
Where bright trees bore each rarest fruit,
And birds, enamoured, ne’er were mute.
Bowed down with terror and distress,
Watched by each cruel giantess,— 130

Like a poor solitary deer
When ravening tigresses are near,—
The hapless lady lay distraught
Like some wild thing but newly caught, 135
And found no solace, no relief

From agonizing fear and grief;
Not for one moment could forget
Each terrifying word and threat,
Or the fierce eyes upon her set
By those who watched around. 140

She thought of Rāma far away,
 She mourned for Lakshmaṇ as she lay
 In grief and terror and dismay
 Half fainting on the ground.

Canto LVII. Sítá Comforted

Soon as the fiend had set her down
 Within his home in Lanká's town
 Triumph and joy filled Indra's breast,
 Whom thus the Eternal Sire addressed:

“This deed will free the worlds from woe 5
 And cause the giants' overthrow.
 The fiend has borne to Lanká's isle
 The lady of the lovely smile,
 True consort born to happy fate
 With features fair and delicate. 10
 She looks and longs for Rāma's face,
 But sees a crowd of demon race,
 And guarded by the giant's train
 Pines for her lord and weeps in vain. 15
 But Lanká founded on a steep
 Is girdled by the mighty deep,
 And how will Rāma know his fair
 And blameless wife is prisoned there?
 She on her woe will sadly brood
 And pine away in solitude, 20
 And heedless of herself, will cease
 To live, despairing of release.
 Yes, pondering on her fate, I see
 Her gentle life in jeopardy. 25
 Go, Indra, swiftly seek the place,
 And look upon her lovely face.
 Within the city make thy way:
 Let heavenly food her spirit stay.”

Thus Brahma spake: and He who slew
 The cruel demon Páka, flew 30
 Where Lanká's royal city lay,
 And Sleep went with him on his way.
 “Sleep,” cried the heavenly Monarch, “close
 Each giant's eye in deep repose.”

Thus Indra spoke, and Sleep fulfilled 35
 With joy his mandate, as he willed,
 To aid the plan the Gods proposed,
 The demons' eyes in sleep she closed.
 Then Śachi's lord, the Thousand-eyed,
 To the Aśoka garden hied. 40
 He came and stood where Sítá lay,
 And gently thus began to say:
 “Lord of the Gods who hold the sky,
 Dame of the lovely smile, am I.
 Weep no more, lady, weep no more; 45
 Thy days of woe will soon be o'er.
 I come, O Janak's child, to be

- The helper of thy lord and thee.
 He through my grace, with hosts to aid,
 This sea-girt land will soon invade. 50
 'Tis by my art that slumbers close
 The eyelids of thy giant foes.
 Now I, with Sleep, this place have sought,
 Videhan lady, and have brought
 A gift of heaven's ambrosial food 55
 To stay thee in thy solitude.
 Receive it from my hand, and taste,
 O lady of the dainty waist:
 For countless ages thou shall be
 From pangs of thirst and hunger free." 60
- But doubt within her bosom woke
 As to the Lord of Gods she spoke:
 "How may I know for truth that thou
 Whose form I see before me now
 Art verily the King adored 65
 By heavenly Gods, and Śachi's lord?
 With Raghu's sons I learnt to know
 The certain signs which Godhead show.
 These marks before mine eyes display
 If o'er the Gods thou bear the sway." 70
- The heavenly lord of Śachi heard,
 And did according to her word.
 Above the ground his feet were raised;
 With eyelids motionless he gazed.
 No dust upon his raiment lay, 75
 And his bright wreath was fresh and gay.
 Nor was the lady's glad heart slow
 The Monarch of the Gods to know,
 And while the tears unceasing ran
 From her sweet eyes she thus began: 80
 "My lord has gained a friend in thee,
 And I this day thy presence see
 Shown clearly to mine eyes, as when
 Rāma and Lakshman, lords of men,
 Beheld it, and their sire the king, 85
 And Janak too from whom I spring.
 Now I, O Monarch of the Blest,
 Will eat this food at thy behest,
 Which thou hast brought me, of thy grace,
 To aid and strengthen Raghu's race." 90
- She spoke, and by his words relieved,
 The food from Indra's hand received,
 Yet ere she ate the balm he brought,
 On Lakshman and her lord she thought.
 "If my brave lord be still alive, 95
 If valiant Lakshman yet survive,
 May this my taste of heavenly food
 Bring health to them and bliss renewed!"
 She ate, and that celestial food
 Stayed hunger, thirst, and lassitude, 100
 And all her strength restored.

Great joy her hopeful spirit stirred
 At the glad tidings newly heard
 Of Lakshmaṇ and her lord.
 And Indra's heart was joyful too: 105
 He bade the Maithil dame adieu,
 His saving errand done.
 With Sleep beside him parting thence
 He sought his heavenly residence
 To prosper Raghu's son. 110

[Hanuman, the Vanar chieftain described below, goes to find Sita for Rama, making a huge leap over the waters to the island of Sri Lanka, where she is being held captive.]

Book V

Canto XV. Sítá

Fair as Kailása white with snow
 He saw a palace flash and glow,
 A crystal pavement gem-inlaid,
 And coral steps and colonnade,
 And glittering towers that kissed the skies, 5
 Whose dazzling splendour charmed his eyes.
 There pallid, with neglected dress,
 Watched close by fiend and giantess,
 Her sweet face thin with constant flow
 Of tears, with fasting and with woe; 10
 Pale as the young moon's crescent when
 The first faint light returns to men:
 Dim as the flame when clouds of smoke
 The latent glory hide and choke;
 Like Rohiṇí the queen of stars 15
 Oppressed by the red planet Mars;
 From her dear friends and husband torn,
 Amid the cruel fiends, forlorn,
 Who fierce-eyed watch around her kept,
 A tender woman sat and wept. 20
 Her sobs, her sighs, her mournful mien,
 Her glorious eyes, proclaimed the queen.
 "This, this is she," the Vánar cried,
 "Fair as the moon and lotus-eyed,
 I saw the giant Rávan bear 25
 A captive through the fields of air.
 Such was the beauty of the dame;
 Her form, her lips, her eyes the same.
 This peerless queen whom I behold
 Is Ráma's wife with limbs of gold. 30
 Best of the sons of men is he,
 And worthy of her lord is she."

Canto XVI. Hanumán's Lament

Then, all his thoughts on Sítá bent,
 The Vánar chieftain made lament:
 "The queen to Ráma's soul endeared,
 By Lakshmaṇ's pious heart revered,
 Lies here,—for none may strive with Fate, 5
 A captive, sad and desolate.

The brothers' might full well she knows,
 And bravely bears the storm of woes,
 As swelling Gangá in the rains
 The rush of every flood sustains. 10
 Her lord, for her, fierce Báli slew,
 Virádha's monstrous might o'erthrew,
 For her the fourteen thousand slain
 In Janasthán bedewed the plain.
 And if for her Ikshváku's son 15
 Destroyed the world 'twere nobly done.
 This, this is she, so far renowned,
 Who sprang from out the furrowed ground,
 Child of the high-souled king whose sway
 The men of Míthilá obey: 20
 The glorious lady wooed and won
 By Daśaratha's noblest son;
 And now these sad eyes look on her
 Mid hostile fiends a prisoner.
 From home and every bliss she fled 25
 By wifely love and duty led,
 And heedless of a wanderer's woes,
 A life in lonely forests chose.
 This, this is she so fair of mould.
 Whose limbs are bright as burnished gold. 30
 Whose voice was ever soft and mild,
 Who sweetly spoke and sweetly smiled.
 O, what is Ráma's misery! how
 He longs to see his darling now!
 Pining for one of her fond looks 35
 As one athirst for water brooks.
 Absorbed in woe the lady sees
 No Rákshas guard, no blooming trees.
 Her eyes are with her thoughts, and they Are fixed on Ráma far away." 40

Canto XVII. Sítá's Guard

His pitying eyes with tears bedewed,
 The weeping queen again he viewed,
 And saw around the prisoner stand
 Her demon guard, a fearful band. 5
 Some earless, some with ears that hung
 Low as their feet and loosely swung:
 Some fierce with single ears and eyes,
 Some dwarfish, some of monstrous size:
 Some with their dark necks long and thin
 With hair upon the knotty skin: 10
 Some with wild locks, some bald and bare,
 Some covered o'er with bristly hair:
 Some tall and straight, some bowed and bent
 With every foul disfigurement:
 All black and fierce with eyes of fire, 15
 Ruthless and stern and swift to ire:
 Some with the jackal's jaw and nose,
 Some faced like boars and buffaloes:
 Some with the heads of goats and kine,
 Of elephants, and dogs, and swine: 20

With lions' lips and horses' brows,
 They walked with feet of mules and cows:
 Swords, maces, clubs, and spears they bore
 In hideous hands that reeked with gore,
 And, never sated, turned afresh 25
 To bowls of wine and piles of flesh.
 Such were the awful guards who stood
 Round Sítá in that lovely wood,
 While in her lonely sorrow she
 Wept sadly neath a spreading tree. 30
 He watched the spouse of Ráma there
 Regardless of her tangled hair,
 Her jewels stripped from neck and limb,
 Decked only with her love of him.

Canto XVIII. Rávan

While from his shelter in the boughs
 The Vánar looked on Ráma's spouse
 He heard the gathered giants raise
 The solemn hymn of prayer and praise.—
 Priests skilled in rite and ritual, who
 The Vedas and their branches knew. 5
 Then, as loud strains of music broke
 His sleep, the giant monarch woke.
 Swift to his heart the thought returned
 Of the fair queen for whom he burned;
 Nor could the amorous fiend control 10
 The passion that absorbed his soul.
 In all his brightest garb arrayed
 He hastened to that lovely shade,
 Where glowed each choicest flower and fruit,
 And the sweet birds were never mute, 15
 And tall deer bent their heads to drink
 On the fair streamlet's grassy brink.
 Near that Aśoka grove he drew,—
 A hundred dames his retinue.
 Like Indra with the thousand eyes 20
 Girt with the beauties of the skies.
 Some walked beside their lord to hold
 The chouries, fans, and lamps of gold.
 And others purest water bore
 In golden urns, and paced before. 25
 Some carried, piled on golden plates,
 Delicious food of dainty cates;
 Some wine in massive bowls whereon
 The fairest gems resplendent shone.
 Some by the monarch's side displayed, 30
 Wrought like a swan, a silken shade:
 Another beauty walked behind,
 The sceptre to her care assigned.
 Around the monarch gleamed the crowd 35
 As lightnings flash about a cloud,
 And each made music as she went
 With zone and tinkling ornament.
 Attended thus in royal state
 The monarch reached the garden gate, 40

While gold and silver torches, fed
 With scented oil a soft light shed.
 He, while the flame of fierce desire
 Burnt in his eyes like kindled fire,
 Seemed Love incarnate in his pride, 45
 His bow and arrows laid aside.
 His robe, from spot and blemish free
 Like Amrit foamy from the sea,
 Hung down in many a loosened fold
 Inwrought with flowers and bright with gold. 50
 The Vānar from his station viewed,
 Amazed, the wondrous multitude,
 Where, in the centre of that ring
 Of noblest women, stood the king,
 As stands the full moon fair to view, 55
 Girt by his starry retinue.

Canto XIX. Sítá's Fear

Then o'er the lady's soul and frame
 A sudden fear and trembling came,
 When, glowing in his youthful pride,
 She saw the monarch by her side.
 Silent she sat, her eyes depressed, 5
 Her soft arms folded o'er her breast,
 And,—all she could,—her beauties screened
 From the bold gazes of the fiend.
 There where the wild she-demons kept
 Their watch around, she sighed and wept. 10
 Then, like a severed bough, she lay
 Prone on the bare earth in dismay.
 The while her thoughts on love's fleet wings
 Flew to her lord the best of kings.
 She fell upon the ground, and there 15
 Lay struggling with her wild despair,
 Sad as a lady born again
 To misery and woe and pain,
 Now doomed to grief and low estate,
 Once noble fair and delicate: 20
 Like faded light of holy lore,
 Like Hope when all her dreams are o'er;
 Like ruined power and rank debased,
 Like majesty of kings disgraced:
 Like worship foiled by erring slips, 25
 The moon that labours in eclipse;
 A pool with all her lilies dead,
 An army when its king has fled:
 So sad and helpless wan and worn,
 She lay among the fiends forlorn. 30

Canto XX. Rávan's Wooing

With amorous look and soft address
 The fiend began his suit to press:
 "Why wouldst thou, lady lotus-eyed,
 From my fond glance those beauties hide?
 Mine eager suit no more repel: 5
 But love me, for I love thee well.

Dismiss, sweet dame, dismiss thy fear;
 No giant and no man is near.
 Ours is the right by force to seize
 What dames soe'er our fancy please. 10
 But I with rude hands will not touch
 A lady whom I love so much.
 Fear not, dear queen: no fear is nigh:
 Come, on thy lover's love rely,
 Some little sign of favor show, 15
 Nor lie enamoured of thy woe.
 Those limbs upon that cold earth laid,
 Those tresses twined in single braid,
 The fast and woe that wear thy frame,
 Beseem not thee, O beauteous dame. 20
 For thee the fairest wreaths were meant,
 The sandal and the aloë's scent,
 Rich ornaments and pearls of price,
 And vesture meet for Paradise.
 With dainty cates shouldst thou be fed, 25
 And rest upon a sumptuous bed.
 And festive joys to thee belong,
 The music, and the dance and song.
 Rise, pearl of women, rise and deck
 With gems and chains thine arms and neck. 30
 Shall not the dame I love be seen
 In vesture worthy of a queen?
 Methinks when thy sweet form was made
 His hand the wise Creator stayed;
 For never more did he design 35
 A beauty meet to rival thine.
 Come, let us love while yet we may,
 For youth will fly and charms decay,
 Come cast thy grief and fear aside,
 And be my love, my chosen bride. 40
 The gems and jewels that my hand
 Has reft from every plundered land,—
 To thee I give them all this day,
 And at thy feet my kingdom lay.
 The broad rich earth will I oërrun, 45
 And leave no town unconquered, none;
 Then of the whole an offering make
 To Janak, dear, for thy sweet sake.
 In all the world no power I see
 Of God or man can strive with me. 50
 Of old the Gods and Asurs set
 In terrible array I met:
 Their scattered hosts to earth I beat,
 And trod their flags beneath my feet.
 Come, taste of bliss and drink thy fill, 55
 And rule the slave who serves thy will.
 Think not of wretched Râma: he
 Is less than nothing now to thee.
 Stript of his glory, poor, dethroned,
 A wanderer by his friends disowned, 60
 On the cold earth he lays his head,
 Or is with toil and misery dead.
 And if perchance he lingers yet,

His eyes on thee shall ne'er be set.
 Could he, that mighty monarch, who 65
 Was named Hiranyakaśipu,
 Could he who wore the garb of gold
 Win Glory back from Indra's hold?
 O lady of the lovely smile,
 Whose eyes the sternest heart beguile, 70
 In all thy radiant beauty dressed
 My heart and soul thou ravishest.
 What though thy robe is soiled and worn,
 And no bright gems thy limbs adorn,
 Thou unadorned art dearer far 75
 Than all my loveliest consorts are.
 My royal home is bright and fair;
 A thousand beauties meet me there,
 But come, my glorious love, and be
 The queen of all those dames and me." 80

Canto XXI. Sítá's Scorn

She thought upon her lord and sighed,
 And thus in gentle tones replied:
 "Beseems thee not, O King, to woo
 A matron, to her husband true.
 Thus vainly one might hope by sin 5
 And evil deeds success to win.
 Shall I, so highly born, disgrace
 My husband's house, my royal race?
 Shall I, a true and loyal dame,
 Defile my soul with deed of shame?" 10

Then on the king her back she turned,
 And answered thus the prayer she spurned:
 "Turn, Rávan, turn thee from thy sin;
 Seek virtue's paths and walk therein.
 To others dames be honour shown; 15
 Protect them as thou wouldst thine own.
 Taught by thyself, from wrong abstain
 Which, wrought on thee, thy heart would pain.
 Beware: this lawless love of thine
 Will ruin thee and all thy line; 20
 And for thy sin, thy sin alone,
 Will Lanká perish overthrown.
 Dream not that wealth and power can sway
 My heart from duty's path to stray.
 Linked like the Day-God and his shine, 25
 I am my lord's and he is mine.
 Repent thee of thine impious deed;
 To Ráma's side his consort lead.
 Be wise; the hero's friendship gain,
 Nor perish in his fury slain. 30
 Go, ask the God of Death to spare,
 Or red bolt flashing through the air,
 But look in vain for spell or charm
 To stay my Ráma's vengeful arm.
 Thou, when the hero bends his bow, 35
 Shalt hear the clang that heralds woe,

Loud as the clash when clouds are rent
 And Indra's bolt to earth is sent.
 Then shall his furious shafts be sped,
 Each like a snake with fiery head, 40
 And in their flight shall hiss and flame
 Marked with the mighty archer's name.
 Then in the fiery deluge all
 Thy giants round their king shall fall."

Canto XXII. Rávan's Threat

Then anger swelled in Rávan's breast,
 Who fiercely thus the dame addressed:
 "Tis ever thus: in vain we sue
 To woman, and her favour woo. 5
 A lover's humble words impel
 Her wayward spirit to rebel.
 The love of thee that fills my soul
 Still keeps my anger in control,
 As charioteers with bit and rein 10
 The swerving of the steed restrain.
 The love that rules me bids me spare
 Thy forfeit life, O thou most fair.
 For this, O Sítá, have I borne
 The keen reproach, the bitter scorn,
 And the fond love thou boastest yet 15
 For that poor wandering anchoret;
 Else had the words which thou hast said
 Brought death upon thy guilty head.
 Two months, fair dame, I grant thee still
 To bend thee to thy lover's will. 20
 If when that respite time is fled
 Thou still refuse to share my bed,
 My cooks shall mince thy limbs with steel
 And serve thee for my morning meal."

The minstrel daughters of the skies 25
 Looked on her woe with pitying eyes,
 And sun-bright children of the Gods
 Consoled the queen with smiles and nods.
 She saw, and with her heart at ease,
 Addressed the fiend in words like these; 30
 "Hast thou no friend to love thee, none
 In all this isle to bid thee shun
 The ruin which thy crime will bring
 On thee and thine, O impious King?
 Who in all worlds save thee could woo 35
 Me, Ráma's consort pure and true,
 As though he tempted with his love
 Queen Sachi on her throne above?
 How canst thou hope, vile wretch, to fly
 The vengeance that éen now is nigh, 40
 When thou hast dared, untouched by shame,
 To press thy suit on Ráma's dame?
 Where woods are thick and grass is high
 A lion and a hare may lie;
 My Ráma is the lion, thou 45

Art the poor hare beneath the bough.
 Thou railest at the lord of men,
 But wilt not stand within his ken.
 What! is that eye unstricken yet
 Whose impious glance on me was set? 50
 Still moves that tongue that would not spare
 The wife of Daśaratha's heir?"

Then, hissing like a furious snake,
 The fiend again to Sítá spake:
 "Deaf to all prayers and threats art thou, 55
 Devoted to thy senseless vow.
 No longer respite will I give,
 And thou this day shalt cease to live;
 For I, as sunlight kills the morn,
 Will slay thee for thy scathe and scorn." 60

The Rákshas guard was summoned: all
 The monstrous crew obeyed the call,
 And hastened to the king to take
 The orders which he fiercely spake:
 "See that ye guard her well, and tame, 65
 Like some wild thing, the stubborn dame,
 Until her haughty soul be bent
 By mingled threat and blandishment."

The monsters heard: away he strode,
 And passed within his queens' abode. 70

Canto XXIII. The Demons' Threats

Then round the helpless Sítá drew
 With fiery eyes the hideous crew,
 And thus assailed her, all and each,
 With insult, taunt, and threatening speech:
 "What! can it be thou prizest not 5
 This happy chance, this glorious lot,
 To be the chosen wife of one
 So strong and great, Pulastya's son?
 Pulastya—thus have sages told—
 Is mid the Lords of Life enrolled. 10
 Lord Brahmá's mind-born son was he,
 Fourth of that glorious company.
 Viśravas from Pulastya sprang,—
 Through all the worlds his glory rang.
 And of Viśravas, large-eyed dame! 15
 Our king the mighty Rávaṇ came.
 His happy consort thou mayst be:
 Scorn not the words we say to thee."

One awful demon, fiery-eyed,
 Stood by the Maithil queen and cried: 20
 'Come and be his, if thou art wise,
 Who smote the sovereign of the skies,
 And made the thirty Gods and three,
 O'ercome in furious battle, flee.
 Thy lover turns away with scorn 25

From wives whom grace and youth adorn.
Thou art his chosen consort, thou
Shall be his pride and darling now.”

Another, Vikatá by name,
In words like these addressed the dame: 30
“The king whose blows, in fury dealt,
The Nágas and Gandharvas felt,
In battle’s fiercest brunt subdued,
Has stood by thee and humbly wooed.
And wilt thou in thy folly miss 35
The glory of a love like this?
Scared by his eye the sun grows chill,
The wanderer wind is hushed and still.
The rains at his command descend,
And trees with new-blown blossoms bend. 40
His word the hosts of demons fear,
And wilt thou, dame, refuse to hear?
Be counselled; with his will comply,
Or, lady, thou shalt surely die.”

Canto XXIV. Sítá’s Reply

Still with reproaches rough and rude
Those fiends the gentle queen pursued:
“What! can so fair a life displease,
To dwell with him in joyous ease?
Dwell in his bowers a happy queen 5
In silk and gold and jewels’ sheen?
Still must thy woman fancy cling
To Ráma and reject our king?
Die in thy folly, or forget
That wretched wandering anchoret. 10
Come, Sítá, in luxurious bowers
Spend with our lord thy happy hours;
The mighty lord who makes his own
The treasures of the worlds o’erthrown.”

Then, as a tear bedewed her eye, 15
The hapless lady made reply:
“I loathe, with heart and soul detest
The shameful life your words suggest.
Eat, if you will, this mortal frame:
My soul rejects the sin and shame. 20
A homeless wanderer though he be,
In him my lord, my life I see,
And, till my earthly days be done,
Will cling to great Ikshváku’s son.”

Then with fierce eyes on Sítá set 25
They cried again with taunt and threat:
Each licking with her fiery tongue
The lip that to her bosom hung,
And menacing the lady’s life
With axe, or spear or murderous knife: 30
“Hear, Sítá, and our words obey,
Or perish by our hands to-day.

Thy love for Raghu's son forsake,
 And Rávan for thy husband take,
 Or we will rend thy limbs apart 35
 And banquet on thy quivering heart.
 Now from her body strike the head,
 And tell the king the dame is dead.
 Then by our lord's commandment she
 A banquet for our band shall be. 40
 Come, let the wine be quickly brought
 That frees each heart from saddening thought.
 Then to the western gate repair,
 And we will dance and revel there."

[After the great battle, Hanuman goes to Sita to tell her about the victory.]

Book VI

Canto CXV. Sítá's Joy

The Vánar chieftain bowed his head,
 Within the walls of Lanká sped,
 Leave from the new-made king obtained,
 And Sítá's lovely garden gained. 5
 Beneath a tree the queen he found,
 Where Rákshas warders watched around.
 Her pallid cheek, her tangled hair,
 Her raiment showed her deep despair,
 Near and more near the envoy came
 And gently hailed the weeping dame. 10
 She started up in sweet surprise,
 And sudden joy illumed her eyes.
 For well the Vánar's voice she knew,
 And hope reviving sprang and grew.

"Fair Queen," he said, "our task is done: 15
 The foe is slain and Lanká won.
 Triumphant mid triumphant friends
 Kind words of greeting Ráma sends.
 "Blest for thy sake, O spouse most true,
 My deadly foe I met and slew. 20
 Mine eyes are strangers yet to sleep:
 I built a bridge athwart the deep
 And crossed the sea to Lanká's shore
 To keep the mighty oath I swore.
 Now, gentle love, thy cares dispel, 25
 And weep no more, for all is well.
 Fear not in Rávan's house to stay
 For good Vibhishaṇ now bears sway,
 For constant truth and friendship known
 Regard his palace as thine own." 30
 He greets thee thus thy heart to cheer,
 And urged by love will soon be here."

Then flushed with joy the lady's cheek.
 Her eyes o'erflowed, her voice was weak;
 But struggling with her sobs she broke 35
 Her silence thus, and faintly spoke:
 "So fast the flood of rapture came,

My trembling tongue no words could frame.
 Ne'er have I heard in days of bliss
 A tale that gave such joy as this. 40
 More precious far than gems and gold
 The message which thy lips have told."

His reverent hands the Vánar raised
 And thus the lady's answer praised:
 "Sweet are the words, O Queen, which thou 45
 True to thy lord, hast spoken now,
 Better than gems and pearls of price,
 Yea, or the throne of Paradise.
 But, lady, ere I leave this place,
 Grant me, I pray, a single grace. 50
 Permit me, and this vengeful hand
 Shall slay thy guards, this Rákshas band,
 Whose cruel insult threat and scorn
 Thy gentle soul too long has borne."

Thus, stern of mood, Hanúmán cried: 55
 The Maithil lady thus replied:
 "Nay, be not wroth with servants: they,
 When monarchs bid must needs obey.
 And, vassals of their lords, fulfil
 Each fancy of their sovereign will. 60
 To mine own sins the blame impute,
 For as we sow we reap the fruit.
 The tyrant's will these dames obeyed
 When their fierce threats my soul dismayed."

She ceased: with admiration moved 65
 The Vánar chief her words approved:
 "Thy speech," he cried, "is worthy one
 Whom love has linked to Raghu's son.
 Now speak, O Queen, that I may know
 Thy pleasure, for to him I go." 70
 The Vánar ceased: then Janak's child
 Made answer as she sweetly smiled:
 "My first, my only wish can be,
 O chief, my loving lord to see."
 Again the Vánar envoy spoke, 75
 And with his words new rapture woke:
 "Queen, ere this sun shall cease to shine
 Thy Ráma's eyes shall look in thine.
 Again the lord of Raghu's race
 Shall turn to thee his moon-bright face. 80
 His faithful brother shall thou see
 And every friend who fought for thee,
 And greet once more thy king restored
 Like Śachí to her heavenly lord."
 To Raghu's son his steps he bent 85
 And told the message that she sent.

Canto CXVI. The Meeting

He looked upon that archer chief
 Whose full eye mocked the lotus leaf,
 And thus the noble Vánar spake:

“Now meet the queen for whose dear sake Thy mighty task was first begun, And now the glorious fruit is won. O’erwhelmed with woe thy lady lies, The hot tears streaming from her eyes. And still the queen must long and pine Until those eyes be turned to thine.”	5      10
But Ráma stood in pensive mood, And gathering tears his eyes bedewed. His sad looks sought the ground: he sighed And thus to King Vibhishan cried: “Let Sítá bathe and tire her head And hither to my sight be led In raiment sweet with precious scent, And gay with golden ornament.”	15
The Rákshas king his palace sought, And Sítá from her bower was brought. Then Rákshas bearers tall and strong, Selected from the menial throng, Through Lanká’s gate the queen, arrayed In glorious robes and gems, conveyed. Concealed behind the silken screen, Swift to the plain they bore the queen, While Vánars, close on every side, With eager looks the litter eyed. The warders at Vibhishan’s hest The onward rushing throng repressed, While like the roar of ocean loud Rose the wild murmur of the crowd. The son of Raghu saw and moved With anger thus the king reproved: “Why vex with hasty blow and threat The Vánars, and my rights forget? Repress this zeal, untimely shown: I count this people as mine own. A woman’s guard is not her bower, The lofty wall, the fenced tower: Her conduct is her best defence, And not a king’s magnificence. At holy rites, in war and woe, Her face unveiled a dame may show; When at the Maiden’s Choice they meet, When marriage troops parade the street. And she, my queen, who long has lain In prison racked with care and pain, May cease a while her face to hide, For is not Ráma by her side? Lay down the litter: on her feet Let Sítá come her lord to meet. And let the hosts of woodland race Look near upon the lady’s face.”	20      25      30      35      40      45      50
Then Lakshman and each Vánar chief Who heard his words were filled with grief. The lady’s gentle spirit sank,	55

And from each eye in fear she shrank,
 As, her sweet eyelids veiled for shame,
 Slowly before her lord she came. 60
 While rapture battled with surprise
 She raised to his her wistful eyes.
 Then with her doubt and fear she strove,
 And from her breast all sorrow drove.
 Regardless of the gathering crowd, 65
 Bright as the moon without a cloud,
 She bent her eyes, no longer dim,
 In joy and trusting love on him.

Canto CXVII. Sītā's Disgrace

He saw her trembling by his side,
 And looked upon her face and cried:
 "Lady, at length my task is done,
 And thou, the prize of war, art won,
 This arm my glory has retrieved, 5
 And all that man might do achieved;
 The insulting foe in battle slain
 And cleared mine honour from its stain.
 This day has made my name renowned
 And with success my labour crowned. 10
 Lord of myself, the oath I swore
 Is binding on my soul no more.
 If from my home my queen was reft,
 This arm has well avenged the theft,
 And in the field has wiped away 15
 The blot that on mine honour lay.
 The bridge that spans the foaming flood,
 The city red with giants' blood;
 The hosts by King Sugrīva led
 Who wisely counselled, fought and bled; 20
 Vibhishan's love, our guide and stay—
 All these are crowned with fruit to-day.
 But, lady, 'twas not love for thee
 That led mine army o'er the sea.
 'Twas not for thee our blood was shed, 25
 Or Lanká filled with giant dead.
 No fond affection for my wife
 Inspired me in the hour of strife.
 I battled to avenge the cause
 Of honour and insulted laws. 30
 My love is fled, for on thy fame
 Lies the dark blot of sin and shame;
 And thou art hateful as the light
 That flashes on the injured sight.
 The world is all before thee: flee: 35
 Go where thou wilt, but not with me.
 How should my home receive again
 A mistress soiled with deathless stain?
 How should I brook the foul disgrace,
 Scorned by my friends and all my race? 40
 For Rávan bore thee through the sky,
 And fixed on thine his evil eye.
 About thy waist his arms he threw,

Close to his breast his captive drew,
 And kept thee, vassal of his power,
 An inmate of his ladies' bower.”

Struck down with overwhelming shame
 She shrank within her trembling frame.
 Each word of Ráma's like a dart
 Had pierced the lady to the heart;
 And from her sweet eyes unrestrained
 The torrent of her sorrows, rained. 5
 Her weeping eyes at length she dried,
 And thus mid choking sobs replied:
 “Canst thou, a high-born prince, dismiss
 A high-born dame with speech like this? 10
 Such words befit the meanest hind,
 Not princely birth and generous mind,
 By all my virtuous life I swear
 I am not what thy words declare.
 If some are faithless, wilt thou find 15
 No love and truth in womankind?
 Doubt others if thou wilt, but own
 The truth which all my life has shown.
 If, when the giant seized his prey,
 Within his hated arms I lay, 20
 And felt the grasp I dreaded, blame
 Fate and the robber, not thy dame.
 What could a helpless woman do?
 My heart was mine and still was true,
 Why when Hanúmán sent by thee 25
 Sought Lanká's town across the sea,
 Couldst thou not give, O lord of men,
 Thy sentence of rejection then?
 Then in the presence of the chief
 Death, ready death, had brought relief, 30
 Nor had I nursed in woe and pain
 This lingering life, alas in vain.

Then hadst thou shunned the fruitless strife
 Nor jeopardied thy noble life,
 But spared thy friends and bold allies 35
 Their vain and weary enterprise.
 Is all forgotten, all? my birth,
 Named Janak's child, from fostering earth?
 That day of triumph when a maid
 My trembling hand in thine I laid? 40
 My meek obedience to thy will,
 My faithful love through joy and ill,
 That never failed at duty's call—
 O King, is all forgotten, all?"

To Lakshman then she turned and spoke 45
 While sobs and sighs her utterance broke:
 "Sumitrā's son, a pile prepare,
 My refuge in my dark despair.
 I will not live to bear this weight
 Of shame, forlorn and desolate. 50
 The kindled fire my woes shall end
 And be my best and surest friend."

His mournful eyes the hero raised
 And wistfully on Rāma gazed,
 In whose stern look no ruth was seen, 55
 No mercy for the weeping queen.
 No chieftain dared to meet those eyes,
 To pray, to question or advise.

The word was passed, the wood was piled
 And fain to die stood Janak's child. 60
 She slowly paced around her lord,
 The Gods with reverent act adored,
 Then raising suppliant hands the dame
 Prayed humbly to the Lord of Flame:
 "As this fond heart by virtue swayed 65
 From Raghū's son has never strayed,
 So, universal witness, Fire
 Protect my body on the pyre,
 As Raghū's son has idly laid
 This charge on Sítá, hear and aid." 70

She ceased: and fearless to the last
 Within the flame's wild fury passed.
 Then rose a piercing cry from all
 Dames, children, men, who saw her fall
 Adorned with gems and gay attire 75
 Beneath the fury of the fire.

Canto CXIX. Glory To Vishnu

The shrill cry pierced through Rāma's ears
 And his sad eyes o'erflowed with tears,
 When lo, transported through the sky
 A glorious band of Gods was nigh.
 Ancestral shades, by men revered, 5
 In venerable state appeared,

And he from whom all riches flow,
 And Yáma Lord who reigns below:
 King Indra, thousand-eyed, and he
 Who wields the sceptre of the sea. 10
 The God who shows the blazoned bull,
 And Brahmá Lord most bountiful
 By whose command the worlds were made
 All these on radiant cars conveyed,
 Brighter than sun-beams, sought the place 15
 Where stood the prince of Raghu's race,
 And from their glittering seats the best
 Of blessed Gods the chief addressed:

"Couldst thou, the Lord of all, couldst thou,
 Creator of the worlds, allow 20
 Thy queen, thy spouse to brave the fire
 And give her body to the pyre?
 Dost thou not yet, supremely wise,
 Thy heavenly nature recognize?"
 They ceased: and Ráma thus began: 25
 "I deem myself a mortal man.
 Of old Ikshváku's line, I spring
 From Daśaratha Kośal's king."
 He ceased: and Brahmá's self replied: 30
 "O cast the idle thought aside.
 Thou art the Lord Nárāyaṇ, thou
 The God to whom all creatures bow.
 Thou art the saviour God who wore
 Of old the semblance of a boar;
 Thou he whose discus overthrows 35
 All present, past and future foes;
 Thou Brahmá, That whose days extend Without beginning, growth or end;
 The God, who, bears the bow of horn,
 Whom four majestic arms adorn; 40
 Thou art the God who rules the sense
 And sways with gentle influence;
 Thou all-pervading Vishṇu Lord
 Who wears the ever-conquering sword;
 Thou art the Guide who leads aright, 45
 Thou Krishṇa of unequalled might.
 Thy hand, O Lord, the hills and plains,
 And earth with all her life sustains;
 Thou wilt appear in serpent form
 When sinks the earth in fire and storm. 50
 Queen Sítá of the lovely brows
 Is Lakshmí thy celestial spouse.
 To free the worlds from Rávaṇ thou
 Wouldst take the form thou wearest now.
 Rejoice: the mighty task is done: 55
 Rejoice, thou great and glorious one.
 The tyrant, slain, thy labours end:
 Triumphant now to heaven ascend.
 High bliss awaits the devotee
 Who clings in loving faith to thee, 60
 Who celebrates with solemn praise
 The Lord of néer beginning days.

On earth below, in heaven above
 Great joy shall crown his faith and love.
 And he who loves the tale divine 65
 Which tells each glorious deed of thine
 Through life's fair course shall never know
 The fierce assault of pain and woe."

Canto CXX. Sítá Restored

Thus spoke the Self-existent Sire:
 Then swiftly from the blazing pyre
 The circling flames were backward rolled,
 And, raising in his gentle hold
 Alive unharmed the Maithil dame, 5
 The Lord of Fire embodied came.
 Fair as the morning was her sheen,
 And gold and gems adorned the queen.
 Her form in crimson robes arrayed,
 Her hair was bound in glossy braid. 10
 Her wreath was fresh and sweet of scent,
 Undimmed was every ornament.
 Then, standing close to Ráma's side,
 The universal witness cried:
 "From every blot and blemish free 15
 Thy faithful queen returns to thee.
 In word or deed, in look or mind
 Her heart from thee has ne'er declined.
 By force the giant bore away
 From thy lone cot his helpless prey; 20
 And in his bowers securely kept
 She still has longed for thee and wept.
 With soft temptation, bribe and threat,
 He bade the dame her love forget:
 But, nobly faithful to her lord, 25
 Her soul the giant's suit abhorred.
 Receive, O King, thy queen again,
 Pure, ever pure from spot and stain."

Still stood the king in thoughtful mood
 And tears of joy his eyes bedewed. 30
 Then to the best of Gods the best
 Of warrior chiefs his mind expressed:

"'Twas meet that mid the thousands here
 The searching fire my queen should clear;
 For long within the giant's bower 35
 She dwelt the vassal of his power.
 For else had many a slanderous tongue
 Reproaches on mine honour flung,
 And scorned the king who, love-impelled,
 His consort from the proof withheld. 40
 No doubt had I, but surely knew
 That Janak's child was pure and true,
 That, come what might, in good and ill
 Her faithful heart was with me still.
 I knew that Rávan could not wrong 45
 My queen whom virtue made so strong.

I knew his heart would sink and fail,
Nor dare her honour to assail,
As Ocean, when he raves and roars,
Fears to o'erleap his bounding shores. 50
Now to the worlds her truth is shown,
And Síta is again mine own.
Thus proved before unnumbered eyes,
On her pure fame no shadow lies.
As heroes to their glory cleave, 55
Mine own dear spouse I ne'er will leave."
He ceased: and clasped in fond embrace
On his dear breast she hid her face.

When Dante walks through Limbo in the Inferno, he talks to a group that he identifies as the five greatest poets in history: Homer, Virgil, Ovid, Horace, and Lucan. While Dante, as an Italian, obviously stacks the deck in favor of Roman poets, his list highlights the importance of the two selections in this chapter: Virgil's Aeneid and Ovid's Metamorphoses. While Horace and Lucan are no longer quite as famous as the others, literary critics today recognize the influence and quality of Virgil and Ovid's works.

Although they were (roughly) contemporaries, the older Virgil had grown up in a world split by civil wars: first Julius Caesar against Pompey the Great, and later Mark Antony (and Cleopatra) against Julius Caesar's nephew Octavian, who would take the name Augustus Caesar when he became the first Roman Emperor. Ovid was born after the civil wars were over. As a result, Virgil was an advocate for stability in his poetry, while Ovid took a much freer approach in his works.

Virgil reshapes the story of Aeneas to demonstrate what he (and Augustus) saw as the perfect Roman values. Aeneas, however, is not simply a reflection of Virgil's time period; the Aeneid attempts to use literature to shape real life by showing a model hero worthy of inspiring imitation. To a certain extent, Virgil succeeds, at least in future generations. Ovid is more of a reflection of Virgil's actual time period. Ovid's witty sophistication and humorous excesses in his early love poetry provide us with a more decadent picture of Rome. Both poets turn to epic poetry later in life, but for opposite reasons: one to create order out of chaos, and one to question (in all seriousness) whether that order is artificial.

Augustus Caesar's reaction to each poet epitomizes the difference between them. Virgil was directed by Augustus to write the Aeneid, which rewrites history to explain how Rome was pre-ordained by the gods to be an empire. Virgil's depiction of the fall of Troy includes Roman fighting techniques and religious beliefs (such as the lares, or household gods) that would have been foreign to Homer's Greeks and Trojans. Since the Aeneid includes the deification of Augustus (foretold in Aeneid 6), it is a splendid piece of propaganda for a man who only called himself the son of the deified (Julius Caesar), rather than a god. When Virgil was dying, he asked that the nearly complete manuscript be burnt; Augustus ordered the manuscript to be finished and published. Conversely, Ovid's work challenged the very notion that the people around him were anything but human. Ovid's works included a book of letters by the women who are abandoned by the so-called heroes of mythology (the Heroides), a scandalous book of love poetry (the Amores), and a manual on how to pick up women (the Ars Amatoria). In particular, the Ars Amatoria was so popular that he wrote a section on how women could pick up men (hardly an example of early feminism, but unusual for the time). Ovid's view of power was skeptical, at best, since the Metamorphoses catalogues the bad behavior of the gods that led us to the present state of affairs. In Metamorphoses 15, Ovid explains why the gods allowed Julius Caesar to be killed, followed by a prayer that Augustus should have more time on earth before the gods take him too: not exactly the emphasis that Augustus might have preferred. Exiled by Augustus for his scandalous poetry, Ovid was never allowed to return to Rome.

Although Roman culture had appropriated Greek literature and religion, changing the names of characters and gods but continuing their stories, there were significant differences in Roman religious practices. Worship of the most important gods was directed by the flamines maiores (the "major priests") of the three principle cults (to Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus), while the flamines minores (or "minor priests") directed the worship of the rest of the gods. The Romans had quite a few gods that had no equivalent among the Greek gods, and their identities sometimes altered over time. In certain cases, earlier Roman gods were absorbed into another god's identity or replaced entirely. For example, the Greek goddess Artemis was, over time, equated with the Roman goddess Diana, who also came to be identified with the Greek goddess Hecate, whose rough equivalent was the Roman goddess Trivia. All four figures eventually were identified as one goddess, who had multiple aspects to her power, and who was worshipped by multiple names. Apollo, however, had no equivalent match among the Roman gods, so he remained Apollo. The following comparison of Greek and Roman gods is particularly useful for anyone who has read Homer's works.

Roman Name	Greek Name
Jupiter/Jove	Zeus
Juno	Hera
Minerva	Athena (or Pallas Athena)
Apollo	Apollo
Venus	Aphrodite
Diana	Artemis
Mercury	Hermes
Neptune	Poseidon
Pluto	Hades
Mars	Ares
Vulcan	Hephaestus
Bacchus	Dionysus
Proserpina	Persephone
Ceres	Demeter
Pan	Pan
Cupid	Eros
(Ulysses)	(Odysseus)

AS YOU READ, CONSIDER THE FOLLOWING QUESTIONS:

- How does each epic portray the gods? How do humans feel about the gods in each work?
- How is the view of “Fate” different in these works from the earlier Greek texts? In particular, what can the gods do in Roman literature that they cannot do in Greek literature?
- What is human nature like in each of the stories? Are there any similarities?
- What view of authority does each epic seem to recommend? Why?
- What is the definition of a hero in each work? How do we know, based on the evidence in the texts?
- Is there a unified view of “duty” in these works? Why or why not?

THE AENEID

Virgil (70-19 B.C.E.)

Published around 19 B.C.E.

Rome

The Aeneid is a Roman epic purporting to explain how Trojans fleeing the fall of Troy become the ancestors of the Romans: in essence, a continuation of Homer’s Iliad. The story centers on Aeneas, a prince of Troy and the son of Venus/Aphrodite, who leads the search for a new homeland. The epic was commissioned by the first Roman emperor, Augustus Caesar, to justify why Rome was no longer a republic: According to the story, the gods themselves planned for Rome to become an empire long before Rome ever existed, and legend is rewritten so that the Trojan Aeneas (who appears in Homer’s Iliad) becomes the model Roman citizen. Virgil’s execution of the story is more complex, recognizing as it does that the price for the foundation of Rome is a steep one. In Virgil’s time, Greek literature enjoyed more prestige than Roman literature, so the Aeneid attempts in part to revise and replace earlier Greek epics; the first six books of the Aeneid are a conscious parallel to Homer's Odyssey, and the last six books refigure Homer's Iliad. Because of the widespread use of Latin in the European Middle Ages, Virgil's perspective on history (and figures that he considered to be historical) exerted considerable influence on writers who followed him.

Arms, and the man I sing, who, forc'd by fate,
 And haughty Juno's unrelenting hate,
 Expell'd and exil'd, left the Trojan shore.
 Long labors, both by sea and land, he bore,
 And in the doubtful war, before he won 5
 The Latian realm, and built the destin'd town;
 His banish'd gods restor'd to rites divine,
 And settled sure succession in his line,
 From whence the race of Alban fathers come,
 And the long glories of majestic Rome. 10

O Muse! the causes and the crimes relate;
 What goddess was provok'd, and whence her hate;
 For what offense the Queen of Heav'n began
 To persecute so brave, so just a man;
 Involv'd his anxious life in endless cares, 15
 Expos'd to wants, and hurried into wars!
 Can heav'nly minds such high resentment show,
 Or exercise their spite in human woe?

Against the Tiber's mouth, but far away,
 An ancient town was seated on the sea; 20
 A Tyrian colony; the people made
 Stout for the war, and studious of their trade:
 Carthage the name; belov'd by Juno more
 Than her own Argos, or the Samian shore.
 Here stood her chariot; here, if Heav'n were kind, 25
 The seat of awful empire she design'd.
 Yet she had heard an ancient rumor fly,

(Long cited by the people of the sky,
 That times to come should see the Trojan race
 Her Carthage ruin, and her tow'rs deface; 30
 Nor thus confin'd, the yoke of sov'reign sway
 Should on the necks of all the nations lay.
 She ponder'd this, and fear'd it was in fate;
 Nor could forget the war she wag'd of late
 For conqu'ring Greece against the Trojan state. 35
 Besides, long causes working in her mind,
 And secret seeds of envy, lay behind;
 Deep graven in her heart the doom remain'd
 Of partial Paris, and her form disdain'd;
 The grace bestow'd on ravish'd Ganymed, 40
 Electra's glories, and her injur'd bed.
 Each was a cause alone; and all combin'd

To kindle vengeance in her haughty mind.
 For this, far distant from the Latian coast
 She drove the remnants of the Trojan host; 45
 And sev'n long years th' unhappy wand'ring train
 Were toss'd by storms, and scatter'd thro' the main.
 Such time, such toil, requir'd the Roman name,
 Such length of labor for so vast a frame.

Now scarce the Trojan fleet, with sails and oars, 50
 Had left behind the fair Sicilian shores,
 Ent'ring with cheerful shouts the wat'ry reign,
 And plowing frothy furrows in the main;
 When, lab'ring still with endless discontent,
 The Queen of Heav'n did thus her fury vent: 55

“Then am I vanquish'd? must I yield?” said she,
 “And must the Trojans reign in Italy?
 So Fate will have it, and Jove adds his force;
 Nor can my pow'r divert their happy course.
 Could angry Pallas, with revengeful spleen, 60
 The Grecian navy burn, and drown the men?
 She, for the fault of one offending foe,
 The bolts of Jove himself presum'd to throw:
 With whirlwinds from beneath she toss'd the ship,
 And bare expos'd the bosom of the deep; 65
 Then, as an eagle gripes the trembling game,
 The wretch, yet hissing with her father's flame,
 She strongly seiz'd, and with a burning wound
 Transfix'd, and naked, on a rock she bound.
 But I, who walk in awful state above, 70
 The majesty of heav'n, the sister wife of Jove,
 For length of years my fruitless force employ
 Against the thin remains of ruin'd Troy!
 What nations now to Juno's pow'r will pray,
 Or off'rings on my slighted altars lay?” 75

Thus rag'd the goddess; and, with fury fraught.
 The restless regions of the storms she sought,
 Where, in a spacious cave of living stone,
 The tyrant Aeolus, from his airy throne, 80
 With pow'r imperial curbs the struggling winds,
 And sounding tempests in dark prisons binds.
 This way and that th' impatient captives tend,
 And, pressing for release, the mountains rend.
 High in his hall th' undaunted monarch stands,
 And shakes his scepter, and their rage commands; 85
 Which did he not, their unresisted sway
 Would sweep the world before them in their way;
 Earth, air, and seas thro' empty space would roll,
 And heav'n would fly before the driving soul.
 In fear of this, the Father of the Gods 90
 Confin'd their fury to those dark abodes,
 And lock'd 'em safe within, oppress'd with mountain loads;
 Impos'd a king, with arbitrary sway,
 To loose their fetters, or their force allay.
 To whom the suppliant queen her pray'rs address'd, 95
 And thus the tenor of her suit express'd:

“O Aeolus! for to thee the King of Heav’n
 The pow’r of tempests and of winds has giv’n;
 Thy force alone their fury can restrain, 100
 And smooth the waves, or swell the troubled main
 A race of wand’ring slaves, abhorr’d by me,
 With prosp’rous passage cut the Tuscan sea;
 To fruitful Italy their course they steer,
 And for their vanquish’d gods design new temples there.
 Raise all thy winds; with night involve the skies; 105
 Sink or disperse my fatal enemies.
 Twice sev’n, the charming daughters of the main,
 Around my person wait, and bear my train:
 Succeed my wish, and second my design;
 The fairest, Deiopeia, shall be thine, 110
 And make thee father of a happy line.”

To this the god: “‘T is yours, O queen, to will
 The work which duty binds me to fulfil.
 These airy kingdoms, and this wide command, 115
 Are all the presents of your bounteous hand:
 Yours is my sov’ reign’s grace; and, as your guest,
 I sit with gods at their celestial feast;
 Raise tempests at your pleasure, or subdue;
 Dispose of empire, which I hold from you.”

He said, and hurl’d against the mountain side 120
 His quiv’ring spear, and all the god applied.
 The raging winds rush thro’ the hollow wound,
 And dance aloft in air, and skim along the ground;
 Then, settling on the sea, the surges sweep, 125
 Raise liquid mountains, and disclose the deep.
 South, East, and West with mix’d confusion roar,
 And roll the foaming billows to the shore.
 The cables crack; the sailors’ fearful cries
 Ascend; and sable night involves the skies;
 And heav’n itself is ravish’d from their eyes. 130
 Loud peals of thunder from the poles ensue;
 Then flashing fires the transient light renew;
 The face of things a frightful image bears,
 And present death in various forms appears.
 Struck with unusual fright, the Trojan chief, 135
 With lifted hands and eyes, invokes relief;
 And, “Thrice and four times happy those,” he cried,
 “That under Ilian walls before their parents died!
 Tydides, bravest of the Grecian train!
 Why could not I by that strong arm be slain, 140
 And lie by noble Hector on the plain,
 Or great Sarpedon, in those bloody fields
 Where Simois rolls the bodies and the shields
 Of heroes, whose dismember’d hands yet bear
 The dart aloft, and clench the pointed spear!” 145

Thus while the pious prince his fate bewails,
 Fierce Boreas drove against his flying sails,
 And rent the sheets; the raging billows rise,
 And mount the tossing vessels to the skies:

Nor can the shiv'ring oars sustain the blow; 150
 The galley gives her side, and turns her prow;
 While those astern, descending down the steep,
 Thro' gaping waves behold the boiling deep.
 Three ships were hurried by the southern blast,
 And on the secret shelves with fury cast. 155
 Those hidden rocks th' Ausonian sailors knew:
 They call'd them Altars, when they rose in view,
 And show'd their spacious backs above the flood.
 Three more fierce Eurus, in his angry mood,
 Dash'd on the shallows of the moving sand, 160
 And in mid ocean left them moor'd aland.
 Orontes' bark, that bore the Lycian crew,
 (A horrid sight!) ev'n in the hero's view,
 From stem to stern by waves was overborne:
 The trembling pilot, from his rudder torn, 165
 Was headlong hurl'd; thrice round the ship was toss'd,
 Then bulg'd at once, and in the deep was lost;
 And here and there above the waves were seen
 Arms, pictures, precious goods, and floating men.
 The stoutest vessel to the storm gave way, 170
 And suck'd thro' loosen'd planks the rushing sea.
 Ilioneus was her chief: Alethes old,
 Achates faithful, Abas young and bold,
 Endur'd not less; their ships, with gaping seams,
 Admit the deluge of the briny streams. 175

Meantime imperial Neptune heard the sound
 Of raging billows breaking on the ground.
 Displeas'd, and fearing for his wat'ry reign,
 He rear'd his awful head above the main,
 Serene in majesty; then roll'd his eyes 180
 Around the space of earth, and seas, and skies.
 He saw the Trojan fleet dispers'd, distress'd,
 By stormy winds and wintry heav'n oppress'd.
 Full well the god his sister's envy knew,
 And what her aims and what her arts pursue. 185
 He summon'd Eurus and the western blast,
 And first an angry glance on both he cast;
 Then thus rebuk'd: "Audacious winds! from whence
 This bold attempt, this rebel insolence?
 Is it for you to ravage seas and land, 190
 Unauthoriz'd by my supreme command?
 To raise such mountains on the troubled main?
 Whom I but first 't is fit the billows to restrain;
 And then you shall be taught obedience to my reign.
 Hence! to your lord my royal mandate bear 195
 The realms of ocean and the fields of air
 Are mine, not his. By fatal lot to me
 The liquid empire fell, and trident of the sea.
 His pow'r to hollow caverns is confin'd:
 There let him reign, the jailer of the wind, 200
 With hoarse commands his breathing subjects call,
 And boast and bluster in his empty hall."
 He spoke; and, while he spoke, he smooth'd the sea,
 Dispell'd the darkness, and restor'd the day.
 Cymothoe, Triton, and the sea-green train 205

Of beauteous nymphs, the daughters of the main,
 Clear from the rocks the vessels with their hands:
 The god himself with ready trident stands,
 And opes the deep, and spreads the moving sands;
 Then heaves them off the shoals. Where'er he guides 210
 His finny coursers and in triumph rides,
 The waves unruffle and the sea subsides.
 As, when in tumults rise th' ignoble crowd,
 Mad are their motions, and their tongues are loud;
 And stones and brands in rattling volleys fly, 215
 And all the rustic arms that fury can supply:
 If then some grave and pious man appear,
 They hush their noise, and lend a list'ning ear;
 He soothes with sober words their angry mood,
 And quenches their innate desire of blood: 220
 So, when the Father of the Flood appears,
 And o'er the seas his sov'reign trident rears,
 Their fury falls: he skims the liquid plains,
 High on his chariot, and, with loosen'd reins,
 Majestic moves along, and awful peace maintains. 225
 The weary Trojans ply their shatter'd oars
 To nearest land, and make the Libyan shores.

Within a long recess there lies a bay:
 An island shades it from the rolling sea,
 And forms a port secure for ships to ride; 230
 Broke by the jutting land, on either side,
 In double streams the briny waters glide.
 Betwixt two rows of rocks a sylvan scene
 Appears above, and groves for ever green:
 A grot is form'd beneath, with mossy seats, 235
 To rest the Nereids, and exclude the heats.
 Down thro' the crannies of the living walls
 The crystal streams descend in murm'ring falls:
 No haulsers need to bind the vessels here,
 Nor bearded anchors; for no storms they fear. 240
 Sev'n ships within this happy harbor meet,
 The thin remainders of the scatter'd fleet.
 The Trojans, worn with toils, and spent with woes,
 Leap on the welcome land, and seek their wish'd repose.

First, good Achates, with repeated strokes 245
 Of clashing flints, their hidden fire provokes:
 Short flame succeeds; a bed of wither'd leaves
 The dying sparkles in their fall receives:
 Caught into life, in fiery fumes they rise,
 And, fed with stronger food, invade the skies. 250
 The Trojans, dropping wet, or stand around
 The cheerful blaze, or lie along the ground:
 Some dry their corn, infected with the brine,
 Then grind with marbles, and prepare to dine.
 Aeneas climbs the mountain's airy brow, 255
 And takes a prospect of the seas below,
 If Capys thence, or Antheus he could spy,
 Or see the streamers of Caicus fly.
 No vessels were in view; but, on the plain,
 Three beamy stags command a lordly train 260

- Of branching heads: the more ignoble throng
 Attend their stately steps, and slowly graze along.
 He stood; and, while secure they fed below,
 He took the quiver and the trusty bow 265
 Achates us'd to bear: the leaders first
 He laid along, and then the vulgar pierc'd;
 Nor ceas'd his arrows, till the shady plain
 Sev'n mighty bodies with their blood distain.
 For the sev'n ships he made an equal share,
 And to the port return'd, triumphant from the war. 270
 The jars of gen'rous wine (Acestes' gift,
 When his Trinacrian shores the navy left)
 He set abroach, and for the feast prepar'd,
 In equal portions with the ven'son shar'd.
 Thus while he dealt it round, the pious chief 275
 With cheerful words allay'd the common grief:
 "Endure, and conquer! Jove will soon dispose
 To future good our past and present woes.
 With me, the rocks of Scylla you have tried;
 Th' inhuman Cyclops and his den defied. 280
 What greater ills hereafter can you bear?
 Resume your courage and dismiss your care,
 An hour will come, with pleasure to relate
 Your sorrows past, as benefits of Fate.
 Thro' various hazards and events, we move 285
 To Latium and the realms foredoom'd by Jove.
 Call'd to the seat (the promise of the skies)
 Where Trojan kingdoms once again may rise,
 Endure the hardships of your present state;
 Live, and reserve yourselves for better fate." 290
- These words he spoke, but spoke not from his heart;
 His outward smiles conceal'd his inward smart.
 The jolly crew, unmindful of the past,
 The quarry share, their plenteous dinner haste. 295
 Some strip the skin; some portion out the spoil;
 The limbs, yet trembling, in the caldrons boil;
 Some on the fire the reeking entrails broil.
 Stretch'd on the grassy turf, at ease they dine,
 Restore their strength with meat, and cheer their souls with wine.
 Their hunger thus appeas'd, their care attends 300
 The doubtful fortune of their absent friends:
 Alternate hopes and fears their minds possess,
 Whether to deem 'em dead, or in distress.
 Above the rest, Aeneas mourns the fate
 Of brave Orontes, and th' uncertain state 305
 Of Gyas, Lycus, and of Amycus.
 The day, but not their sorrows, ended thus.
- When, from aloft, almighty Jove surveys
 Earth, air, and shores, and navigable seas,
 At length on Libyan realms he fix'd his eyes 310
 Whom, pond'ring thus on human miseries,
 When Venus saw, she with a lowly look,
 Not free from tears, her heav'nly sire bespoke:
- "O King of Gods and Men! whose awful hand

Disperses thunder on the seas and land, 315
 Disposing all with absolute command;
 How could my pious son thy pow'r incense?
 Or what, alas! is vanish'd Troy's offense?
 Our hope of Italy not only lost,
 On various seas by various tempests toss'd, 320
 But shut from ev'ry shore, and barr'd from ev'ry coast.
 You promis'd once, a progeny divine
 Of Romans, rising from the Trojan line,
 In after times should hold the world in awe,
 And to the land and ocean give the law. 325
 How is your doom revers'd, which eas'd my care
 When Troy was ruin'd in that cruel war?
 Then fates to fates I could oppose; but now,
 When Fortune still pursues her former blow,
 What can I hope? What worse can still succeed? 330
 What end of labors has your will decreed?
 Antenor, from the midst of Grecian hosts,
 Could pass secure, and pierce th' Illyrian coasts,
 Where, rolling down the steep, Timavus raves
 And thro' nine channels disembogues his waves. 335
 At length he founded Padua's happy seat,
 And gave his Trojans a secure retreat;
 There fix'd their arms, and there renew'd their name,
 And there in quiet rules, and crown'd with fame.
 But we, descended from your sacred line, 340
 Entitled to your heav'n and rites divine,
 Are banish'd earth; and, for the wrath of one,
 Remov'd from Latium and the promis'd throne.
 Are these our scepters? these our due rewards?
 And is it thus that Jove his plighted faith regards?" 345

To whom the Father of th' immortal race,
 Smiling with that serene indulgent face,
 With which he drives the clouds and clears the skies,
 First gave a holy kiss; then thus replies:

"Daughter, dismiss thy fears; to thy desire 350
 The fates of thine are fix'd, and stand entire.
 Thou shalt behold thy wish'd Lavinian walls;
 And, ripe for heav'n, when fate Aeneas calls,
 Then shalt thou bear him up, sublime, to me:
 No councils have revers'd my firm decree. 355
 And, lest new fears disturb thy happy state,
 Know, I have search'd the mystic rolls of Fate:
 Thy son (nor is th' appointed season far)
 In Italy shall wage successful war,
 Shall tame fierce nations in the bloody field, 360
 And sov'reign laws impose, and cities build,
 Till, after ev'ry foe subdued, the sun
 Thrice thro' the signs his annual race shall run:
 This is his time prefix'd. Ascanius then,
 Now call'd Iulus, shall begin his reign. 365
 He thirty rolling years the crown shall wear,
 Then from Lavinium shall the seat transfer,
 And, with hard labor, Alba Longa build.
 The throne with his succession shall be fill'd

- Three hundred circuits more: then shall be seen 370
 Ilia the fair, a priestess and a queen,
 Who, full of Mars, in time, with kindly throes,
 Shall at a birth two goodly boys disclose.
 The royal babes a tawny wolf shall drain:
 Then Romulus his grandsire's throne shall gain, 375
 Of martial tow'rs the founder shall become,
 The people Romans call, the city Rome.
 To them no bounds of empire I assign,
 Nor term of years to their immortal line.
 Ev'n haughty Juno, who, with endless broils, 380
 Earth, seas, and heav'n, and Jove himself turmoils;
 At length aton'd, her friendly pow'r shall join,
 To cherish and advance the Trojan line.
 The subject world shall Rome's dominion own,
 And, prostrate, shall adore the nation of the gown. 385
 An age is ripening in revolving fate
 When Troy shall overturn the Grecian state,
 And sweet revenge her conqu'ring sons shall call,
 To crush the people that conspir'd her fall.
 Then Caesar from the Julian stock shall rise, 390
 Whose empire ocean, and whose fame the skies
 Alone shall bound; whom, fraught with eastern spoils,
 Our heav'n, the just reward of human toils,
 Securely shall repay with rites divine;
 And incense shall ascend before his sacred shrine. 395
 Then dire debate and impious war shall cease,
 And the stern age be soften'd into peace:
 Then banish'd Faith shall once again return,
 And Vestal fires in hallow'd temples burn;
 And Remus with Quirinus shall sustain 400
 The righteous laws, and fraud and force restrain.
 Janus himself before his fane shall wait,
 And keep the dreadful issues of his gate,
 With bolts and iron bars: within remains
 Imprison'd Fury, bound in brazen chains; 405
 High on a trophy rais'd, of useless arms,
 He sits, and threats the world with vain alarms.”
- He said, and sent Cyllenius with command
 To free the ports, and ope the Punic land
 To Trojan guests; lest, ignorant of fate, 410
 The queen might force them from her town and state.
 Down from the steep of heav'n Cyllenius flies,
 And cleaves with all his wings the yielding skies.
 Soon on the Libyan shore descends the god,
 Performs his message, and displays his rod: 415
 The surly murmurs of the people cease;
 And, as the fates requir'd, they give the peace:
 The queen herself suspends the rigid laws,
 The Trojans pities, and protects their cause.
- Meantime, in shades of night Aeneas lies: 420
 Care seiz'd his soul, and sleep forsook his eyes.
 But, when the sun restor'd the cheerful day,
 He rose, the coast and country to survey,
 Anxious and eager to discover more.

It look'd a wild uncultivated shore; 425
 But, whether humankind, or beasts alone
 Possess'd the new-found region, was unknown.
 Beneath a ledge of rocks his fleet he hides:
 Tall trees surround the mountain's shady sides;
 The bending brow above a safe retreat provides. 430
 Arm'd with two pointed darts, he leaves his friends,
 And true Achates on his steps attends.
 Lo! in the deep recesses of the wood,
 Before his eyes his goddess mother stood:
 A huntress in her habit and her mien; 435
 Her dress a maid, her air confess'd a queen.
 Bare were her knees, and knots her garments bind;
 Loose was her hair, and wanton'd in the wind;
 Her hand sustain'd a bow; her quiver hung behind.
 She seem'd a virgin of the Spartan blood: 440
 With such array Harpalyce bestrode
 Her Thracian courser and outstripp'd the rapid flood.
 "Ho, strangers! have you lately seen," she said,
 "One of my sisters, like myself array'd,
 Who cross'd the lawn, or in the forest stray'd? 445
 A painted quiver at her back she bore;
 Varied with spots, a lynx's hide she wore;
 And at full cry pursued the tusky boar."

Thus Venus: thus her son replied again:
 "None of your sisters have we heard or seen, 450
 O virgin! or what other name you bear
 Above that style—O more than mortal fair!
 Your voice and mien celestial birth betray!
 If, as you seem, the sister of the day,
 Or one at least of chaste Diana's train, 455
 Let not an humble suppliant sue in vain;
 But tell a stranger, long in tempests toss'd,
 What earth we tread, and who commands the coast?
 Then on your name shall wretched mortals call,
 And offer'd victims at your altars fall." 460
 "I dare not," she replied, "assume the name
 Of goddess, or celestial honors claim:
 For Tyrian virgins bows and quivers bear,
 And purple buskins o'er their ankles wear.
 Know, gentle youth, in Libyan lands you are— 465
 A people rude in peace, and rough in war.
 The rising city, which from far you see,
 Is Carthage, and a Tyrian colony.
 Phoenician Dido rules the growing state,
 Who fled from Tyre, to shun her brother's hate. 470
 Great were her wrongs, her story full of fate;
 Which I will sum in short. Sichaeus, known
 For wealth, and brother to the Punic throne,
 Possess'd fair Dido's bed; and either heart
 At once was wounded with an equal dart. 475
 Her father gave her, yet a spotless maid;
 Pygmalion then the Tyrian scepter sway'd:
 One who condemn'd divine and human laws.
 Then strife ensued, and cursed gold the cause.
 The monarch, blinded with desire of wealth, 480

- With steel invades his brother's life by stealth;
 Before the sacred altar made him bleed,
 And long from her conceal'd the cruel deed.
 Some tale, some new pretense, he daily coind,
 To soothe his sister, and delude her mind. 485
 At length, in dead of night, the ghost appears
 Of her unhappy lord: the specter stares,
 And, with erected eyes, his bloody bosom bares.
 The cruel altars and his fate he tells,
 And the dire secret of his house reveals, 490
 Then warns the widow, with her household gods,
 To seek a refuge in remote abodes.
 Last, to support her in so long a way,
 He shows her where his hidden treasure lay.
 Admonish'd thus, and seiz'd with mortal fright, 495
 The queen provides companions of her flight:
 They meet, and all combine to leave the state,
 Who hate the tyrant, or who fear his hate.
 They seize a fleet, which ready rigg'd they find;
 Nor is Pygmalion's treasure left behind. 500
 The vessels, heavy laden, put to sea
 With prosp'rous winds; a woman leads the way.
 I know not, if by stress of weather driv'n,
 Or was their fatal course dispos'd by Heav'n;
 At last they landed, where from far your eyes 505
 May view the turrets of new Carthage rise;
 There bought a space of ground, which (Byrsa call'd,
 From the bull's hide) they first inclos'd, and wall'd.
 But whence are you? what country claims your birth?
 What seek you, strangers, on our Libyan earth?" 510
- To whom, with sorrow streaming from his eyes,
 And deeply sighing, thus her son replies:
 "Could you with patience hear, or I relate,
 O nymph, the tedious annals of our fate!
 Thro' such a train of woes if I should run, 515
 The day would sooner than the tale be done!
 From ancient Troy, by force expell'd, we came—
 If you by chance have heard the Trojan name.
 On various seas by various tempests toss'd,
 At length we landed on your Libyan coast. 520
 The good Aeneas am I call'd—a name,
 While Fortune favor'd, not unknown to fame.
 My household gods, companions of my woes,
 With pious care I rescued from our foes.
 To fruitful Italy my course was bent; 525
 And from the King of Heav'n is my descent.
 With twice ten sail I cross'd the Phrygian sea;
 Fate and my mother goddess led my way.
 Scarce sev'n, the thin remainders of my fleet,
 From storms preserv'd, within your harbor meet. 530
 Myself distress'd, an exile, and unknown,
 Debarr'd from Europe, and from Asia thrown,
 In Libyan desarts wander thus alone."
- His tender parent could no longer bear;
 But, interposing, sought to soothe his care. 535

“Whoe’er you are—not unbelov’d by Heav’n,
 Since on our friendly shore your ships are driv’n—
 Have courage: to the gods permit the rest,
 And to the queen expose your just request. 540
 Now take this earnest of success, for more:
 Your scatter’d fleet is join’d upon the shore;
 The winds are chang’d, your friends from danger free;
 Or I renounce my skill in augury.
 Twelve swans behold in beauteous order move,
 And stoop with closing pinions from above; 545
 Whom late the bird of Jove had driv’n along,
 And thro’ the clouds pursued the scatt’ring throng:
 Now, all united in a goodly team,
 They skim the ground, and seek the quiet stream.
 As they, with joy returning, clap their wings, 550
 And ride the circuit of the skies in rings;
 Not otherwise your ships, and ev’ry friend,
 Already hold the port, or with swift sails descend.
 No more advice is needful; but pursue
 The path before you, and the town in view.” 555

Thus having said, she turn’d, and made appear
 Her neck refulgent, and dishevel’d hair,
 Which, flowing from her shoulders, reach’d the ground.
 And widely spread ambrosial scents around: 560
 In length of train descends her sweeping gown;
 And, by her graceful walk, the Queen of Love is known.
 The prince pursued the parting deity
 With words like these: “Ah! whither do you fly?
 Unkind and cruel! to deceive your son 565
 In borrow’d shapes, and his embrace to shun;
 Never to bless my sight, but thus unknown;
 And still to speak in accents not your own.”
 Against the goddess these complaints he made,
 But took the path, and her commands obey’d.
 They march, obscure; for Venus kindly shrouds 570
 With mists their persons, and involves in clouds,
 That, thus unseen, their passage none might stay,
 Or force to tell the causes of their way.
 This part perform’d, the goddess flies sublime 575
 To visit Paphos and her native clime;
 Where garlands, ever green and ever fair,
 With vows are offer’d, and with solemn pray’r:
 A hundred altars in her temple smoke;
 A thousand bleeding hearts her pow’r invoke.

They climb the next ascent, and, looking down, 580
 Now at a nearer distance view the town.
 The prince with wonder sees the stately tow’rs,
 Which late were huts and shepherds’ homely bow’rs,
 The gates and streets; and hears, from ev’ry part,
 The noise and busy concourse of the mart. 585
 The toiling Tyrians on each other call
 To ply their labor: some extend the wall;
 Some build the citadel; the brawny throng
 Or dig, or push unwieldly stones along.
 Some for their dwellings choose a spot of ground, 590

Which, first design'd, with ditches they surround.
 Some laws ordain; and some attend the choice
 Of holy senates, and elect by voice.
 Here some design a mole, while others there
 Lay deep foundations for a theater; 595
 From marble quarries mighty columns hew,
 For ornaments of scenes, and future view.
 Such is their toil, and such their busy pains,
 As exercise the bees in flow'ry plains,
 When winter past, and summer scarce begun, 600
 Invites them forth to labor in the sun;
 Some lead their youth abroad, while some condense
 Their liquid store, and some in cells dispense;
 Some at the gate stand ready to receive
 The golden burthen, and their friends relieve; 605
 All with united force, combine to drive
 The lazy drones from the laborious hive:
 With envy stung, they view each other's deeds;
 The fragrant work with diligence proceeds.
 "Thrice happy you, whose walls already rise!" 610
 Aeneas said, and view'd, with lifted eyes,
 Their lofty tow'rs; then, entiring at the gate,
 Conceal'd in clouds (prodigious to relate)
 He mix'd, unmark'd, among the busy throng,
 Borne by the tide, and pass'd unseen along. 615

Full in the center of the town there stood,
 Thick set with trees, a venerable wood.
 The Tyrians, landing near this holy ground,
 And digging here, a prosp'rous omen found:
 From under earth a courser's head they drew, 620
 Their growth and future fortune to foreshew.
 This fated sign their foundress Juno gave,
 Of a soil fruitful, and a people brave.
 Sidonian Dido here with solemn state
 Did Juno's temple build, and consecrate, 625
 Enrich'd with gifts, and with a golden shrine;
 But more the goddess made the place divine.
 On brazen steps the marble threshold rose,
 And brazen plates the cedar beams inclose:
 The rafters are with brazen cov'rings crown'd; 630
 The lofty doors on brazen hinges sound.
 What first Aeneas this place beheld,
 Reviv'd his courage, and his fear expell'd.
 For while, expecting there the queen, he rais'd
 His wond'ring eyes, and round the temple gaz'd, 635
 Admir'd the fortune of the rising town,
 The striving artists, and their arts' renown;
 He saw, in order painted on the wall,
 Whatever did unhappy Troy befall:
 The wars that fame around the world had blown, 640
 All to the life, and ev'ry leader known.
 There Agamemnon, Priam here, he spies,
 And fierce Achilles, who both kings defies.
 He stopp'd, and weeping said: "O friend! ev'n here
 The monuments of Trojan woes appear! 645
 Our known disasters fill ev'n foreign lands:

See there, where old unhappy Priam stands!
 Ev'n the mute walls relate the warrior's fame,
 And Trojan grieves the Tyrians' pity claim." 650
 He said (his tears a ready passage find),
 Devouring what he saw so well design'd,
 And with an empty picture fed his mind:
 For there he saw the fainting Grecians yield,
 And here the trembling Trojans quit the field, 655
 Pursued by fierce Achilles thro' the plain,
 On his high chariot driving o'er the slain.
 The tents of Rhesus next his grief renew,
 By their white sails betray'd to nightly view;
 And wakeful Diomede, whose cruel sword 660
 The sentries slew, nor spar'd their slumb'ring lord,
 Then took the fiery steeds, ere yet the food
 Of Troy they taste, or drink the Xanthian flood.
 Elsewhere he saw where Troilus defied
 Achilles, and unequal combat tried;
 Then, where the boy disarm'd, with loosen'd reins, 665
 Was by his horses hurried o'er the plains,
 Hung by the neck and hair, and dragg'd around:
 The hostile spear, yet sticking in his wound,
 With tracks of blood inscrib'd the dusty ground.
 Meantime the Trojan dames, oppress'd with woe, 670
 To Pallas' fane in long procession go,
 In hopes to reconcile their heav'nly foe.
 They weep, they beat their breasts, they rend their hair,
 And rich embroider'd vests for presents bear;
 But the stern goddess stands unmov'd with pray'r. 675
 Thrice round the Trojan walls Achilles drew
 The corpse of Hector, whom in fight he slew.
 Here Priam sues; and there, for sums of gold,
 The lifeless body of his son is sold.
 So sad an object, and so well express'd, 680
 Drew sighs and groans from the griev'd hero's breast,
 To see the figure of his lifeless friend,
 And his old sire his helpless hand extend.
 Himself he saw amidst the Grecian train,
 Mix'd in the bloody battle on the plain; 685
 And swarthy Memnon in his arms he knew,
 His pompous ensigns, and his Indian crew.
 Penthisilea there, with haughty grace,
 Leads to the wars an Amazonian race:
 In their right hands a pointed dart they wield; 690
 The left, for ward, sustains the lunar shield.
 Athwart her breast a golden belt she throws,
 Amidst the press alone provokes a thousand foes,
 And dares her maiden arms to manly force oppose.

Thus while the Trojan prince employs his eyes, 695
 Fix'd on the walls with wonder and surprise,
 The beauteous Dido, with a num'rous train
 And pomp of guards, ascends the sacred fane.
 Such on Eurotas' banks, or Cynthus' height,
 Diana seems; and so she charms the sight, 700
 When in the dance the graceful goddess leads
 The choir of nymphs, and overtops their heads:

Known by her quiver, and her lofty mien,
 She walks majestic, and she looks their queen;
 Latona sees her shine above the rest, 705
 And feeds with secret joy her silent breast.
 Such Dido was; with such becoming state,
 Amidst the crowd, she walks serenely great.
 Their labor to her future sway she speeds,
 And passing with a gracious glance proceeds; 710
 Then mounts the throne, high plac'd before the shrine:
 In crowds around, the swarming people join.
 She takes petitions, and dispenses laws,
 Hears and determines ev'ry private cause;
 Their tasks in equal portions she divides, 715
 And, where unequal, there by lots decides.
 Another way by chance Aeneas bends
 His eyes, and unexpected sees his friends,
 Antheus, Sergestus grave, Cloanthus strong,
 And at their backs a mighty Trojan throng, 720
 Whom late the tempest on the billows toss'd,
 And widely scatter'd on another coast.
 The prince, unseen, surpris'd with wonder stands,
 And longs, with joyful haste, to join their hands;
 But, doubtful of the wish'd event, he stays, 725
 And from the hollow cloud his friends surveys,
 Impatient till they told their present state,
 And where they left their ships, and what their fate,
 And why they came, and what was their request;
 For these were sent, commission'd by the rest, 730
 To sue for leave to land their sickly men,
 And gain admission to the gracious queen.
 Ent'ring, with cries they fill'd the holy fane;
 Then thus, with lowly voice, Ilioneus began:

"O queen! indulg'd by favor of the gods 735
 To found an empire in these new abodes,
 To build a town, with statutes to restrain
 The wild inhabitants beneath thy reign,
 We wretched Trojans, toss'd on ev'ry shore,
 From sea to sea, thy clemency implore. 740
 Forbid the fires our shipping to deface!
 Receive th' unhappy fugitives to grace,
 And spare the remnant of a pious race!
 We come not with design of wasteful prey,
 To drive the country, force the swains away: 745
 Nor such our strength, nor such is our desire;
 The vanquish'd dare not to such thoughts aspire.
 A land there is, Hesperia nam'd of old;
 The soil is fruitful, and the men are bold—
 Th' Oenotrians held it once—by common fame 750
 Now call'd Italia, from the leader's name.
 To that sweet region was our voyage bent,
 When winds and ev'ry warring element
 Disturb'd our course, and, far from sight of land,
 Cast our torn vessels on the moving sand: 755
 The sea came on; the South, with mighty roar,
 Dispers'd and dash'd the rest upon the rocky shore.
 Those few you see escap'd the Storm, and fear,

Unless you interpose, a shipwreck here. 760
 What men, what monsters, what inhuman race,
 What laws, what barb'rous customs of the place,
 Shut up a desart shore to drowning men,
 And drive us to the cruel seas again?
 If our hard fortune no compassion draws,
 Nor hospitable rights, nor human laws, 765
 The gods are just, and will revenge our cause.
 Aeneas was our prince: a juster lord,
 Or nobler warrior, never drew a sword;
 Observant of the right, religious of his word.
 If yet he lives, and draws this vital air, 770
 Nor we, his friends, of safety shall despair;
 Nor you, great queen, these offices repent,
 Which he will equal, and perhaps augment.
 We want not cities, nor Sicilian coasts,
 Where King Acestes Trojan lineage boasts. 775
 Permit our ships a shelter on your shores,
 Refitted from your woods with planks and oars,
 That, if our prince be safe, we may renew
 Our destin'd course, and Italy pursue.
 But if, O best of men, the Fates ordain 780
 That thou art swallow'd in the Libyan main,
 And if our young Iulus be no more,
 Dismiss our navy from your friendly shore,
 That we to good Acestes may return,
 And with our friends our common losses mourn." 785
 Thus spoke Ilioneus: the Trojan crew
 With cries and clamors his request renew.

The modest queen a while, with downcast eyes,
 Ponder'd the speech; then briefly thus replies: 790
 "Trojans, dismiss your fears; my cruel fate,
 And doubts attending an unsettled state,
 Force me to guard my coast from foreign foes.
 Who has not heard the story of your woes,
 The name and fortune of your native place,
 The fame and valor of the Phrygian race? 795
 We Tyrians are not so devoid of sense,
 Nor so remote from Phoebus' influence.
 Whether to Latian shores your course is bent,
 Or, driv'n by tempests from your first intent,
 You seek the good Acestes' government, 800
 Your men shall be receiv'd, your fleet repair'd,
 And sail, with ships of convoy for your guard:
 Or, would you stay, and join your friendly pow'rs
 To raise and to defend the Tyrian tow'rs,
 My wealth, my city, and myself are yours. 805
 And would to Heav'n, the Storm, you felt, would bring
 On Carthaginian coasts your wand'ring king.
 My people shall, by my command, explore
 The ports and creeks of ev'ry winding shore,
 And towns, and wilds, and shady woods, in quest 810
 Of so renown'd and so desir'd a guest."

Rais'd in his mind the Trojan hero stood,
 And long'd to break from out his ambient cloud:

- Achates found it, and thus urg'd his way:
 "From whence, O goddess-born, this long delay? 815
 What more can you desire, your welcome sure,
 Your fleet in safety, and your friends secure?
 One only wants; and him we saw in vain
 Oppose the Storm, and swallow'd in the main.
 Orontes in his fate our forfeit paid; 820
 The rest agrees with what your mother said."
 Scarce had he spoken, when the cloud gave way,
 The mists flew upward and dissolv'd in day.
- The Trojan chief appear'd in open sight,
 August in visage, and serenely bright. 825
 His mother goddess, with her hands divine,
 Had form'd his curling locks, and made his temples shine,
 And giv'n his rolling eyes a sparkling grace,
 And breath'd a youthful vigor on his face;
 Like polish'd ivory, beauteous to behold, 830
 Or Parian marble, when enchas'd in gold:
 Thus radiant from the circling cloud he broke,
 And thus with manly modesty he spoke:
- "He whom you seek am I; by tempests toss'd,
 And sav'd from shipwreck on your Libyan coast; 835
 Presenting, gracious queen, before your throne,
 A prince that owes his life to you alone.
 Fair majesty, the refuge and redress
 Of those whom fate pursues, and wants oppress,
 You, who your pious offices employ 840
 To save the relics of abandon'd Troy;
 Receive the shipwreck'd on your friendly shore,
 With hospitable rites relieve the poor;
 Associate in your town a wand'ring train,
 And strangers in your palace entertain: 845
 What thanks can wretched fugitives return,
 Who, scatter'd thro' the world, in exile mourn?
 The gods, if gods to goodness are inclin'd;
 If acts of mercy touch their heav'nly mind,
 And, more than all the gods, your gen'rous heart. 850
 Conscious of worth, requite its own desert!
 In you this age is happy, and this earth,
 And parents more than mortal gave you birth.
 While rolling rivers into seas shall run,
 And round the space of heav'n the radiant sun; 855
 While trees the mountain tops with shades supply,
 Your honor, name, and praise shall never die.
 Whate'er abode my fortune has assign'd,
 Your image shall be present in my mind."
 Thus having said, he turn'd with pious haste, 860
 And joyful his expecting friends embrac'd:
 With his right hand Ilioneus was grac'd,
 Serestus with his left; then to his breast
 Cloanthus and the noble Gyas press'd;
 And so by turns descended to the rest. 865
- The Tyrian queen stood fix'd upon his face,
 Pleas'd with his motions, ravish'd with his grace;

Admir'd his fortunes, more admir'd the man;
 Then recollected stood, and thus began:
 "What fate, O goddess-born; what angry pow'rs
 Have cast you shipwreck'd on our barren shores? 870
 Are you the great Aeneas, known to fame,
 Who from celestial seed your lineage claim?"

The same Aeneas whom fair Venus bore
 To fam'd Anchises on th' Idaean shore? 875

It calls into my mind, tho' then a child,
 When Teucer came, from Salamis exil'd,
 And sought my father's aid, to be restor'd:
 My father Belus then with fire and sword
 Invaded Cyprus, made the region bare, 880
 And, conqu'ring, finish'd the successful war.

From him the Trojan siege I understood,
 The Grecian chiefs, and your illustrious blood.
 Your foe himself the Dardan valor prais'd,
 And his own ancestry from Trojans rais'd. 885
 Enter, my noble guest, and you shall find,
 If not a costly welcome, yet a kind:

For I myself, like you, have been distress'd,
 Till Heav'n afforded me this place of rest;
 Like you, an alien in a land unknown, 890
 I learn to pity woes so like my own."

She said, and to the palace led her guest;
 Then offer'd incense, and proclaim'd a feast.
 Nor yet less careful for her absent friends,
 Twice ten fat oxen to the ships she sends; 895
 Besides a hundred boars, a hundred lambs,

With bleating cries, attend their milky dams;
 And jars of gen'rous wine and spacious bowls
 She gives, to cheer the sailors' drooping souls.
 Now purple hangings clothe the palace walls, 900
 And sumptuous feasts are made in splendid halls:

On Tyrian carpets, richly wrought, they dine;
 With loads of massy plate the sideboards shine,
 And antique vases, all of gold emboss'd
 (The gold itself inferior to the cost), 905
 Of curious work, where on the sides were seen

The fights and figures of illustrious men,
 From their first founder to the present queen.

The good Aeneas, paternal care
 Iulus' absence could no longer bear, 910
 Dispatch'd Achates to the ships in haste,

To give a glad relation of the past,
 And, fraught with precious gifts, to bring the boy,
 Snatch'd from the ruins of unhappy Troy:
 A robe of tissue, stiff with golden wire; 915
 An upper vest, once Helen's rich attire,

From Argos by the fam'd adultress brought,
 With golden flow'rs and winding foliage wrought,
 Her mother Leda's present, when she came
 To ruin Troy and set the world on flame; 920
 The scepter Priam's eldest daughter bore,
 Her orient necklace, and the crown she wore

- Of double texture, glorious to behold,
 One order set with gems, and one with gold.
 Instructed thus, the wise Achates goes, 925
 And in his diligence his duty shows.
- But Venus, anxious for her son's affairs,
 New counsels tries, and new designs prepares:
 That Cupid should assume the shape and face
 Of sweet Ascanius, and the sprightly grace; 930
 Should bring the presents, in her nephew's stead,
 And in Eliza's veins the gentle poison shed:
 For much she fear'd the Tyrians, double-tongued,
 And knew the town to Juno's care belong'd.
 These thoughts by night her golden slumbers broke, 935
 And thus alarm'd, to winged Love she spoke:
 "My son, my strength, whose mighty pow'r alone
 Controls the Thund'rer on his awful throne,
 To thee thy much-afflicted mother flies,
 And on thy succor and thy faith relies. 940
 Thou know'st, my son, how Jove's revengeful wife,
 By force and fraud, attempts thy brother's life;
 And often hast thou mourn'd with me his pains.
 Him Dido now with blandishment detains;
 But I suspect the town where Juno reigns. 945
 For this 't is needful to prevent her art,
 And fire with love the proud Phoenician's heart:
 A love so violent, so strong, so sure,
 As neither age can change, nor art can cure.
 How this may be perform'd, now take my mind: 950
 Ascanius by his father is design'd
 To come, with presents laden, from the port,
 To gratify the queen, and gain the court.
 I mean to plunge the boy in pleasing sleep,
 And, ravish'd, in Idalian bow'rs to keep, 955
 Or high Cythera, that the sweet deceit
 May pass unseen, and none prevent the cheat.
 Take thou his form and shape. I beg the grace
 But only for a night's revolving space:
 Thyself a boy, assume a boy's dissembled face; 960
 That when, amidst the fervor of the feast,
 The Tyrian hugs and fonds thee on her breast,
 And with sweet kisses in her arms constrains,
 Thou may'st infuse thy venom in her veins."
 The God of Love obeys, and sets aside 965
 His bow and quiver, and his plummy pride;
 He walks Iulus in his mother's sight,
 And in the sweet resemblance takes delight.
- The goddess then to young Ascanius flies,
 And in a pleasing slumber seals his eyes: 970
 Lull'd in her lap, amidst a train of Loves,
 She gently bears him to her blissful groves,
 Then with a wreath of myrtle crowns his head,
 And softly lays him on a flow'ry bed.
 Cupid meantime assum'd his form and face, 975
 Foll'wing Achates with a shorter pace,
 And brought the gifts. The queen already sate

Amidst the Trojan lords, in shining state,
 High on a golden bed: her princely guest
 Was next her side; in order sate the rest. 980
 Then canisters with bread are heap'd on high;
 Th' attendants water for their hands supply,
 And, having wash'd, with silken towels dry.
 Next fifty handmaids in long order bore
 The censers, and with fumes the gods adore: 985
 Then youths, and virgins twice as many, join
 To place the dishes, and to serve the wine.
 The Tyrian train, admitted to the feast,
 Approach, and on the painted couches rest.
 All on the Trojan gifts with wonder gaze, 990
 But view the beauteous boy with more amaze,
 His rosy-color'd cheeks, his radiant eyes,
 His motions, voice, and shape, and all the god's disguise;
 Nor pass unprais'd the vest and veil divine,
 Which wand'ring foliage and rich flow'rs entwine. 995
 But, far above the rest, the royal dame,
 (Already doom'd to love's disastrous flame,)
 With eyes insatiate, and tumultuous joy,
 Beholds the presents, and admires the boy.
 The guileful god about the hero long, 1000
 With children's play, and false embraces, hung;
 Then sought the queen: she took him to her arms
 With greedy pleasure, and devour'd his charms.
 Unhappy Dido little thought what guest,
 How dire a god, she drew so near her breast; 1005
 But he, not mindless of his mother's pray'r,
 Works in the pliant bosom of the fair,
 And molds her heart anew, and blots her former care.
 The dead is to the living love resign'd;
 And all Aeneas enters in her mind. 1010

Now, when the rage of hunger was appeas'd,
 The meat remov'd, and ev'ry guest was pleas'd,
 The golden bowls with sparkling wine are crown'd,
 And thro' the palace cheerful cries resound. 1015
 From gilded roofs depending lamps display
 Nocturnal beams, that emulate the day.
 A golden bowl, that shone with gems divine,
 The queen commanded to be crown'd with wine:
 The bowl that Belus us'd, and all the Tyrian line.
 Then, silence thro' the hall proclaim'd, she spoke: 1020
 "O hospitable Jove! we thus invoke,
 With solemn rites, thy sacred name and pow'r;
 Bless to both nations this auspicious hour!
 So may the Trojan and the Tyrian line
 In lasting concord from this day combine. 1025
 Thou, Bacchus, god of joys and friendly cheer,
 And gracious Juno, both be present here!
 And you, my lords of Tyre, your vows address
 To Heav'n with mine, to ratify the peace."
 The goblet then she took, with nectar crown'd 1030
 (Sprinkling the first libations on the ground,)
 And rais'd it to her mouth with sober grace;
 Then, sipping, offer'd to the next in place.

'T was Bitias whom she call'd, a thirsty soul;
 He took challenge, and embrac'd the bowl, 1035
 With pleasure swill'd the gold, nor ceas'd to draw,
 Till he the bottom of the brimmer saw.
 The goblet goes around: Iopas brought
 His golden lyre, and sung what ancient Atlas taught:
 The various labors of the wand'ring moon, 1040
 And whence proceed th' eclipses of the sun;
 Th' original of men and beasts; and whence
 The rains arise, and fires their warmth dispense,
 And fix'd and erring stars dispose their influence;
 What shakes the solid earth; what cause delays 1045
 The summer nights and shortens winter days.
 With peals of shouts the Tyrians praise the song:
 Those peals are echo'd by the Trojan throng.
 Th' unhappy queen with talk prolong'd the night,
 And drank large draughts of love with vast delight; 1050
 Of Priam much enquir'd, of Hector more;
 Then ask'd what arms the swarthy Memnon wore,
 What troops he landed on the Trojan shore;
 The steeds of Diomede varied the discourse,
 And fierce Achilles, with his matchless force; 1055
 At length, as fate and her ill stars requir'd,
 To hear the series of the war desir'd.
 "Relate at large, my godlike guest," she said,
 "The Grecian stratagems, the town betray'd:
 The fatal issue of so long a war, 1060
 Your flight, your wand'rings, and your woes, declare;
 For, since on ev'ry sea, on ev'ry coast,
 Your men have been distress'd, your navy toss'd,
 Sev'n times the sun has either tropic view'd,
 The winter banish'd, and the spring renew'd." 1065

Book II

All were attentive to the godlike man,
 When from his lofty couch he thus began:
 "Great queen, what you command me to relate
 Renews the sad remembrance of our fate:
 An empire from its old foundations rent, 1070
 And ev'ry woe the Trojans underwent;
 A peopled city made a desart place;
 All that I saw, and part of which I was:
 Not ev'n the hardest of our foes could hear,
 Nor stern Ulysses tell without a tear. 1075
 And now the latter watch of wasting night,
 And setting stars, to kindly rest invite;
 But, since you take such int'rest in our woe,
 And Troy's disastrous end desire to know,
 I will restrain my tears, and briefly tell 1080
 What in our last and fatal night befell.

"By destiny compell'd, and in despair,
 The Greeks grew weary of the tedious war,
 And by Minerva's aid a fabric rear'd,
 Which like a steed of monstrous height appear'd: 1085
 The sides were plank'd with pine; they feign'd it made

For their return, and this the vow they paid.
 Thus they pretend, but in the hollow side
 Selected numbers of their soldiers hide: 1090
 With inward arms the dire machine they load,
 And iron bowels stuff the dark abode.
 In sight of Troy lies Tenedos, an isle
 (While Fortune did on Priam's empire smile)
 Renown'd for wealth; but, since, a faithless bay,
 Where ships expos'd to wind and weather lay. 1095
 There was their fleet conceal'd. We thought, for Greece
 Their sails were hoisted, and our fears release.
 The Trojans, coop'd within their walls so long,
 Unbar their gates, and issue in a throng,
 Like swarming bees, and with delight survey 1100
 The camp deserted, where the Grecians lay:
 The quarters of the sev'ral chiefs they show'd;
 Here Phoenix, here Achilles, made abode;
 Here join'd the battles; there the navy rode.
 Part on the pile their wond'ring eyes employ: 1105
 The pile by Pallas rais'd to ruin Troy.
 Thymoetes first ('t is doubtful whether hir'd,
 Or so the Trojan destiny requir'd)
 Mov'd that the ramparts might be broken down,
 To lodge the monster fabric in the town. 1110
 But Capys, and the rest of sounder mind,
 The fatal present to the flames designed,
 Or to the wat'ry deep; at least to bore
 The hollow sides, and hidden frauds explore.
 The giddy vulgar, as their fancies guide, 1115
 With noise say nothing, and in parts divide.
 Laocoon, follow'd by a num'rous crowd,
 Ran from the fort, and cried, from far, aloud:
 'O wretched countrymen! what fury reigns?
 What more than madness has possess'd your brains? 1120
 Think you the Grecians from your coasts are gone?
 And are Ulysses' arts no better known?
 This hollow fabric either must inclose,
 Within its blind recess, our secret foes;
 Or 't is an engine rais'd above the town, 1125
 T' o'erlook the walls, and then to batter down.
 Somewhat is sure design'd, by fraud or force:
 Trust not their presents, nor admit the horse.
 Thus having said, against the steed he threw
 His forceful spear, which, hissing as flew, 1130
 Pierc'd thro' the yielding planks of jointed wood,
 And trembling in the hollow belly stood.
 The sides, transpierc'd, return a rattling sound,
 And groans of Greeks inclos'd come issuing thro' the wound
 And, had not Heav'n the fall of Troy design'd, 1135
 Or had not men been fated to be blind,
 Enough was said and done t' inspire a better mind.
 Then had our lances pierc'd the treach'rous wood,
 And Ilian tow'rs and Priam's empire stood.
 Meantime, with shouts, the Trojan shepherds bring 1140
 A captive Greek, in bands, before the king;
 Taken to take; who made himself their prey,
 T' impose on their belief, and Troy betray;

Fix'd on his aim, and obstinately bent
 To die undaunted, or to circumvent. 1145
 About the captive, tides of Trojans flow;
 All press to see, and some insult the foe.
 Now hear how well the Greeks their wiles disguis'd;
 Behold a nation in a man compris'd.
 Trembling the miscreant stood, unarm'd and bound; 1150
 He star'd, and roll'd his haggard eyes around,
 Then said: 'Alas! what earth remains, what sea
 Is open to receive unhappy me?
 What fate a wretched fugitive attends,
 Scorn'd by my foes, abandon'd by my friends?' 1155
 He said, and sigh'd, and cast a rueful eye:
 Our pity kindles, and our passions die.
 We cheer youth to make his own defense,
 And freely tell us what he was, and whence:
 What news he could impart, we long to know, 1160
 And what to credit from a captive foe.

"His fear at length dismiss'd, he said: 'Whate'er
 My fate ordains, my words shall be sincere:
 I neither can nor dare my birth disclaim;
 Greece is my country, Sinon is my name. 1165
 Tho' plung'd by Fortune's pow'r in misery,
 'T is not in Fortune's pow'r to make me lie.
 If any chance has hither brought the name
 Of Palamedes, not unknown to fame,
 Who suffer'd from the malice of the times, 1170
 Accus'd and sentenc'd for pretended crimes,
 Because these fatal wars he would prevent;
 Whose death the wretched Greeks too late lament—
 Me, then a boy, my father, poor and bare
 Of other means, committed to his care, 1175
 His kinsman and companion in the war.
 While Fortune favor'd, while his arms support
 The cause, and rul'd the counsels, of the court,
 I made some figure there; nor was my name
 Obscure, nor I without my share of fame. 1180
 But when Ulysses, with fallacious arts,
 Had made impression in the people's hearts,
 And forg'd a treason in my patron's name
 (I speak of things too far divulg'd by fame),
 My kinsman fell. Then I, without support, 1185
 In private mourn'd his loss, and left the court.
 Mad as I was, I could not bear his fate
 With silent grief, but loudly blam'd the state,
 And curs'd the direful author of my woes.
 'T was told again; and hence my ruin rose. 1190
 I threaten'd, if indulgent Heav'n once more
 Would land me safely on my native shore,
 His death with double vengeance to restore.
 This mov'd the murderer's hate; and soon ensued
 Th' effects of malice from a man so proud. 1195
 Ambiguous rumors thro' the camp he spread,
 And sought, by treason, my devoted head;
 New crimes invented; left unturn'd no stone,
 To make my guilt appear, and hide his own;

Till Calchas was by force and threat'ning wrought— 1200
 But why—why dwell I on that anxious thought?
 If on my nation just revenge you seek,
 And 't is t' appear a foe, t' appear a Greek;
 Already you my name and country know;
 Assuage your thirst of blood, and strike the blow: 1205
 My death will both the kingly brothers please,
 And set insatiate Ithacus at ease.
 This fair unfinish'd tale, these broken starts,
 Rais'd expectations in our longing hearts:
 Unknowing as we were in Grecian arts. 1210
 His former trembling once again renew'd,
 With acted fear, the villain thus pursued:

“Long had the Grecians (tir'd with fruitless care,
 And wearied with an unsuccessful war)
 Resolv'd to raise the siege, and leave the town; 1215
 And, had the gods permitted, they had gone;
 But oft the wintry seas and southern winds
 Withstood their passage home, and chang'd their minds.
 Portents and prodigies their souls amaz'd;
 But most, when this stupendous pile was rais'd: 1220
 Then flaming meteors, hung in air, were seen,
 And thunders rattled thro' a sky serene.
 Dismay'd, and fearful of some dire event,
 Eurypylus t' enquire their fate was sent.
 He from the gods this dreadful answer brought: 1225

“O Grecians, when the Trojan shores you sought,
 Your passage with a virgin's blood was bought:
 So must your safe return be bought again,
 And Grecian blood once more atone the main.” 1230
 The spreading rumor round the people ran;
 All fear'd, and each believ'd himself the man.
 Ulysses took th' advantage of their fright;
 Call'd Calchas, and produc'd in open sight:
 Then bade him name the wretch, ordain'd by fate
 The public victim, to redeem the state. 1235
 Already some presag'd the dire event,
 And saw what sacrifice Ulysses meant.
 For twice five days the good old seer withstood
 Th' intended treason, and was dumb to blood,
 Till, tir'd, with endless clamors and pursuit 1240
 Of Ithacus, he stood no longer mute;
 But, as it was agreed, pronounc'd that I
 Was destin'd by the wrathful gods to die.
 All prais'd the sentence, pleas'd the storm should fall
 On one alone, whose fury threaten'd all. 1245
 The dismal day was come; the priests prepare
 Their leaven'd cakes, and fillets for my hair.
 I follow'd nature's laws, and must avow
 I broke my bonds and fled the fatal blow.
 Hid in a weedy lake all night I lay, 1250
 Secure of safety when they sail'd away.
 But now what further hopes for me remain,
 To see my friends, or native soil, again;
 My tender infants, or my careful sire,

We rais'd and dedicate this wondrous frame,
 So lofty, lest thro' your forbidden gates
 It pass, and intercept our better fates:
 For, once admitted there, our hopes are lost;
 And Troy may then a new Palladium boast; 1315
 For so religion and the gods ordain,
 That, if you violate with hands profane
 Minerva's gift, your town in flames shall burn,
 (Which omen, O ye gods, on Graecia turn!)
 But if it climb, with your assisting hands, 1320
 The Trojan walls, and in the city stands;
 Then Troy shall Argos and Mycenae burn,
 And the reverse of fate on us return.'

"With such deceits he gain'd their easy hearts,
 Too prone to credit his perfidious arts. 1325
 What Diomede, nor Thetis' greater son,
 A thousand ships, nor ten years' siege, had done—
 False tears and fawning words the city won.

"A greater omen, and of worse portent,
 Did our unwary minds with fear torment, 1330
 Concurring to produce the dire event.
 Laocoon, Neptune's priest by lot that year,
 With solemn pomp then sacrific'd a steer;
 When, dreadful to behold, from sea we spied
 Two serpents, rank'd abreast, the seas divide, 1335
 And smoothly sweep along the swelling tide.
 Their flaming crests above the waves they show;
 Their bellies seem to burn the seas below;
 Their speckled tails advance to steer their course,
 And on the sounding shore the flying billows force. 1340
 And now the strand, and now the plain they held;
 Their ardent eyes with bloody streaks were fill'd;
 Their nimble tongues they brandish'd as they came,
 And lick'd their hissing jaws, that sputter'd flame.
 We fled amaz'd; their destin'd way they take, 1345
 And to Laocoon and his children make;
 And first around the tender boys they wind,
 Then with their sharpen'd fangs their limbs and bodies grind.
 The wretched father, running to their aid
 With pious haste, but vain, they next invade; 1350
 Twice round his waist their winding volumes roll'd;
 And twice about his gasping throat they fold.
 The priest thus doubly chok'd, their crests divide,
 And tow'ring o'er his head in triumph ride.
 With both his hands he labors at the knots; 1355
 His holy fillets the blue venom blots;
 His roaring fills the flitting air around.
 Thus, when an ox receives a glancing wound,
 He breaks his bands, the fatal altar flies,
 And with loud bellowings breaks the yielding skies. 1360
 Their tasks perform'd, the serpents quit their prey,
 And to the tow'r of Pallas make their way:
 Couch'd at her feet, they lie protected there
 By her large buckler and protended spear.
 Amazement seizes all; the gen'ral cry 1365

- Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die,
Whose hand the will of Pallas had withstood,
And dared to violate the sacred wood.
All vote t' admit the steed, that vows be paid
And incense offer'd to th' offended maid. 1370
A spacious breach is made; the town lies bare;
Some hoisting-levers, some the wheels prepare
And fasten to the horse's feet; the rest
With cables haul along th' unwieldly beast.
Each on his fellow for assistance calls; 1375
At length the fatal fabric mounts the walls,
Big with destruction. Boys with chaplets crown'd,
And choirs of virgins, sing and dance around.
Thus rais'd aloft, and then descending down,
It enters o'er our heads, and threatens the town. 1380
O sacred city, built by hands divine!
O valiant heroes of the Trojan line!
Four times he struck: as oft the clashing sound
Of arms was heard, and inward groans rebound.
Yet, mad with zeal, and blinded with our fate, 1385
We haul along the horse in solemn state;
Then place the dire portent within the tow'r.
Cassandra cried, and curs'd th' unhappy hour;
Foretold our fate; but, by the god's decree,
All heard, and none believ'd the prophecy. 1390
With branches we the fanes adorn, and waste,
In jollity, the day ordain'd to be the last.
Meantime the rapid heav'ns roll'd down the light,
And on the shaded ocean rush'd the night;
Our men, secure, nor guards nor sentries held, 1395
But easy sleep their weary limbs compell'd.
The Grecians had embark'd their naval pow'rs
From Tenedos, and sought our well-known shores,
Safe under covert of the silent night,
And guided by th' imperial galley's light; 1400
When Sinon, favor'd by the partial gods,
Unlock'd the horse, and op'd his dark abodes;
Restor'd to vital air our hidden foes,
Who joyful from their long confinement rose.
Tysander bold, and Sthenelus their guide, 1405
And dire Ulysses down the cable slide:
Then Thoas, Athamas, and Pyrrhus haste;
Nor was the Podalirian hero last,
Nor injur'd Menelaus, nor the fam'd
Epeus, who the fatal engine fram'd. 1410
A nameless crowd succeed; their forces join
T' invade the town, oppress'd with sleep and wine.
Those few they find awake first meet their fate;
Then to their fellows they unbar the gate.
- “‘T was in the dead of night, when sleep repairs 1415
Our bodies worn with toils, our minds with cares,
When Hector's ghost before my sight appears:
A bloody shroud he seem'd, and bath'd in tears;
Such as he was, when, by Pelides slain,
Thessalian coursers dragg'd him o'er the plain. 1420
Swoln were his feet, as when the thongs were thrust

Thro' the bor'd holes; his body black with dust;
 Unlike that Hector who return'd from toils
 Of war, triumphant, in Aeacian spoils, 1425
 Or him who made the fainting Greeks retire,
 And launch'd against their navy Phrygian fire.
 His hair and beard stood stiffen'd with his gore;
 And all the wounds he for his country bore
 Now stream'd afresh, and with new purple ran.
 I wept to see the visionary man, 1430
 And, while my trance continued, thus began:
 'O light of Trojans, and support of Troy,
 Thy father's champion, and thy country's joy!
 O, long expected by thy friends! from whence
 Art thou so late return'd for our defense? 1435
 Do we behold thee, wearied as we are
 With length of labors, and with toils of war?
 After so many fun'erals of thy own
 Art thou restor'd to thy declining town?
 But say, what wounds are these? What new disgrace 1440
 Deforms the manly features of thy face?'

"To this the specter no reply did frame,
 But answer'd to the cause for which he came,
 And, groaning from the bottom of his breast,
 This warning in these mournful words express'd: 1445
 'O goddess-born! escape, by timely flight,
 The flames and horrors of this fatal night.
 The foes already have possess'd the wall;
 Troy nods from high, and totters to her fall.
 Enough is paid to Priam's royal name, 1450
 More than enough to duty and to fame.
 If by a mortal hand my father's throne
 Could be defended, 't was by mine alone.
 Now Troy to thee commends her future state,
 And gives her gods companions of thy fate: 1455
 From their assistance walls expect,
 Which, wand'ring long, at last thou shalt erect?
 He said, and brought me, from their blest abodes,
 The venerable statues of the gods,
 With ancient Vesta from the sacred choir, 1460
 The wreaths and relics of th' immortal fire.

"Now peals of shouts come thund'ring from afar,
 Cries, threats, and loud laments, and mingled war:
 The noise approaches, tho' our palace stood
 Aloof from streets, encompass'd with a wood. 1465
 Louder, and yet more loud, I hear th' alarms
 Of human cries distinct, and clashing arms.
 Fear broke my slumbers; I no longer stay,
 But mount the terrace, thence the town survey,
 And hearken what the frightful sounds convey. 1470
 Thus, when a flood of fire by wind is borne,
 Crackling it rolls, and mows the standing corn;
 Or deluges, descending on the plains,
 Sweep o'er the yellow year, destroy the pains
 Of lab'ring oxen and the peasant's gains; 1475
 Unroot the forest oaks, and bear away

- Flocks, folds, and trees, and undistinguish'd prey:
 The shepherd climbs the cliff, and sees from far
 The wasteful ravage of the wat'ry war. 1480
 Then Hector's faith was manifestly clear'd,
 And Grecian frauds in open light appear'd.
 The palace of Deiphobus ascends
 In smoky flames, and catches on his friends.
 Ucalegon burns next: the seas are bright 1485
 With splendor not their own, and shine with Trojan light.
 New clamors and new clangors now arise,
 The sound of trumpets mix'd with fighting cries.
 With frenzy seiz'd, I run to meet th' alarms,
 Resolv'd on death, resolv'd to die in arms,
 But first to gather friends, with them t' oppose 1490
 (If fortune favor'd) and repel the foes;
 Spurr'd by my courage, by my country fir'd,
 With sense of honor and revenge inspir'd.
- "Pantheus, Apollo's priest, a sacred name,
 Had scap'd the Grecian swords, and pass'd the flame: 1495
 With relics loaden, to my doors he fled,
 And by the hand his tender grandson led.
 'What hope, O Pantheus? whither can we run?
 Where make a stand? and what may yet be done?'
 Scarce had I said, when Pantheus, with a groan: 1500
 'Troy is no more, and Ilium was a town!
 The fatal day, th' appointed hour, is come,
 When wrathful Jove's irrevocable doom
 Transfers the Trojan state to Grecian hands.
 The fire consumes the town, the foe commands; 1505
 And armed hosts, an unexpected force,
 Break from the bowels of the fatal horse.
 Within the gates, proud Sinon throws about
 The flames; and foes for entrance press without,
 With thousand others, whom I fear to name, 1510
 More than from Argos or Mycenae came.
 To sev'ral posts their parties they divide;
 Some block the narrow streets, some scour the wide:
 The bold they kill, th' unwary they surprise;
 Who fights finds death, and death finds him who flies. 1515
 The warders of the gate but scarce maintain
 Th' unequal combat, and resist in vain.'
- "I heard; and Heav'n, that well-born souls inspires,
 Prompts me thro' lifted swords and rising fires 1520
 To run where clashing arms and clamor calls,
 And rush undaunted to defend the walls.
 Ripheus and Iph'itus by my side engage,
 For valor one renown'd, and one for age.
 Dymas and Hypanis by moonlight knew
 My motions and my mien, and to my party drew; 1525
 With young Coroebus, who by love was led
 To win renown and fair Cassandra's bed,
 And lately brought his troops to Priam's aid,
 Forewarn'd in vain by the prophetic maid.
 Whom when I saw resolv'd in arms to fall, 1530
 And that one spirit animated all:

'Brave souls!' said I,—'but brave, alas! in vain—
 Come, finish what our cruel fates ordain.
 You see the desp'rate state of our affairs,
 And heav'n's protecting pow'rs are deaf to pray'rs. 1535
 The passive gods behold the Greeks defile
 Their temples, and abandon to the spoil
 Their own abodes: we, feeble few, conspire
 To save a sinking town, involv'd in fire.
 Then let us fall, but fall amidst our foes: 1540
 Despair of life the means of living shows.
 So bold a speech encourag'd their desire
 Of death, and added fuel to their fire.

"As hungry wolves, with raging appetite,
 Scour thro' the fields, nor fear the stormy night— 1545
 Their whelps at home expect the promis'd food,
 And long to temper their dry chaps in blood—
 So rush'd we forth at once; resolv'd to die,
 Resolv'd, in death, the last extremes to try.
 We leave the narrow lanes behind, and dare 1550
 Th' unequal combat in the public square:
 Night was our friend; our leader was despair.
 What tongue can tell the slaughter of that night?
 What eyes can weep the sorrows and affright?
 An ancient and imperial city falls: 1555
 The streets are fill'd with frequent funerals;
 Houses and holy temples float in blood,
 And hostile nations make a common flood.
 Not only Trojans fall; but, in their turn,
 The vanquish'd triumph, and the victors mourn. 1560
 Ours take new courage from despair and night:
 Confus'd the fortune is, confus'd the fight.
 All parts resound with tumults, complaints, and fears;
 And grisly Death in sundry shapes appears.
 Androgeos fell among us, with his band, 1565
 Who thought us Grecians newly come to land.
 'From whence,' said he, 'my friends, this long delay?
 You loiter, while the spoils are borne away:
 Our ships are laden with the Trojan store;
 And you, like truants, come too late ashore.' 1570
 He said, but soon corrected his mistake,
 Found, by the doubtful answers which we make:
 Amaz'd, he would have shunn'd th' unequal fight;
 But we, more num'rous, intercept his flight.
 As when some peasant, in a bushy brake, 1575
 Has with unwary footing press'd a snake;
 He starts aside, astonish'd, when he spies
 His rising crest, blue neck, and rolling eyes;
 So from our arms surpris'd Androgeos flies.
 In vain; for him and his we compass'd round, 1580
 Possess'd with fear, unknowing of the ground,
 And of their lives an easy conquest found.
 Thus Fortune on our first endeavor smil'd.
 Coroebus then, with youthful hopes beguil'd,
 Swoln with success, and a daring mind, 1585
 This new invention fatally design'd.
 'My friends,' said he, 'since Fortune shows the way,

- 'T is fit we should th' auspicious guide obey.
 For what has she these Grecian arms bestow'd,
 But their destruction, and the Trojans' good? 1590
 Then change we shields, and their devices bear:
 Let fraud supply the want of force in war.
 They find us arms.' This said, himself he dress'd
 In dead Androgeos' spoils, his upper vest,
 His painted buckler, and his plummy crest. 1595
 Thus Ripheus, Dymas, all the Trojan train,
 Lay down their own attire, and strip the slain.
 Mix'd with the Greeks, we go with ill presage,
 Flatter'd with hopes to glut our greedy rage;
 Unknown, assaulting whom we blindly meet, 1600
 And strew with Grecian carcasses the street.
 Thus while their straggling parties we defeat,
 Some to the shore and safer ships retreat;
 And some, oppress'd with more ignoble fear,
 Remount the hollow horse, and pant in secret there. 1605
- "But, ah! what use of valor can be made,
 When heav'n's propitious pow'rs refuse their aid!
 Behold the royal prophetess, the fair
 Cassandra, dragg'd by her dishevel'd hair,
 Whom not Minerva's shrine, nor sacred bands, 1610
 In safety could protect from sacrilegious hands:
 On heav'n she cast her eyes, she sigh'd, she cried—
 'T was all she could—her tender arms were tied.
 So sad a sight Coroebus could not bear;
 But, fir'd with rage, distracted with despair, 1615
 Amid the barb'rous ravishers he flew:
 Our leader's rash example we pursue.
 But storms of stones, from the proud temple's height,
 Pour down, and on our batter'd helms alight:
 We from our friends receiv'd this fatal blow, 1620
 Who thought us Grecians, as we seem'd in show.
 They aim at the mistaken crests, from high;
 And ours beneath the pond'rous ruin lie.
 Then, mov'd with anger and disdain, to see
 Their troops dispers'd, the royal virgin free, 1625
 The Grecians rally, and their pow'rs unite,
 With fury charge us, and renew the fight.
 The brother kings with Ajax join their force,
 And the whole squadron of Thessalian horse.
- "Thus, when the rival winds their quarrel try, 1630
 Contending for the kingdom of the sky,
 South, east, and west, on airy coursers borne;
 The whirlwind gathers, and the woods are torn:
 Then Nereus strikes the deep; the billows rise,
 And, mix'd with ooze and sand, pollute the skies. 1635
 The troops we squander'd first again appear
 From several quarters, and enclose the rear.
 They first observe, and to the rest betray,
 Our diff'rent speech; our borrow'd arms survey.
 Oppress'd with odds, we fall; Coroebus first, 1640
 At Pallas' altar, by Peneleus pierc'd.
 Then Ripheus follow'd, in th' unequal fight;

Just of his word, observant of the right:
 Heav'n thought not so. Dymas their fate attends,
 With Hypanis, mistaken by their friends. 1645
 Nor, Pantheus, thee, thy miter, nor the bands
 Of awful Phoebus, sav'd from impious hands.
 Ye Trojan flames, your testimony bear,
 What I perform'd, and what I suffer'd there;
 No sword avoiding in the fatal strife, 1650
 Expos'd to death, and prodigal of life;
 Witness, ye heavens! I live not by my fault:
 I strove to have deserv'd the death I sought.
 But, when I could not fight, and would have died,
 Borne off to distance by the growing tide, 1655
 Old Iphitus and I were hurried thence,
 With Pelias wounded, and without defense.
 New clamors from th' invested palace ring:
 We run to die, or disengage the king.
 So hot th' assault, so high the tumult rose, 1660
 While ours defend, and while the Greeks oppose
 As all the Dardan and Argolic race
 Had been contracted in that narrow space;
 Or as all Ilium else were void of fear,
 And tumult, war, and slaughter, only there. 1665
 Their targets in a tortoise cast, the foes,
 Secure advancing, to the turrets rose:
 Some mount the scaling ladders; some, more bold,
 Swerve upwards, and by posts and pillars hold;
 Their left hand gripes their bucklers in th' ascent, 1670
 While with their right they seize the battlement.
 From their demolish'd tow'rs the Trojans throw
 Huge heaps of stones, that, falling, crush the foe;
 And heavy beams and rafters from the sides
 (Such arms their last necessity provides) 1675
 And gilded roofs, come tumbling from on high,
 The marks of state and ancient royalty.
 The guards below, fix'd in the pass, attend
 The charge undaunted, and the gate defend.
 Renew'd in courage with recover'd breath, 1680
 A second time we ran to tempt our death,
 To clear the palace from the foe, succeed
 The weary living, and revenge the dead.

"A postern door, yet unobserv'd and free,
 Join'd by the length of a blind gallery, 1685
 To the king's closet led: a way well known
 To Hector's wife, while Priam held the throne,
 Thro' which she brought Astyanax, unseen,
 To cheer his grandsire and his grandsire's queen.
 Thro' this we pass, and mount the tow'r, from whence 1690
 With unavailing arms the Trojans make defense.
 From this the trembling king had oft descried
 The Grecian camp, and saw their navy ride.
 Beams from its lofty height with swords we hew,
 Then, wrenching with our hands, th' assault renew; 1695
 And, where the rafters on the columns meet,
 We push them headlong with our arms and feet.
 The lightning flies not swifter than the fall,

Nor thunder louder than the ruin'd wall:
 Down goes the top at once; the Greeks beneath 1700
 Are piecemeal torn, or pounded into death.
 Yet more succeed, and more to death are sent;
 We cease not from above, nor they below relent.
 Before the gate stood Pyrrhus, threat'ning loud,
 With glitt'ring arms conspicuous in the crowd. 1705
 So shines, renew'd in youth, the crested snake,
 Who slept the winter in a thorny brake,
 And, casting off his slough when spring returns,
 Now looks aloft, and with new glory burns;
 Restor'd with poisonous herbs, his ardent sides 1710
 Reflect the sun; and rais'd on spires he rides;
 High o'er the grass, hissing he rolls along,
 And brandishes by fits his forky tongue.
 Proud Periphas, and fierce Automedon,
 His father's charioteer, together run 1715
 To force the gate; the Scyrian infantry
 Rush on in crowds, and the barr'd passage free.
 Ent'ring the court, with shouts the skies they rend;
 And flaming firebrands to the roofs ascend.
 Himself, among the foremost, deals his blows, 1720
 And with his ax repeated strokes bestows
 On the strong doors; then all their shoulders ply,
 Till from the posts the brazen hinges fly.
 He hews apace; the double bars at length
 Yield to his ax and unresisted strength. 1725
 A mighty breach is made: the rooms conceal'd
 Appear, and all the palace is reveal'd;
 The halls of audience, and of public state,
 And where the lonely queen in secret sate.
 Arm'd soldiers now by trembling maids are seen, 1730
 With not a door, and scarce a space, between.
 The house is fill'd with loud laments and cries,
 And shrieks of women rend the vaulted skies;
 The fearful matrons run from place to place,
 And kiss the thresholds, and the posts embrace. 1735
 The fatal work inhuman Pyrrhus plies,
 And all his father sparkles in his eyes;
 Nor bars, nor fighting guards, his force sustain:
 The bars are broken, and the guards are slain.
 In rush the Greeks, and all the apartments fill; 1740
 Those few defendants whom they find, they kill.
 Not with so fierce a rage the foaming flood
 Roars, when he finds his rapid course withstood;
 Bears down the dams with unresisted sway,
 And sweeps the cattle and the cots away. 1745
 These eyes beheld him when he march'd between
 The brother kings: I saw th' unhappy queen,
 The hundred wives, and where old Priam stood,
 To stain his hallow'd altar with his brood.
 The fifty nuptial beds (such hopes had he, 1750
 So large a promise, of a progeny),
 The posts, of plated gold, and hung with spoils,
 Fell the reward of the proud victor's toils.
 Where'er the raging fire had left a space,
 The Grecians enter and possess the place. 1755

“Perhaps you may of Priam’s fate enquire.
 He, when he saw his regal town on fire,
 His ruin’d palace, and his ent’ring foes,
 On ev’ry side inevitable woes,
 In arms, disus’d, invests his limbs, decay’d, 1760
 Like them, with age; a late and useless aid.
 His feeble shoulders scarce the weight sustain;
 Loaded, not arm’d, he creeps along with pain,
 Despairing of success, ambitious to be slain!
 Uncover’d but by heav’n, there stood in view 1765
 An altar; near the hearth a laurel grew,
 Dodder’d with age, whose boughs encompass round
 The household gods, and shade the holy ground.
 Here Hecuba, with all her helpless train
 Of dames, for shelter sought, but sought in vain. 1770
 Driv’n like a flock of doves along the sky,
 Their images they hug, and to their altars fly.
 The Queen, when she beheld her trembling lord,
 And hanging by his side a heavy sword,
 ‘What rage,’ she cried, ‘has seiz’d my husband’s mind? 1775
 What arms are these, and to what use design’d?
 These times want other aids! Were Hector here,
 Ev’n Hector now in vain, like Priam, would appear.
 With us, one common shelter thou shalt find,
 Or in one common fate with us be join’d.’ 1780
 She said, and with a last salute embrac’d
 The poor old man, and by the laurel plac’d.
 Behold! Polites, one of Priam’s sons,
 Pursued by Pyrrhus, there for safety runs.
 Thro’ swords and foes, amaz’d and hurt, he flies 1785
 Thro’ empty courts and open galleries.
 Him Pyrrhus, urging with his lance, pursues,
 And often reaches, and his thrusts renews.
 The youth, transfix’d, with lamentable cries,
 Expires before his wretched parent’s eyes: 1790
 Whom gasping at his feet when Priam saw,
 The fear of death gave place to nature’s law;
 And, shaking more with anger than with age,
 ‘The gods,’ said he, ‘requite thy brutal rage!
 As sure they will, barbarian, sure they must, 1795
 If there be gods in heav’n, and gods be just—
 Who tak’st in wrongs an insolent delight;
 With a son’s death t’ infect a father’s sight.
 Not he, whom thou and lying fame conspire
 To call thee his—not he, thy vaunted sire, 1800
 Thus us’d my wretched age: the gods he fear’d,
 The laws of nature and of nations heard.
 He cheer’d my sorrows, and, for sums of gold,
 The bloodless carcass of my Hector sold;
 Pitied the woes a parent underwent, 1805
 And sent me back in safety from his tent.’

“This said, his feeble hand a javelin threw,
 Which, flutt’ring, seem’d to loiter as it flew:
 Just, and but barely, to the mark it held,
 And faintly tinkled on the brazen shield. 1810

- “Then Pyrrhus thus: ‘Go thou from me to fate,
 And to my father my foul deeds relate.
 Now die!’ With that he dragg’d the trembling sire,
 Slidd’ring thro’ clotted blood and holy mire,
 (The mingled paste his murder’d son had made,) 1815
 Haul’d from beneath the violated shade,
 And on the sacred pile the royal victim laid.
 His right hand held his bloody falchion bare,
 His left he twisted in his hoary hair;
 Then, with a speeding thrust, his heart he found: 1820
 The lukewarm blood came rushing thro’ the wound,
 And sanguine streams distain’d the sacred ground.
 Thus Priam fell, and shar’d one common fate
 With Troy in ashes, and his ruin’d state:
 He, who the scepter of all Asia sway’d, 1825
 Whom monarchs like domestic slaves obey’d.
 On the bleak shore now lies th’ abandon’d king,
 A headless carcass, and a nameless thing.
- “Then, not before, I felt my cruddled blood
 Congeal with fear, my hair with horror stood: 1830
 My father’s image fill’d my pious mind,
 Lest equal years might equal fortune find.
 Again I thought on my forsaken wife,
 And trembled for my son’s abandon’d life.
 I look’d about, but found myself alone, 1835
 Deserted at my need! My friends were gone.
 Some spent with toil, some with despair oppress’d,
 Leap’d headlong from the heights; the flames consum’d the rest.
 Thus, wand’ring in my way, without a guide,
 The graceless Helen in the porch I spied 1840
 Of Vesta’s temple; there she lurk’d alone;
 Muffled she sate, and, what she could, unknown:
 But, by the flames that cast their blaze around,
 That common bane of Greece and Troy I found.
 For Ilium burnt, she dreads the Trojan sword; 1845
 More dreads the vengeance of her injur’d lord;
 Ev’n by those gods who refug’d her abhorr’d.
 Trembling with rage, the strumpet I regard,
 Resolv’d to give her guilt the due reward:
 ‘Shall she triumphant sail before the wind, 1850
 And leave in flames unhappy Troy behind?
 Shall she her kingdom and her friends review,
 In state attended with a captive crew,
 While unreveng’d the good old Priam falls,
 And Grecian fires consume the Trojan walls? 1855
 For this the Phrygian fields and Xanthian flood
 Were swell’d with bodies, and were drunk with blood?
 ‘T is true, a soldier can small honor gain,
 And boast no conquest, from a woman slain:
 Yet shall the fact not pass without applause, 1860
 Of vengeance taken in so just a cause;
 The punish’d crime shall set my soul at ease,
 And murm’ring manes of my friends appease.’
 Thus while I rave, a gleam of pleasing light
 Spread o’er the place; and, shining heav’nly bright, 1865
 My mother stood reveal’d before my sight

Never so radiant did her eyes appear;
 Not her own star confess'd a light so clear:
 Great in her charms, as when on gods above
 She looks, and breathes herself into their love. 1870
 She held my hand, the destin'd blow to break;
 Then from her rosy lips began to speak:
 'My son, from whence this madness, this neglect
 Of my commands, and those whom I protect?
 Why this unmanly rage? Recall to mind 1875
 Whom you forsake, what pledges leave behind.
 Look if your helpless father yet survive,
 Or if Ascanius or Creusa live.
 Around your house the greedy Grecians err;
 And these had perish'd in the nightly war, 1880
 But for my presence and protecting care.
 Not Helen's face, nor Paris, was in fault;
 But by the gods was this destruction brought.
 Now cast your eyes around, while I dissolve
 The mists and films that mortal eyes involve, 1885
 Purge from your sight the dross, and make you see
 The shape of each avenging deity.
 Enlighten'd thus, my just commands fulfill,
 Nor fear obedience to your mother's will.
 Where yon disorder'd heap of ruin lies, 1890
 Stones rent from stones; where clouds of dust arise—
 Amid that smother Neptune holds his place,
 Below the wall's foundation drives his mace,
 And heaves the building from the solid base.
 Look where, in arms, imperial Juno stands 1895
 Full in the Scaean gate, with loud commands,
 Urging on shore the tardy Grecian bands.
 See! Pallas, of her snaky buckler proud,
 Bestrides the tow'r, refulgent thro' the cloud:
 See! Jove new courage to the foe supplies, 1900
 And arms against the town the partial deities.
 Haste hence, my son; this fruitless labor end:
 Haste, where your trembling spouse and sire attend:
 Haste; and a mother's care your passage shall befriend.' 1905
 She said, and swiftly vanish'd from my sight,
 Obscure in clouds and gloomy shades of night.
 I look'd, I listen'd; dreadful sounds I hear;
 And the dire forms of hostile gods appear.
 Troy sunk in flames I saw (nor could prevent),
 And Ilium from its old foundations rent; 1910
 Rent like a mountain ash, which dar'd the winds,
 And stood the sturdy strokes of lab'ring hinds.
 About the roots the cruel ax resounds;
 The stumps are pierc'd with oft-repeated wounds:
 The war is felt on high; the nodding crown 1915
 Now threats a fall, and throws the leafy honors down.
 To their united force it yields, tho' late,
 And mourns with mortal groans th' approaching fate:
 The roots no more their upper load sustain;
 But down she falls, and spreads a ruin thro' the plain. 1920

"Descending thence, I scape thro' foes and fire:
 Before the goddess, foes and flames retire.

- Arriv'd at home, he, for whose only sake,
Or most for his, such toils I undertake,
The good Anchises, whom, by timely flight, 1925
I purpos'd to secure on Ida's height,
Refus'd the journey, resolute to die
And add his fun'rals to the fate of Troy,
Rather than exile and old age sustain.
- 'Go you, whose blood runs warm in ev'ry vein. 1930
Had Heav'n decreed that I should life enjoy,
Heav'n had decreed to save unhappy Troy.
'T is, sure, enough, if not too much, for one,
Twice to have seen our Ilium overthrown.
Make haste to save the poor remaining crew, 1935
And give this useless corpse a long adieu.
These weak old hands suffice to stop my breath;
At least the pitying foes will aid my death,
To take my spoils, and leave my body bare:
As for my sepulcher, let Heav'n take care. 1940
'T is long since I, for my celestial wife
Loath'd by the gods, have dragg'd a ling'ring life;
Since ev'ry hour and moment I expire,
Blasted from heav'n by Jove's avenging fire.'
This oft repeated, he stood fix'd to die: 1945
Myself, my wife, my son, my family,
Intreat, pray, beg, and raise a doleful cry—
'What, will he still persist, on death resolve,
And in his ruin all his house involve?'
He still persists his reasons to maintain; 1950
Our pray'rs, our tears, our loud laments, are vain.
- "Urg'd by despair, again I go to try
The fate of arms, resolv'd in fight to die:
'What hope remains, but what my death must give?
Can I, without so dear a father, live? 1955
You term it prudence, what I baseness call:
Could such a word from such a parent fall?
If Fortune please, and so the gods ordain,
That nothing should of ruin'd Troy remain,
And you conspire with Fortune to be slain, 1960
The way to death is wide, th' approaches near:
For soon relentless Pyrrhus will appear,
Reeking with Priam's blood—the wretch who slew
The son (inhuman) in the father's view,
And then the sire himself to the dire altar drew. 1965
O goddess mother, give me back to Fate;
Your gift was undesir'd, and came too late!
Did you, for this, unhappy me convey
Thro' foes and fires, to see my house a prey?
Shall I my father, wife, and son behold, 1970
Welt'ring in blood, each other's arms infold?
Haste! gird my sword, tho' spent and overcome:
'T is the last summons to receive our doom.
I hear thee, Fate; and I obey thy call!
Not unreveng'd the foe shall see my fall. 1975
Restore me to the yet unfinish'd fight:
My death is wanting to conclude the night.'
Arm'd once again, my glitt'ring sword I wield,

- While th' other hand sustains my weighty shield,
And forth I rush to seek th' abandon'd field. 1980
I went; but sad Creusa stopp'd my way,
And cross the threshold in my passage lay,
Embrac'd my knees, and, when I would have gone,
Shew'd me my feeble sire and tender son:
'If death be your design, at least,' said she, 1985
'Take us along to share your destiny.
If any farther hopes in arms remain,
This place, these pledges of your love, maintain.
To whom do you expose your father's life,
Your son's, and mine, your now forgotten wife!' 1990
While thus she fills the house with clam'rous cries,
Our hearing is diverted by our eyes:
For, while I held my son, in the short space
Betwixt our kisses and our last embrace;
Strange to relate, from young Iulus' head 1995
A lambent flame arose, which gently spread
Around his brows, and on his temples fed.
Amaz'd, with running water we prepare
To quench the sacred fire, and slake his hair;
But old Anchises, vers'd in omens, rear'd 2000
His hands to heav'n, and this request preferr'd:
'If any vows, almighty Jove, can bend
Thy will; if piety can pray'rs commend,
Confirm the glad presage which thou art pleas'd to send.'
Scarce had he said, when, on our left, we hear 2005
A peal of rattling thunder roll in air:
There shot a streaming lamp along the sky,
Which on the winged lightning seem'd to fly;
From o'er the roof the blaze began to move,
And, trailing, vanish'd in th' Idaean grove. 2010
It swept a path in heav'n, and shone a guide,
Then in a steaming stench of sulphur died.
- "The good old man with suppliant hands implor'd
The gods' protection, and their star ador'd.
'Now, now,' said he, 'my son, no more delay! 2015
I yield, I follow where Heav'n shews the way.
Keep, O my country gods, our dwelling place,
And guard this relic of the Trojan race,
This tender child! These omens are your own,
And you can yet restore the ruin'd town. 2020
At least accomplish what your signs foreshow:
I stand resign'd, and am prepar'd to go.'
- "He said. The crackling flames appear on high.
And driving sparkles dance along the sky.
With Vulcan's rage the rising winds conspire, 2025
And near our palace roll the flood of fire.
'Haste, my dear father, ('t is no time to wait.)
And load my shoulders with a willing freight.
Whate'er befalls, your life shall be my care;
One death, or one deliv'rance, we will share. 2030
My hand shall lead our little son; and you,
My faithful consort, shall our steps pursue.
Next, you, my servants, heed my strict commands:

Without the walls a ruin'd temple stands,
 To Ceres hallow'd once; a cypress nigh 2035
 Shoots up her venerable head on high,
 By long religion kept; there bend your feet,
 And in divided parties let us meet.
 Our country gods, the relics, and the bands,
 Hold you, my father, in your guiltless hands: 2040
 In me 't is impious holy things to bear,
 Red as I am with slaughter, new from war,
 Till in some living stream I cleanse the guilt
 Of dire debate, and blood in battle spilt.
 Thus, ord'ring all that prudence could provide, 2045
 I clothe my shoulders with a lion's hide
 And yellow spoils; then, on my bending back,
 The welcome load of my dear father take;
 While on my better hand Ascanius hung,
 And with unequal paces tripp'd along. 2050
 Creusa kept behind; by choice we stray
 Thro' ev'ry dark and ev'ry devious way.
 I, who so bold and dauntless, just before,
 The Grecian darts and shock of lances bore,
 At ev'ry shadow now am seiz'd with fear, 2055
 Not for myself, but for the charge I bear;
 Till, near the ruin'd gate arriv'd at last,
 Secure, and deeming all the danger past,
 A frightful noise of trampling feet we hear.
 My father, looking thro' the shades, with fear, 2060
 Cried out: 'Haste, haste, my son, the foes are nigh;
 Their swords and shining armor I descry.'
 Some hostile god, for some unknown offense,
 Had sure bereft my mind of better sense;
 For, while thro' winding ways I took my flight, 2065
 And sought the shelter of the gloomy night,
 Alas! I lost Creusa: hard to tell
 If by her fatal destiny she fell,
 Or weary sate, or wander'd with affright;
 But she was lost for ever to my sight. 2070
 I knew not, or reflected, till I meet
 My friends, at Ceres' now deserted seat.
 We met: not one was wanting; only she Deceiv'd her friends, her son, and wretched me.

"What mad expressions did my tongue refuse! 2075
 Whom did I not, of gods or men, accuse!
 This was the fatal blow, that pain'd me more
 Than all I felt from ruin'd Troy before.
 Stung with my loss, and raving with despair,
 Abandoning my now forgotten care, 2080
 Of counsel, comfort, and of hope bereft,
 My sire, my son, my country gods I left.
 In shining armor once again I sheathe
 My limbs, not feeling wounds, nor fearing death.
 Then headlong to the burning walls I run, 2085
 And seek the danger I was forc'd to shun.
 I tread my former tracks; thro' night explore
 Each passage, ev'ry street I cross'd before.
 All things were full of horror and affright,

And dreadful ev'n the silence of the night. 2090
 Then to my father's house I make repair,
 With some small glimpse of hope to find her there.
 Instead of her, the cruel Greeks I met;
 The house was fill'd with foes, with flames beset.
 Driv'n on the wings of winds, whole sheets of fire, 2095
 Thro' air transported, to the roofs aspire.
 From thence to Priam's palace I resort,
 And search the citadel and desart court.
 Then, unobserv'd, I pass by Juno's church:
 A guard of Grecians had possess'd the porch; 2100
 There Phoenix and Ulysses watch prey,
 And thither all the wealth of Troy convey:
 The spoils which they from ransack'd houses brought,
 And golden bowls from burning altars caught,
 The tables of the gods, the purple vests, 2105
 The people's treasure, and the pomp of priests.
 A rank of wretched youths, with pinion'd hands,
 And captive matrons, in long order stands.
 Then, with ungovern'd madness, I proclaim,
 Thro' all the silent street, Creusa's name: 2110
 Creusa still I call; at length she hears,
 And sudden thro' the shades of night appears—
 Appears, no more Creusa, nor my wife,
 But a pale specter, larger than the life.
 Aghast, astonish'd, and struck dumb with fear, 2115
 I stood; like bristles rose my stiffen'd hair.
 Then thus the ghost began to soothe my grief
 'Nor tears, nor cries, can give the dead relief.
 Desist, my much-lov'd lord, 't indulge your pain;
 You bear no more than what the gods ordain. 2120
 My fates permit me not from hence to fly;
 Nor he, the great controller of the sky.
 Long wand'ring ways for you the pow'rs decree;
 On land hard labors, and a length of sea.
 Then, after many painful years are past, 2125
 On Latium's happy shore you shall be cast,
 Where gentle Tiber from his bed beholds
 The flow'ry meadows, and the feeding folds.
 There end your toils; and there your fates provide
 A quiet kingdom, and a royal bride: 2130
 There fortune shall the Trojan line restore,
 And you for lost Creusa weep no more.
 Fear not that I shall watch, with servile shame,
 Th' imperious looks of some proud Grecian dame;
 Or, stooping to the victor's lust, disgrace 2135
 My goddess mother, or my royal race.
 And now, farewell! The parent of the gods
 Restrains my fleeting soul in her abodes:
 I trust our common issue to your care.
 She said, and gliding pass'd unseen in air. 2140
 I strove to speak: but horror tied my tongue;
 And thrice about her neck my arms I flung,
 And, thrice deceiv'd, on vain embraces hung.
 Light as an empty dream at break of day,
 Or as a blast of wind, she rush'd away. 2145

“Thus having pass’d the night in fruitless pain,
 I to my longing friends return again,
 Amaz’d th’ augmented number to behold,
 Of men and matrons mix’d, of young and old;
 A wretched exil’d crew together brought, 2150
 With arms appointed, and with treasure fraught,
 Resolv’d, and willing, under my command,
 To run all hazards both of sea and land.
 The Morn began, from Ida, to display
 Her rosy cheeks; and Phosphor led the day: 2155
 Before the gates the Grecians took their post,
 And all pretense of late relief was lost.
 I yield to Fate, unwillingly retire,
 And, loaded, up the hill convey my sire.”

Book III

“When Heav’n had overturn’d the Trojan state 2160
 And Priam’s throne, by too severe a fate;
 When ruin’d Troy became the Grecians’ prey,
 And Ilium’s lofty tow’rs in ashes lay;
 Warn’d by celestial omens, we retreat,
 To seek in foreign lands a happier seat. 2165
 Near old Antandros, and at Ida’s foot,
 The timber of the sacred groves we cut,
 And build our fleet; uncertain yet to find
 What place the gods for our repose assign’d.
 Friends daily flock; and scarce the kindly spring 2170
 Began to clothe the ground, and birds to sing,
 When old Anchises summon’d all to sea:
 The crew my father and the Fates obey.
 With sighs and tears I leave my native shore,
 And empty fields, where Ilium stood before. 2175
 My sire, my son, our less and greater gods,
 All sail at once, and cleave the briny floods.

“Against our coast appears a spacious land,
 Which once the fierce Lycurgus did command,
 (Thracia the name—the people bold in war; 2180 Vast are their fields, and tillage is their care,)
 A hospitable realm while Fate was kind,
 With Troy in friendship and religion join’d.
 I land; with luckless omens then adore
 Their gods, and draw a line along the shore; 2185
 I lay the deep foundations of a wall,
 And Aenos, nam’d from me, the city call.
 To Dionaeon Venus vows are paid,
 And all the pow’rs that rising labors aid;
 A bull on Jove’s imperial altar laid. 2190
 Not far, a rising hillock stood in view;
 Sharp myrtles on the sides, and cornels grew.
 There, while I went to crop the sylvan scenes,
 And shade our altar with their leafy greens,
 I pull’d a plant—with horror I relate 2195
 A prodigy so strange and full of fate.
 The rooted fibers rose, and from the wound
 Black bloody drops distill’d upon the ground.

Mute and amaz'd, my hair with terror stood;
 Fear shrunk my sinews, and congeal'd my blood. 2200
 Mann'd once again, another plant I try:
 That other gush'd with the same sanguine dye.
 Then, fearing guilt for some offense unknown,
 With pray'rs and vows the Dryads I atone,
 With all the sisters of the woods, and most 2205
 The God of Arms, who rules the Thracian coast,
 That they, or he, these omens would avert,
 Release our fears, and better signs impart.
 Clear'd, as I thought, and fully fix'd at length
 To learn the cause, I tugged with all my strength: 2210
 I bent my knees against the ground; once more
 The violated myrtle ran with gore.
 Scarce dare I tell the sequel: from the womb
 Of wounded earth, and caverns of the tomb,
 A groan, as of a troubled ghost, renew'd 2215
 My fright, and then these dreadful words ensued:
 'Why dost thou thus my buried body rend?
 O spare the corpse of thy unhappy friend!
 Spare to pollute thy pious hands with blood:
 The tears distil not from the wounded wood; 2220
 But ev'ry drop this living tree contains
 Is kindred blood, and ran in Trojan veins.
 O fly from this unhospitable shore,
 Warn'd by my fate; for I am Polydore!
 Here loads of lances, in my blood embued, 2225
 Again shoot upward, by my blood renew'd.'

"My falt'ring tongue and shiv'ring limbs declare
 My horror, and in bristles rose my hair.
 When Troy with Grecian arms was closely pent,
 Old Priam, fearful of the war's event, 2230
 This hapless Polydore to Thracia sent:
 Loaded with gold, he sent his darling, far
 From noise and tumults, and destructive war,
 Committed to the faithless tyrant's care;
 Who, when he saw the pow'r of Troy decline, 2235
 Forsook the weaker, with the strong to join;
 Broke ev'ry bond of nature and of truth,
 And murder'd, for his wealth, the royal youth.
 O sacred hunger of pernicious gold!
 What bands of faith can impious lucre hold? 2240
 Now, when my soul had shaken off her fears,
 I call my father and the Trojan peers;
 Relate the prodigies of Heav'n, require
 What he commands, and their advice desire.
 All vote to leave that execrable shore, 2245
 Polluted with the blood of Polydore;
 But, ere we sail, his fun'ral rites prepare,
 Then, to his ghost, a tomb and altars rear.
 In mournful pomp the matrons walk the round,
 With baleful cypress and blue fillets crown'd, 2250
 With eyes dejected, and with hair unbound.
 Then bowls of tepid milk and blood we pour,
 And thrice invoke the soul of Polydore.

- “Now, when the raging storms no longer reign,
But southern gales invite us to the main, 2255
We launch our vessels, with a prosp’rous wind,
And leave the cities and the shores behind.
- “An island in th’ Aegaeon main appears;
Neptune and wat’ry Doris claim it theirs. 2260
It floated once, till Phoebus fix’d the sides
To rooted earth, and now it braves the tides.
Here, borne by friendly winds, we come ashore,
With needful ease our weary limbs restore,
And the Sun’s temple and his town adore.
- “Anius, the priest and king, with laurel crown’d, 2265
His hoary locks with purple fillets bound,
Who saw my sire the Delian shore ascend,
Came forth with eager haste to meet his friend;
Invites him to his palace; and, in sign 2270
Of ancient love, their plighted hands they join.
Then to the temple of the god I went,
And thus, before the shrine, my vows present:
‘Give, O Thymbraeus, give a resting place
To the sad relics of the Trojan race; 2275
A seat secure, a region of their own,
A lasting empire, and a happier town.
Where shall we fix? where shall our labors end?
Whom shall we follow, and what fate attend?
Let not my pray’rs a doubtful answer find;
But in clear auguries unveil thy mind.’ 2280
Scarce had I said: he shook the holy ground,
The laurels, and the lofty hills around;
And from the tripos rush’d a bellowing sound.
Prostrate we fell; confess’d the present god,
Who gave this answer from his dark abode: 2285
‘Undaunted youths, go, seek that mother earth
From which your ancestors derive their birth.
The soil that sent you forth, her ancient race
In her old bosom shall again embrace.
Thro’ the wide world th’ Aeneian house shall reign, 2290
And children’s children shall the crown sustain.’
Thus Phoebus did our future fates disclose:
A mighty tumult, mix’d with joy, arose.
- “All are concern’d to know what place the god 2295
Assign’d, and where determin’d our abode.
My father, long revolving in his mind
The race and lineage of the Trojan kind,
Thus answer’d their demands: ‘Ye princes, hear
Your pleasing fortune, and dispel your fear. 2300
The fruitful isle of Crete, well known to fame,
Sacred of old to Jove’s imperial name,
In the mid ocean lies, with large command,
And on its plains a hundred cities stand.
Another Ida rises there, and we
From thence derive our Trojan ancestry. 2305
From thence, as ‘t is divulg’d by certain fame,
To the Rhoetean shores old Teucrus came;

There fix'd, and there the seat of empire chose,
 Ere Ilium and the Trojan tow'rs arose. 2310
 In humble vales they built their soft abodes,
 Till Cybele, the mother of the gods,
 With tinkling cymbals charm'd th' Idaean woods,
 She secret rites and ceremonies taught,
 And to the yoke the savage lions brought. 2315
 Let us the land which Heav'n appoints, explore;
 Appease the winds, and seek the Gnoasian shore.
 If Jove assists the passage of our fleet,
 The third propitious dawn discovers Crete.<sup>7</sup>
 Thus having said, the sacrifices, laid 2320
 On smoking altars, to the gods he paid:
 A bull, to Neptune an oblation due,
 Another bull to bright Apollo slew;
 A milk-white ewe, the western winds to please,
 And one coal-black, to calm the stormy seas. 2325
 Ere this, a flying rumor had been spread
 That fierce Idomeneus from Crete was fled,
 Expell'd and exil'd; that the coast was free
 From foreign or domestic enemy.

“We leave the Delian ports, and put to sea;
 By Naxos, fam'd for vintage, make our way; 2330
 Then green Donysa pass; and sail in sight
 Of Paros' isle, with marble quarries white.
 We pass the scatter'd isles of Cyclades,
 That, scarce distinguish'd, seem to stud the seas. 2335
 The shouts of sailors double near the shores;
 They stretch their canvas, and they ply their oars.
 ‘All hands aloft! for Crete! for Crete!’ they cry,
 And swiftly thro' the foamy billows fly.
 Full on the promis'd land at length we bore,
 With joy descending on the Cretan shore. 2340
 With eager haste a rising town I frame,
 Which from the Trojan Pergamus I name:
 The name itself was grateful; I exhort
 To found their houses, and erect a fort. 2345
 Our ships are haul'd upon the yellow strand;
 The youth begin to till the labor'd land;
 And I myself new marriages promote,
 Give laws, and dwellings I divide by lot;
 When rising vapors choke the wholesome air,
 And blasts of noisome winds corrupt the year; 2350
 The trees devouring caterpillars burn;
 Parch'd was the grass, and blighted was the corn:
 Nor 'scape the beasts; for Sirius, from on high,
 With pestilential heat infects the sky:
 My men—some fall, the rest in fevers fry. 2355
 Again my father bids me seek the shore
 Of sacred Delos, and the god implore,
 To learn what end of woes we might expect,
 And to what clime our weary course direct.

“‘T was night, when ev'ry creature, void of cares, 2360
 The common gift of balmy slumber shares:
 The statues of my gods (for such they seem'd),

- Those gods whom I from flaming Troy redeem'd,
 Before me stood, majestically bright,
 Full in the beams of Phoebe's ent'ring light. 2365
 Then thus they spoke, and eas'd my troubled mind:
 'What from the Delian god thou go'st to find,
 He tells thee here, and sends us to relate.
 Those pow'rs are we, companions of thy fate,
 Who from the burning town by thee were brought, 2370
 Thy fortune follow'd, and thy safety wrought.
 Thro' seas and lands as we thy steps attend,
 So shall our care thy glorious race befriend.
 An ample realm for thee thy fates ordain,
 A town that o'er the conquer'd world shall reign. 2375
 Thou, mighty walls for mighty nations build;
 Nor let thy weary mind to labors yield:
 But change thy seat; for not the Delian god,
 Nor we, have giv'n thee Crete for our abode.
 A land there is, Hesperia call'd of old, 2380
 (The soil is fruitful, and the natives bold—
 Th' Oenotrians held it once,) by later fame
 Now call'd Italia, from the leader's name.
 Iasius there and Dardanus were born;
 From thence we came, and thither must return. 2385
 Rise, and thy sire with these glad tidings greet.
 Search Italy; for Jove denies thee Crete.'
- 'Astonish'd at their voices and their sight,
 (Nor were they dreams, but visions of the night;
 I saw, I knew their faces, and descried, 2390
 In perfect view, their hair with fillets tied;)
 I started from my couch; a clammy sweat
 On all my limbs and shiv'ring body sate.
 To heav'n I lift my hands with pious haste,
 And sacred incense in the flames I cast. 2395
 Thus to the gods their perfect honors done,
 More cheerful, to my good old sire I run,
 And tell the pleasing news. In little space
 He found his error of the double race;
 Not, as before he deem'd, deriv'd from Crete; 2400
 No more deluded by the doubtful seat:
 Then said: 'O son, turmoil'd in Trojan fate!
 Such things as these Cassandra did relate.
 This day revives within my mind what she Foretold of Troy renew'd in Italy, 2405
 And Latian lands; but who could then have thought
 That Phrygian gods to Latium should be brought,
 Or who believ'd what mad Cassandra taught?
 Now let us go where Phoebus leads the way.'
- 'He said; and we with glad consent obey, 2410
 Forsake the seat, and, leaving few behind,
 We spread our sails before the willing wind.
 Now from the sight of land our galleys move,
 With only seas around and skies above;
 When o'er our heads descends a burst of rain, 2415
 And night with sable clouds involves the main;
 The ruffling winds the foamy billows raise;

The scatter'd fleet is forc'd to sev'ral ways;
 The face of heav'n is ravish'd from our eyes,
 And in redoubled peals the roaring thunder flies. 2420
 Cast from our course, we wander in the dark.
 No stars to guide, no point of land to mark.
 Ev'n Palinurus no distinction found
 Betwixt the night and day; such darkness reign'd around.
 Three starless nights the doubtful navy strays, 2425
 Without distinction, and three sunless days;
 The fourth renews the light, and, from our shrouds,
 We view a rising land, like distant clouds;
 The mountain-tops confirm the pleasing sight,
 And curling smoke ascending from their height. 2430
 The canvas falls; their oars the sailors ply;
 From the rude strokes the whirling waters fly.
 At length I land upon the Strophades,
 Safe from the danger of the stormy seas.
 Those isles are compass'd by th' Ionian main, 2435
 The dire abode where the foul Harpies reign,
 Forc'd by the winged warriors to repair
 To their old homes, and leave their costly fare.
 Monsters more fierce offended Heav'n ne'er sent
 From hell's abyss, for human punishment: 2440
 With virgin faces, but with wombs obscene,
 Foul paunches, and with ordure still unclean;
 With claws for hands, and looks for ever lean.

"We landed at the port, and soon beheld
 Fat herds of oxen graze the flow'ry field, 2445
 And wanton goats without a keeper stray'd.
 With weapons we the welcome prey invade,
 Then call the gods for partners of our feast,
 And Jove himself, the chief invited guest.
 We spread the tables on the greensward ground; 2450
 We feed with hunger, and the bowls go round;
 When from the mountain-tops, with hideous cry,
 And clatt'ring wings, the hungry Harpies fly;
 They snatch the meat, defiling all they find,
 And, parting, leave a loathsome stench behind. 2455
 Close by a hollow rock, again we sit,
 New dress the dinner, and the beds refit,
 Secure from sight, beneath a pleasing shade,
 Where tufted trees a native arbor made.
 Again the holy fires on altars burn; 2460
 And once again the rav'nous birds return,
 Or from the dark recesses where they lie,
 Or from another quarter of the sky;
 With filthy claws their odious meal repeat,
 And mix their loathsome ordures with their meat. 2465
 I bid my friends for vengeance then prepare,
 And with the hellish nation wage the war.
 They, as commanded, for the fight provide,
 And in the grass their glitt'ring weapons hide;
 Then, when along the crooked shore we hear 2470
 Their clatt'ring wings, and saw the foes appear,
 Misenus sounds a charge: we take th' alarm,
 And our strong hands with swords and bucklers arm.

- In this new kind of combat all employ
 Their utmost force, the monsters to destroy. 2475
 In vain—the fated skin is proof to wounds;
 And from their plumes the shining sword rebounds.
 At length rebuff'd, they leave their mangled prey,
 And their stretch'd pinions to the skies display.
 Yet one remain'd—the messenger of Fate: 2480
 High on a craggy cliff Celaeno sate,
 And thus her dismal errand did relate:
 'What! not contented with our oxen slain,
 Dare you with Heav'n an impious war maintain,
 And drive the Harpies from their native reign? 2485
 Heed therefore what I say; and keep in mind
 What Jove decrees, what Phoebus has design'd,
 And I, the Furies' queen, from both relate—
 You seek th' Italian shores, foredoom'd by fate:
 Th' Italian shores are granted you to find, 2490
 And a safe passage to the port assign'd.
 But know, that ere your promis'd walls you build,
 My curses shall severely be fulfill'd.
 Fierce famine is your lot for this misdeed,
 Reduc'd to grind the plates on which you feed.' 2495
 She said, and to the neighb'ring forest flew.
 Our courage fails us, and our fears renew.
 Hopeless to win by war, to pray'rs we fall,
 And on th' offended Harpies humbly call,
 And whether gods or birds obscene they were, 2500
 Our vows for pardon and for peace prefer.
 But old Anchises, off'ring sacrifice,
 And lifting up to heav'n his hands and eyes,
 Ador'd the greater gods: 'Avert,' said he,
 'These omens; render vain this prophecy, 2505
 And from th' impending curse a pious people free!'
- “Thus having said, he bids us put to sea;
 We loose from shore our haulsers, and obey,
 And soon with swelling sails pursue the wat'ry way.
 Amidst our course, Zacynthian woods appear; 2510
 And next by rocky Neritos we steer:
 We fly from Ithaca's detested shore,
 And curse the land which dire Ulysses bore.
 At length Leucate's cloudy top appears,
 And the Sun's temple, which the sailor fears. 2515
 Resolv'd to breathe a while from labor past,
 Our crooked anchors from the prow we cast,
 And joyful to the little city haste.
 Here, safe beyond our hopes, our vows we pay
 To Jove, the guide and patron of our way. 2520
 The customs of our country we pursue,
 And Trojan games on Actian shores renew.
 Our youth their naked limbs besmear with oil,
 And exercise the wrestlers' noble toil;
 Pleas'd to have sail'd so long before the wind, 2525
 And left so many Grecian towns behind.
 The sun had now fulfill'd his annual course,
 And Boreas on the seas display'd his force:
 I fix'd upon the temple's lofty door

The brazen shield which vanquish'd Abas bore; 2530
 The verse beneath my name and action speaks:
 'These arms Aeneas took from conqu'ring Greeks.'
 Then I command to weigh; the seamen ply
 Their sweeping oars; the smoking billows fly.
 The sight of high Phaeacia soon we lost, 2535
 And skimm'd along Epirus' rocky coast.

"Then to Chaonia's port our course we bend,
 And, landed, to Buthrotus' heights ascend.
 Here wondrous things were loudly blaz'd fame:
 How Helenus reviv'd the Trojan name, 2540
 And reign'd in Greece; that Priam's captive son
 Succeeded Pyrrhus in his bed and throne;
 And fair Andromache, restor'd by fate,
 Once more was happy in a Trojan mate.
 I leave my galleys riding in the port, 2545
 And long to see the new Dardanian court.
 By chance, the mournful queen, before the gate,
 Then solemniz'd her former husband's fate.
 Green altars, rais'd of turf, with gifts she crown'd,
 And sacred priests in order stand around, 2550
 And thrice the name of hapless Hector sound.
 The grove itself resembles Ida's wood;
 And Simois seem'd the well-dissembled flood.
 But when at nearer distance she beheld
 My shining armor and my Trojan shield, 2555
 Astonish'd at the sight, the vital heat
 Forsakes her limbs; her veins no longer beat:
 She faints, she falls, and scarce recov'ring strength,
 Thus, with a falt'ring tongue, she speaks at length:

"Are you alive, O goddess-born?' she said, 2560
 'Or if a ghost, then where is Hector's shade?'
 At this, she cast a loud and frightful cry.
 With broken words I made this brief reply:
 'All of me that remains appears in sight;
 I live, if living be to loathe the light. 2565
 No phantom; but I drag a wretched life,
 My fate resembling that of Hector's wife.
 What have you suffer'd since you lost your lord?
 By what strange blessing are you now restor'd?
 Still are you Hector's? or is Hector fled, 2570
 And his remembrance lost in Pyrrhus' bed?'
 With eyes dejected, in a lowly tone,
 After a modest pause she thus begun:

"O only happy maid of Priam's race,
 Whom death deliver'd from the foes' embrace! 2575
 Commanded on Achilles' tomb to die,
 Not forc'd, like us, to hard captivity,
 Or in a haughty master's arms to lie.
 In Grecian ships unhappy we were borne,
 Endur'd the victor's lust, sustain'd the scorn, 2580
 Thus I submitted to the lawless pride
 Of Pyrrhus, more a handmaid than a bride.
 Cloy'd with possession, he forsook my bed,

- And Helen's lovely daughter sought to wed;
Then me to Trojan Helenus resign'd, 2585
And his two slaves in equal marriage join'd;
Till young Orestes, pierc'd with deep despair,
And longing to redeem the promis'd fair,
Before Apollo's altar slew the ravisher.
By Pyrrhus' death the kingdom we regain'd: 2590
At least one half with Helenus remain'd.
Our part, from Chaon, he Chaonia calls,
And names from Pergamus his rising walls.
But you, what fates have landed on our coast?
What gods have sent you, or what storms have toss'd? 2595
Does young Ascanius life and health enjoy,
Sav'd from the ruins of unhappy Troy?
O tell me how his mother's loss he bears,
What hopes are promis'd from his blooming years,
How much of Hector in his face appears?' 2600
She spoke; and mix'd her speech with mournful cries,
And fruitless tears came trickling from her eyes.
- "At length her lord descends upon the plain,
In pomp, attended with a num'rous train;
Receives his friends, and to the city leads, 2605
And tears of joy amidst his welcome sheds.
Proceeding on, another Troy I see,
Or, in less compass, Troy's epitome.
A riv'let by the name of Xanthus ran,
And I embrace the Scaean gate again. 2610
My friends in porticoes were entertain'd,
And feasts and pleasures thro' the city reign'd.
The tables fill'd the spacious hall around,
And golden bowls with sparkling wine were crown'd.
Two days we pass'd in mirth, till friendly gales, 2615
Blown from the south supplied our swelling sails.
Then to the royal seer I thus began:
'O thou, who know'st, beyond the reach of man,
The laws of heav'n, and what the stars decree;
Whom Phoebus taught unerring prophecy, 2620
From his own tripod, and his holy tree;
Skill'd in the wing'd inhabitants of air,
What auspices their notes and flights declare:
O say—for all religious rites portend
A happy voyage, and a prosp'rous end; 2625
And ev'ry power and omen of the sky
Direct my course for destin'd Italy;
But only dire Celaeno, from the gods,
A dismal famine fatally forebodes—
O say what dangers I am first to shun, 2630
What toils vanquish, and what course to run.'
- "The prophet first with sacrifice adores
The greater gods; their pardon then implores;
Unbinds the fillet from his holy head;
To Phoebus, next, my trembling steps he led, 2635
Full of religious doubts and awful dread.
Then, with his god possess'd, before the shrine,
These words proceeded from his mouth divine:

'O goddess-born, (for Heav'n's appointed will,
 With greater auspices of good than ill, 2640
 Foreshows thy voyage, and thy course directs;
 Thy fates conspire, and Jove himself protects,)
 Of many things some few I shall explain,
 Teach thee to shun the dangers of the main,
 And how at length the promis'd shore to gain. 2645
 The rest the fates from Helenus conceal,
 And Juno's angry pow'r forbids to tell.
 First, then, that happy shore, that seems so nigh,
 Will far from your deluded wishes fly;
 Long tracts of seas divide your hopes from Italy: 2650
 For you must cruise along Sicilian shores,
 And stem the currents with your struggling oars;
 Then round th' Italian coast your navy steer;
 And, after this, to Circe's island veer;
 And, last, before your new foundations rise, 2655
 Must pass the Stygian lake, and view the nether skies.
 Now mark the signs of future ease and rest,
 And bear them safely treasur'd in thy breast.
 When, in the shady shelter of a wood,
 And near the margin of a gentle flood, 2660
 Thou shalt behold a sow upon the ground,
 With thirty sucking young encompass'd round;
 The dam and offspring white as falling snow—
 These on thy city shall their name bestow,
 And there shall end thy labors and thy woe. 2665
 Nor let the threaten'd famine fright thy mind,
 For Phoebus will assist, and Fate the way will find.
 Let not thy course to that ill coast be bent,
 Which fronts from far th' Epirian continent:
 Those parts are all by Grecian foes possess'd; 2670
 The salvage Locrians here the shores infest;
 There fierce Idomeneus his city builds,
 And guards with arms the Salentinian fields;
 And on the mountain's brow Petilia stands,
 Which Philoctetes with his troops commands. 2675
 Ev'n when thy fleet is landed on the shore,
 And priests with holy vows the gods adore,
 Then with a purple veil involve your eyes,
 Lest hostile faces blast the sacrifice.
 These rites and customs to the rest commend, 2680
 That to your pious race they may descend.

"When, parted hence, the wind, that ready waits
 For Sicily, shall bear you to the straits
 Where proud Pelorus opes a wider way,
 Tack to the larboard, and stand off to sea: 2685
 Veer starboard sea and land. Th' Italian shore
 And fair Sicilia's coast were one, before
 An earthquake caus'd the flaw: the roaring tides
 The passage broke that land from land divides;
 And where the lands retir'd, the rushing ocean rides. 2690
 Distinguish'd by the straits, on either hand,
 Now rising cities in long order stand,
 And fruitful fields: so much can time invade
 The mold'ring work that beauteous Nature made.

- Far on the right, her dogs foul Scylla hides: 2695
 Charybdis roaring on the left presides,
 And in her greedy whirlpool sucks the tides;
 Then spouts them from below: with fury driv'n,
 The waves mount up and wash the face of heav'n.
 But Scylla from her den, with open jaws, 2700
 The sinking vessel in her eddy draws,
 Then dashes on the rocks. A human face,
 And virgin bosom, hides her tail's disgrace:
 Her parts obscene below the waves descend,
 With dogs inclos'd, and in a dolphin end. 2705
 'T is safer, then, to bear aloof to sea,
 And coast Pachynus, tho' with more delay,
 Than once to view misshapen Scylla near,
 And the loud yell of wat'ry wolves to hear.
- “Besides, if faith to Helenus be due, 2710
 And if prophetic Phoebus tell me true,
 Do not this precept of your friend forget,
 Which therefore more than once I must repeat:
 Above the rest, great Juno's name adore;
 Pay vows to Juno; Juno's aid implore. 2715
 Let gifts be to the mighty queen design'd,
 And mollify with pray'rs her haughty mind.
 Thus, at the length, your passage shall be free,
 And you shall safe descend on Italy.
 Arriv'd at Cumae, when you view the flood 2720
 Of black Avernus, and the sounding wood,
 The mad prophetic Sibyl you shall find,
 Dark in a cave, and on a rock reclin'd.
 She sings the fates, and, in her frantic fits,
 The notes and names, inscrib'd, to leafs commits. 2725
 What she commits to leafs, in order laid,
 Before the cavern's entrance are display'd:
 Unmov'd they lie; but, if a blast of wind
 Without, or vapors issue from behind,
 The leafs are borne aloft in liquid air, 2730
 And she resumes no more her museful care,
 Nor gathers from the rocks her scatter'd verse,
 Nor sets in order what the winds disperse.
 Thus, many not succeeding, most upbraid
 The madness of the visionary maid, 2735
 And with loud curses leave the mystic shade.
- “Think it not loss of time a while to stay,
 Tho' thy companions chide thy long delay;
 Tho' summon'd to the seas, tho' pleasing gales
 Invite thy course, and stretch thy swelling sails: 2740
 But beg the sacred priestess to relate
 With willing words, and not to write thy fate.
 The fierce Italian people she will show,
 And all thy wars, and all thy future woe,
 And what thou may'st avoid, and what must undergo. 2745
 She shall direct thy course, instruct thy mind,
 And teach thee how the happy shores to find.
 This is what Heav'n allows me to relate:
 Now part in peace; pursue thy better fate,

- And raise, by strength of arms, the Trojan state.' 2750
- "This when the priest with friendly voice declar'd,
He gave me license, and rich gifts prepar'd:
Bounteous of treasure, he supplied my want
With heavy gold, and polish'd elephant;
Then Dodonaean caldrons put on board, 2755
And ev'ry ship with sums of silver stor'd.
A trusty coat of mail to me he sent,
Thrice chain'd with gold, for use and ornament;
The helm of Pyrrhus added to the rest,
That flourish'd with a plume and waving crest. 2760
Nor was my sire forgotten, nor my friends;
And large recruits he to my navy sends:
Men, horses, captains, arms, and warlike stores;
Supplies new pilots, and new sweeping oars.
Meantime, my sire commands to hoist our sails, 2765
Lest we should lose the first auspicious gales.
- "The prophet bless'd the parting crew, and last,
With words like these, his ancient friend embrac'd:
'Old happy man, the care of gods above,
Whom heav'nly Venus honor'd with her love, 2770
And twice preserv'd thy life, when Troy was lost,
Behold from far the wish'd Ausonian coast:
There land; but take a larger compass round,
For that before is all forbidden ground.
The shore that Phoebus has design'd for you, 2775
At farther distance lies, conceal'd from view.
Go happy hence, and seek your new abodes,
Blest in a son, and favor'd by the gods:
For I with useless words prolong your stay,
When southern gales have summon'd you away.' 2780
- "Nor less the queen our parting thence deplor'd,
Nor was less bounteous than her Trojan lord.
A noble present to my son she brought,
A robe with flow'rs on golden tissue wrought,
A phrygian vest; and loads with gifts beside 2785
Of precious texture, and of Asian pride.
'Accept,' she said, 'these monuments of love,
Which in my youth with happier hands I wove:
Regard these trifles for the giver's sake;
'T is the last present Hector's wife can make. 2790
Thou call'st my lost Astyanax to mind;
In thee his features and his form I find:
His eyes so sparkled with a lively flame;
Such were his motions; such was all his frame;
And ah! had Heav'n so pleas'd, his years had been the same.' 2795
- "With tears I took my last adieu, and said:
'Your fortune, happy pair, already made,
Leaves you no farther wish. My diff'rent state,
Avoiding one, incurs another fate.
To you a quiet seat the gods allow: 2800
You have no shores to search, no seas to plow,
Nor fields of flying Italy to chase:

- (Deluding visions, and a vain embrace!)
 You see another Simois, and enjoy
 The labor of your hands, another Troy, 2805
 With better auspice than her ancient tow'rs,
 And less obnoxious to the Grecian pow'rs.
 If e'er the gods, whom I with vows adore,
 Conduct my steps to Tiber's happy shore;
 If ever I ascend the Latian throne, 2810
 And build a city I may call my own;
 As both of us our birth from Troy derive,
 So let our kindred lines in concord live,
 And both in acts of equal friendship strive.
 Our fortunes, good or bad, shall be the same: 2815
 The double Troy shall differ but in name;
 That what we now begin may never end,
 But long to late posterity descend.'
- "Near the Ceraunian rocks our course we bore;
 The shortest passage to th' Italian shore. 2820
 Now had the sun withdrawn his radiant light,
 And hills were hid in dusky shades of night:
 We land, and, on the bosom of the ground,
 A safe retreat and a bare lodging found. 2825
 Close by the shore we lay; the sailors keep
 Their watches, and the rest securely sleep.
 The night, proceeding on with silent pace,
 Stood in her noon, and view'd with equal face
 Her steepy rise and her declining race. 2830
 Then wakeful Palinurus rose, to spy
 The face of heav'n, and the nocturnal sky;
 And listen'd ev'ry breath of air to try;
 Observes the stars, and notes their sliding course,
 The Pleiads, Hyads, and their wat'ry force; 2835
 And both the Bears is careful to behold,
 And bright Orion, arm'd with burnish'd gold.
 Then, when he saw no threat'ning tempest nigh,
 But a sure promise of a settled sky,
 He gave the sign to weigh; we break our sleep,
 Forsake the pleasing shore, and plow the deep. 2840
- "And now the rising morn with rosy light
 Adorns the skies, and puts the stars to flight;
 When we from far, like bluish mists, descry
 The hills, and then the plains, of Italy. 2845
 Achates first pronounc'd the joyful sound;
 Then, 'Italy!' the cheerful crew rebound.
 My sire Anchises crown'd a cup with wine,
 And, off'ring, thus implor'd the pow'rs divine:
 'Ye gods, presiding over lands and seas, 2850
 And you who raging winds and waves appease,
 Breathe on our swelling sails a prosp'rous wind,
 And smooth our passage to the port assign'd!
 The gentle gales their flagging force renew,
 And now the happy harbor is in view. 2855
 Minerva's temple then salutes our sight,
 Plac'd, as a landmark, on the mountain's height.
 We furl our sails, and turn the prows to shore;

The curling waters round the galleys roar.
 The land lies open to the raging east,
 Then, bending like a bow, with rocks compress'd, 2860
 Shuts out the storms; the winds and waves complain,
 And vent their malice on the cliffs in vain.
 The port lies hid within; on either side
 Two tow'ring rocks the narrow mouth divide.
 The temple, which aloft we view'd before, 2865
 To distance flies, and seems to shun the shore.
 Scarce landed, the first omens I beheld
 Were four white steeds that cropp'd the flow'ry field.
 'War, war is threaten'd from this foreign ground,'
 My father cried, 'where warlike steeds are found. 2870
 Yet, since reclaim'd to chariots they submit,
 And bend to stubborn yokes, and champ the bit,
 Peace may succeed to war.' Our way we bend
 To Pallas, and the sacred hill ascend;
 There prostrate to the fierce virago pray, 2875
 Whose temple was the landmark of our way.
 Each with a Phrygian mantle veil'd his head,
 And all commands of Helenus obey'd,
 And pious rites to Grecian Juno paid.
 These dues perform'd, we stretch our sails, and stand 2880
 To sea, forsaking that suspected land.

"From hence Tarentum's bay appears in view,
 For Hercules renown'd, if fame be true.
 Just opposite, Lacinian Juno stands;
 Caulonian tow'rs, and Scylacaeon strands, 2885
 For shipwrecks fear'd. Mount Aetna thence we spy,
 Known by the smoky flames which cloud the sky.
 Far off we hear the waves with surly sound
 Invade the rocks, the rocks their groans rebound.
 The billows break upon the sounding strand, 2890
 And roll the rising tide, impure with sand.
 Then thus Anchises, in experience old:
 "T is that Charybdis which the seer foretold,
 And those the promis'd rocks! Bear off to sea!
 With haste the frighted mariners obey. 2895
 First Palinurus to the larboard veer'd;
 Then all the fleet by his example steer'd.
 To heav'n aloft on ridgy waves we ride,
 Then down to hell descend, when they divide;
 And thrice our galleys knock'd the stony ground, 2900
 And thrice the hollow rocks return'd the sound,
 And thrice we saw the stars, that stood with dews around.
 The flagging winds forsook us, with the sun;
 And, wearied, on Cyclopien shores we run.
 The port capacious, and secure from wind, 2905
 Is to the foot of thund'ring Aetna join'd.
 By turns a pitchy cloud she rolls on high;
 By turns hot embers from her entrails fly,
 And flakes of mounting flames, that lick the sky.
 Oft from her bowels massy rocks are thrown, 2910
 And, shiver'd by the force, come piecemeal down.
 Oft liquid lakes of burning sulphur flow,
 Fed from the fiery springs that boil below.

- Enceladus, they say, transfix'd by Jove,
 With blasted limbs came tumbling from above; 2915
 And, where he fell, th' avenging father drew
 This flaming hill, and on his body threw.
 As often as he turns his weary sides,
 He shakes the solid isle, and smoke the heavens hides.
 In shady woods we pass the tedious night, 2920
 Where bellowing sounds and groans our souls affright,
 Of which no cause is offer'd to the sight;
 For not one star was kindled in the sky,
 Nor could the moon her borrow'd light supply;
 For misty clouds involv'd the firmament, 2925
 The stars were muffled, and the moon was pent.
- "Scarce had the rising sun the day reveal'd,
 Scarce had his heat the pearly dews dispell'd,
 When from the woods there bolts, before our sight,
 Somewhat betwixt a mortal and a sprite, 2930
 So thin, so ghastly meager, and so wan,
 So bare of flesh, he scarce resembled man.
 This thing, all tatter'd, seem'd from far t' implore
 Our pious aid, and pointed to the shore.
 We look behind, then view his shaggy beard; 2935
 His clothes were tagg'd with thorns, and filth his limbs besmear'd;
 The rest, in mien, in habit, and in face,
 Appear'd a Greek, and such indeed he was.
 He cast on us, from far, a frightful view,
 Whom soon for Trojans and for foes he knew; 2940
 Stood still, and paus'd; then all at once began
 To stretch his limbs, and trembled as he ran.
 Soon as approach'd, upon his knees he falls,
 And thus with tears and sighs for pity calls:
 'Now, by the pow'rs above, and what we share 2945
 From Nature's common gift, this vital air,
 O Trojans, take me hence! I beg no more;
 But bear me far from this unhappy shore.
 'T is true, I am a Greek, and farther own,
 Among your foes besieg'd th' imperial town. 2950
 For such demerits if my death be due,
 No more for this abandon'd life I sue;
 This only favor let my tears obtain,
 To throw me headlong in the rapid main:
 Since nothing more than death my crime demands, 2955
 I die content, to die by human hands.'
 He said, and on his knees my knees embrac'd:
 I bade him boldly tell his fortune past,
 His present state, his lineage, and his name,
 Th' occasion of his fears, and whence he came. 2960
 The good Anchises rais'd him with his hand;
 Who, thus encourag'd, answer'd our demand:
 'From Ithaca, my native soil, I came
 To Troy; and Achaemenides my name.
 Me my poor father with Ulysses sent; 2965
 (O had I stay'd, with poverty content!)
 But, fearful for themselves, my countrymen
 Left me forsaken in the Cyclops' den.
 The cave, tho' large, was dark; the dismal floor

Was pav'd with mangled limbs and putrid gore. 2970
 Our monstrous host, of more than human size,
 Erects his head, and stares within the skies;
 Bellowing his voice, and horrid is his hue.
 Ye gods, remove this plague from mortal view!
 The joints of slaughter'd wretches are his food; 2975
 And for his wine he quaffs the streaming blood.
 These eyes beheld, when with his spacious hand
 He seiz'd two captives of our Grecian band;
 Stretch'd on his back, he dash'd against the stones
 Their broken bodies, and their crackling bones: 2980
 With spouting blood the purple pavement swims,
 While the dire glutton grinds the trembling limbs.

"Not unreveng'd Ulysses bore their fate,
 Nor thoughtless of his own unhappy state;
 For, gorg'd with flesh, and drunk with human wine 2985
 While fast asleep the giant lay supine,
 Snoring aloud, and belching from his maw
 His indigested foam, and morsels raw;
 We pray; we cast the lots, and then surround
 The monstrous body, stretch'd along the ground: 2990
 Each, as he could approach him, lends a hand
 To bore his eyeball with a flaming brand.
 Beneath his frowning forehead lay his eye;
 For only one did the vast frame supply—
 But that a globe so large, his front it fill'd, 2995
 Like the sun's disk or like a Grecian shield.
 The stroke succeeds; and down the pupil bends:
 This vengeance follow'd for our slaughter'd friends.
 But haste, unhappy wretches, haste to fly!
 Your cables cut, and on your oars rely! 3000
 Such, and so vast as Polypheme appears,
 A hundred more this hated island bears:
 Like him, in caves they shut their woolly sheep;
 Like him, their herds on tops of mountains keep;
 Like him, with mighty strides, they stalk from steep to steep 3005
 And now three moons their sharpen'd horns renew,
 Since thus, in woods and wilds, obscure from view,
 I drag my loathsome days with mortal fright,
 And in deserted caverns lodge by night;
 Oft from the rocks a dreadful prospect see 3010
 Of the huge Cyclops, like a walking tree:
 From far I hear his thund'ring voice resound,
 And trampling feet that shake the solid ground.
 Cornels and salvage berries of the wood,
 And roots and herbs, have been my meager food. 3015
 While all around my longing eyes I cast,
 I saw your happy ships appear at last.
 On those I fix'd my hopes, to these I run;
 'T is all I ask, this cruel race to shun;
 What other death you please, yourselves bestow? 3020

"Scarce had he said, when on the mountain's brow
 We saw the giant shepherd stalk before
 His following flock, and leading to the shore:
 A monstrous bulk, deform'd, depriv'd of sight;

- His staff a trunk of pine, to guide his steps aright. 3025
 His pond'rous whistle from his neck descends;
 His woolly care their pensive lord attends:
 This only solace his hard fortune sends.
 Soon as he reach'd the shore and touch'd the waves,
 From his bor'd eye the gutt'ring blood he laves: 3030
 He gnash'd his teeth, and groan'd; thro' seas he strides,
 And scarce the topmost billows touch'd his sides.
- “Seiz'd with a sudden fear, we run to sea,
 The cables cut, and silent haste away;
 The well-deserving stranger entertain; 3035
 Then, buckling to the work, our oars divide the main.
 The giant harken'd to the dashing sound:
 But, when our vessels out of reach he found,
 He strided onward, and in vain essay'd
 Th' Ionian deep, and durst no farther wade. 3040
 With that he roar'd aloud: the dreadful cry
 Shakes earth, and air, and seas; the billows fly
 Before the bellowing noise to distant Italy.
 The neigh'ring Aetna trembling all around,
 The winding caverns echo to the sound. 3045
 His brother Cyclops hear the yelling roar,
 And, rushing down the mountains, crowd the shore.
 We saw their stern distorted looks, from far,
 And one-eyed glance, that vainly threaten'd war:
 A dreadful council, with their heads on high; 3050
 (The misty clouds about their foreheads fly;)
 Not yielding to the tow'ring tree of Jove,
 Or tallest cypress of Diana's grove.
 New pangs of mortal fear our minds assail;
 We tug at ev'ry oar, and hoist up ev'ry sail, 3055
 And take th' advantage of the friendly gale.
 Forewarn'd by Helenus, we strive to shun
 Charybdis' gulf, nor dare to Scylla run.
 An equal fate on either side appears:
 We, tacking to the left, are free from fears; 3060
 For, from Pelorus' point, the North arose,
 And drove us back where swift Pantagias flows.
 His rocky mouth we pass, and make our way
 By Thapsus and Megara's winding bay.
 This passage Achaemenides had shown, 3065
 Tracing the course which he before had run.
- “Right o'er against Plemmyrium's wat'ry strand,
 There lies an isle once call'd th' Ortygian land.
 Alpheus, as old fame reports, has found
 From Greece a secret passage under ground, 3070
 By love to beauteous Arethusa led;
 And, mingling here, they roll in the same sacred bed.
 As Helenus enjoin'd, we next adore
 Diana's name, protectress of the shore.
 With prosp'rous gales we pass the quiet sounds
 Of still Elorus, and his fruitful bounds. 3075
 Then, doubling Cape Pachynus, we survey
 The rocky shore extended to the sea.
 The town of Camarine from far we see,

And fenny lake, undrain'd by fate's decree. 3080
 In sight of the Geloan fields we pass,
 And the large walls, where mighty Gela was;
 Then Agragas, with lofty summits crown'd,
 Long for the race of warlike steeds renown'd.
 We pass'd Selinus, and the palmy land, 3085
 And widely shun the Lilybaean strand,
 Unsafe, for secret rocks and moving sand.
 At length on shore the weary fleet arriv'd,
 Which Drepanum's unhappy port receiv'd.
 Here, after endless labors, often toss'd 3090
 By raging storms, and driv'n on ev'ry coast,
 My dear, dear father, spent with age, I lost:
 Ease of my cares, and solace of my pain,
 Sav'd thro' a thousand toils, but sav'd in vain
 The prophet, who my future woes reveal'd, 3095
 Yet this, the greatest and the worst, conceal'd;
 And dire Celaeno, whose foreboding skill
 Denounc'd all else, was silent of the ill.
 This my last labor was. Some friendly god
 From thence convey'd us to your blest abode." 3100

Thus, to the list'ning queen, the royal guest
 His wand'ring course and all his toils express'd;
 And here concluding, he retir'd to rest.

Book IV

But anxious cares already seiz'd the queen:
 She fed within her veins a flame unseen; 3105
 The hero's valor, acts, and birth inspire
 Her soul with love, and fan the secret fire.
 His words, his looks, imprinted in her heart,
 Improve the passion, and increase the smart.
 Now, when the purple morn had chas'd away 3110
 The dewy shadows, and restor'd the day,
 Her sister first with early care she sought,
 And thus in mournful accents eas'd her thought:

"My dearest Anna, what new dreams affright
 My lab'ring soul! what visions of the night 3115
 Disturb my quiet, and distract my breast
 With strange ideas of our Trojan guest!
 His worth, his actions, and majestic air,
 A man descended from the gods declare.
 Fear ever argues a degenerate kind; 3120
 His birth is well asserted by his mind.
 Then, what he suffer'd, when by Fate betray'd!
 What brave attempts for falling Troy he made!
 Such were his looks, so gracefully he spoke,
 That, were I not resolv'd against the yoke 3125
 Of hapless marriage, never to be curst
 With second love, so fatal was my first,
 To this one error I might yield again;
 For, since Sichaeus was untimely slain,
 This only man is able to subvert 3130
 The fix'd foundations of my stubborn heart.

- And, to confess my frailty, to my shame,
Somewhat I find within, if not the same,
Too like the sparkles of my former flame. 3135
But first let yawning earth a passage rend,
And let me thro' the dark abyss descend;
First let avenging Jove, with flames from high,
Drive down this body to the nether sky,
Condemn'd with ghosts in endless night to lie,
Before I break the plighted faith I gave! 3140
No! he who had my vows shall ever have;
For, whom I lov'd on earth, I worship in the grave."
- She said: the tears ran gushing from her eyes,
And stopp'd her speech. Her sister thus replies: 3145
"O dearer than the vital air I breathe,
Will you to grief your blooming years bequeath,
Condemn'd to waste in woes your lonely life,
Without the joys of mother or of wife?
Think you these tears, this pompous train of woe,
Are known or valued by the ghosts below? 3150
I grant that, while your sorrows yet were green,
It well became a woman, and a queen,
The vows of Tyrian princes to neglect,
To scorn Hyarbas, and his love reject,
With all the Libyan lords of mighty name; 3155
But will you fight against a pleasing flame!
This little spot of land, which Heav'n bestows,
On ev'ry side is hemm'd with warlike foes;
Gaetolian cities here are spread around,
And fierce Numidians there your frontiers bound; 3160
Here lies a barren waste of thirsty land,
And there the Syrtes raise the moving sand;
Barcaean troops besiege the narrow shore,
And from the sea Pygmalion threatens more.
Propitious Heav'n, and gracious Juno, lead 3165
This wand'ring navy to your needful aid:
How will your empire spread, your city rise,
From such a union, and with such allies?
Implore the favor of the pow'rs above,
And leave the conduct of the rest to love. 3170
Continue still your hospitable way,
And still invent occasions of their stay,
Till storms and winter winds shall cease to threat,
And planks and oars repair their shatter'd fleet."
- These words, which from a friend and sister came, 3175
With ease resolv'd the scruples of her fame,
And added fury to the kindled flame.
Inspir'd with hope, the project they pursue;
On ev'ry altar sacrifice renew:
A chosen ewe of two years old they pay 3180
To Ceres, Bacchus, and the God of Day;
Preferring Juno's pow'r, for Juno ties
The nuptial knot and makes the marriage joys.
The beauteous queen before her altar stands,
And holds the golden goblet in her hands. 3185
A milk-white heifer she with flow'rs adorns,

And pours the ruddy wine betwixt her horns;
 And, while the priests with pray'r the gods invoke,
 She feeds their altars with Sabaeen smoke,
 With hourly care the sacrifice renews, 3190
 And anxiously the panting entrails views.
 What priestly rites, alas! what pious art,
 What vows avail to cure a bleeding heart!
 A gentle fire she feeds within her veins,
 Where the soft god secure in silence reigns. 3195

Sick with desire, and seeking him she loves,
 From street to street the raving Dido roves.
 So when the watchful shepherd, from the blind,
 Wounds with a random shaft the careless hind,
 Distracted with her pain she flies the woods, 3200
 Bounds o'er the lawn, and seeks the silent floods,
 With fruitless care; for still the fatal dart
 Sticks in her side, and rankles in her heart.
 And now she leads the Trojan chief along
 The lofty walls, amidst the busy throng; 3205
 Displays her Tyrian wealth, and rising town,
 Which love, without his labor, makes his own.
 This pomp she shows, to tempt her wand'ring guest;
 Her falt'ring tongue forbids to speak the rest.
 When day declines, and feasts renew the night, 3210
 Still on his face she feeds her famish'd sight;
 She longs again to hear the prince relate
 His own adventures and the Trojan fate.
 He tells it o'er and o'er; but still in vain,
 For still she begs to hear it once again. 3215
 The hearer on the speaker's mouth depends,
 And thus the tragic story never ends.

Then, when they part, when Phoebé's paler light
 Withdraws, and falling stars to sleep invite,
 She last remains, when ev'ry guest is gone, 3220
 Sits on the bed he press'd, and sighs alone;
 Absent, her absent hero sees and hears;
 Or in her bosom young Ascanius bears,
 And seeks the father's image in the child,
 If love by likeness might be so beguil'd. 3225

Meantime the rising tow'rs are at a stand;
 No labors exercise the youthful band,
 Nor use of arts, nor toils of arms they know;
 The mole is left unfinish'd to the foe;
 The mounds, the works, the walls, neglected lie, 3230
 Short of their promis'd heighth, that seem'd to threat the sky,

But when imperial Juno, from above,
 Saw Dido fetter'd in the chains of love,
 Hot with the venom which her veins inflam'd,
 And by no sense of shame to be reclaim'd, 3235
 With soothing words to Venus she begun:
 "High praises, endless honors, you have won,
 And mighty trophies, with your worthy son!
 Two gods a silly woman have undone!

- Nor am I ignorant, you both suspect 3240
 This rising city, which my hands erect:
 But shall celestial discord never cease?
 'T is better ended in a lasting peace.
 You stand possess'd of all your soul desir'd:
 Poor Dido with consuming love is fir'd. 3245
 Your Trojan with my Tyrian let us join;
 So Dido shall be yours, Aeneas mine:
 One common kingdom, one united line.
 Eliza shall a Dardan lord obey,
 And lofty Carthage for a dow'r convey." 3250
 Then Venus, who her hidden fraud descried,
 Which would the scepter of the world misguide
 To Libyan shores, thus artfully replied:
 "Who, but a fool, would wars with Juno choose,
 And such alliance and such gifts refuse, 3255
 If Fortune with our joint desires comply?
 The doubt is all from Jove and destiny;
 Lest he forbid, with absolute command,
 To mix the people in one common land—
 Or will the Trojan and the Tyrian line 3260
 In lasting leagues and sure succession join?
 But you, the partner of his bed and throne,
 May move his mind; my wishes are your own."
- "Mine," said imperial Juno, "be the care;
 Time urges, now, to perfect this affair: 3265
 Attend my counsel, and the secret share.
 When next the Sun his rising light displays,
 And gilds the world below with purple rays,
 The queen, Aeneas, and the Tyrian court
 Shall to the shady woods, for sylvan game, resort. 3270
 There, while the huntsmen pitch their toils around,
 And cheerful horns from side to side resound,
 A pitchy cloud shall cover all the plain
 With hail, and thunder, and tempestuous rain;
 The fearful train shall take their speedy flight, 3275
 Dispers'd, and all involv'd in gloomy night;
 One cave a grateful shelter shall afford
 To the fair princess and the Trojan lord.
 I will myself the bridal bed prepare,
 If you, to bless the nuptials, will be there: 3280
 So shall their loves be crown'd with due delights,
 And Hymen shall be present at the rites."
 The Queen of Love consents, and closely smiles
 At her vain project, and discover'd wiles.
- The rosy morn was risen from the main, 3285
 And horns and hounds awake the princely train:
 They issue early thro' the city gate,
 Where the more wakeful huntsmen ready wait,
 With nets, and toils, and darts, beside the force
 Of Spartan dogs, and swift Massylian horse. 3290
 The Tyrian peers and officers of state
 For the slow queen in antechambers wait;
 Her lofty courser, in the court below,
 Who his majestic rider seems to know,

Proud of his purple trappings, paws the ground, 3295
 And champs the golden bit, and spreads the foam around.
 The queen at length appears; on either hand
 The brawny guards in martial order stand.
 A flow'rd simar with golden fringe she wore,
 And at her back a golden quiver bore; 3300
 Her flowing hair a golden caul restrains,
 A golden clasp the Tyrian robe sustains.
 Then young Ascanius, with a sprightly grace,
 Leads on the Trojan youth to view the chase.
 But far above the rest in beauty shines 3305
 The great Aeneas, the troop he joins;
 Like fair Apollo, when he leaves the frost
 Of wint'ry Xanthus, and the Lycian coast,
 When to his native Delos he resorts,
 Ordains the dances, and renews the sports; 3310
 Where painted Scythians, mix'd with Cretan bands,
 Before the joyful altars join their hands:
 Himself, on Cynthus walking, sees below
 The merry madness of the sacred show.
 Green wreaths of bays his length of hair inclose; 3315
 A golden fillet binds his awful brows;
 His quiver sounds: not less the prince is seen
 In manly presence, or in lofty mien.

Now had they reach'd the hills, and storm'd the seat
 Of salvage beasts, in dens, their last retreat. 3320
 The cry pursues the mountain goats: they bound
 From rock to rock, and keep the craggy ground;
 Quite otherwise the stags, a trembling train,
 In herds unsingled, scour the dusty plain,
 And a long chase in open view maintain. 3325
 The glad Ascanius, as his courser guides,
 Spurs thro' the vale, and these and those outrides.
 His horse's flanks and sides are forc'd to feel
 The clanking lash, and goading of the steel.
 Impatiently he views the feeble prey, 3330
 Wishing some nobler beast to cross his way,
 And rather would the tusky boar attend,
 Or see the tawny lion downward bend.

Meantime, the gath'ring clouds obscure the skies:
 From pole to pole the forky lightning flies; 3335
 The rattling thunders roll; and Juno pours
 A wintry deluge down, and sounding show'rs.
 The company, dispers'd, to converts ride,
 And seek the homely cots, or mountain's hollow side.
 The rapid rains, descending from the hills, 3340
 To rolling torrents raise the creeping rills.
 The queen and prince, as love or fortune guides,
 One common cavern in her bosom hides.
 Then first the trembling earth the signal gave,
 And flashing fires enlighten all the cave; 3345
 Hell from below, and Juno from above,
 And howling nymphs, were conscious of their love.
 From this ill-omen'd hour in time arose
 Debate and death, and all succeeding woes.

- The queen, whom sense of honor could not move, 3350
 No longer made a secret of her love,
 But call'd it marriage, by that specious name
 To veil the crime and sanctify the shame.
- The loud report thro' Libyan cities goes. 3355
 Fame, the great ill, from small beginnings grows:
 Swift from the first; and ev'ry moment brings
 New vigor to her flights, new pinions to her wings.
 Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size;
 Her feet on earth, her forehead in the skies.
 Inrag'd against the gods, revengeful Earth 3360
 Produc'd her last of the Titanian birth.
 Swift is her walk, more swift her winged haste:
 A monstrous phantom, horrible and vast.
 As many plumes as raise her lofty flight,
 So many piercing eyes inlarge her sight; 3365
 Millions of opening mouths to Fame belong,
 And ev'ry mouth is furnish'd with a tongue,
 And round with list'ning ears the flying plague is hung.
 She fills the peaceful universe with cries;
 No slumbers ever close her wakeful eyes; 3370
 By day, from lofty tow'rs her head she shews,
 And spreads thro' trembling crowds disastrous news;
 With court informers haunts, and royal spies;
 Things done relates, not done she feigns, and mingles truth with lies.
- Talk is her business, and her chief delight 3375
 To tell of prodigies and cause affright.
 She fills the people's ears with Dido's name,
 Who, lost to honor and the sense of shame,
 Admits into her throne and nuptial bed
 A wand'ring guest, who from his country fled: 3380
 Whole days with him she passes in delights,
 And wastes in luxury long winter nights,
 Forgetful of her fame and royal trust,
 Dissolv'd in ease, abandon'd to her lust.
- The goddess widely spreads the loud report, 3385
 And flies at length to King Hyarba's court.
 When first possess'd with this unwelcome news
 Whom did he not of men and gods accuse?
 This prince, from ravish'd Garamantis born,
 A hundred temples did with spoils adorn, 3390
 In Ammon's honor, his celestial sire;
 A hundred altars fed with wakeful fire;
 And, thro' his vast dominions, priests ordain'd,
 Whose watchful care these holy rites maintain'd.
 The gates and columns were with garlands crown'd, 3395
 And blood of victim beasts enrich'd the ground.
- He, when he heard a fugitive could move
 The Tyrian princess, who disdain'd his love,
 His breast with fury burn'd, his eyes with fire,
 Mad with despair, impatient with desire; 3400
 Then on the sacred altars pouring wine,
 He thus with pray'rs implor'd his sire divine:

“Great Jove! propitious to the Moorish race,
 Who feast on painted beds, with off’rings grace 3405
 Thy temples, and adore thy pow’r divine
 With blood of victims, and with sparkling wine,
 Seest thou not this? or do we fear in vain
 Thy boasted thunder, and thy thoughtless reign?
 Do thy broad hands the forky lightnings lance?
 Thine are the bolts, or the blind work of chance? 3410
 A wand’ring woman builds, within our state,
 A little town, bought at an easy rate;
 She pays me homage, and my grants allow
 A narrow space of Libyan lands to plow;
 Yet, scorning me, by passion blindly led, 3415
 Admits a banish’d Trojan to her bed!
 And now this other Paris, with his train
 Of conquer’d cowards, must in Afric reign!
 (Whom, what they are, their looks and garb confess,
 Their locks with oil perfum’d, their Lydian dress.) 3420
 He takes the spoil, enjoys the princely dame;
 And I, rejected I, adore an empty name.”

His vows, in haughty terms, he thus preferr’d,
 And held his altar’s horns. The mighty Thund’rer heard;
 Then cast his eyes on Carthage, where he found 3425
 The lustful pair in lawless pleasure drown’d,
 Lost in their loves, insensible of shame,
 And both forgetful of their better fame.
 He calls Cyllenius, and the god attends,
 By whom his menacing command he sends: 3430
 “Go, mount the western winds, and cleave the sky;
 Then, with a swift descent, to Carthage fly:
 There find the Trojan chief, who wastes his days
 In slothful riot and inglorious ease,
 Nor minds the future city, giv’n by fate. 3435
 To him this message from my mouth relate:
 ‘Not so fair Venus hop’d, when twice she won
 Thy life with pray’rs, nor promis’d such a son.
 Hers was a hero, destin’d to command
 A martial race, and rule the Latian land, 3440
 Who should his ancient line from Teucer draw,
 And on the conquer’d world impose the law.
 If glory cannot move a mind so mean,
 Nor future praise from fading pleasure wean,
 Yet why should he defraud his son of fame, 3445
 And grudge the Romans their immortal name!
 What are his vain designs! what hopes he more
 From his long ling’ring on a hostile shore,
 Regardless to redeem his honor lost,
 And for his race to gain th’ Ausonian coast! 3450
 Bid him with speed the Tyrian court forsake;
 With this command the slumb’ring warrior wake.”

Hermes obeys; with golden pinions binds
 His flying feet, and mounts the western winds:
 And, whether o’er the seas or earth he flies, 3455
 With rapid force they bear him down the skies.
 But first he grasps within his awful hand

- The mark of sov'reign pow'r, his magic wand;
 With this he draws the ghosts from hollow graves;
 With this he drives them down the Stygian waves; 3460
 With this he seals in sleep the wakeful sight,
 And eyes, tho' clos'd in death, restores to light.
 Thus arm'd, the god begins his airy race,
 And drives the racking clouds along the liquid space;
 Now sees the tops of Atlas, as he flies, 3465
 Whose brawny back supports the starry skies;
 Atlas, whose head, with piny forests crown'd,
 Is beaten by the winds, with foggy vapors bound.
 Snows hide his shoulders; from beneath his chin
 The founts of rolling streams their race begin; 3470
 A beard of ice on his large breast depends.
 Here, pois'd upon his wings, the god descends:
 Then, rested thus, he from the tow'ring height
 Plung'd downward, with precipitated flight,
 Lights on the seas, and skims along the flood. 3475
 As waterfowl, who seek their fishy food,
 Less, and yet less, to distant prospect show;
 By turns they dance aloft, and dive below:
 Like these, the steerage of his wings he plies,
 And near the surface of the water flies, 3480
 Till, having pass'd the seas, and cross'd the sands,
 He clos'd his wings, and stoop'd on Libyan lands:
 Where shepherds once were hous'd in homely sheds,
 Now tow'rs within the clouds advance their heads.
 Arriving there, he found the Trojan prince 3485
 New ramparts raising for the town's defense.
 A purple scarf, with gold embroider'd o'er,
 (Queen Dido's gift,) about his waist he wore;
 A sword, with glitt'ring gems diversified,
 For ornament, not use, hung idly by his side. 3490
- Then thus, with winged words, the god began,
 Resuming his own shape: "Degenerate man,
 Thou woman's property, what mak'st thou here,
 These foreign walls and Tyrian tow'rs to rear,
 Forgetful of thy own? All-pow'rful Jove, 3495
 Who sways the world below and heav'n above,
 Has sent me down with this severe command:
 What means thy ling'ring in the Libyan land?
 If glory cannot move a mind so mean,
 Nor future praise from flitting pleasure wean, 3500
 Regard the fortunes of thy rising heir:
 The promis'd crown let young Ascanius wear,
 To whom th' Ausonian scepter, and the state
 Of Rome's imperial name is ow'd by fate."
 So spoke the god; and, speaking, took his flight, 3505
 Involv'd in clouds, and vanish'd out of sight.
- The pious prince was seiz'd with sudden fear;
 Mute was his tongue, and upright stood his hair.
 Revolving in his mind the stern command,
 He longs to fly, and loathes the charming land. 3510
 What should he say? or how should he begin?
 What course, alas! remains to steer between

Th' offended lover and the pow'rful queen?
 This way and that he turns his anxious mind,
 And all expedients tries, and none can find. 3515
 Fix'd on the deed, but doubtful of the means,
 After long thought, to this advice he leans:
 Three chiefs he calls, commands them to repair
 The fleet, and ship their men with silent care;
 Some plausible pretense he bids them find, 3520
 To color what in secret he design'd.
 Himself, meantime, the softest hours would choose,
 Before the love-sick lady heard the news;
 And move her tender mind, by slow degrees,
 To suffer what the sov'reign pow'r decrees: 3525
 Jove will inspire him, when, and what to say.
 They hear with pleasure, and with haste obey.

But soon the queen perceives the thin disguise:
 (What arts can blind a jealous woman's eyes!)
 She was the first to find the secret fraud, 3530
 Before the fatal news was blaz'd abroad.
 Love the first motions of the lover hears,
 Quick to presage, and ev'n in safety fears.
 Nor impious Fame was wanting to report
 The ships repair'd, the Trojans' thick resort, 3535
 And purpose to forsake the Tyrian court.
 Frantic with fear, impatient of the wound,
 And impotent of mind, she roves the city round.
 Less wild the Bacchanalian dames appear,
 When, from afar, their nightly god they hear, 3540
 And howl about the hills, and shake the wreathy spear.
 At length she finds the dear perfidious man;
 Prevents his form'd excuse, and thus began:
 "Base and ungrateful! could you hope to fly,
 And undiscover'd scape a lover's eye? 3545
 Nor could my kindness your compassion move.
 Nor plighted vows, nor dearer bands of love?
 Or is the death of a despairing queen
 Not worth preventing, tho' too well foreseen?
 Ev'n when the wintry winds command your stay, 3550
 You dare the tempests, and defy the sea.
 False as you are, suppose you were not bound
 To lands unknown, and foreign coasts to sound;
 Were Troy restor'd, and Priam's happy reign,
 Now durst you tempt, for Troy, the raging main? 3555
 See whom you fly! am I the foe you shun?
 Now, by those holy vows, so late begun,
 By this right hand, (since I have nothing more
 To challenge, but the faith you gave before;)
 I beg you by these tears too truly shed, 3560
 By the new pleasures of our nuptial bed;
 If ever Dido, when you most were kind,
 Were pleasing in your eyes, or touch'd your mind;
 By these my pray'rs, if pray'rs may yet have place,
 Pity the fortunes of a falling race. 3565
 For you I have provok'd a tyrant's hate,
 Incens'd the Libyan and the Tyrian state;
 For you alone I suffer in my fame,

- Bereft of honor, and expos'd to shame.
Whom have I now to trust, ungrateful guest? 3570
(That only name remains of all the rest!)
What have I left? or whither can I fly?
Must I attend Pygmalion's cruelty,
Or till Hyarba shall in triumph lead
A queen that proudly scornd his proffer'd bed? 3575
Had you deferr'd, at least, your hasty flight,
And left behind some pledge of our delight,
Some babe to bless the mother's mournful sight,
Some young Aeneas, to supply your place,
Whose features might express his father's face; 3580
I should not then complain to live bereft
Of all my husband, or be wholly left."
- Here paus'd the queen. Unmov'd he holds his eyes,
By Jove's command; nor suffer'd love to rise,
Tho' heaving in his heart; and thus at length replies: 3585
"Fair queen, you never can enough repeat
Your boundless favors, or I own my debt;
Nor can my mind forget Eliza's name,
While vital breath inspires this mortal frame.
This only let me speak in my defense: 3590
I never hop'd a secret flight from hence,
Much less pretended to the lawful claim
Of sacred nuptials, or a husband's name.
For, if indulgent Heav'n would leave me free,
And not submit my life to fate's decree, 3595
My choice would lead me to the Trojan shore,
Those relics to review, their dust adore,
And Priam's ruin'd palace to restore.
But now the Delphian oracle commands,
And fate invites me to the Latian lands. 3600
That is the promis'd place to which I steer,
And all my vows are terminated there.
If you, a Tyrian, and a stranger born,
With walls and tow'rs a Libyan town adorn,
Why may not we—like you, a foreign race— 3605
Like you, seek shelter in a foreign place?
As often as the night obscures the skies
With humid shades, or twinkling stars arise,
Anchises' angry ghost in dreams appears,
Chides my delay, and fills my soul with fears; 3610
And young Ascanius justly may complain
Of his defrauded and destin'd reign.
Ev'n now the herald of the gods appear'd:
Waking I saw him, and his message heard.
From Jove he came commission'd, heav'nly bright 3615
With radiant beams, and manifest to sight
(The sender and the sent I both attest)
These walls he enter'd, and those words express'd.
Fair queen, oppose not what the gods command;
Forc'd by my fate, I leave your happy land." 3620
- Thus while he spoke, already she began,
With sparkling eyes, to view the guilty man;
From head to foot survey'd his person o'er,

Nor longer these outrageous threats forebore:
 “False as thou art, and, more than false, forsworn! 3625
 Not sprung from noble blood, nor goddess-born,
 But hewn from harden’d entrails of a rock!
 And rough Hyrcanian tigers gave thee suck!
 Why should I fawn? what have I worse to fear?
 Did he once look, or lent a list’ning ear, 3630
 Sigh’d when I sobb’d, or shed one kindly tear?—
 All symptoms of a base ungrateful mind,
 So foul, that, which is worse, ‘tis hard to find.
 Of man’s injustice why should I complain?
 The gods, and Jove himself, behold in vain 3635
 Triumphant treason; yet no thunder flies,
 Nor Juno views my wrongs with equal eyes;
 Faithless is earth, and faithless are the skies!
 Justice is fled, and Truth is now no more!
 I sav’d the shipwreck’d exile on my shore; 3640
 With needful food his hungry Trojans fed;
 I took the traitor to my throne and bed:
 Fool that I was—‘t is little to repeat
 The rest—I stor’d and rigg’d his ruin’d fleet.
 I rave, I rave! A god’s command he pleads, 3645
 And makes Heav’n accessory to his deeds.
 Now Lycian lots, and now the Delian god,
 Now Hermes is employ’d from Jove’s abode,
 To warn him hence; as if the peaceful state
 Of heav’nly pow’rs were touch’d with human fate! 3650
 But go! thy flight no longer I detain—
 Go seek thy promis’d kingdom thro’ the main!
 Yet, if the heav’ns will hear my pious vow,
 The faithless waves, not half so false as thou,
 Or secret sands, shall sepulchers afford 3655
 To thy proud vessels, and their perjur’d lord.
 Then shalt thou call on injur’d Dido’s name:
 Dido shall come in a black sulph’ry flame,
 When death has once dissolv’d her mortal frame;
 Shall smile to see the traitor vainly weep: 3660
 Her angry ghost, arising from the deep,
 Shall haunt thee waking, and disturb thy sleep.
 At least my shade thy punishment shall know,
 And Fame shall spread the pleasing news below.”

Abruptly here she stops; then turns away 3665
 Her loathing eyes, and shuns the sight of day.
 Amaz’d he stood, revolving in his mind
 What speech to frame, and what excuse to find.
 Her fearful maids their fainting mistress led,
 And softly laid her on her ivory bed. 3670

But good Aeneas, tho’ he much desir’d
 To give that pity which her grief requir’d;
 Tho’ much he mourn’d, and labor’d with his love,
 Resolv’d at length, obeys the will of Jove;
 Reviews his forces: they with early care 3675
 Unmoor their vessels, and for sea prepare.
 The fleet is soon afloat, in all its pride,
 And well-calk’d galleys in the harbor ride.

- Then oaks for oars they fell'd; or, as they stood,
 Of its green arms despoil'd the growing wood, 3680
 Studious of flight. The beach is cover'd o'er
 With Trojan bands, that blacken all the shore:
 On ev'ry side are seen, descending down,
 Thick swarms of soldiers, loaden from the town.
 Thus, in battalia, march embodied ants, 3685
 Fearful of winter, and of future wants,
 T' invade the corn, and to their cells convey
 The plunder'd forage of their yellow prey.
 The sable troops, along the narrow tracks,
 Scarce bear the weighty burthen on their backs: 3690
 Some set their shoulders to the pond'rous grain;
 Some guard the spoil; some lash the lagging train;
 All ply their sev'ral tasks, and equal toil sustain.
- What pangs the tender breast of Dido tore,
 When, from the tow'r, she saw the cover'd shore, 3695
 And heard the shouts of sailors from afar,
 Mix'd with the murmurs of the wat'ry war!
 All-pow'rful Love! what changes canst thou cause
 In human hearts, subjected to thy laws!
 Once more her haughty soul the tyrant bends: 3700
 To pray'rs and mean submissions she descends.
 No female arts or aids she left untried,
 Nor counsels unexplor'd, before she died.
 "Look, Anna! look! the Trojans crowd to sea;
 They spread their canvas, and their anchors weigh. 3705
 The shouting crew their ships with garlands bind,
 Invoke the sea gods, and invite the wind.
 Could I have thought this threat'ning blow so near,
 My tender soul had been forewarn'd to bear.
 But do not you my last request deny; 3710
 With yon perfidious man your int'rest try,
 And bring me news, if I must live or die.
 You are his fav'rite; you alone can find
 The dark recesses of his inmost mind: 3715
 In all his trusted secrets you have part,
 And know the soft approaches to his heart.
 Haste then, and humbly seek my haughty foe;
 Tell him, I did not with the Grecians go,
 Nor did my fleet against his friends employ, 3720
 Nor swore the ruin of unhappy Troy,
 Nor mov'd with hands profane his father's dust:
 Why should he then reject a suit so just!
 Whom does he shun, and whither would he fly!
 Can he this last, this only pray'r deny! 3725
 Let him at least his dang'rous flight delay,
 Wait better winds, and hope a calmer sea.
 The nuptials he disclaims I urge no more:
 Let him pursue the promis'd Latian shore.
 A short delay is all I ask him now;
 A pause of grief, an interval from woe, 3730
 Till my soft soul be temper'd to sustain
 Accustom'd sorrows, and inur'd to pain.
 If you in pity grant this one request,
 My death shall glut the hatred of his breast."

This mournful message pious Anna bears, 3735
 And seconds with her own her sister's tears:
 But all her arts are still employ'd in vain;
 Again she comes, and is refus'd again.
 His harden'd heart nor pray'rs nor threat'nings move;
 Fate, and the god, had stopp'd his ears to love. 3740

As, when the winds their airy quarrel try,
 Justling from ev'ry quarter of the sky,
 This way and that the mountain oak they bend,
 His boughs they shatter, and his branches rend;
 With leaves and falling mast they spread the ground; 3745
 The hollow valleys echo to the sound:
 Unmov'd, the royal plant their fury mocks,
 Or, shaken, clings more closely to the rocks;
 Far as he shoots his tow'ring head on high,
 So deep in earth his fix'd foundations lie. 3750
 No less a storm the Trojan hero bears;
 Thick messages and loud complaints he hears,
 And bandied words, still beating on his ears.
 Sighs, groans, and tears proclaim his inward pains;
 But the firm purpose of his heart remains. 3755

The wretched queen, pursued by cruel fate,
 Begins at length the light of heav'n to hate,
 And loathes to live. Then dire portents she sees,
 To hasten on the death her soul decrees:
 Strange to relate! for when, before the shrine, 3760
 She pours in sacrifice the purple wine,
 The purple wine is turn'd to putrid blood,
 And the white offer'd milk converts to mud.
 This dire presage, to her alone reveal'd,
 From all, and ev'n her sister, she conceal'd. 3765
 A marble temple stood within the grove,
 Sacred to death, and to her murder'd love;
 That honor'd chapel she had hung around
 With snowy fleeces, and with garlands crown'd:
 Oft, when she visited this lonely dome, 3770
 Strange voices issued from her husband's tomb;
 She thought she heard him summon her away,
 Invite her to his grave, and chide her stay.
 Hourly 't is heard, when with a boding note
 The solitary screech owl strains her throat, 3775
 And, on a chimney's top, or turret's height,
 With songs obscene disturbs the silence of the night.
 Besides, old prophecies augment her fears;
 And stern Aeneas in her dreams appears,
 Disdainful as by day: she seems, alone, 3780
 To wander in her sleep, thro' ways unknown,
 Guideless and dark; or, in a desert plain,
 To seek her subjects, and to seek in vain:
 Like Pentheus, when, distracted with his fear,
 He saw two suns, and double Thebes, appear; 3785
 Or mad Orestes, when his mother's ghost
 Full in his face infernal torches toss'd,
 And shook her snaky locks: he shuns the sight,
 Flies o'er the stage, surpris'd with mortal fright;
 The Furies guard the door and intercept his flight. 3790

- Now, sinking underneath a load of grief,
 From death alone she seeks her last relief;
 The time and means resolv'd within her breast,
 She to her mournful sister thus address'd
 (Dissembling hope, her cloudy front she clears,
 And a false vigor in her eyes appears):
 "Rejoice!" she said. "Instructed from above,
 My lover I shall gain, or lose my love.
 Nigh rising Atlas, next the falling sun,
 Long tracts of Ethiopian climates run:
 There a Massylian priestess I have found,
 Honor'd for age, for magic arts renown'd:
 Th' Hesperian temple was her trusted care;
 'T was she supplied the wakeful dragon's fare.
 She poppy seeds in honey taught to steep,
 Reclaim'd his rage, and sooth'd him into sleep.
 She watch'd the golden fruit; her charms unbind
 The chains of love, or fix them on the mind:
 She stops the torrents, leaves the channel dry,
 Repels the stars, and backward bears the sky.
 The yawning earth rebellows to her call,
 Pale ghosts ascend, and mountain ashes fall.
 Witness, ye gods, and thou my better part,
 How loth I am to try this impious art!
 Within the secret court, with silent care,
 Erect a lofty pile, expos'd in air:
 Hang on the topmost part the Trojan vest,
 Spoils, arms, and presents, of my faithless guest.
 Next, under these, the bridal bed be plac'd,
 Where I my ruin in his arms embrac'd:
 All relics of the wretch are doom'd to fire;
 For so the priestess and her charms require."
- Thus far she said, and farther speech forbears;
 A mortal paleness in her face appears:
 Yet the mistrustless Anna could not find
 The secret fun'ral in these rites design'd;
 Nor thought so dire a rage possess'd her mind.
 Unknowing of a train conceal'd so well,
 She fear'd no worse than when Sichaeus fell;
 Therefore obeys. The fatal pile they rear,
 Within the secret court, expos'd in air.
 The cloven holms and pines are heap'd on high,
 And garlands on the hollow spaces lie.
 Sad cypress, vervain, yew, compose the wreath,
 And ev'ry baleful green denoting death.
 The queen, determin'd to the fatal deed,
 The spoils and sword he left, in order spread,
 And the man's image on the nuptial bed.
- And now (the sacred altars plac'd around)
 The priestess enters, with her hair unbound,
 And thrice invokes the pow'rs below the ground.
 Night, Erebus, and Chaos she proclaims,
 And threefold Hecate, with her hundred names,
 And three Dianas: next, she sprinkles round
 With feign'd Avernian drops the hallow'd ground;

Culls hoary simples, found by Phoebé's light,
 With brazen sickles reap'd at noon of night;
 Then mixes baleful juices in the bowl,
 And cuts the forehead of a newborn foal,
 Robbing the mother's love. The destin'd queen 3850
 Observes, assisting at the rites obscene;
 A leaven'd cake in her devoted hands
 She holds, and next the highest altar stands:
 One tender foot was shod, her other bare;
 Girt was her gather'd gown, and loose her hair. 3855
 Thus dress'd, she summon'd, with her dying breath,
 The heav'n's and planets conscious of her death,
 And ev'ry pow'r, if any rules above,
 Who minds, or who revenges, injur'd love.

'T was dead of night, when weary bodies close 3860
 Their eyes in balmy sleep and soft repose:
 The winds no longer whisper thro' the woods,
 Nor murm'ring tides disturb the gentle floods.
 The stars in silent order mov'd around;
 And Peace, with downy wings, was brooding on the ground 3865
 The flocks and herds, and party-color'd fowl,
 Which haunt the woods, or swim the weedy pool,
 Stretch'd on the quiet earth, securely lay,
 Forgetting the past labors of the day.
 All else of nature's common gift partake: 3870
 Unhappy Dido was alone awake.
 Nor sleep nor ease the furious queen can find;
 Sleep fled her eyes, as quiet fled her mind.
 Despair, and rage, and love divide her heart;
 Despair and rage had some, but love the greater part. 3875

Then thus she said within her secret mind:
 "What shall I do? what succor can I find?
 Become a suppliant to Hyarba's pride,
 And take my turn, to court and be denied?
 Shall I with this ungrateful Trojan go, 3880
 Forsake an empire, and attend a foe?
 Himself I refug'd, and his train reliev'd—
 'T is true—but am I sure to be receiv'd?
 Can gratitude in Trojan souls have place!
 Laomedon still lives in all his race! 3885
 Then, shall I seek alone the churlish crew,
 Or with my fleet their flying sails pursue?
 What force have I but those whom scarce before
 I drew reluctant from their native shore?
 Will they again embark at my desire, 3890
 Once more sustain the seas, and quit their second Tyre?
 Rather with steel thy guilty breast invade,
 And take the fortune thou thyself hast made.
 Your pity, sister, first seduc'd my mind,
 Or seconded too well what I design'd. 3895
 These dear-bought pleasures had I never known,
 Had I continued free, and still my own;
 Avoiding love, I had not found despair,
 But shar'd with salvage beasts the common air.
 Like them, a lonely life I might have led, 3900

- Not mourn'd the living, nor disturb'd the dead."
 These thoughts she brooded in her anxious breast.
 On board, the Trojan found more easy rest.
 Resolv'd to sail, in sleep he pass'd the night;
 And order'd all things for his early flight. 3905
- To whom once more the winged god appears;
 His former youthful mien and shape he wears,
 And with this new alarm invades his ears:
 "Sleep'st thou, O goddess-born! and canst thou drown
 Thy needful cares, so near a hostile town, 3910
 Beset with foes; nor hear'st the western gales
 Invite thy passage, and inspire thy sails?
 She harbors in her heart a furious hate,
 And thou shalt find the dire effects too late;
 Fix'd on revenge, and obstinate to die. 3915
 Haste swiftly hence, while thou hast pow'r to fly.
 The sea with ships will soon be cover'd o'er,
 And blazing firebrands kindle all the shore.
 Prevent her rage, while night obscures the skies,
 And sail before the purple morn arise. 3920
 Who knows what hazards thy delay may bring?
 Woman's a various and a changeful thing."
 Thus Hermes in the dream; then took his flight
 Aloft in air unseen, and mix'd with night.
- Twice warn'd by the celestial messenger, 3925
 The pious prince arose with hasty fear;
 Then rous'd his drowsy train without delay:
 "Haste to your banks; your crooked anchors weigh,
 And spread your flying sails, and stand to sea.
 A god commands: he stood before my sight, 3930
 And urg'd us once again to speedy flight.
 O sacred pow'r, what pow'r soe'er thou art,
 To thy blest orders I resign my heart.
 Lead thou the way; protect thy Trojan bands,
 And prosper the design thy will commands." 3935
 He said: and, drawing forth his flaming sword,
 His thund'ring arm divides the many-twisted cord.
 An emulating zeal inspires his train:
 They run; they snatch; they rush into the main.
 With headlong haste they leave the desert shores, 3940
 And brush the liquid seas with lab'ring oars.
- Aurora now had left her saffron bed,
 And beams of early light the heav'ns o'erspread,
 When, from a tow'r, the queen, with wakeful eyes,
 Saw day point upward from the rosy skies. 3945
 She look'd to seaward; but the sea was void,
 And scarce in ken the sailing ships descried.
 Stung with despite, and furious with despair,
 She struck her trembling breast, and tore her hair.
 "And shall th' ungrateful traitor go," she said, 3950
 "My land forsaken, and my love betray'd?
 Shall we not arm? not rush from ev'ry street,
 To follow, sink, and burn his perjur'd fleet?
 Haste, haul my galleys out! pursue the foe!

Bring flaming brands! set sail, and swiftly row! 3955
 What have I said? where am I? Fury turns
 My brain; and my distemper'd bosom burns.
 Then, when I gave my person and my throne,
 This hate, this rage, had been more timely shown.
 See now the promis'd faith, the vaunted name, 3960
 The pious man, who, rushing thro' the flame,
 Preserv'd his gods, and to the Phrygian shore
 The burthen of his feeble father bore!
 I should have torn him piecemeal; strow'd in floods
 His scatter'd limbs, or left expos'd in woods; 3965
 Destroy'd his friends and son; and, from the fire,
 Have set the reeking boy before the sire.
 Events are doubtful, which on battles wait:
 Yet where's the doubt, to souls secure of fate?
 My Tyrians, at their injur'd queen's command, 3970
 Had toss'd their fires amid the Trojan band;
 At once extinguish'd all the faithless name;
 And I myself, in vengeance of my shame,
 Had fall'n upon the pile, to mend the fun'ral flame.
 Thou Sun, who view'st at once the world below; 3975
 Thou Juno, guardian of the nuptial vow;
 Thou Hecate hearken from thy dark abodes!
 Ye Furies, fiends, and violated gods,
 All pow'rs invok'd with Dido's dying breath,
 Attend her curses and avenge her death! 3980
 If so the Fates ordain, Jove commands,
 Th' ungrateful wretch should find the Latian lands,
 Yet let a race untam'd, and haughty foes,
 His peaceful entrance with dire arms oppose:
 Oppress'd with numbers in th' unequal field, 3985
 His men discourag'd, and himself expell'd,
 Let him for succor sue from place to place,
 Torn from his subjects, and his son's embrace.
 First, let him see his friends in battle slain,
 And their untimely fate lament in vain; 3990
 And when, at length, the cruel war shall cease,
 On hard conditions may he buy his peace:
 Nor let him then enjoy supreme command;
 But fall, untimely, by some hostile hand,
 And lie unburied on the barren sand! 3995
 These are my pray'rs, and this my dying will;
 And you, my Tyrians, ev'ry curse fulfil.
 Perpetual hate and mortal wars proclaim,
 Against the prince, the people, and the name.
 These grateful off'rings on my grave bestow; 4000
 Nor league, nor love, the hostile nations know!
 Now, and from hence, in ev'ry future age,
 When rage excites your arms, and strength supplies the rage
 Rise some avenger of our Libyan blood,
 With fire and sword pursue the perjur'd brood; 4005
 Our arms, our seas, our shores, oppos'd to theirs;
 And the same hate descend on all our heirs!"

This said, within her anxious mind she weighs
 The means of cutting short her odious days.
 Then to Sichaes' nurse she briefly said 4010

(For, when she left her country, hers was dead):

“Go, Barce, call my sister. Let her care
The solemn rites of sacrifice prepare;
The sheep, and all th’ atoning off’rings bring, 4015
Sprinkling her body from the crystal spring
With living drops; then let her come, and thou
With sacred fillets bind thy hoary brow.
Thus will I pay my vows to Stygian Jove,
And end the cares of my disastrous love;
Then cast the Trojan image on the fire, 4020
And, as that burns, my passions shall expire.”

The nurse moves onward, with officious care,
And all the speed her aged limbs can bear.
But furious Dido, with dark thoughts involv’d,
Shook at the mighty mischief she resolv’d. 4025
With livid spots distinguish’d was her face;
Red were her rolling eyes, and discompos’d her pace;
Ghastly she gaz’d, with pain she drew her breath,
And nature shiver’d at approaching death.

Then swiftly to the fatal place she pass’d, 4030
And mounts the fun’ral pile with furious haste;
Unsheathes the sword the Trojan left behind
(Not for so dire an enterprise design’d).

But when she view’d the garments loosely spread,
Which once he wore, and saw the conscious bed, 4035
She paus’d, and with a sigh the robes embrac’d;
Then on the couch her trembling body cast,
Repress’d the ready tears, and spoke her last:

“Dear pledges of my love, while Heav’n so pleas’d,
Receive a soul, of mortal anguish eas’d: 4040

My fatal course is finish’d; and I go,
A glorious name, among the ghosts below.
A lofty city by my hands is rais’d,
Pygmalion punish’d, and my lord appeas’d. 4045

What could my fortune have afforded more,
Had the false Trojan never touch’d my shore!”

Then kiss’d the couch; and, “Must I die,” she said,
“And unreveng’d? ‘T is doubly to be dead!

Yet ev’n this death with pleasure I receive:
On any terms, ‘t is better than to live. 4050

These flames, from far, may the false Trojan view;
These boding omens his base flight pursue!”

She said, and struck; deep enter’d in her side
The piercing steel, with reeking purple dyed: 4055

Clogg’d in the wound the cruel weapon stands;
The spouting blood came streaming on her hands.

Her sad attendants saw the deadly stroke,
And with loud cries the sounding palace shook.

Distracted, from the fatal sight they fled,
And thro’ the town the dismal rumor spread. 4060

First from the frighted court the yell began;
Redoubled, thence from house to house it ran:
The groans of men, with shrieks, laments, and cries
Of mixing women, mount the vaulted skies.

Not less the clamor, than if—ancient Tyre, 4065
 Or the new Carthage, set by foes on fire—
 The rolling ruin, with their lov'd abodes,
 Involv'd the blazing temples of their gods.

Her sister hears; and, furious with despair,
 She beats her breast, and rends her yellow hair, 4070
 And, calling on Eliza's name aloud,
 Runs breathless to the place, and breaks the crowd.

“Was all that pomp of woe for this prepar'd;
 These fires, this fun'ral pile, these altars rear'd?
 Was all this train of plots contriv'd,” said she, 4075
 “All only to deceive unhappy me?

Which is the worst? Didst thou in death pretend
 To scorn thy sister, or delude thy friend?
 Thy summon'd sister, and thy friend, had come;
 One sword had serv'd us both, one common tomb: 4080
 Was I to raise the pile, the pow'rs invoke,
 Not to be present at the fatal stroke?

At once thou hast destroy'd thyself and me,
 Thy town, thy senate, and thy colony!
 Bring water; bathe the wound; while I in death 4085
 Lay close my lips to hers, and catch the flying breath.”

This said, she mounts the pile with eager haste,
 And in her arms the gasping queen embrac'd;
 Her temples chaf'd; and her own garments tore,
 To stanch the streaming blood, and cleanse the gore. 4090
 Thrice Dido tried to raise her drooping head,
 And, fainting thrice, fell grov'ling on the bed;

Thrice op'd her heavy eyes, and sought the light,
 But, having found it, sicken'd at the sight,
 And clos'd her lids at last in endless night. 4095

Then Juno, grieving that she should sustain
 A death so ling'ring, and so full of pain,
 Sent Iris down, to free her from the strife
 Of lab'ring nature, and dissolve her life.

For since she died, not doom'd by Heav'n's decree, 4100
 Or her own crime, but human casualty,
 And rage of love, that plung'd her in despair,
 The Sisters had not cut the topmost hair,
 Which Proserpine and they can only know;

Nor made her sacred to the shades below. 4105
 Downward the various goddess took her flight,
 And drew a thousand colors from the light;
 Then stood above the dying lover's head,
 And said: “I thus devote thee to the dead.

This off'ring to th' infernal gods I bear.” 4110
 Thus while she spoke, she cut the fatal hair:
 The struggling soul was loos'd, and life dissolv'd in air.

Book V

Meantime the Trojan cuts his wat'ry way,
 Fix'd on his voyage, thro' the curling sea;
 Then, casting back his eyes, with dire amaze, 4115
 Sees on the Punic shore the mounting blaze.

The cause unknown; yet his presaging mind
 The fate of Dido from the fire divin'd;
 He knew the stormy souls of womankind,
 What secret springs their eager passions move, 4120
 How capable of death for injur'd love.
 Dire auguries from hence the Trojans draw;
 Till neither fires nor shining shores they saw.
 Now seas and skies their prospect only bound;
 An empty space above, a floating field around. 4125
 But soon the heav'ns with shadows were o'erspread;
 A swelling cloud hung hov'ring o'er their head:
 Livid it look'd, the threat'ning of a storm:
 Then night and horror ocean's face deform.
 The pilot, Palinurus, cried aloud: 4130
 "What gusts of weather from that gath'ring cloud
 My thoughts presage! Ere yet the tempest roars,
 Stand to your tackle, mates, and stretch your oars;
 Contract your swelling sails, and luff to wind."
 The frightened crew perform the task assign'd. 4135
 Then, to his fearless chief: "Not Heav'n," said he,
 "Tho' Jove himself should promise Italy,
 Can stem the torrent of this raging sea.
 Mark how the shifting winds from west arise,
 And what collected night involves the skies! 4140
 Nor can our shaken vessels live at sea,
 Much less against the tempest force their way.
 'T is fate diverts our course, and fate we must obey.
 Not far from hence, if I observ'd aright
 The southing of the stars, and polar light, 4145
 Sicilia lies, whose hospitable shores
 In safety we may reach with struggling oars."
 Aeneas then replied: "Too sure I find
 We strive in vain against the seas and wind:
 Now shift your sails; what place can please me more 4150
 Than what you promise, the Sicilian shore,
 Whose hallow'd earth Anchises' bones contains,
 And where a prince of Trojan lineage reigns?"
 The course resolv'd, before the western wind
 They scud amain, and make the port assign'd. 4155
 Meantime Acestes, from a lofty stand,
 Beheld the fleet descending on the land;
 And, not unmindful of his ancient race,
 Down from the cliff he ran with eager pace,
 And held the hero in a strict embrace. 4160
 Of a rough Libyan bear the spoils he wore,
 And either hand a pointed jav'lin bore.
 His mother was a dame of Dardan blood;
 His sire Criniscus, a Sicilian flood.
 He welcomes his returning friends ashore 4165
 With plenteous country cates and homely store.

Now, when the following morn had chas'd away
 The flying stars, and light restor'd the day,
 Aeneas call'd the Trojan troops around,
 And thus bespoke them from a rising ground: 4170
 "Offspring of heav'n, divine Dardanian race!
 The sun, revolving thro' th' ethereal space,

The shining circle of the year has fill'd,
 Since first this isle my father's ashes held: 4175
 And now the rising day renews the year;
 A day for ever sad, for ever dear.
 This would I celebrate with annual games,
 With gifts on altars pil'd, and holy flames,
 Tho' banish'd to Gaetulia's barren sands,
 Caught on the Grecian seas, or hostile lands: 4180
 But since this happy storm our fleet has driv'n
 (Not, as I deem, without the will of Heav'n)
 Upon these friendly shores and flow'ry plains,
 Which hide Anchises and his blest remains,
 Let us with joy perform his honors due, 4185
 And pray for prosp'rous winds, our voyage to renew;
 Pray, that in towns and temples of our own,
 The name of great Anchises may be known,
 And yearly games may spread the gods' renown. 4190
 Our sports Acestes, of the Trojan race,
 With royal gifts ordain'd, is pleas'd to grace:
 Two steers on ev'ry ship the king bestows;
 His gods and ours shall share your equal vows.
 Besides, if, nine days hence, the rosy morn
 Shall with unclouded light the skies adorn, 4195
 That day with solemn sports I mean to grace:
 Light galleys on the seas shall run a wat'ry race;
 Some shall in swiftness for the goal contend,
 And others try the twanging bow to bend;
 The strong, with iron gauntlets arm'd, shall stand 4200
 Oppos'd in combat on the yellow sand.
 Let all be present at the games prepar'd,
 And joyful victors wait the just reward.
 But now assist the rites, with garlands crown'd."
 He said, and first his brows with myrtle bound. 4205
 Then Helymus, by his example led,
 And old Acestes, each adorn'd his head;
 Thus young Ascanius, with a sprightly grace,
 His temples tied, and all the Trojan race. 4210
 Aeneas then advanc'd amidst the train,
 By thousands follow'd thro' the flow'ry plain,
 To great Anchises' tomb; which when he found,
 He pour'd to Bacchus, on the hallow'd ground,
 Two bowls of sparkling wine, of milk two more, 4215
 And two (from offer'd bulls) of purple gore,
 With roses then the sepulcher he strow'd
 And thus his father's ghost bespoke aloud:
 "Hail, O ye holy manes! hail again,
 Paternal ashes, now review'd in vain! 4220
 The gods permitted not, that you, with me,
 Should reach the promis'd shores of Italy,
 Or Tiber's flood, what flood soe'er it be."
 Scarce had he finish'd, when, with speckled pride,
 A serpent from the tomb began to glide;
 His huge bulk on sev'n high volumes roll'd; 4225
 Blue was his breadth of back, but streak'd with scaly gold:
 Thus riding on his curls, he seem'd to pass
 A rolling fire along, and singe the grass.
 More various colors thro' his body run,

- Than Iris when her bow imbibes the sun. 4230
 Betwixt the rising altars, and around,
 The sacred monster shot along the ground;
 With harmless play amidst the bowls he pass'd,
 And with his lolling tongue assay'd the taste:
 Thus fed with holy food, the wondrous guest 4235
 Within the hollow tomb retir'd to rest.
 The pious prince, surpris'd at what he view'd,
 The fun'ral honors with more zeal renew'd,
 Doubtful if this place's genius were,
 Or guardian of his father's sepulcher. 4240
 Five sheep, according to the rites, he slew;
 As many swine, and steers of sable hue;
 New gen'rous wine he from the goblets pour'd.
 And call'd his father's ghost, from hell restor'd.
 The glad attendants in long order come, 4245
 Off'ring their gifts at great Anchises' tomb:
 Some add more oxen: some divide the spoil;
 Some place the chargers on the grassy soil;
 Some blow the fires, and offered entrails broil.
- Now came the day desir'd. The skies were bright 4250
 With rosy luster of the rising light:
 The bord'ring people, rous'd by sounding fame
 Of Trojan feasts and great Acestes' name,
 The crowded shore with acclamations fill,
 Part to behold, and part to prove their skill. 4255
 And first the gifts in public view they place,
 Green laurel wreaths, and palm, the victors' grace:
 Within the circle, arms and tripods lie,
 Ingots of gold and silver, heap'd on high,
 And vests embroider'd, of the Tyrian dye. 4260
 The trumpet's clangor then the feast proclaims,
 And all prepare for their appointed games.
 Four galleys first, which equal rowers bear,
 Advancing, in the wat'ry lists appear.
 The speedy Dolphin, that outstrips the wind, 4265
 Bore Mnestheus, author of the Memmian kind:
 Gyas the vast Chimaera's bulk commands,
 Which rising, like a tow'ring city stands;
 Three Trojans tug at ev'ry lab'ring oar;
 Three banks in three degrees the sailors bore; 4270
 Beneath their sturdy strokes the billows roar.
 Sergesthus, who began the Sergian race,
 In the great Centaur took the leading place;
 Cloanthus on the sea-green Scylla stood,
 From whom Cluentius draws his Trojan blood. 4275
- Far in the sea, against the foaming shore,
 There stands a rock: the raging billows roar
 Above his head in storms; but, when 't is clear,
 Uncurl their ridgy backs, and at his foot appear.
 In peace below the gentle waters run; 4280
 The cormorants above lie basking in the sun.
 On this the hero fix'd an oak in sight,
 The mark to guide the mariners aright.
 To bear with this, the seamen stretch their oars;

Then round the rock they steer, and seek the former shores. 4285
 The lots decide their place. Above the rest,
 Each leader shining in his Tyrian vest;
 The common crew with wreaths of poplar boughs
 Their temples crown, and shade their sweaty brows:
 Besmear'd with oil, their naked shoulders shine. 4290
 All take their seats, and wait the sounding sign:
 They gripe their oars; and ev'ry panting breast
 Is rais'd by turns with hope, by turns with fear depress'd.
 The clangor of the trumpet gives the sign;
 At once they start, advancing in a line: 4295
 With shouts the sailors rend the starry skies;
 Lash'd with their oars, the smoky billows rise;
 Sparkles the briny main, and the vex'd ocean fries.
 Exact in time, with equal strokes they row:
 At once the brushing oars and brazen prow 4300
 Dash up the sandy waves, and ope the depths below.
 Not fiery coursers, in a chariot race,
 Invade the field with half so swift a pace;
 Not the fierce driver with more fury lends
 The sounding lash, and, ere the stroke descends, 4305
 Low to the wheels his pliant body bends.
 The partial crowd their hopes and fears divide,
 And aid with eager shouts the favor'd side.
 Cries, murmurs, clamors, with a mixing sound,
 From woods to woods, from hills to hills rebound. 4310

Amidst the loud applauses of the shore,
 Gyas outstripp'd the rest, and sprung before:
 Cloanthus, better mann'd, pursued him fast,
 But his o'er-masted galley check'd his haste. 4315
 The Centaur and the Dolphin brush the brine
 With equal oars, advancing in a line;
 And now the mighty Centaur seems to lead,
 And now the speedy Dolphin gets ahead;
 Now board to board the rival vessels row,
 The billows lave the skies, and ocean groans below. 4320
 They reach'd the mark. Proud Gyas and his train
 In triumph rode, the victors of the main;
 But, steering round, he charg'd his pilot stand
 More close to shore, and skim along the sand—
 "Let others bear to sea!" Menoetes heard; 4325
 But secret shelves too cautiously he fear'd,
 And, fearing, sought the deep; and still aloof he steer'd.
 With louder cries the captain call'd again:
 "Bear to the rocky shore, and shun the main."
 He spoke, and, speaking, at his stern he saw 4330
 The bold Cloanthus near the shelvings draw.
 Betwixt the mark and him the Scylla stood,
 And in a closer compass plow'd the flood.
 He pass'd the mark; and, wheeling, got before:
 Gyas blasphem'd the gods, devoutly swore, 4335
 Cried out for anger, and his hair he tore.
 Mindless of others' lives (so high was grown
 His rising rage) and careless of his own,
 The trembling dotard to the deck he drew;
 Then hoisted up, and overboard he threw: 4340

This done, he seiz'd the helm; his fellows cheer'd,
Turn'd short upon the shelves, and madly steer'd.

Hardly his head the plunging pilot rears,
Clogg'd with his clothes, and cumber'd with his years:
Now dropping wet, he climbs the cliff with pain. 4345
The crowd, that saw him fall and float again,
Shout from the distant shore; and loudly laugh'd,
To see his heaving breast disgorge the briny draught.
The following Centaur, and the Dolphin's crew,
Their vanish'd hopes of victory renew; 4350
While Gyas lags, they kindle in the race,
To reach the mark. Sergesthus takes the place;
Mnestheus pursues; and while around they wind,
Comes up, not half his galley's length behind;
Then, on the deck, amidst his mates appear'd, 4355
And thus their drooping courage he cheer'd:
"My friends, and Hector's followers heretofore,
Exert your vigor; tug the lab'ring oar;
Stretch to your strokes, my still unconquer'd crew,
Whom from the flaming walls of Troy I drew. 4360
In this, our common int'rest, let me find
That strength of hand, that courage of the mind,
As when you stemm'd the strong Malean flood,
And o'er the Syrtes' broken billows row'd.
I seek not now the foremost palm to gain; 4365
Tho' yet—but, ah! that haughty wish is vain!
Let those enjoy it whom the gods ordain.
But to be last, the lags of all the race!—
Redeem yourselves and me from that disgrace."
Now, one and all, they tug amain; they row 4370
At the full stretch, and shake the brazen prow.
The sea beneath 'em sinks; their lab'ring sides
Are swell'd, and sweat runs gutt'ring down in tides.
Chance aids their daring with unhop'd success;
Sergesthus, eager with his beak to press 4375
Betwixt the rival galley and the rock,
Shuts up th' unwieldy Centaur in the lock.
The vessel struck; and, with the dreadful shock,
Her oars she shiver'd, and her head she broke.
The trembling rowers from their banks arise, 4380
And, anxious for themselves, renounce the prize.
With iron poles they heave her off the shores,
And gather from the sea their floating oars.
The crew of Mnestheus, with elated minds,
Urge their success, and call the willing winds; 4385
Then ply their oars, and cut their liquid way
In larger compass on the roomy sea.
As, when the dove her rocky hold forsakes,
Rous'd in a fright, her sounding wings she shakes;
The cavern rings with clatt'ring; out she flies, 4390
And leaves her callow care, and cleaves the skies:
At first she flutters; but at length she springs
To smoother flight, and shoots upon her wings:
So Mnestheus in the Dolphin cuts the sea;
And, flying with a force, that force assists his way. 4395
Sergesthus in the Centaur soon he pass'd,

Wedg'd in the rocky shoals, and sticking fast.
 In vain the victor he with cries implores,
 And practices to row with shatter'd oars. 4400
 Then Mnestheus bears with Gyas, and outflies:
 The ship, without a pilot, yields the prize.
 Unvanquish'd Scylla now alone remains;
 Her he pursues, and all his vigor strains.
 Shouts from the fav'ring multitude arise;
 Applauding Echo to the shouts replies; 4405
 Shouts, wishes, and applause run rattling thro' the skies.
 These clamors with disdain the Scylla heard,
 Much grudg'd the praise, but more the robb'd reward:
 Resolv'd to hold their own, they mend their pace,
 All obstinate to die, or gain the race. 4410
 Rais'd with success, the Dolphin swiftly ran;
 For they can conquer, who believe they can.
 Both urge their oars, and fortune both supplies,
 And both perhaps had shar'd an equal prize;
 When to the seas Cloanthus holds his hands, 4415
 And succor from the wat'ry pow'rs demands:
 "Gods of the liquid realms, on which I row!
 If, giv'n by you, the laurel bind my brow,
 Assist to make me guilty of my vow!
 A snow-white bull shall on your shore be slain; 4420
 His offer'd entrails cast into the main,
 And ruddy wine, from golden goblets thrown,
 Your grateful gift and my return shall own."
 The choir of nymphs, and Phorcus, from below,
 With virgin Panopea, heard his vow; 4425
 And old Portunus, with his breadth of hand,
 Push'd on, and sped the galley to the land.
 Swift as a shaft, or winged wind, she flies,
 And, darting to the port, obtains the prize.

The herald summons all, and then proclaims 4430
 Cloanthus conqu'ror of the naval games.
 The prince with laurel crowns the victor's head,
 And three fat steers are to his vessel led,
 The ship's reward; with gen'rous wine beside,
 And sums of silver, which the crew divide. 4435
 The leaders are distinguish'd from the rest;
 The victor honor'd with a nobler vest,
 Where gold and purple strive in equal rows,
 And needlework its happy cost bestows.
 There Ganymede is wrought with living art, 4440
 Chasing thro' Ida's groves the trembling hart:
 Breathless he seems, yet eager to pursue;
 When from aloft descends, in open view,
 The bird of Jove, and, sousing on his prey,
 With crooked talons bears the boy away. 4445
 In vain, with lifted hands and gazing eyes,
 His guards behold him soaring thro' the skies,
 And dogs pursue his flight with imitated cries.

Mnestheus the second victor was declar'd;
 And, summon'd there, the second prize he shard. 4450
 A coat of mail, brave Demoleus bore,

- More brave Aeneas from his shoulders tore,
 In single combat on the Trojan shore:
 This was ordain'd for Mnestheus to possess;
 In war for his defense, for ornament in peace. 4455
 Rich was the gift, and glorious to behold,
 But yet so pond'rous with its plates of gold,
 That scarce two servants could the weight sustain;
 Yet, loaded thus, Demoleus o'er the plain
 Pursued and lightly seiz'd the Trojan train. 4460
 The third, succeeding to the last reward,
 Two goodly bowls of massy silver shar'd,
 With figures prominent, and richly wrought,
 And two brass caldrons from Dodona brought.
- Thus all, rewarded by the hero's hands, 4465
 Their conqu'ring temples bound with purple bands;
 And now Sergesthus, clearing from the rock,
 Brought back his galley shatter'd with the shock.
 Forlorn she look'd, without an aiding oar,
 And, houted by the vulgar, made to shore. 4470
 As when a snake, surpris'd upon the road,
 Is crush'd athwart her body by the load
 Of heavy wheels; or with a mortal wound
 Her belly bruis'd, and trodden to the ground:
 In vain, with loosen'd curls, she crawls along; 4475
 Yet, fierce above, she brandishes her tongue;
 Glares with her eyes, and bristles with her scales;
 But, groveling in the dust, her parts unsound she trails:
 So slowly to the port the Centaur tends,
 But, what she wants in oars, with sails amends. 4480
 Yet, for his galley sav'd, the grateful prince
 Is pleas'd th' unhappy chief to recompense.
 Pholoe, the Cretan slave, rewards his care,
 Beauteous herself, with lovely twins as fair.
- From thence his way the Trojan hero bent 4485
 Into the neighb'ring plain, with mountains pent,
 Whose sides were shaded with surrounding wood.
 Full in the midst of this fair valley stood
 A native theater, which, rising slow
 By just degrees, o'erlook'd the ground below. 4490
 High on a sylvan throne the leader sate;
 A num'rous train attend in solemn state.
 Here those that in the rapid course delight,
 Desire of honor and the prize invite.
 The rival runners without order stand; 4495
 The Trojans mix'd with the Sicilian band.
 First Nisus, with Euryalus, appears;
 Euryalus a boy of blooming years,
 With sprightly grace and equal beauty crown'd;
 Nisus, for friendship to the youth renown'd. 4500
 Diores next, of Priam's royal race,
 Then Salius joined with Patron, took their place;
 (But Patron in Arcadia had his birth,
 And Salius his from Arcanian earth;)
 Then two Sicilian youths—the names of these, 4505
 Swift Helymus, and lovely Panopes:

Both jolly huntsmen, both in forest bred,
 And owning old Acestes for their head;
 With sev'ral others of ignobler name,
 Whom time has not deliver'd o'er to fame. 4510

To these the hero thus his thoughts explain'd,
 In words which gen'ral approbation gain'd:
 "One common largess is for all design'd,
 (The vanquish'd and the victor shall be join'd,) 4515
 Two darts of polish'd steel and Gnosian wood,
 A silver-studded ax, alike bestow'd.

The foremost three have olive wreaths decreed:
 The first of these obtains a stately steed,
 Adorn'd with trappings; and the next in fame,
 The quiver of an Amazonian dame, 4520
 With feather'd Thracian arrows well supplied:
 A golden belt shall gird his manly side,

Which with a sparkling diamond shall be tied.
 The third this Grecian helmet shall content."
 He said. To their appointed base they went; 4525
 With beating hearts th' expected sign receive,
 And, starting all at once, the barrier leave.

Spread out, as on the winged winds, they flew,
 And seiz'd the distant goal with greedy view.
 Shot from the crowd, swift Nisus all o'erpass'd; 4530
 Nor storms, nor thunder, equal half his haste.
 The next, but tho' the next, yet far disjoint'd,
 Came Salius, and Euryalus behind;

Then Helymus, whom young Dioces plied,
 Step after step, and almost side by side, 4535
 His shoulders pressing; and, in longer space,
 Had won, or left at least a dubious race.

Now, spent, the goal they almost reach at last,
 When eager Nisus, hapless in his haste,
 Slipp'd first, and, slipping, fell upon the plain, 4540
 Soak'd with the blood of oxen newly slain.
 The careless victor had not mark'd his way;
 But, treading where the treach'rous puddle lay,
 His heels flew up; and on the grassy floor
 He fell, besmear'd with filth and holy gore. 4545
 Not mindless then, Euryalus, of thee,
 Nor of the sacred bonds of amity,

He strove th' immediate rival's hope to cross,
 And caught the foot of Salius as he rose.
 So Salius lay extended on the plain; 4550
 Euryalus springs out, the prize to gain,
 And leaves the crowd: applauding peals attend
 The victor to the goal, who vanquish'd by his friend.

Next Helymus; and then Dioces came,
 By two misfortunes made the third in fame. 4555

But Salius enters, and, exclaiming loud
 For justice, deafens and disturbs the crowd;
 Urges his cause may in the court be heard;
 And pleads the prize is wrongfully conferr'd. 4560
 But favor for Euryalus appears;

4560

- His blooming beauty, with his tender tears,
 Had brib'd the judges for the promis'd prize.
 Besides, Diores fills the court with cries,
 Who vainly reaches at the last reward,
 If the first palm on Salius be conferr'd. 4565
 Then thus the prince: "Let no disputes arise:
 Where fortune plac'd it, I award the prize.
 But fortune's errors give me leave to mend,
 At least to pity my deserving friend."
 He said, and, from among the spoils, he draws 4570
 (Pond'rous with shaggy mane and golden paws)
 A lion's hide: to Salius this he gives.
 Nisus with envy sees the gift, and grieves.
 "If such rewards to vanquish'd men are due."
 He said, "and falling is to rise by you, 4575
 What prize may Nisus from your bounty claim,
 Who merited the first rewards and fame?
 In falling, both an equal fortune tried;
 Would fortune for my fall so well provide!"
 With this he pointed to his face, and show'd 4580
 His hand and all his habit smear'd with blood.
 Th' indulgent father of the people smil'd,
 And caus'd to be produc'd an ample shield,
 Of wondrous art, by Didymaon wrought,
 Long since from Neptune's bars in triumph brought. 4585
 This giv'n to Nisus, he divides the rest,
 And equal justice in his gifts express'd.
- The race thus ended, and rewards bestow'd,
 Once more the prince bespeaks th' attentive crowd:
 "If there he here whose dauntless courage dare 4590
 In gauntlet-fight, with limbs and body bare,
 His opposite sustain in open view,
 Stand forth the champion, and the games renew.
 Two prizes I propose, and thus divide:
 A bull with gilded horns, and fillets tied, 4595
 Shall be the portion of the conqu'ring chief;
 A sword and helm shall cheer the loser's grief."
- Then haughty Dares in the lists appears;
 Stalking he strides, his head erected bears:
 His nervous arms the weighty gauntlet wield, 4600
 And loud applauses echo thro' the field.
 Dares alone in combat us'd to stand
 The match of mighty Paris, hand to hand;
 The same, at Hector's fun'rals, undertook
 Gigantic Butes, of th' Amycian stock, 4605
 And, by the stroke of his resistless hand,
 Stretch'd the vast bulk upon the yellow sand.
 Such Dares was; and such he strode along,
 And drew the wonder of the gazing throng.
 His brawny back and ample breast he shows, 4610
 His lifted arms around his head he throws,
 And deals in whistling air his empty blows.
 His match is sought; but, thro' the trembling band,
 Not one dares answer to the proud demand.
 Presuming of his force, with sparkling eyes 4615

Already he devours the promis'd prize.
 He claims the bull with awless insolence,
 And having seiz'd his horns, accosts the prince:
 "If none my matchless valor dares oppose,
 How long shall Dares wait his dastard foes? 4620
 Permit me, chief, permit without delay,
 To lead this uncontended gift away."
 The crowd assents, and with redoubled cries
 For the proud challenger demands the prize.

Acestes, fir'd with just disdain, to see 4625
 The palm usurp'd without a victory,
 Reproach'd Entellus thus, who sate beside,
 And heard and saw, unmov'd, the Trojan's pride:
 "Once, but in vain, a champion of renown,
 So tamely can you bear the ravish'd crown, 4630
 A prize in triumph borne before your sight,
 And shun, for fear, the danger of the fight?
 Where is our Eryx now, the boasted name,
 The god who taught your thund'ring arm the game?
 Where now your baffled honor? Where the spoil 4635
 That fill'd your house, and fame that fill'd our isle?"
 Entellus, thus: "My soul is still the same,
 Unmov'd with fear, and mov'd with martial fame;
 But my chill blood is curdled in my veins,
 And scarce the shadow of a man remains. 4640
 O could I turn to that fair prime again,
 That prime of which this boaster is so vain,
 The brave, who this decrepid age defies,
 Should feel my force, without the promis'd prize."

He said; and, rising at the word, he threw 4645
 Two pond'rous gauntlets down in open view;
 Gauntlets which Eryx wont in fight to wield,
 And sheathe his hands with in the listed field.
 With fear and wonder seiz'd, the crowd beholds
 The gloves of death, with sev'n distinguish'd folds 4650
 Of tough bull hides; the space within is spread
 With iron, or with loads of heavy lead:
 Dares himself was daunted at the sight,
 Renounc'd his challenge, and refus'd to fight.
 Astonish'd at their weight, the hero stands, 4655
 And pois'd the pond'rous engines in his hands.
 "What had your wonder," said Entellus, "been,
 Had you the gauntlets of Alcides seen,
 Or view'd the stern debate on this unhappy green!
 These which I bear your brother Eryx bore, 4660
 Still mark'd with batter'd brains and mingled gore.
 With these he long sustain'd th' Herculean arm;
 And these I wielded while my blood was warm,
 This languish'd frame while better spirits fed,
 Ere age unstrung my nerves, or time oërsnow'd my head. 4665
 But if the challenger these arms refuse,
 And cannot wield their weight, or dare not use;
 If great Aeneas and Acestes join
 In his request, these gauntlets I resign;
 Let us with equal arms perform the fight, 4670
 And let him leave to fear, since I resign my right."

This said, Entellus for the strife prepares;
 Stripp'd of his quilted coat, his body bares;
 Compos'd of mighty bones and brawn he stands, 4675
 A goodly tow'ring object on the sands.
 Then just Aeneas equal arms supplied,
 Which round their shoulders to their wrists they tied.
 Both on the tiptoe stand, at full extent,
 Their arms aloft, their bodies inly bent;
 Their heads from aiming blows they bear afar; 4680
 With clashing gauntlets then provoke the war.
 One on his youth and pliant limbs relies;
 One on his sinews and his giant size.
 The last is stiff with age, his motion slow;
 He heaves for breath, he staggers to and fro, 4685
 And clouds of issuing smoke his nostrils loudly blow.
 Yet equal in success, they ward, they strike;
 Their ways are diff'rent, but their art alike.
 Before, behind, the blows are dealt; around
 Their hollow sides the rattling thumps resound. 4690
 A storm of strokes, well meant, with fury flies,
 And errs about their temples, ears, and eyes.
 Nor always errs; for oft the gauntlet draws
 A sweeping stroke along the crackling jaws.
 Heavy with age, Entellus stands his ground, 4695
 But with his warping body wards the wound.
 His hand and watchful eye keep even pace;
 While Dares traverses and shifts his place,
 And, like a captain who beleaguers round
 Some strong-built castle on a rising ground, 4700
 Views all th' approaches with observing eyes:
 This and that other part in vain he tries,
 And more on industry than force relies.
 With hands on high, Entellus threatens the foe;
 But Dares watch'd the motion from below, 4705
 And slipp'd aside, and shunn'd the long descending blow.
 Entellus wastes his forces on the wind,
 And, thus deluded of the stroke design'd,
 Headlong and heavy fell; his ample breast
 And weighty limbs his ancient mother press'd. 4710
 So falls a hollow pine, that long had stood
 On Ida's height, or Erymanthus' wood,
 Torn from the roots. The diff'ring nations rise,
 And shouts and mingled murmurs rend the skies,
 Acestus runs with eager haste, to raise 4715
 The fall'n companion of his youthful days.
 Dauntless he rose, and to the fight return'd;
 With shame his glowing cheeks, his eyes with fury burn'd.
 Disdain and conscious virtue fir'd his breast,
 And with redoubled force his foe he press'd. 4720
 He lays on load with either hand, amain,
 And headlong drives the Trojan o'er the plain;
 Nor stops, nor stays; nor rest nor breath allows;
 But storms of strokes descend about his brows,
 A rattling tempest, and a hail of blows. 4725
 But now the prince, who saw the wild increase
 Of wounds, commands the combatants to cease,
 And bounds Entellus' wrath, and bids the peace.

First to the Trojan, spent with toil, he came,
 And sooth'd his sorrow for the suffer'd shame. 4730
 "What fury seiz'd my friend? The gods," said he,
 "To him propitious, and averse to thee,
 Have giv'n his arm superior force to thine.
 'T is madness to contend with strength divine."
 The gauntlet fight thus ended, from the shore 4735
 His faithful friends unhappy Dares bore:
 His mouth and nostrils pour'd a purple flood,
 And pounded teeth came rushing with his blood.
 Faintly he stagger'd thro' the hissing throng,
 And hung his head, and trail'd his legs along. 4740
 The sword and casque are carried by his train;
 But with his foe the palm and ox remain.

The champion, then, before Aeneas came,
 Proud of his prize, but prouder of his fame:
 "O goddess-born, and you, Dardanian host, 4745
 Mark with attention, and forgive my boast;
 Learn what I was, by what remains; and know
 From what impending fate you sav'd my foe."
 Sternly he spoke, and then confronts the bull;
 And, on his ample forehead aiming full, 4750
 The deadly stroke, descending, pierc'd the skull.
 Down drops the beast, nor needs a second wound,
 But sprawls in pangs of death, and spurns the ground.
 Then, thus: "In Dares' stead I offer this.
 Eryx, accept a nobler sacrifice; 4755
 Take the last gift my wither'd arms can yield:
 Thy gauntlets I resign, and here renounce the field."

This done, Aeneas orders, for the close,
 The strife of archers with contending bows.
 The mast Sergesthus' shatter'd galley bore 4760
 With his own hands he raises on the shore.
 A flutt'ring dove upon the top they tie,
 The living mark at which their arrows fly.
 The rival archers in a line advance,
 Their turn of shooting to receive from chance. 4765
 A helmet holds their names; the lots are drawn:
 On the first scroll was read Hippocoon.
 The people shout. Upon the next was found
 Young Mnestheus, late with naval honors crown'd.
 The third contain'd Eurytion's noble name, 4770
 Thy brother, Pandarus, and next in fame,
 Whom Pallas urg'd the treaty to confound,
 And send among the Greeks a feather'd wound.
 Acestes in the bottom last remain'd,
 Whom not his age from youthful sports restrain'd. 4775
 Soon all with vigor bend their trusty bows,
 And from the quiver each his arrow chose.
 Hippocoon's was the first: with forceful sway
 It flew, and, whizzing, cut the liquid way.
 Fix'd in the mast the feather'd weapon stands: 4780
 The fearful pigeon flutters in her bands,
 And the tree trembled, and the shouting cries
 Of the pleas'd people rend the vaulted skies.

Then Mnestheus to the head his arrow drove,
 With lifted eyes, and took his aim above, 4785
 But made a glancing shot, and missed the dove;
 Yet miss'd so narrow, that he cut the cord
 Which fasten'd by the foot the flitting bird.
 The captive thus releas'd, away she flies,
 And beats with clapping wings the yielding skies. 4790
 His bow already bent, Eurytion stood;
 And, having first invok'd his brother god,
 His winged shaft with eager haste he sped.
 The fatal message reach'd her as she fled:
 She leaves her life aloft; she strikes the ground, 4795
 And renders back the weapon in the wound.
 Acestes, grudging at his lot, remains,
 Without a prize to gratify his pains.
 Yet, shooting upward, sends his shaft, to show
 An archer's art, and boast his twanging bow. 4800
 The feather'd arrow gave a dire portent,
 And latter augurs judge from this event.
 Chaf'd by the speed, it fir'd; and, as it flew,
 A trail of following flames ascending drew:
 Kindling they mount, and mark the shiny way; 4805
 Across the skies as falling meteors play,
 And vanish into wind, or in a blaze decay.
 The Trojans and Sicilians wildly stare,
 And, trembling, turn their wonder into pray'r.
 The Dardan prince put on a smiling face, 4810
 And strain'd Acestes with a close embrace;
 Then, hon'ring him with gifts above the rest,
 Turn'd the bad omen, nor his fears confess'd.
 "The gods," said he, "this miracle have wrought,
 And order'd you the prize without the lot. 4815
 Accept this goblet, rough with figur'd gold,
 Which Thracian Cisseus gave my sire of old:
 This pledge of ancient amity receive,
 Which to my second sire I justly give."
 He said, and, with the trumpets' cheerful sound, 4820
 Proclaim'd him victor, and with laurel-crown'd.
 Nor good Eurytion envied him the prize,
 Tho' he transfix'd the pigeon in the skies.
 Who cut the line, with second gifts was grac'd;
 The third was his whose arrow pierc'd the mast. 4925

The chief, before the games were wholly done,
 Call'd Periphantes, tutor to his son,
 And whisper'd thus: "With speed Ascanius find;
 And, if his childish troop be ready join'd,
 On horseback let him grace his grandsire's day, 4930
 And lead his equals arm'd in just array."
 He said; and, calling out, the cirque he clears.
 The crowd withdrawn, an open plain appears.
 And now the noble youths, of form divine,
 Advance before their fathers, in a line; 4935
 The riders grace the steeds; the steeds with glory shine.

Thus marching on in military pride,
 Shouts of applause resound from side to side.

Their casques adorn'd with laurel wreaths they wear,
 Each brandishing aloft a cornel spear. 4940
 Some at their backs their gilded quivers bore;
 Their chains of burnish'd gold hung down before.
 Three graceful troops they form'd upon the green;
 Three graceful leaders at their head were seen;
 Twelve follow'd ev'ry chief, and left a space between. 4945
 The first young Priam led; a lovely boy,
 Whose grandsire was th' unhappy king of Troy;
 His race in after times was known to fame,
 New honors adding to the Latian name;
 And well the royal boy his Thracian steed became. 4950
 White were the fetlocks of his feet before,
 And on his front a snowy star he bore.
 Then beauteous Atys, with Iulus bred,
 Of equal age, the second squadron led.
 The last in order, but the first in place, 4955
 First in the lovely features of his face,
 Rode fair Ascanius on a fiery steed,
 Queen Dido's gift, and of the Tyrian breed.
 Sure coursers for the rest the king ordains,
 With golden bits adorn'd, and purple reins. 4960

The pleas'd spectators peals of shouts renew,
 And all the parents in the children view;
 Their make, their motions, and their sprightly grace,
 And hopes and fears alternate in their face.

Th' unfledg'd commanders and their martial train 4965
 First make the circuit of the sandy plain
 Around their sires, and, at th' appointed sign,
 Drawn up in beauteous order, form a line.
 The second signal sounds, the troop divides
 In three distinguish'd parts, with three distinguish'd guides 4970
 Again they close, and once again disjoin;
 In troop to troop oppos'd, and line to line.
 They meet; they wheel; they throw their darts afar
 With harmless rage and well-dissembled war.
 Then in a round the mingled bodies run: 4975
 Flying they follow, and pursuing shun;
 Broken, they break; and, rallying, they renew
 In other forms the military shew.
 At last, in order, undiscern'd they join,
 And march together in a friendly line. 4980
 And, as the Cretan labyrinth of old,
 With wand'ring ways and many a winding fold,
 Involv'd the weary feet, without redress,
 In a round error, which denied recess;
 So fought the Trojan boys in warlike play, 4985
 Turn'd and return'd, and still a diff'rent way.
 Thus dolphins in the deep each other chase
 In circles, when they swim around the wat'ry race.
 This game, these carousels, Ascanius taught;
 And, building Alba, to the Latins brought; 4990
 Shew'd what he learn'd: the Latin sires impart
 To their succeeding sons the graceful art;
 From these imperial Rome receiv'd the game,
 Which Troy, the youths the Trojan troop, they name.

- Thus far the sacred sports they celebrate: 4995
 But Fortune soon resum'd her ancient hate;
 For, while they pay the dead his annual dues,
 Those envied rites Saturnian Juno views;
 And sends the goddess of the various bow,
 To try new methods of revenge below; 5000
 Supplies the winds to wing her airy way,
 Where in the port secure the navy lay.
 Swiftly fair Iris down her arch descends,
 And, undiscern'd, her fatal voyage ends.
 She saw the gath'ring crowd; and, gliding thence, 5005
 The desert shore, and fleet without defense.
 The Trojan matrons, on the sands alone,
 With sighs and tears Anchises' death bemoan;
 Then, turning to the sea their weeping eyes,
 Their pity to themselves renews their cries. 5010
 "Alas!" said one, "what oceans yet remain
 For us to sail! what labors to sustain!"
 All take the word, and, with a gen'ral groan,
 Implore the gods for peace, and places of their own.
- The goddess, great in mischief, views their pains, 5015
 And in a woman's form her heav'nly limbs restrains.
 In face and shape old Beroe she became,
 Doryclus' wife, a venerable dame,
 Once blest with riches, and a mother's name.
 Thus chang'd, amidst the crying crowd she ran, 5020
 Mix'd with the matrons, and these words began:
 "O wretched we, whom not the Grecian pow'r,
 Nor flames, destroy'd, in Troy's unhappy hour!
 O wretched we, reserv'd by cruel fate,
 Beyond the ruins of the sinking state! 5025
 Now sev'n revolving years are wholly run,
 Since this improsp'rous voyage we begun;
 Since, toss'd from shores to shores, from lands to lands,
 Inhospitable rocks and barren sands,
 Wand'ring in exile thro' the stormy sea, 5030
 We search in vain for flying Italy.
 Now cast by fortune on this kindred land,
 What should our rest and rising walls withstand,
 Or hinder here to fix our banish'd band?
 O country lost, and gods redeem'd in vain, 5035
 If still in endless exile we remain!
 Shall we no more the Trojan walls renew,
 Or streams of some dissembled Simois view!
 Haste, join with me, th' unhappy fleet consume!
 Cassandra bids; and I declare her doom. 5040
 In sleep I saw her; she supplied my hands
 (For this I more than dreamt) with flaming brands:
 'With these,' said she, 'these wand'ring ships destroy:
 These are your fatal seats, and this your Troy.'
 Time calls you now; the precious hour employ: 5045
 Slack not the good presage, while Heav'n inspires
 Our minds to dare, and gives the ready fires.
 See! Neptune's altars minister their brands:
 The god is pleas'd; the god supplies our hands."
 Then from the pile a flaming fire she drew, 5050
 And, toss'd in air, amidst the galleys threw.

Wrapp'd in amaze, the matrons wildly stare:
 Then Pyrgo, reverenc'd for her hoary hair,
 Pyrgo, the nurse of Priam's num'rous race:
 "No Beroe this, tho' she belies her face!" 5055
 What terrors from her frowning front arise!
 Behold a goddess in her ardent eyes!
 What rays around her heav'nly face are seen!
 Mark her majestic voice, and more than mortal mien!
 Beroe but now I left, whom, pin'd with pain, 5060
 Her age and anguish from these rites detain,"
 She said. The matrons, seiz'd with new amaze,
 Roll their malignant eyes, and on the navy gaze.
 They fear, and hope, and neither part obey:
 They hope the fated land, but fear the fatal way. 5065
 The goddess, having done her task below,
 Mounts up on equal wings, and bends her painted bow.
 Struck with the sight, and seiz'd with rage divine,
 The matrons prosecute their mad design:
 They shriek aloud; they snatch, with impious hands, 5070
 The food of altars; fires and flaming brands.
 Green boughs and saplings, mingled in their haste,
 And smoking torches, on the ships they cast.
 The flame, unstopp'd at first, more fury gains,
 And Vulcan rides at large with loosen'd reins: 5075
 Triumphant to the painted sterns he soars,
 And seizes, in this way, the banks and crackling oars.
 Eumelus was the first the news to bear,
 While yet they crowd the rural theater.
 Then, what they hear, is witness'd by their eyes: 5080
 A storm of sparkles and of flames arise.
 Ascanius took th' alarm, while yet he led
 His early warriors on his prancing steed,
 And, spurring on, his equals soon o'erpass'd;
 Nor could his frightened friends reclaim his haste. 5085
 Soon as the royal youth appear'd in view,
 He sent his voice before him as he flew:
 "What madness moves you, matrons, to destroy
 The last remainders of unhappy Troy!
 Not hostile fleets, but your own hopes, you burn, 5090
 And on your friends your fatal fury turn.
 Behold your own Ascanius!" While he said,
 He drew his glitt'ring helmet from his head,
 In which the youths to sportful arms he led.
 By this, Aeneas and his train appear; 5095
 And now the women, seiz'd with shame and fear,
 Dispers'd, to woods and caverns take their flight,
 Abhor their actions, and avoid the light;
 Their friends acknowledge, and their error find,
 And shake the goddess from their alter'd mind. 5100

Not so the raging fires their fury cease,
 But, lurking in the seams, with seeming peace,
 Work on their way amid the smold'ring tow,
 Sure in destruction, but in motion slow.
 The silent plague thro' the green timber eats, 5105
 And vomits out a tardy flame by fits.
 Down to the keels, and upward to the sails,

- The fire descends, or mounts, but still prevails;
Nor buckets pour'd, nor strength of human hand,
Can the victorious element withstand. 5110
- The pious hero rends his robe, and throws
To heav'n his hands, and with his hands his vows.
"O Jove," he cried, "if pray'rs can yet have place;
If thou abhorr'st not all the Dardan race;
If any spark of pity still remain; 5115
If gods are gods, and not invok'd in vain;
Yet spare the relics of the Trojan train!
Yet from the flames our burning vessels free,
Or let thy fury fall alone on me!
At this devoted head thy thunder throw, 5120
And send the willing sacrifice below!"
- Scarce had he said, when southern storms arise:
From pole to pole the forky lightning flies;
Loud rattling shakes the mountains and the plain;
Heav'n bellies downward, and descends in rain. 5125
Whole sheets of water from the clouds are sent,
Which, hissing thro' the planks, the flames prevent,
And stop the fiery pest. Four ships alone
Burn to the waist, and for the fleet atone.
- But doubtful thoughts the hero's heart divide; 5230
If he should still in Sicily reside,
Forgetful of his fates, or tempt the main,
In hope the promis'd Italy to gain.
Then Nautes, old and wise, to whom alone
The will of Heav'n by Pallas was foreshown; 5235
Vers'd in portents, experienc'd, and inspir'd
To tell events, and what the fates requir'd;
Thus while he stood, to neither part inclin'd,
With cheerful words reliev'd his lab'ring mind:
"O goddess-born, resign'd in ev'ry state, 5240
With patience bear, with prudence push your fate.
By suff'ring well, our Fortune we subdue;
Fly when she frowns, and, when she calls, pursue.
Your friend Acestes is of Trojan kind;
To him disclose the secrets of your mind: 5345
Trust in his hands your old and useless train;
Too num'rous for the ships which yet remain:
The feeble, old, indulgent of their ease,
The dames who dread the dangers of the seas,
With all the dastard crew, who dare not stand 5350
The shock of battle with your foes by land.
Here you may build a common town for all,
And, from Acestes' name, Acesta call."
The reasons, with his friend's experience join'd,
Encourag'd much, but more disturb'd his mind. 5355
- 'T was dead of night; when to his slumb'ring eyes
His father's shade descended from the skies,
And thus he spoke: "O more than vital breath,
Lov'd while I liv'd, and dear ev'n after death;
O son, in various toils and troubles toss'd, 5360

The King of Heav'n employs my careful ghost
 On his commands: the god, who sav'd from fire
 Your flaming fleet, and heard your just desire.
 The wholesome counsel of your friend receive,
 And here the coward train and woman leave: 5365
 The chosen youth, and those who nobly dare,
 Transport, to tempt the dangers of the war.
 The stern Italians will their courage try;
 Rough are their manners, and their minds are high.
 But first to Pluto's palace you shall go, 5370
 And seek my shade among the blest below:
 For not with impious ghosts my soul remains,
 Nor suffers with the damn'd perpetual pains,
 But breathes the living air of soft Elysian plains.
 The chaste Sibylla shall your steps convey, 5375
 And blood of offer'd victims free the way.
 There shall you know what realms the gods assign,
 And learn the fates and fortunes of your line.
 But now, farewell! I vanish with the night,
 And feel the blast of heav'n's approaching light." 5380
 He said, and mix'd with shades, and took his airy flight.
 "Whither so fast?" the filial duty cried;
 "And why, ah why, the wish'd embrace denied?"

He said, and rose; as holy zeal inspires,
 He rakes hot embers, and renews the fires; 5385
 His country gods and Vesta then adores
 With cakes and incense, and their aid implores.
 Next, for his friends and royal host he sent,
 Reveald his vision, and the gods' intent,
 With his own purpose. All, without delay, 5390
 The will of Jove, and his desires obey.
 They list with women each degenerate name,
 Who dares not hazard life for future fame.
 These they cashier: the brave remaining few,
 Oars, banks, and cables, half consum'd, renew. 5395
 The prince designs a city with the plow;
 The lots their sev'ral tenements allow.
 This part is nam'd from Ilium, that from Troy,
 And the new king ascends the throne with joy;
 A chosen senate from the people draws; 5400
 Appoints the judges, and ordains the laws.
 Then, on the top of Eryx, they begin
 A rising temple to the Paphian queen.
 Anchises, last, is honor'd as a god;
 A priest is added, annual gifts bestow'd, 5405
 And groves are planted round his blest abode.
 Nine days they pass in feasts, their temples crown'd;
 And fumes of incense in the fanes abound.
 Then from the south arose a gentle breeze
 That curl'd the smoothness of the glassy seas; 5410
 The rising winds a ruffling gale afford,
 And call the merry mariners aboard.

Now loud laments along the shores resound,
 Of parting friends in close embraces bound.
 The trembling women, the degenerate train, 5415

- Who shunn'd the frightful dangers of the main,
 Ev'n those desire to sail, and take their share
 Of the rough passage and the promis'd war:
 Whom good Aeneas cheers, and recommends
 To their new master's care his fearful friends. 5420
 On Eryx's altars three fat calves he lays;
 A lamb new-fallen to the stormy seas;
 Then slips his haulsers, and his anchors weighs.
 High on the deck the godlike hero stands,
 With olive crown'd, a charger in his hands; 5425
 Then cast the reeking entrails in the brine,
 And pour'd the sacrifice of purple wine.
 Fresh gales arise; with equal strokes they vie,
 And brush the buxom seas, and o'er the billows fly.
- Meantime the mother goddess, full of fears, 5430
 To Neptune thus address'd, with tender tears:
 "The pride of Jove's imperious queen, the rage,
 The malice which no suff'rings can assuage,
 Compel me to these pray'rs; since neither fate,
 Nor time, nor pity, can remove her hate: 5435
 Ev'n Jove is thwarted by his haughty wife;
 Still vanquish'd, yet she still renews the strife.
 As if 't were little to consume the town
 Which aw'd the world, and wore th' imperial crown,
 She prosecutes the ghost of Troy with pains, 5440
 And gnaws, ev'n to the bones, the last remains.
 Let her the causes of her hatred tell;
 But you can witness its effects too well.
 You saw the storm she rais'd on Libyan floods,
 That mix'd the mounting billows with the clouds; 5445
 When, bribing Aeolus, she shook the main,
 And mov'd rebellion in your wat'ry reign.
 With fury she possess'd the Dardan dames,
 To burn their fleet with execrable flames,
 And forc'd Aeneas, when his ships were lost, 5450
 To leave his foll'wers on a foreign coast.
 For what remains, your godhead I implore,
 And trust my son to your protecting pow'r.
 If neither Jove's nor Fate's decree withstand,
 Secure his passage to the Latian land." 5455
- Then thus the mighty Ruler of the Main:
 "What may not Venus hope from Neptune's reign?
 My kingdom claims your birth; my late defense
 Of your indanger'd fleet may claim your confidence. 5460
 Nor less by land than sea my deeds declare
 How much your lov'd Aeneas is my care.
 Thee, Xanthus, and thee, Simois, I attest.
 Your Trojan troops when proud Achilles press'd,
 And drove before him headlong on the plain,
 And dash'd against the walls the trembling train; 5465
 When floods were fill'd with bodies of the slain;
 When crimson Xanthus, doubtful of his way,
 Stood up on ridges to behold the sea;
 (New heaps came tumbling in, and chok'd his way;)
 When your Aeneas fought, but fought with odds 5470

Of force unequal, and unequal gods;
 I spread a cloud before the victor's sight,
 Sustain'd the vanquish'd, and secur'd his flight;
 Ev'n then secur'd him, when I sought with joy
 The vow'd destruction of ungrateful Troy. 5475
 My will's the same: fair goddess, fear no more,
 Your fleet shall safely gain the Latian shore;
 Their lives are giv'n; one destin'd head alone
 Shall perish, and for multitudes atone."
 Thus having arm'd with hopes her anxious mind, 5480
 His finny team Saturnian Neptune join'd,
 Then adds the foamy bridle to their jaws,
 And to the loosen'd reins permits the laws.
 High on the waves his azure car he guides;
 Its axles thunder, and the sea subsides, 5485
 And the smooth ocean rolls her silent tides.
 The tempests fly before their father's face,
 Trains of inferior gods his triumph grace,
 And monster whales before their master play,
 And choirs of Tritons crowd the wat'ry way. 5490
 The marshal'd pow'rs in equal troops divide
 To right and left; the gods his better side
 Inclose, and on the worse the Nymphs and Nereids ride.

Now smiling hope, with sweet vicissitude,
 Within the hero's mind his joys renew'd. 5495
 He calls to raise the masts, the sheets display;
 The cheerful crew with diligence obey;
 They scud before the wind, and sail in open sea.
 Ahead of all the master pilot steers;
 And, as he leads, the following navy veers. 5500
 The steeds of Night had travel'd half the sky,
 The drowsy rowers on their benches lie,
 When the soft God of Sleep, with easy flight,
 Descends, and draws behind a trail of light.
 Thou, Palinurus, art his destin'd prey; 5505
 To thee alone he takes his fatal way.
 Dire dreams to thee, and iron sleep, he bears;
 And, lighting on thy prow, the form of Phorbas wears.
 Then thus the traitor god began his tale:
 "The winds, my friend, inspire a pleasing gale; 5510
 The ships, without thy care, securely sail.
 Now steal an hour of sweet repose; and I
 Will take the rudder and thy room supply."
 To whom the yawning pilot, half asleep:
 "Me dost thou bid to trust the treach'rous deep, 5515
 The harlot smiles of her dissembling face,
 And to her faith commit the Trojan race?
 Shall I believe the Siren South again,
 And, oft betray'd, not know the monster main?"
 He said: his fasten'd hands the rudder keep, 5520
 And, fix'd on heav'n, his eyes repel invading sleep.
 The god was wroth, and at his temples threw
 A branch in Lethe dipp'd, and drunk with Stygian dew:
 The pilot, vanquish'd by the pow'r divine,
 Soon clos'd his swimming eyes, and lay supine. 5525
 Scarce were his limbs extended at their length,

The god, insulting with superior strength,
 Fell heavy on him, plung'd him in the sea,
 And, with the stern, the rudder tore away. 5530
 Headlong he fell, and, struggling in the main,
 Cried out for helping hands, but cried in vain.
 The victor daemon mounts obscure in air,
 While the ship sails without the pilot's care.
 On Neptune's faith the floating fleet relies;
 But what the man forsook, the god supplies, 5535
 And o'er the dang'rous deep secure the navy flies;
 Glides by the Sirens' cliffs, a shelfy coast,
 Long infamous for ships and sailors lost,
 And white with bones. Th' impetuous ocean roars,
 And rocks rebellow from the sounding shores. 5540
 The watchful hero felt the knocks, and found
 The tossing vessel sail'd on shoaly ground.
 Sure of his pilot's loss, he takes himself
 The helm, and steers aloof, and shuns the shelf.
 Inly he griev'd, and, groaning from the breast, 5545
 Deplor'd his death; and thus his pain express'd:
 "For faith repos'd on seas, and on the flatt'ring sky, Thy naked corpse is doom'd on shores unknown to lie."

Book VI

He said, and wept; then spread his sails before
 The winds, and reach'd at length the Cumaean shore: 5550
 Their anchors dropp'd, his crew the vessels moor.
 They turn their heads to sea, their sterns to land,
 And greet with greedy joy th' Italian strand.
 Some strike from clashing flints their fiery seed;
 Some gather sticks, the kindled flames to feed, 5555
 Or search for hollow trees, and fell the woods,
 Or trace thro' valleys the discover'd floods.
 Thus, while their sev'ral charges they fulfil,
 The pious prince ascends the sacred hill
 Where Phoebus is ador'd; and seeks the shade 5560
 Which hides from sight his venerable maid.
 Deep in a cave the Sibyl makes abode;
 Thence full of fate returns, and of the god.
 Thro' Trivia's grove they walk; and now behold,
 And enter now, the temple roof'd with gold. 5565
 When Daedalus, to fly the Cretan shore,
 His heavy limbs on jointed pinions bore,
 (The first who sail'd in air,) 't is sung by Fame,
 To the Cumaean coast at length he came,
 And here alighting, built this costly frame. 5570
 Inscrib'd to Phoebus, here he hung on high
 The steerage of his wings, that cut the sky:
 Then o'er the lofty gate his art emboss'd
 Androgeos' death, and off'rings to his ghost;
 Sev'n youths from Athens yearly sent, to meet 5575
 The fate appointed by revengeful Crete.
 And next to those the dreadful urn was plac'd,
 In which the destin'd names by lots were cast:
 The mournful parents stand around in tears,
 And rising Crete against their shore appears. 5580

There too, in living sculpture, might be seen
 The mad affection of the Cretan queen;
 Then how she cheats her bellowing lover's eye;
 The rushing leap, the doubtful progeny,
 The lower part a beast, a man above, 5585
 The monument of their polluted love.
 Not far from thence he grav'd the wondrous maze,
 A thousand doors, a thousand winding ways:
 Here dwells the monster, hid from human view,
 Not to be found, but by the faithful clew; 5590
 Till the kind artist, mov'd with pious grief,
 Lent to the loving maid this last relief,
 And all those erring paths describ'd so well
 That Theseus conquer'd and the monster fell.
 Here hapless Icarus had found his part, 5595
 Had not the father's grief restrain'd his art.
 He twice assay'd to cast his son in gold;
 Twice from his hands he dropp'd the forming mold.

All this with wond'ring eyes Aeneas view'd;
 Each varying object his delight renew'd: 5600
 Eager to read the rest—Achates came,
 And by his side the mad divining dame,
 The priestess of the god, Deiphobe her name.
 "Time suffers not," she said, "to feed your eyes
 With empty pleasures; haste the sacrifice. 5605
 Sev'n bullocks, yet unyok'd, for Phoebus choose,
 And for Diana sev'n unspotted ewes."
 This said, the servants urge the sacred rites,
 While to the temple she the prince invites. 5610
 A spacious cave, within its farthest part,
 Was hew'd and fashion'd by laborious art
 Thro' the hill's hollow sides: before the place,
 A hundred doors a hundred entries grace;
 As many voices issue, and the sound
 Of Sybil's words as many times rebound. 5615
 Now to the mouth they come. Aloud she cries:
 "This is the time; enquire your destinies.
 He comes; behold the god!" Thus while she said,
 (And shiv'ring at the sacred entry stay'd,) 5620
 Her color chang'd; her face was not the same,
 And hollow groans from her deep spirit came.
 Her hair stood up; convulsive rage possess'd
 Her trembling limbs, and heav'd her lab'ring breast.
 Greater than humankind she seem'd to look,
 And with an accent more than mortal spoke. 5625
 Her staring eyes with sparkling fury roll;
 When all the god came rushing on her soul.
 Swiftly she turn'd, and, foaming as she spoke:
 "Why this delay?" she cried—"the pow'rs invoke!
 Thy pray'rs alone can open this abode; 5630
 Else vain are my demands, and dumb the god."

She said no more. The trembling Trojans hear,
 O'erspread with a damp sweat and holy fear.
 The prince himself, with awful dread possess'd,
 His vows to great Apollo thus address'd: 5635

“Indulgent god, propitious pow’r to Troy,
 Swift to relieve, unwilling to destroy,
 Directed by whose hand the Dardan dart
 Pierc’d the proud Grecian’s only mortal part:
 Thus far, by fate’s decrees and thy commands, 5640
 Thro’ ambient seas and thro’ devouring sands,
 Our exil’d crew has sought th’ Ausonian ground;
 And now, at length, the flying coast is found.
 Thus far the fate of Troy, from place to place,
 With fury has pursued her wand’ring race. 5645
 Here cease, ye pow’rs, and let your vengeance end:
 Troy is no more, and can no more offend.
 And thou, O sacred maid, inspir’d to see
 Th’ event of things in dark futurity;
 Give me what Heav’n has promis’d to my fate, 5650
 To conquer and command the Latian state;
 To fix my wand’ring gods, and find a place
 For the long exiles of the Trojan race.
 Then shall my grateful hands a temple rear
 To the twin gods, with vows and solemn pray’r; 5655
 And annual rites, and festivals, and games,
 Shall be perform’d to their auspicious names.
 Nor shalt thou want thy honors in my land;
 For there thy faithful oracles shall stand,
 Preserv’d in shrines; and ev’ry sacred lay, 5660
 Which, by thy mouth, Apollo shall convey:
 All shall be treasur’d by a chosen train
 Of holy priests, and ever shall remain.
 But O! commit not thy prophetic mind
 To flitting leaves, the sport of ev’ry wind, 5665
 Lest they disperse in air our empty fate;
 Write not, but, what the pow’rs ordain, relate.”

Struggling in vain, impatient of her load,
 And lab’ring underneath the pond’rous god,
 The more she strove to shake him from her breast, 5670
 With more and far superior force he press’d;
 Commands his entrance, and, without control,
 Usurps her organs and inspires her soul.
 Now, with a furious blast, the hundred doors
 Ope of themselves; a rushing whirlwind roars 5675
 Within the cave, and Sibyl’s voice restores:
 “Escap’d the dangers of the wat’ry reign,
 Yet more and greater ills by land remain.
 The coast, so long desir’d (nor doubt th’ event),
 Thy troops shall reach, but, having reach’d, repent. 5680
 Wars, horrid wars, I view—a field of blood,
 And Tiber rolling with a purple flood.
 Simois nor Xanthus shall be wanting there:
 A new Achilles shall in arms appear,
 And he, too, goddess-born. Fierce Juno’s hate, 5685
 Added to hostile force, shall urge thy fate.
 To what strange nations shalt not thou resort,
 Driv’n to solicit aid at ev’ry court!
 The cause the same which Ilium once oppress’d;
 A foreign mistress, and a foreign guest. 5690
 But thou, secure of soul, unbent with woes,

The more thy fortune frowns, the more oppose.
 The dawns of thy safety shall be shown
 From whence thou least shalt hope, a Grecian town.”

Thus, from the dark recess, the Sibyl spoke, 5695

And the resisting air the thunder broke;
 The cave rebellow'd, and the temple shook.
 Th' ambiguous god, who rul'd her lab'ring breast,
 In these mysterious words his mind express'd;
 Some truths reveal'd, in terms involv'd the rest. 5700

At length her fury fell, her foaming ceas'd,
 And, ebbing in her soul, the god decreas'd.
 Then thus the chief: “No terror to my view,
 No frightful face of danger can be new.
 Inur'd to suffer, and resolv'd to dare, 5705

The Fates, without my pow'r, shall be without my care.
 This let me crave, since near your grove the road
 To hell lies open, and the dark abode
 Which Acheron surrounds, th' innavigable flood;
 Conduct me thro' the regions void of light, 5710

And lead me longing to my father's sight.
 For him, a thousand dangers I have sought,
 And, rushing where the thickest Grecians fought,
 Safe on my back the sacred burthen brought.
 He, for my sake, the raging ocean tried, 5715

And wrath of Heav'n, my still auspicious guide,
 And bore beyond the strength decrepid age supplied.
 Oft, since he breath'd his last, in dead of night
 His reverend image stood before my sight;
 Enjoin'd to seek, below, his holy shade; 5720

Conducted there by your unerring aid.
 But you, if pious minds by pray'rs are won,
 Oblige the father, and protect the son.
 Yours is the pow'r; nor Proserpine in vain
 Has made you priestess of her nightly reign. 5725

If Orpheus, arm'd with his enchanting lyre,
 The ruthless king with pity could inspire,
 And from the shades below redeem his wife;
 If Pollux, off'ring his alternate life,
 Could free his brother, and can daily go 5730

By turns aloft, by turns descend below—
 Why name I Theseus, or his greater friend,
 Who trod the downward path, and upward could ascend?
 Not less than theirs from Jove my lineage came;
 My mother greater, my descent the same.” 5735

So pray'd the Trojan prince, and, while he pray'd,
 His hand upon the holy altar laid.

Then thus replied the prophetess divine:
 “O goddess-born of great Anchises' line,
 The gates of hell are open night and day; 5740
 Smooth the descent, and easy is the way:
 But to return, and view the cheerful skies,
 In this the task and mighty labor lies.

To few great Jupiter imparts this grace,
 And those of shining worth and heav'nly race. 5745
 Betwixt those regions and our upper light,

Deep forests and impenetrable night
 Possess the middle space: th' infernal bounds
 Cocytus, with his sable waves, surrounds.

But if so dire a love your soul invades, 5750
 As twice below to view the trembling shades;
 If you so hard a toil will undertake,
 As twice to pass th' innavigable lake;
 Receive my counsel. In the neighb'ring grove

There stands a tree; the queen of Stygian Jove 5755
 Claims it her own; thick woods and gloomy night
 Conceal the happy plant from human sight.
 One bough it bears; but (wondrous to behold!)
 The ductile rind and leaves of radiant gold:

This from the vulgar branches must be torn, 5760
 And to fair Proserpine the present borne,
 Ere leave be giv'n to tempt the nether skies.
 The first thus rent a second will arise,
 And the same metal the same room supplies.

Look round the wood, with lifted eyes, to see 5765
 The lurking gold upon the fatal tree:
 Then rend it off, as holy rites command;
 The willing metal will obey thy hand,
 Following with ease, if favor'd by thy fate,

Thou art foredoom'd to view the Stygian state: 5770
 If not, no labor can the tree constrain;
 And strength of stubborn arms and steel are vain.
 Besides, you know not, while you here attend,
 Th' unworthy fate of your unhappy friend:

Breathless he lies; and his unburied ghost, 5775
 Depriv'd of fun'ral rites, pollutes your host.
 Pay first his pious dues; and, for the dead,
 Two sable sheep around his hearse be led;
 Then, living turfs upon his body lay:

This done, securely take the destin'd way, 5780
 To find the regions destitute of day."

She said, and held her peace. Aeneas went Sad from the cave, and full of discontent,
 Unknowing whom the sacred Sibyl meant.

Achates, the companion of his breast, 5785
 Goes grieving by his side, with equal cares oppress'd.
 Walking, they talk'd, and fruitlessly divin'd
 What friend the priestess by those words design'd.
 But soon they found an object to deplore:

Misenus lay extended on the shore; 5790
 Son of the God of Winds: none so renown'd
 The warrior trumpet in the field to sound;
 With breathing brass to kindle fierce alarms,
 And rouse to dare their fate in honorable arms.

He serv'd great Hector, and was ever near, 5795
 Not with his trumpet only, but his spear.
 But by Pelides' arms when Hector fell,
 He chose Aeneas; and he chose as well.
 Swoln with applause, and aiming still at more,

He now provokes the sea gods from the shore; 5800
 With envy Triton heard the martial sound,
 And the bold champion, for his challenge, drown'd;

Then cast his mangled carcass on the strand:
 The gazing crowd around the body stand. 5805
 All weep; but most Aeneas mourns his fate,
 And hastens to perform the funeral state.
 In altar-wise, a stately pile they rear;
 The basis broad below, and top advanc'd in air.
 An ancient wood, fit for the work design'd,
 (The shady covert of the salvage kind,) 5810
 The Trojans found: the sounding ax is plied;
 Firs, pines, and pitch trees, and the tow'ring pride
 Of forest ashes, feel the fatal stroke,
 And piercing wedges cleave the stubborn oak.
 Huge trunks of trees, fell'd from the steepy crown 5815
 Of the bare mountains, roll with ruin down.
 Arm'd like the rest the Trojan prince appears,
 And by his pious labor urges theirs.

Thus while he wrought, revolving in his mind 5820
 The ways to compass what his wish design'd,
 He cast his eyes upon the gloomy grove,
 And then with vows implor'd the Queen of Love:
 "O may thy pow'r, propitious still to me,
 Conduct my steps to find the fatal tree,
 In this deep forest; since the Sibyl's breath 5825
 Foretold, alas! too true, Misenus' death."
 Scarce had he said, when, full before his sight,
 Two doves, descending from their airy flight,
 Secure upon the grassy plain alight.
 He knew his mother's birds; and thus he pray'd: 5830
 "Be you my guides, with your auspicious aid,
 And lead my footsteps, till the branch be found,
 Whose glitt'ring shadow gilds the sacred ground.
 And thou, great parent, with celestial care,
 In this distress be present to my pray'r!" 5835
 Thus having said, he stopp'd with watchful sight,
 Observing still the motions of their flight,
 What course they took, what happy signs they shew.
 They fed, and, flutt'ring, by degrees withdrew
 Still farther from the place, but still in view: 5840
 Hopping and flying, thus they led him on
 To the slow lake, whose baleful stench to shun
 They wing'd their flight aloft; then, stooping low,
 Perch'd on the double tree that bears the golden bough.
 Thro' the green leafs the glitt'ring shadows glow; 5845
 As, on the sacred oak, the wintry mistletoe,
 Where the proud mother views her precious brood,
 And happier branches, which she never sow'd.
 Such was the glitt'ring; such the ruddy rind,
 And dancing leaves, that wanton'd in the wind. 5850
 He seiz'd the shining bough with griping hold,
 And rent away, with ease, the ling'ring gold;
 Then to the Sibyl's palace bore the prize.
 Meantime the Trojan troops, with weeping eyes,
 To dead Misenus pay his obsequies. 5855
 First, from the ground a lofty pile they rear,
 Of pitch trees, oaks, and pines, and unctuous fir:
 The fabric's front with cypress twigs they strew,

And stick the sides with boughs of baleful yew.
 The topmost part his glitt'ring arms adorn; 5860
 Warm waters, then, in brazen caldrons borne,
 Are pour'd to wash his body, joint by joint,
 And fragrant oils the stiffen'd limbs anoint.
 With groans and cries Misenus they deplore:
 Then on a bier, with purple cover'd o'er, 5865
 The breathless body, thus bewail'd, they lay,
 And fire the pile, their faces turn'd away—
 Such reverend rites their fathers us'd to pay.
 Pure oil and incense on the fire they throw,
 And fat of victims, which his friends bestow. 5870
 These gifts the greedy flames to dust devour;
 Then on the living coals red wine they pour;
 And, last, the relics by themselves dispose,
 Which in a brazen urn the priests inclose.
 Old Corynaeus compass'd thrice the crew, 5875
 And dipp'd an olive branch in holy dew;
 Which thrice he sprinkled round, and thrice aloud
 Invok'd the dead, and then dismissed the crowd.
 But good Aeneas order'd on the shore
 A stately tomb, whose top a trumpet bore, 5880
 A soldier's fauchion, and a seaman's oar.
 Thus was his friend interr'd; and deathless fame
 Still to the lofty cape consigns his name.
 These rites perform'd, the prince, without delay,
 Hastes to the nether world his destin'd way. 5885
 Deep was the cave; and, downward as it went
 From the wide mouth, a rocky rough descent;
 And here th' access a gloomy grove defends,
 And there th' unnavigable lake extends,
 O'er whose unhappy waters, void of light, 5890
 No bird presumes to steer his airy flight;
 Such deadly stench from the depths arise,
 And steaming sulphur, that infects the skies.
 From hence the Grecian bards their legends make,
 And give the name Avernus to the lake. 5895
 Four sable bullocks, in the yoke untaught,
 For sacrifice the pious hero brought.
 The priestess pours the wine betwixt their horns;
 Then cuts the curling hair; that first oblation burns,
 Invoking Hecate hither to repair: 5900
 A pow'rful name in hell and upper air.
 The sacred priests with ready knives bereave
 The beasts of life, and in full bowls receive
 The streaming blood: a lamb to Hell and Night
 (The sable wool without a streak of white) 5905
 Aeneas offers; and, by fate's decree,
 A barren heifer, Proserpine, to thee,
 With holocausts he Pluto's altar fills;
 Sev'n brawny bulls with his own hand he kills;
 Then on the broiling entrails oil he pours; 5910
 Which, ointed thus, the raging flame devours.
 Late the nocturnal sacrifice begun,
 Nor ended till the next returning sun.
 Then earth began to bellow, trees to dance,
 And howling dogs in glimm'ring light advance, 5915

Ere Hecate came. "Far hence be souls profane!"
 The Sibyl cried, "and from the grove abstain!
 Now, Trojan, take the way thy fates afford;
 Assume thy courage, and unsheathe thy sword."
 She said, and pass'd along the gloomy space; 5920
 The prince pursued her steps with equal pace.

Ye realms, yet unreveal'd to human sight,
 Ye gods who rule the regions of the night,
 Ye gliding ghosts, permit me to relate
 The mystic wonders of your silent state! 5925

Obscure they went thro' dreary shades, that led
 Along the waste dominions of the dead.
 Thus wander travelers in woods by night,
 By the moon's doubtful and malignant light,
 When Jove in dusky clouds involves the skies, 5930
 And the faint crescent shoots by fits before their eyes.

Just in the gate and in the jaws of hell,
 Revengeful Cares and sullen Sorrows dwell,
 And pale Diseases, and repining Age,
 Want, Fear, and Famine's unresisted rage; 5935
 Here Toils, and Death, and Death's half-brother, Sleep,

Forms terrible to view, their sentry keep;
 With anxious Pleasures of a guilty mind,
 Deep Frauds before, and open Force behind;
 The Furies' iron beds; and Strife, that shakes 5940
 Her hissing tresses and unfolds her snakes.

Full in the midst of this infernal road,
 An elm displays her dusky arms abroad:
 The God of Sleep there hides his heavy head,
 And empty dreams on ev'ry leaf are spread. 5945

Of various forms unnumber'd specters more,
 Centaurs, and double shapes, besiege the door.
 Before the passage, horrid Hydra stands,
 And Briareus with all his hundred hands;
 Gorgons, Geryon with his triple frame; 5950
 And vain Chimaera vomits empty flame.

The chief unsheath'd his shining steel, prepar'd,
 Tho' seiz'd with sudden fear, to force the guard,
 Off'ring his brandish'd weapon at their face;
 Had not the Sibyl stopp'd his eager pace, 5955
 And told him what those empty phantoms were:
 Forms without bodies, and impassive air.

Hence to deep Acheron they take their way,
 Whose troubled eddies, thick with ooze and clay,
 Are whirl'd aloft, and in Cocytus lost. 5960

There Charon stands, who rules the dreary coast—
 A sordid god: down from his hoary chin
 A length of beard descends, uncomb'd, unclean;
 His eyes, like hollow furnaces on fire;
 A girdle, foul with grease, binds his obscene attire. 5965

He spreads his canvas; with his pole he steers;
 The freights of flitting ghosts in his thin bottom bears.
 He look'd in years; yet in his years were seen
 A youthful vigor and autumnal green.

- An airy crowd came rushing where he stood, 5970
 Which fill'd the margin of the fatal flood:
 Husbands and wives, boys and unmarried maids,
 And mighty heroes' more majestic shades,
 And youths, intomb'd before their fathers' eyes,
 With hollow groans, and shrieks, and feeble cries. 5975
 Thick as the leaves in autumn strow the woods,
 Or fowls, by winter forc'd, forsake the floods,
 And wing their hasty flight to happier lands;
 Such, and so thick, the shiv'ring army stands,
 And press for passage with extended hands. 5980
 Now these, now those, the surly boatman bore:
 The rest he drove to distance from the shore.
 The hero, who beheld with wond'ring eyes
 The tumult mix'd with shrieks, laments, and cries,
 Ask'd of his guide, what the rude concourse meant; 5985
 Why to the shore the thronging people bent;
 What forms of law among the ghosts were us'd;
 Why some were ferried o'er, and some refus'd.
- “Son of Anchises, offspring of the gods,”
 The Sibyl said, “you see the Stygian floods, 5990
 The sacred stream which heav'n's imperial state
 Attests in oaths, and fears to violate.
 The ghosts rejected are th' unhappy crew
 Depriv'd of sepulchers and fun'ral due:
 The boatman, Charon; those, the buried host, 5995
 He ferries over to the farther coast;
 Nor dares his transport vessel cross the waves
 With such whose bones are not compos'd in graves.
 A hundred years they wander on the shore;
 At length, their penance done, are wafted o'er.” 6000
 The Trojan chief his forward pace repress'd,
 Revolving anxious thoughts within his breast,
 He saw his friends, who, whelm'd beneath the waves,
 Their fun'ral honors claim'd, and ask'd their quiet graves.
 The lost Leucaspis in the crowd he knew, 6005
 And the brave leader of the Lycian crew,
 Whom, on the Tyrrhene seas, the tempests met;
 The sailors master'd, and the ship o'erset.
- Amidst the spirits, Palinurus press'd,
 Yet fresh from life, a new-admitted guest, 6010
 Who, while he steering view'd the stars, and bore
 His course from Afric to the Latian shore,
 Fell headlong down. The Trojan fix'd his view,
 And scarcely thro' the gloom the sullen shadow knew.
 Then thus the prince: “What envious pow'r, O friend, 6015
 Brought your lov'd life to this disastrous end?
 For Phoebus, ever true in all he said,
 Has in your fate alone my faith betray'd.
 The god foretold you should not die, before
 You reach'd, secure from seas, th' Italian shore. 6020
 Is this th' unerring pow'r?” The ghost replied;
 “Nor Phoebus flatter'd, nor his answers lied;
 Nor envious gods have sent me to the deep:
 But, while the stars and course of heav'n I keep,

My wearied eyes were seiz'd with fatal sleep. 6025
 I fell; and, with my weight, the helm constrain'd
 Was drawn along, which yet my gripe retain'd.
 Now by the winds and raging waves I swear,
 Your safety, more than mine, was then my care;
 Lest, of the guide bereft, the rudder lost, 6030
 Your ship should run against the rocky coast.
 Three blust'ring nights, borne by the southern blast,
 I floated, and discover'd land at last:
 High on a mounting wave my head I bore,
 Forcing my strength, and gath'ring to the shore. 6035
 Panting, but past the danger, now I seiz'd
 The craggy cliffs, and my tir'd members eas'd.
 While, cumber'd with my dropping clothes, I lay,
 The cruel nation, covetous of prey,
 Stain'd with my blood th' inhospitable coast; 6040
 And now, by winds and waves, my lifeless limbs are toss'd:
 Which O avert, by yon ethereal light,
 Which I have lost for this eternal night!
 Or, if by dearer ties you may be won,
 By your dead sire, and by your living son, 6045
 Redeem from this reproach my wand'ring ghost;
 Or with your navy seek the Velin coast,
 And in a peaceful grave my corpse compose;
 Or, if a nearer way your mother shows,
 Without whose aid you durst not undertake 6050
 This frightful passage o'er the Stygian lake,
 Lend to this wretch your hand, and waft him o'er
 To the sweet banks of yon forbidden shore."
 Scarce had he said, the prophetess began:
 "What hopes delude thee, miserable man? 6055
 Think'st thou, thus unintomb'd, to cross the floods,
 To view the Furies and infernal gods,
 And visit, without leave, the dark abodes?
 Attend the term of long revolving years;
 Fate, and the dooming gods, are deaf to tears. 6060
 This comfort of thy dire misfortune take:
 The wrath of Heav'n, inflicted for thy sake,
 With vengeance shall pursue th' inhuman coast,
 Till they propitiate thy offended ghost,
 And raise a tomb, with vows and solemn pray'r; 6065
 And Palinurus' name the place shall bear."
 This calm'd his cares; sooth'd with his future fame,
 And pleas'd to hear his propagated name.

Now nearer to the Stygian lake they draw:
 Whom, from the shore, the surly boatman saw; 6070
 Observ'd their passage thro' the shady wood,
 And mark'd their near approaches to the flood.
 Then thus he call'd aloud, inflam'd with wrath:
 "Mortal, whate'er, who this forbidden path
 In arms presum'st to tread, I charge thee, stand, 6075
 And tell thy name, and bus'ness in the land.
 Know this, the realm of night—the Stygian shore:
 My boat conveys no living bodies o'er;
 Nor was I pleas'd great Theseus once to bear,
 Who forc'd a passage with his pointed spear, 6080

Nor strong Alcides—men of mighty fame,
 And from th' immortal gods their lineage came.
 In fetters one the barking porter tied,
 And took him trembling from his sov'reign's side:
 Two sought by force to seize his beauteous bride." 6085
 To whom the Sibyl thus: "Compose thy mind;
 Nor frauds are here contriv'd, nor force design'd.
 Still may the dog the wand'ring troops constrain
 Of airy ghosts, and vex the guilty train,
 And with her grisly lord his lovely queen remain. 6090
 The Trojan chief, whose lineage is from Jove,
 Much fam'd for arms, and more for filial love,
 Is sent to seek his sire in your Elysian grove.
 If neither piety, nor Heav'n's command,
 Can gain his passage to the Stygian strand, 6095
 This fatal present shall prevail at least."
 Then shew'd the shining bough, conceal'd within her vest.
 No more was needful: for the gloomy god
 Stood mute with awe, to see the golden rod;
 Admir'd the destin'd off'ring to his queen— 6100
 A venerable gift, so rarely seen.
 His fury thus appeas'd, he puts to land;
 The ghosts forsake their seats at his command:
 He clears the deck, receives the mighty freight;
 The leaky vessel groans beneath the weight. 6105
 Slowly she sails, and scarcely stems the tides;
 The pressing water pours within her sides.
 His passengers at length are wafted o'er,
 Expos'd, in muddy weeds, upon the miry shore.

No sooner landed, in his den they found 6110
 The triple porter of the Stygian sound,
 Grim Cerberus, who soon began to rear
 His crested snakes, and arm'd his bristling hair.
 The prudent Sibyl had before prepar'd
 A sop, in honey steep'd, to charm the guard; 6115
 Which, mix'd with pow'rful drugs, she cast before
 His greedy grinning jaws, just op'd to roar.
 With three enormous mouths he gapes; and straight,
 With hunger press'd, devours the pleasing bait.
 Long draughts of sleep his monstrous limbs enslave; 6120
 He reels, and, falling, fills the spacious cave.
 The keeper charm'd, the chief without delay
 Pass'd on, and took th' irremeable way.
 Before the gates, the cries of babes new born,
 Whom fate had from their tender mothers torn, 6125
 Assault his ears: then those, whom form of laws
 Condemn'd to die, when traitors judg'd their cause.
 Nor want they lots, nor judges to review
 The wrongful sentence, and award a new.
 Minos, the strict inquisitor, appears; 6130
 And lives and crimes, with his assessors, hears.
 Round in his urn the blended balls he rolls,
 Absolves the just, and dooms the guilty souls.
 The next, in place and punishment, are they
 Who prodigally throw their souls away; 6135
 Fools, who, repining at their wretched state,

And loathing anxious life, suborn'd their fate.
 With late repentance now they would retrieve
 The bodies they forsook, and wish to live;
 Their pains and poverty desire to bear, 6140
 To view the light of heav'n, and breathe the vital air:
 But fate forbids; the Stygian floods oppose,
 And with circling streams the captive souls inclose.

Not far from thence, the Mournful Fields appear
 So call'd from lovers that inhabit there. 6145

The souls whom that unhappy flame invades,
 In secret solitude and myrtle shades
 Make endless moans, and, pining with desire,
 Lament too late their unextinguish'd fire. 6150

Here Procris, Eriphyle here he found, 6150

Baring her breast, yet bleeding with the wound
 Made by her son. He saw Pasiphae there,
 With Phaedra's ghost, a foul incestuous pair.
 There Laodamia, with Evadne, moves,
 Unhappy both, but loyal in their loves: 6155

Caeneus, a woman once, and once a man,
 But ending in the sex she first began.

Not far from these Phoenician Dido stood,
 Fresh from her wound, her bosom bath'd in blood; 6160

Whom when the Trojan hero hardly knew, 6160

Obscure in shades, and with a doubtful view,
 (Doubtful as he who sees, thro' dusky night,
 Or thinks he sees, the moon's uncertain light,)

With tears he first approach'd the sullen shade;
 And, as his love inspir'd him, thus he said: 6165

“Unhappy queen! then is the common breath
 Of rumor true, in your reported death,

And I, alas! the cause? By Heav'n, I vow,
 And all the pow'rs that rule the realms below, 6170

Unwilling I forsook your friendly state,
 Commanded by the gods, and forc'd by fate—

Those gods, that fate, whose unresisted might
 Have sent me to these regions void of light,
 Thro' the vast empire of eternal night.

Nor dar'd I to presume, that, press'd with grief, 6175

My flight should urge you to this dire relief.
 Stay, stay your steps, and listen to my vows:

“T is the last interview that fate allows!”

In vain he thus attempts her mind to move
 With tears, and pray'rs, and late-repenting love. 6180

Disdainfully she look'd; then turning round,
 But fix'd her eyes unmov'd upon the ground,

And what he says and swears, regards no more
 Than the deaf rocks, when the loud billows roar; 6185

But whirl'd away, to shun his hateful sight,
 Hid in the forest and the shades of night;

Then sought Sichaëus thro' the shady grove,
 Who answer'd all her cares, and equal'd all her love.

Some pious tears the pitying hero paid,
 And follow'd with his eyes the flitting shade, 6190

Then took the forward way, by fate ordain'd,

- And, with his guide, the farther fields attain'd,
Where, sever'd from the rest, the warrior souls remain'd.
Tydeus he met, with Meleager's race,
The pride of armies, and the soldiers' grace; 6195
And pale Adrastus with his ghastly face.
Of Trojan chiefs he view'd a num'rous train,
All much lamented, all in battle slain;
Glaucus and Medon, high above the rest,
Antenor's sons, and Ceres' sacred priest. 6200
And proud Idaeus, Priam's charioteer,
Who shakes his empty reins, and aims his airy spear.
The gladsome ghosts, in circling troops, attend
And with unwearied eyes behold their friend;
Delight to hover near, and long to know 6205
What bus'ness brought him to the realms below.
But Argive chiefs, and Agamemnon's train,
When his refulgent arms flash'd thro' the shady plain,
Fled from his well-known face, with wonted fear,
As when his thund'ring sword and pointed spear 6210
Drove headlong to their ships, and glean'd the routed rear.
They rais'd a feeble cry, with trembling notes;
But the weak voice deceiv'd their gasping throats.
- Here Priam's son, Deiphobus, he found,
Whose face and limbs were one continued wound: 6215
Dishonest, with lopp'd arms, the youth appears,
Spoil'd of his nose, and shorten'd of his ears.
He scarcely knew him, striving to disown
His blotted form, and blushing to be known;
And therefore first began: "O Teucer's race, 6220
Who durst thy faultless figure thus deface?
What heart could wish, what hand inflict, this dire disgrace?
'Twas fam'd, that in our last and fatal night
Your single prowess long sustain'd the fight, 6225
Till tir'd, not forc'd, a glorious fate you chose,
And fell upon a heap of slaughter'd foes.
But, in remembrance of so brave a deed,
A tomb and fun'ral honors I decreed;
Thrice call'd your manes on the Trojan plains:
The place your armor and your name retains. 6230
Your body too I sought, and, had I found,
Design'd for burial in your native ground."
- The ghost replied: "Your piety has paid
All needful rites, to rest my wand'ring shade;
But cruel fate, and my more cruel wife, 6235
To Grecian swords betray'd my sleeping life.
These are the monuments of Helen's love:
The shame I bear below, the marks I bore above.
You know in what deluding joys we pass'd
The night that was by Heav'n decreed our last: 6240
For, when the fatal horse, descending down,
Pregnant with arms, o'erwhelm'd th' unhappy town
She feign'd nocturnal orgies; left my bed,
And, mix'd with Trojan dames, the dances led
Then, waving high her torch, the signal made, 6245
Which rous'd the Grecians from their ambushade.

With watching overworn, with cares oppress'd,
 Unhappy I had laid me down to rest,
 And heavy sleep my weary limbs possess'd. 6250
 Meantime my worthy wife our arms mislaid,
 And from beneath my head my sword convey'd;
 The door unlatch'd, and, with repeated calls,
 Invites her former lord within my walls.
 Thus in her crime her confidence she plac'd,
 And with new treasons would redeem the past. 6255
 What need I more? Into the room they ran,
 And meanly murder'd a defenseless man.
 Ulysses, basely born, first led the way.
 Avenging pow'rs! with justice if I pray,
 That fortune be their own another day! 6260
 But answer you; and in your turn relate,
 What brought you, living, to the Stygian state:
 Driv'n by the winds and errors of the sea,
 Or did you Heav'n's superior doom obey?
 Or tell what other chance conducts your way, 6265
 To view with mortal eyes our dark retreats,
 Tumults and torments of th' infernal seats."

While thus in talk the flying hours they pass,
 The sun had finish'd more than half his race:
 And they, perhaps, in words and tears had spent 6270
 The little time of stay which Heav'n had lent;
 But thus the Sibyl chides their long delay:
 "Night rushes down, and headlong drives the day:
 'T is here, in different paths, the way divides;
 The right to Pluto's golden palace guides; 6275
 The left to that unhappy region tends,
 Which to the depth of Tartarus descends;
 The seat of night profound, and punish'd fiends."
 Then thus Deiphobus: "O sacred maid,
 Forbear to chide, and be your will obey'd! 6280
 Lo! to the secret shadows I retire,
 To pay my penance till my years expire.
 Proceed, auspicious prince, with glory crown'd,
 And born to better fates than I have found."
 He said; and, while he said, his steps he turn'd 6285
 To secret shadows, and in silence mourn'd.

The hero, looking on the left, espied
 A lofty tow'r, and strong on ev'ry side
 With treble walls, which Phlegethon surrounds,
 Whose fiery flood the burning empire bounds; 6290
 And, press'd betwixt the rocks, the bellowing noise resounds
 Wide is the fronting gate, and, rais'd on high
 With adamantine columns, threatens the sky.
 Vain is the force of man, and Heav'n's as vain,
 To crush the pillars which the pile sustain. 6295
 Sublime on these a tow'r of steel is rear'd;
 And dire Tisiphone there keeps the ward,
 Girt in her sanguine gown, by night and day,
 Observant of the souls that pass the downward way.
 From hence are heard the groans of ghosts, the pains 6300
 Of sounding lashes and of dragging chains.

The Trojan stood astonish'd at their cries,
 And ask'd his guide from whence those yells arise;
 And what the crimes, and what the tortures were,
 And loud laments that rent the liquid air. 6305

She thus replied: "The chaste and holy race
 Are all forbidden this polluted place.
 But Hecate, when she gave to rule the woods,
 Then led me trembling thro' these dire abodes,
 And taught the tortures of th' avenging gods. 6310
 These are the realms of unrelenting fate;
 And awful Rhadamanthus rules the state.
 He hears and judges each committed crime;
 Enquires into the manner, place, and time.
 The conscious wretch must all his acts reveal, 6315
 (Loth to confess, unable to conceal),
 From the first moment of his vital breath,
 To his last hour of unrepenting death.
 Straight, o'er the guilty ghost, the Fury shakes
 The sounding whip and brandishes her snakes, 6320
 And the pale sinner, with her sisters, takes.
 Then, of itself, unfolds th' eternal door;
 With dreadful sounds the brazen hinges roar.
 You see, before the gate, what stalking ghost
 Commands the guard, what sentries keep the post. 6325
 More formidable Hydra stands within,
 Whose jaws with iron teeth severely grin.
 The gaping gulf low to the center lies,
 And twice as deep as earth is distant from the skies.
 The rivals of the gods, the Titan race, 6330
 Here, sing'd with lightning, roll within th' unfathom'd space.
 Here lie th' Alaeon twins, (I saw them both,)
 Enormous bodies, of gigantic growth,
 Who dar'd in fight the Thund'rer to defy,
 Affect his heav'n, and force him from the sky. 6335
 Salmoneus, suff'ring cruel pains, I found,
 For emulating Jove; the rattling sound
 Of mimic thunder, and the glitt'ring blaze
 Of pointed lightnings, and their forky rays.
 Thro' Elis and the Grecian towns he flew; 6340
 Th' audacious wretch four fiery coursers drew:
 He wav'd a torch aloft, and, madly vain,
 Sought godlike worship from a servile train.
 Ambitious fool! with horny hoofs to pass
 O'er hollow arches of resounding brass, 6345
 To rival thunder in its rapid course,
 And imitate inimitable force!
 But he, the King of Heav'n, obscure on high,
 Bar'd his red arm, and, launching from the sky
 His writhen bolt, not shaking empty smoke, 6350
 Down to the deep abyss the flaming felon strook.
 There Tityus was to see, who took his birth
 From heav'n, his nursing from the foodful earth.
 Here his gigantic limbs, with large embrace,
 Infold nine acres of infernal space. 6355
 A rav'nous vulture, in his open'd side,
 Her crooked beak and cruel talons tried;

Still for the growing liver digg'd his breast;
 The growing liver still supplied the feast;
 Still are his entrails fruitful to their pains: 6360
 Th' immortal hunger lasts, th' immortal food remains.
 Ixion and Perithous I could name,
 And more Thessalian chiefs of mighty fame.
 High o'er their heads a mold'ring rock is plac'd,
 That promises a fall, and shakes at ev'ry blast. 6365
 They lie below, on golden beds display'd;
 And genial feasts with regal pomp are made.
 The Queen of Furies by their sides is set,
 And snatches from their mouths th' untasted meat,
 Which if they touch, her hissing snakes she rears, 6370
 Tossing her torch, and thund'ring in their ears.
 Then they, who brothers' better claim disown,
 Expel their parents, and usurp the throne;
 Defraud their clients, and, to lucre sold,
 Sit brooding on unprofitable gold; 6375
 Who dare not give, and ev'n refuse to lend
 To their poor kindred, or a wanting friend.
 Vast is the throng of these; nor less the train
 Of lustful youths, for foul adult'ry slain:
 Hosts of deserters, who their honor sold, 6380
 And basely broke their faith for bribes of gold.
 All these within the dungeon's depth remain,
 Despairing pardon, and expecting pain.
 Ask not what pains; nor farther seek to know
 Their process, or the forms of law below. 6385
 Some roll a weighty stone; some, laid along,
 And bound with burning wires, on spokes of wheels are hung
 Unhappy Theseus, doom'd for ever there,
 Is fix'd by fate on his eternal chair;
 And wretched Phlegyas warns the world with cries 6390
 (Could warning make the world more just or wise):
 'Learn righteousness, and dread th' avenging deities.'
 To tyrants others have their country sold,
 Imposing foreign lords, for foreign gold;
 Some have old laws repeal'd, new statutes made, 6395
 Not as the people pleas'd, but as they paid;
 With incest some their daughters' bed profan'd:
 All dar'd the worst of ills, and, what they dar'd, attain'd.
 Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
 And throats of brass, inspir'd with iron lungs, 6400
 I could not half those horrid crimes repeat,
 Nor half the punishments those crimes have met.
 But let us haste our voyage to pursue:
 The walls of Pluto's palace are in view;
 The gate, and iron arch above it, stands 6405
 On anvils labor'd by the Cyclops' hands.
 Before our farther way the Fates allow,
 Here must we fix on high the golden bough."

She said: and thro' the gloomy shades they pass'd,
 And chose the middle path. Arriv'd at last, 6410
 The prince with living water sprinkled o'er
 His limbs and body; then approach'd the door,
 Possess'd the porch, and on the front above

- He fix'd the fatal bough requir'd by Pluto's love.
 These holy rites perform'd, they took their way 6415
 Where long extended plains of pleasure lay:
 The verdant fields with those of heav'n may vie,
 With ether vested, and a purple sky;
 The blissful seats of happy souls below.
 Stars of their own, and their own suns, they know; 6420
 Their airy limbs in sports they exercise,
 And on the green contend the wrestler's prize.
 Some in heroic verse divinely sing;
 Others in artful measures led the ring.
 The Thracian bard, surrounded by the rest, 6425
 There stands conspicuous in his flowing vest;
 His flying fingers, and harmonious quill,
 Strikes sev'n distinguish'd notes, and sev'n at once they fill.
 Here found they Teucer's old heroic race,
 Born better times and happier years to grace. 6430
 Assaracus and Ilus here enjoy
 Perpetual fame, with him who founded Troy.
 The chief beheld their chariots from afar,
 Their shining arms, and coursers train'd to war:
 Their lances fix'd in earth, their steeds around, 6435
 Free from their harness, graze the flow'ry ground.
 The love of horses which they had, alive,
 And care of chariots, after death survive.
 Some cheerful souls were feasting on the plain;
 Some did the song, and some the choir maintain, 6440
 Beneath a laurel shade, where mighty Po
 Mounts up to woods above, and hides his head below.
 Here patriots live, who, for their country's good,
 In fighting fields, were prodigal of blood:
 Priests of unblemish'd lives here make abode, 6445
 And poets worthy their inspiring god;
 And searching wits, of more mechanic parts,
 Who grac'd their age with new-invented arts:
 Those who to worth their bounty did extend,
 And those who knew that bounty to commend. 6450
 The heads of these with holy fillets bound,
 And all their temples were with garlands crown'd.
- To these the Sibyl thus her speech address'd,
 And first to him surrounded by the rest
 (Tow'ring his height, and ample was his breast): 6455
 "Say, happy souls, divine Musaeus, say,
 Where lives Anchises, and where lies our way
 To find the hero, for whose only sake
 We sought the dark abodes, and cross'd the bitter lake?"
 To this the sacred poet thus replied: 6460
 "In no fix'd place the happy souls reside.
 In groves we live, and lie on mossy beds,
 By crystal streams, that murmur thro' the meads:
 But pass yon easy hill, and thence descend;
 The path conducts you to your journey's end." 6465
 This said, he led them up the mountain's brow,
 And shews them all the shining fields below.
 They wind the hill, and thro' the blissful meadows go.

But old Anchises, in a flow'ry vale,
 Review'd his muster'd race, and took the tale: 6470
 Those happy spirits, which, ordain'd by fate,
 For future beings and new bodies wait—
 With studious thought observ'd th' illustrious throng,
 In nature's order as they pass'd along:
 Their names, their fates, their conduct, and their care, 6475
 In peaceful senates and successful war.
 He, when Aeneas on the plain appears,
 Meets him with open arms, and falling tears.
 "Welcome," he said, "the gods' undoubted race!
 O long expected to my dear embrace! 6480
 Once more 't is giv'n me to behold your face!
 The love and pious duty which you pay
 Have pass'd the perils of so hard a way.
 'T is true, computing times, I now believ'd
 The happy day approach'd; nor are my hopes deceiv'd. 6485
 What length of lands, what oceans have you pass'd;
 What storms sustain'd, and on what shores been cast?
 How have I fear'd your fate! but fear'd it most,
 When love assail'd you, on the Libyan coast."
 To this, the filial duty thus replies: 6490
 "Your sacred ghost before my sleeping eyes
 Appear'd, and often urg'd this painful enterprise.
 After long tossing on the Tyrrhene sea,
 My navy rides at anchor in the bay.
 But reach your hand, O parent shade, nor shun 6495
 The dear embraces of your longing son!"
 He said; and falling tears his face bedew:
 Then thrice around his neck his arms he threw;
 And thrice the flitting shadow slipp'd away,
 Like winds, or empty dreams that fly the day. 6500

Now, in a secret vale, the Trojan sees
 A sep'rate grove, thro' which a gentle breeze
 Plays with a passing breath, and whispers thro' the trees;
 And, just before the confines of the wood,
 The gliding Lethe leads her silent flood. 6505
 About the boughs an airy nation flew,
 Thick as the humming bees, that hunt the golden dew;
 In summer's heat on tops of lilies feed,
 And creep within their bells, to suck the balmy seed:
 The winged army roams the fields around; 6510
 The rivers and the rocks remurmur to the sound.
 Aeneas wond'ring stood, then ask'd the cause
 Which to the stream the crowding people draws.
 Then thus the sire: "The souls that throng the flood
 Are those to whom, by fate, are other bodies ow'd: 6515
 In Lethe's lake they long oblivion taste,
 Of future life secure, forgetful of the past.
 Long has my soul desir'd this time and place,
 To set before your sight your glorious race,
 That this presaging joy may fire your mind 6520
 To seek the shores by destiny design'd."—
 "O father, can it be, that souls sublime
 Return to visit our terrestrial clime,

And that the gen'rous mind, releas'd by death,
Can covet lazy limbs and mortal breath?" 6525

Anchises then, in order, thus begun
To clear those wonders to his godlike son:
"Know, first, that heav'n, and earth's compacted frame,
And flowing waters, and the starry flame,
And both the radiant lights, one common soul 6530
Inspires and feeds, and animates the whole.

This active mind, infus'd thro' all the space,
Unites and mingles with the mighty mass.
Hence men and beasts the breath of life obtain,
And birds of air, and monsters of the main. 6535

Th' ethereal vigor is in all the same,
And every soul is fill'd with equal flame;
As much as earthy limbs, and gross allay
Of mortal members, subject to decay,
Blunt not the beams of heav'n and edge of day. 6540

From this coarse mixture of terrestrial parts,
Desire and fear by turns possess their hearts,
And grief, and joy; nor can the groveling mind,
In the dark dungeon of the limbs confin'd,
Assert the native skies, or own its heav'nly kind: 6545

Nor death itself can wholly wash their stains;
But long-contracted filth ev'n in the soul remains.
The relics of inveterate vice they wear,
And spots of sin obscene in ev'ry face appear.
For this are various penances enjoind; 6550

And some are hung to bleach upon the wind,
Some plung'd in waters, others purg'd in fires,
Till all the dregs are drain'd, and all the rust expires.
All have their manes, and those manes bear:
The few, so cleans'd, to these abodes repair, 6555

And breathe, in ample fields, the soft Elysian air.
Then are they happy, when by length of time
The scurf is worn away of each committed crime;
No speck is left of their habitual stains,
But the pure ether of the soul remains. 6560

But, when a thousand rolling years are past,
(So long their punishments and penance last,)
Whole droves of minds are, by the driving god,
Compell'd to drink the deep Lethaeon flood,
In large forgetful draughts to steep the cares 6565
Of their past labors, and their irksome years,
That, unrememb'ring of its former pain,
The soul may suffer mortal flesh again."

Thus having said, the father spirit leads
The priestess and his son thro' swarms of shades, 6570
And takes a rising ground, from thence to see
The long procession of his progeny.

"Survey," pursued the sire, "this airy throng,
As, offer'd to thy view, they pass along.
These are th' Italian names, which fate will join 6575
With ours, and graff upon the Trojan line.
Observe the youth who first appears in sight,
And holds the nearest station to the light,

Already seems to snuff the vital air,
 And leans just forward, on a shining spear: 6580
 Silvius is he, thy last-begotten race,
 But first in order sent, to fill thy place;
 An Alban name, but mix'd with Dardan blood,
 Born in the covert of a shady wood:
 Him fair Lavinia, thy surviving wife, 6585
 Shall breed in groves, to lead a solitary life.
 In Alba he shall fix his royal seat,
 And, born a king, a race of kings beget.
 Then Procas, honor of the Trojan name,
 Capys, and Numitor, of endless fame. 6590
 A second Silvius after these appears;
 Silvius Aeneas, for thy name he bears;
 For arms and justice equally renown'd,
 Who, late restor'd, in Alba shall be crown'd.
 How great they look! how vig'rously they wield 6595
 Their weighty lances, and sustain the shield!
 But they, who crown'd with oaken wreaths appear,
 Shall Gabian walls and strong Fidena rear;
 Nomentum, Bola, with Pometia, found;
 And raise Collatian tow'rs on rocky ground. 6600
 All these shall then be towns of mighty fame,
 Tho' now they lie obscure, and lands without a name.
 See Romulus the great, born to restore
 The crown that once his injur'd grandsire wore.
 This prince a priestess of your blood shall bear, 6605
 And like his sire in arms he shall appear.
 Two rising crests, his royal head adorn;
 Born from a god, himself to godhead born:
 His sire already signs him for the skies,
 And marks the seat amidst the deities. 6610
 Auspicious chief! thy race, in times to come,
 Shall spread the conquests of imperial Rome—
 Rome, whose ascending tow'rs shall heav'n invade,
 Involving earth and ocean in her shade;
 High as the Mother of the Gods in place, 6615
 And proud, like her, of an immortal race.
 Then, when in pomp she makes the Phrygian round,
 With golden turrets on her temples crown'd;
 A hundred gods her sweeping train supply;
 Her offspring all, and all command the sky. 6620

“Now fix your sight, and stand intent, to see
 Your Roman race, and Julian progeny.
 The mighty Caesar waits his vital hour,
 Impatient for the world, and grasps his promis'd pow'r.
 But next behold the youth of form divine, 6625
 Caesar himself, exalted in his line;
 Augustus, promis'd oft, and long foretold,
 Sent to the realm that Saturn rul'd of old;
 Born to restore a better age of gold.
 Afric and India shall his pow'r obey; 6630
 He shall extend his propagated sway
 Beyond the solar year, without the starry way,
 Where Atlas turns the rolling heav'ns around,
 And his broad shoulders with their lights are crown'd.

At his foreseen approach, already quake 6635
 The Caspian kingdoms and Maeotian lake:
 Their seers behold the tempest from afar,
 And threat'ning oracles denounce the war.
 Nile hears him knocking at his sev'nfold gates,
 And seeks his hidden spring, and fears his nephew's fates. 6640
 Nor Hercules more lands or labors knew,
 Not tho' the brazen-footed hind he slew,
 Freed Erymanthus from the foaming boar,
 And dipp'd his arrows in Lernaean gore;
 Nor Bacchus, turning from his Indian war, 6645
 By tigers drawn triumphant in his car,
 From Nisus' top descending on the plains,
 With curling vines around his purple reins.
 And doubt we yet thro' dangers to pursue
 The paths of honor, and a crown in view? 6650
 But what's the man, who from afar appears?
 His head with olive crown'd, his hand a censer bears,
 His hoary beard and holy vestments bring
 His lost idea back: I know the Roman king.
 He shall to peaceful Rome new laws ordain, 6655
 Call'd from his mean abode a scepter to sustain.
 Him Tullus next in dignity succeeds,
 An active prince, and prone to martial deeds.
 He shall his troops for fighting fields prepare,
 Disus'd to toils, and triumphs of the war. 6660
 By dint of sword his crown he shall increase,
 And scour his armor from the rust of peace.
 Whom Ancus follows, with a fawning air,
 But vain within, and proudly popular.
 Next view the Tarquin kings, th' avenging sword 6665
 Of Brutus, justly drawn, and Rome restor'd.
 He first renews the rods and ax severe,
 And gives the consuls royal robes to wear.
 His sons, who seek the tyrant to sustain,
 And long for arbitrary lords again, 6670
 With ignominy scourg'd, in open sight,
 He dooms to death deserv'd, asserting public right.
 Unhappy man, to break the pious laws
 Of nature, pleading in his children's cause!
 Howeer the doubtful fact is understood, 6675
 'T is love of honor, and his country's good:
 The consul, not the father, sheds the blood.
 Behold Torquatus the same track pursue;
 And, next, the two devoted Decii view:
 The Drusian line, Camillus loaded home 6680
 With standards well redeem'd, and foreign foes o'ercome
 The pair you see in equal armor shine,
 Now, friends below, in close embraces join;
 But, when they leave the shady realms of night,
 And, cloth'd in bodies, breathe your upper light, 6685
 With mortal hate each other shall pursue:
 What wars, what wounds, what slaughter shall ensue!
 From Alpine heights the father first descends;
 His daughter's husband in the plain attends:
 His daughter's husband arms his eastern friends. 6690
 Embrace again, my sons, be foes no more;

Nor stain your country with her children's gore!
 And thou, the first, lay down thy lawless claim,
 Thou, of my blood, who bearist the Julian name!
 Another comes, who shall in triumph ride, 6695
 And to the Capitol his chariot guide,
 From conquer'd Corinth, rich with Grecian spoils.
 And yet another, fam'd for warlike toils,
 On Argos shall impose the Roman laws,
 And on the Greeks revenge the Trojan cause; 6700
 Shall drag in chains their Achillean race;
 Shall vindicate his ancestors' disgrace,
 And Pallas, for her violated place.
 Great Cato there, for gravity renown'd,
 And conqu'ring Cossus goes with laurels crown'd. 6705
 Who can omit the Gracchi? who declare
 The Scipios' worth, those thunderbolts of war,
 The double bane of Carthage? Who can see
 Without esteem for virtuous poverty,
 Severe Fabricius, or can cease t' admire 6710
 The plowman consul in his coarse attire?
 Tir'd as I am, my praise the Fabii claim;
 And thou, great hero, greatest of thy name,
 Ordain'd in war to save the sinking state,
 And, by delays, to put a stop to fate! 6715
 Let others better mold the running mass
 Of metals, and inform the breathing brass,
 And soften into flesh a marble face;
 Plead better at the bar; describe the skies,
 And when the stars descend, and when they rise. 6720
 But, Rome, 't is thine alone, with awful sway,
 To rule mankind, and make the world obey,
 Disposing peace and war by thy own majestic way;
 To tame the proud, the fetter'd slave to free:
 These are imperial arts, and worthy thee." 6725

He paus'd; and, while with wond'ring eyes they view'd
 The passing spirits, thus his speech renew'd:
 "See great Marcellus! how, untir'd in toils,
 He moves with manly grace, how rich with regal spoils!
 He, when his country, threaten'd with alarms, 6730
 Requires his courage and his conqu'ring arms,
 Shall more than once the Punic bands affright;
 Shall kill the Gaulish king in single fight;
 Then to the Capitol in triumph move,
 And the third spoils shall grace Feretrian Jove." 6735
 Aeneas here beheld, of form divine,
 A godlike youth in glitt'ring armor shine,
 With great Marcellus keeping equal pace;
 But gloomy were his eyes, dejected was his face.
 He saw, and, wond'ring, ask'd his airy guide, 6740
 What and of whence was he, who press'd the hero's side:
 "His son, or one of his illustrious name?
 How like the former, and almost the same!
 Observe the crowds that compass him around;
 All gaze, and all admire, and raise a shouting sound: 6745
 But hov'ring mists around his brows are spread,
 And night, with sable shades, involves his head."

“Seek not to know,” the ghost replied with tears,
 “The sorrows of thy sons in future years.
 This youth (the blissful vision of a day) 6750
 Shall just be shown on earth, and snatch'd away.
 The gods too high had rais'd the Roman state,
 Were but their gifts as permanent as great.
 What groans of men shall fill the Martian field!
 How fierce a blaze his flaming pile shall yield! 6755
 What fun'ral pomp shall floating Tiber see,
 When, rising from his bed, he views the sad solemnity!
 No youth shall equal hopes of glory give,
 No youth afford so great a cause to grieve;
 The Trojan honor, and the Roman boast, 6760
 Admir'd when living, and ador'd when lost!
 Mirror of ancient faith in early youth!
 Undaunted worth, inviolable truth!
 No foe, unpunish'd, in the fighting field
 Shall dare thee, foot to foot, with sword and shield; 6765
 Much less in arms oppose thy matchless force,
 When thy sharp spurs shall urge thy foaming horse.
 Ah! couldst thou break thro' fate's severe decree,
 A new Marcellus shall arise in thee!
 Full canisters of fragrant lilies bring, 6770
 Mix'd with the purple roses of the spring;
 Let me with fun'ral flow'rs his body strow;
 This gift which parents to their children owe,
 This unavailing gift, at least, I may bestow!”
 Thus having said, he led the hero round 6775
 The confines of the blest Elysian ground;
 Which when Anchises to his son had shown,
 And fir'd his mind to mount the promis'd throne,
 He tells the future wars, ordain'd by fate;
 The strength and customs of the Latian state; 6780
 The prince, and people; and forearms his care
 With rules, to push his fortune, or to bear.

Two gates the silent house of Sleep adorn;
 Of polish'd ivory this, that of transparent horn:
 True visions thro' transparent horn arise; 6785
 Thro' polish'd ivory pass deluding lies.
 Of various things discoursing as he pass'd,
 Anchises hither bends his steps at last.
 Then, thro' the gate of iv'ry, he dismiss'd
 His valiant offspring and divining guest. 6790
 Straight to the ships Aeneas his way,
 Embark'd his men, and skimm'd along the sea,
 Still coasting, till he gain'd Cajeta's bay.
 At length on oozy ground his galleys moor;
 Their heads are turn'd to sea, their sterns to shore. 6795

Book VII

And thou, O matron of immortal fame,
 Here dying, to the shore hast left thy name;
 Cajeta still the place is call'd from thee,
 The nurse of great Aeneas' infancy.
 Here rest thy bones in rich Hesperia's plains; 6800
 Thy name ('t is all a ghost can have) remains.

Now, when the prince her fun'ral rites had paid,
 He plow'd the Tyrrhene seas with sails display'd.
 From land a gentle breeze arose by night,
 Serenely shone the stars, the moon was bright, 6805
 And the sea trembled with her silver light.
 Now near the shelves of Circe's shores they run,
 (Circe the rich, the daughter of the Sun,)
 A dang'rous coast: the goddess wastes her days
 In joyous songs; the rocks resound her lays: 6810
 In spinning, or the loom, she spends the night,
 And cedar brands supply her father's light.
 From hence were heard, rebellowing to the main,
 The roars of lions that refuse the chain,
 The grunts of bristled boars, and groans of bears, 6815
 And herds of howling wolves that stun the sailors' ears.
 These from their caverns, at the close of night,
 Fill the sad isle with horror and affright.
 Darkling they mourn their fate, whom Circe's pow'r,
 (That watch'd the moon and planetary hour,) 6820
 With words and wicked herbs from humankind
 Had alter'd, and in brutal shapes confin'd.
 Which monsters lest the Trojans' pious host
 Should bear, or touch upon th' enchanted coast,
 Propitious Neptune steer'd their course by night 6825
 With rising gales that sped their happy flight.
 Supplied with these, they skim the sounding shore,
 And hear the swelling surges vainly roar.
 Now, when the rosy morn began to rise,
 And wav'd her saffron streamer thro' the skies; 6830
 When Thetis blush'd in purple not her own,
 And from her face the breathing winds were blown,
 A sudden silence sate upon the sea,
 And sweeping oars, with struggling, urge their way.
 The Trojan, from the main, beheld a wood, 6835
 Which thick with shades and a brown horror stood:
 Betwixt the trees the Tiber took his course,
 With whirlpools dimpled; and with downward force,
 That drove the sand along, he took his way,
 And roll'd his yellow billows to the sea. 6840
 About him, and above, and round the wood,
 The birds that haunt the borders of his flood,
 That bath'd within, or basked upon his side,
 To tuneful songs their narrow throats applied.
 The captain gives command; the joyful train 6845
 Glide thro' the gloomy shade, and leave the main.

Now, Erato, thy poet's mind inspire,
 And fill his soul with thy celestial fire!
 Relate what Latium was; her ancient kings;
 Declare the past and state of things, 6850
 When first the Trojan fleet Ausonia sought,
 And how the rivals lov'd, and how they fought.
 These are my theme, and how the war began,
 And how concluded by the godlike man:
 For I shall sing of battles, blood, and rage, 6855
 Which princes and their people did engage;

And haughty souls, that, mov'd with mutual hate,
 In fighting fields pursued and found their fate;
 That rous'd the Tyrrhene realm with loud alarms,
 And peaceful Italy involv'd in arms. 6860
 A larger scene of action is display'd;
 And, rising hence, a greater work is weigh'd.

Latinus, old and mild, had long possess'd
 The Latin scepter, and his people blest:
 His father Faunus; a Laurentian dame 6865
 His mother; fair Marica was her name.

But Faunus came from Picus: Picus drew
 His birth from Saturn, if records be true.
 Thus King Latinus, in the third degree,
 Had Saturn author of his family. 6870

But this old peaceful prince, as Heav'n decreed,
 Was blest with no male issue to succeed:
 His sons in blooming youth were snatch'd by fate;
 One only daughter heir'd the royal state. 6875
 Fir'd with her love, and with ambition led,
 The neighb'ring princes court her nuptial bed.

Among the crowd, but far above the rest,
 Young Turnus to the beauteous maid address'd.
 Turnus, for high descent and graceful mien,
 Was first, and favor'd by the Latian queen; 6880
 With him she strove to join Lavinia's hand,
 But dire portents the purpos'd match withstand.

Deep in the palace, of long growth, there stood
 A laurel's trunk, a venerable wood;
 Where rites divine were paid; whose holy hair 6885
 Was kept and cut with superstitious care.

This plant Latinus, when his town he wall'd,
 Then found, and from the tree Laurentum call'd;
 And last, in honor of his new abode,
 He vow'd the laurel to the laurel's god. 6890

It happen'd once (a boding prodigy!)
 A swarm of bees, that cut the liquid sky,
 (Unknown from whence they took their airy flight,)
 Upon the topmost branch in clouds alight; 6895
 There with their clasping feet together clung,
 And a long cluster from the laurel hung.

An ancient augur prophesied from hence:
 "Behold on Latian shores a foreign prince!
 From the same parts of heav'n his navy stands,
 To the same parts on earth; his army lands; 6900
 The town he conquers, and the tow'r commands."

Yet more, when fair Lavinia fed the fire
 Before the gods, and stood beside her sire,
 (Strange to relate!) the flames, involv'd in smoke
 Of incense, from the sacred altar broke, 6905
 Caught her dishevel'd hair and rich attire;
 Her crown and jewels crackled in the fire:

From thence the fuming trail began to spread
 And lambent glories danc'd about her head.
 This new portent the seer with wonder views, 6910

Then pausing, thus his prophecy renews:
 “The nymph, who scatters flaming fires around,
 Shall shine with honor, shall herself be crown’d;
 But, caus’d by her irrevocable fate,
 War shall the country waste, and change the state.” 6915

Latinus, frighted with this dire ostent,
 For counsel to his father Faunus went,
 And sought the shades renown’d for prophecy
 Which near Albunea’s sulph’rous fountain lie.
 To these the Latian and the Sabine land 6920
 Fly, when distress’d, and thence relief demand.
 The priest on skins of off’rings takes his ease,
 And nightly visions in his slumber sees;

A swarm of thin aerial shapes appears,
 And, flutt’ring round his temples, deafs his ears: 6925
 These he consults, the future fates to know,
 From pow’rs above, and from the fiends below.

Here, for the gods’ advice, Latinus flies,
 Off’ring a hundred sheep for sacrifice:
 Their woolly fleeces, as the rites requir’d, 6930
 He laid beneath him, and to rest retir’d.

No sooner were his eyes in slumber bound,
 When, from above, a more than mortal sound
 Invades his ears; and thus the vision spoke:
 “Seek not, my seed, in Latian bands to yoke 6935
 Our fair Lavinia, nor the gods provoke.

A foreign son upon thy shore descends,
 Whose martial fame from pole to pole extends.
 His race, in arms and arts of peace renown’d,
 Not Latium shall contain, nor Europe bound: 6940
 ‘T is theirs whate’er the sun surveys around.”

These answers, in the silent night receiv’d,
 The king himself divulg’d, the land believ’d:
 The fame thro’ all the neighb’ring nations flew,
 When now the Trojan navy was in view. 6945

Beneath a shady tree, the hero spread
 His table on the turf, with cakes of bread;
 And, with his chiefs, on forest fruits he fed.
 They sate; and, (not without the god’s command,) 6950
 Their homely fare dispatch’d, the hungry band
 Invade their trenchers next, and soon devour,
 To mend the scanty meal, their cakes of flour.

Ascanius this observ’d, and smiling said:
 “See, we devour the plates on which we fed.” 6955
 The speech had omen, that the Trojan race
 Should find repose, and this the time and place.

Aeneas took the word, and thus replies,
 Confessing fate with wonder in his eyes:
 “All hail, O earth! all hail, my household gods!
 Behold the destin’d place of your abodes! 6960
 For thus Anchises prophesied of old,

And this our fatal place of rest foretold:
 ‘When, on a foreign shore, instead of meat,
 By famine forc’d, your trenchers you shall eat,
 Then ease your weary Trojans will attend, 6965

- And the long labors of your voyage end.
Remember on that happy coast to build,
And with a trench inclose the fruitful field.
This was that famine, this the fatal place
Which ends the wand'ring of our exil'd race. 6970
Then, on to-morrow's dawn, your care employ,
To search the land, and where the cities lie,
And what the men; but give this day to joy.
Now pour to Jove; and, after Jove is blest,
Call great Anchises to the genial feast: 6975
Crown high the goblets with a cheerful draught;
Enjoy the present hour; adjourn the future thought."
- Thus having said, the hero bound his brows
With leafy branches, then perform'd his vows;
Adoring first the genius of the place, 6980
Then Earth, the mother of the heav'nly race,
The nymphs, and native godheads yet unknown,
And Night, and all the stars that gild her sable throne,
And ancient Cybel, and Idaean Jove,
And last his sire below, and mother queen above. 6985
Then heav'n's high monarch thunder'd thrice aloud,
And thrice he shook aloft a golden cloud.
Soon thro' the joyful camp a rumor flew,
The time was come their city to renew.
Then ev'ry brow with cheerful green is crown'd, 6990
The feasts are doubled, and the bowls go round.
- When next the rosy morn disclos'd the day,
The scouts to sev'ral parts divide their way,
To learn the natives' names, their towns explore,
The coasts and trendings of the crooked shore: 6995
Here Tiber flows, and here Numicus stands;
Here warlike Latins hold the happy lands.
The pious chief, who sought by peaceful ways
To found his empire, and his town to raise,
A hundred youths from all his train selects, 7000
And to the Latian court their course directs,
(The spacious palace where their prince resides,
And all their heads with wreaths of olive hides.
They go commission'd to require a peace,
And carry presents to procure access. 7005
Thus while they speed their pace, the prince designs
His new-elected seat, and draws the lines.
The Trojans round the place a rampire cast,
And palisades about the trenches plac'd.
- Meantime the train, proceeding on their way, 7010
From far the town and lofty tow'rs survey;
At length approach the walls. Without the gate,
They see the boys and Latian youth debate
The martial prizes on the dusty plain:
Some drive the cars, and some the coursers rein; 7015
Some bend the stubborn bow for victory,
And some with darts their active sinews try.
A posting messenger, dispatch'd from hence,
Of this fair troop advis'd their aged prince,

That foreign men of mighty stature came; 7020
 Uncouth their habit, and unknown their name.
 The king ordains their entrance, and ascends
 His regal seat, surrounded by his friends.

The palace built by Picus, vast and proud, 7025
 Supported by a hundred pillars stood,
 And round incompass'd with a rising wood.
 The pile o'erlook'd the town, and drew the sight;
 Surpris'd at once with reverence and delight.
 There kings receiv'd the marks of sov'reign pow'r;
 In state the monarchs march'd; the lictors bore 7030
 Their awful axes and the rods before.

Here the tribunal stood, the house of pray'r,
 And here the sacred senators repair;
 All at large tables, in long order set,
 A ram their off'ring, and a ram their meat. 7035

Above the portal, carv'd in cedar wood,
 Plac'd in their ranks, their godlike grandsires stood;
 Old Saturn, with his crooked scythe, on high;
 And Italus, that led the colony;
 And ancient Janus, with his double face, 7040
 And bunch of keys, the porter of the place.

There good Sabinus, planter of the vines,
 On a short pruning hook his head reclines,
 And studiously surveys his gen'rous wines;
 Then warlike kings, who for their country fought, 7045
 And honorable wounds from battle brought.

Around the posts hung helmets, darts, and spears,
 And captive chariots, axes, shields, and bars,
 And broken beaks of ships, the trophies of their wars.
 Above the rest, as chief of all the band, 7050
 Was Picus plac'd, a buckler in his hand;
 His other way'd a long divining wand.

Girt in his Gabin gown the hero sate,
 Yet could not with his art avoid his fate:
 For Circe long had lov'd the youth in vain, 7055
 Till love, refus'd, converted to disdain:

Then, mixing pow'rful herbs, with magic art,
 She chang'd his form, who could not change his heart;
 Constrain'd him in a bird, and made him fly,
 With party-color'd plumes, a chatt'ring pie. 7060

In this high temple, on a chair of state,
 The seat of audience, old Latinus sate;
 Then gave admission to the Trojan train;
 And thus with pleasing accents he began: 7065
 "Tell me, ye Trojans, for that name you own,

Nor is your course upon our coasts unknown—
 Say what you seek, and whither were you bound:
 Were you by stress of weather cast aground?
 (Such dangers as on seas are often seen,
 And oft befall to miserable men,) 7070

Or come, your shipping in our ports to lay,
 Spent and disabled in so long a way?
 Say what you want: the Latians you shall find
 Not forc'd to goodness, but by will inclin'd;

For, since the time of Saturn's holy reign, 7075
 His hospitable customs we retain.
 I call to mind (but time the tale has worn)
 Th' Arunci told, that Dardanus, tho' born
 On Latian plains, yet sought the Phrygian shore,
 And Samothracia, Samos call'd before. 7080
 From Tuscan Coritum he claim'd his birth;
 But after, when exempt from mortal earth,
 From thence ascended to his kindred skies,
 A god, and, as a god, augments their sacrifice;"

He said. Ilioneus made this reply: 7085
 "O king, of Faunus' royal family!
 Nor wintry winds to Latium forc'd our way,
 Nor did the stars our wand'ring course betray.
 Willing we sought your shores; and, hither bound,
 The port, so long desir'd, at length we found; 7090
 From our sweet homes and ancient realms expell'd;
 Great as the greatest that the sun beheld.
 The god began our line, who rules above;
 And, as our race, our king descends from Jove:
 And hither are we come, by his command, 7095
 To crave admission in your happy land.
 How dire a tempest, from Mycenae pour'd,
 Our plains, our temples, and our town devour'd;
 What was the waste of war, what fierce alarms
 Shook Asia's crown with European arms; 7100
 Ev'n such have heard, if any such there be,
 Whose earth is bounded by the frozen sea;
 And such as, born beneath the burning sky
 And sultry sun, betwixt the tropics lie. 7105
 From that dire deluge, thro' the wat'ry waste,
 Such length of years, such various perils past,
 At last escap'd, to Latium we repair,
 To beg what you without your want may spare:
 The common water, and the common air;
 Sheds which ourselves will build, and mean abodes, 7110
 Fit to receive and serve our banish'd gods.
 Nor our admission shall your realm disgrace,
 Nor length of time our gratitude efface.
 Besides, what endless honor you shall gain,
 To save and shelter Troy's unhappy train! 7115
 Now, by my sov'reign, and his fate, I swear,
 Renown'd for faith in peace, for force in war;
 Oft our alliance other lands desir'd,
 And, what we seek of you, of us requir'd.
 Despite not then, that in our hands we bear 7120
 These holy boughs, sue with words of pray'r.
 Fate and the gods, by their supreme command,
 Have doom'd our ships to seek the Latian land.
 To these abodes our fleet Apollo sends;
 Here Dardanus was born, and hither tends; 7125
 Where Tuscan Tiber rolls with rapid force,
 And where Numicus opes his holy source.
 Besides, our prince presents, with his request,
 Some small remains of what his sire possess'd.
 This golden charger, snatch'd from burning Troy, 7130

Anchises did in sacrifice employ;
 This royal robe and this tiara wore
 Old Priam, and this golden scepter bore
 In full assemblies, and in solemn games;
 These purple vests were weav'd by Dardan dames.” 7135

Thus while he spoke, Latinus roll'd around
 His eyes, and fix'd a while upon the ground.
 Intent he seem'd, and anxious in his breast;
 Not by the scepter mov'd, or kingly vest,
 But pond'ring future things of wondrous weight; 7140
 Succession, empire, and his daughter's fate.
 On these he mus'd within his thoughtful mind,
 And then revolv'd what Faunus had divin'd.

This was the foreign prince, by fate decreed
 To share his scepter, and Lavinia's bed; 7145

This was the race that sure portents foreshew
 To sway the world, and land and sea subdue.
 At length he rais'd his cheerful head, and spoke:
 “The pow'rs,” said he, “the pow'rs we both invoke,
 To you, and yours, and mine, propitious be, 7150
 And firm our purpose with their augury!

Have what you ask; your presents I receive;
 Land, where and when you please, with ample leave;
 Partake and use my kingdom as your own;
 All shall be yours, while I command the crown: 7155

And, if my wish'd alliance please your king,
 Tell him he should not send the peace, but bring.
 Then let him not a friend's embraces fear;
 The peace is made when I behold him here.

Besides this answer, tell my royal guest, 7160
 I add to his commands my own request:

One only daughter heirs my crown and state,
 Whom not our oracles, nor Heav'n, nor fate,
 Nor frequent prodigies, permit to join
 With any native of th' Ausonian line. 7165

A foreign son-in-law shall come from far
 (Such is our doom), a chief renown'd in war,
 Whose race shall bear aloft the Latian name,
 And thro' the conquer'd world diffuse our fame.

Himself to be the man the fates require, 7170
 I firmly judge, and, what I judge, desire.”

He said, and then on each bestow'd a steed.
 Three hundred horses, in high stables fed,
 Stood ready, shining all, and smoothly dress'd:
 Of these he chose the fairest and the best, 7175

To mount the Trojan troop. At his command
 The steeds caparison'd with purple stand,
 With golden trappings, glorious to behold,
 And champ betwixt their teeth the foaming gold.

Then to his absent guest the king decreed 7180
 A pair of coursers born of heav'nly breed,

Who from their nostrils breath'd ethereal fire;
 Whom Circe stole from her celestial sire,
 By substituting mares produc'd on earth,
 Whose wombs conceiv'd a more than mortal birth. 7185

These draw the chariot which Latinus sends,
 And the rich present to the prince commends.
 Sublime on stately steeds the Trojans borne,
 To their expecting lord with peace return.

But jealous Juno, from Pachynus' height, 7190
 As she from Argos took her airy flight,
 Beheld with envious eyes this hateful sight.
 She saw the Trojan and his joyful train
 Descend upon the shore, desert the main,
 Design a town, and, with unhop'd success, 7195
 Th' ambassadors return with promis'd peace.
 Then, pierc'd with pain, she shook her haughty head,
 Sigh'd from her inward soul, and thus she said:
 "O hated offspring of my Phrygian foes!
 O fates of Troy, which Juno's fates oppose! 7200
 Could they not fall unpitied on the plain,
 But slain revive, and, taken, scape again?
 When execrable Troy in ashes lay,
 Thro' fires and swords and seas they forc'd their way.
 Then vanquish'd Juno must in vain contend, 7205
 Her rage disarm'd, her empire at an end.
 Breathless and tir'd, is all my fury spent?
 Or does my glutted spleen at length relent?
 As if 't were little from their town to chase,
 I thro' the seas pursued their exil'd race; 7210
 Ingag'd the heav'ns, oppos'd the stormy main;
 But billows roar'd, and tempests rag'd in vain.
 What have my Scyllas and my Syrtes done,
 When these they overpass, and those they shun?
 On Tiber's shores they land, secure of fate, 7215
 Triumphant o'er the storms and Juno's hate.
 Mars could in mutual blood the Centaurs bathe,
 And Jove himself gave way to Cynthia's wrath,
 Who sent the tusky boar to Calydon;
 (What great offense had either people done?) 7220
 But I, the consort of the Thunderer,
 Have wag'd a long and unsuccessful war,
 With various arts and arms in vain have toil'd,
 And by a mortal man at length am foil'd.
 If native pow'r prevail not, shall I doubt 7225
 To seek for needful succor from without?
 If Jove and Heav'n my just desires deny,
 Hell shall the pow'r of Heav'n and Jove supply.
 Grant that the Fates have firm'd, by their decree,
 The Trojan race to reign in Italy; 7230
 At least I can defer the nuptial day,
 And with protracted wars the peace delay:
 With blood the dear alliance shall be bought,
 And both the people near destruction brought;
 So shall the son-in-law and father join, 7235
 With ruin, war, and waste of either line.
 O fatal maid, thy marriage is endow'd
 With Phrygian, Latian, and Rutulian blood!
 Bellona leads thee to thy lover's hand;
 Another queen brings forth another brand, 7240
 To burn with foreign fires another land!

A second Paris, diff'ring but in name,
Shall fire his country with a second flame."

Thus having said, she sinks beneath the ground,
With furious haste, and shoots the Stygian sound, 7245
To rouse Alecto from th' infernal seat
Of her dire sisters, and their dark retreat.
This Fury, fit for her intent, she chose;
One who delights in wars and human woes.
Ev'n Pluto hates his own misshapen race; 7250
Her sister Furies fly her hideous face;
So frightful are the forms the monster takes,
So fierce the hissings of her speckled snakes.
Her Juno finds, and thus inflames her spite:
"O virgin daughter of eternal Night, 7255
Give me this once thy labor, to sustain
My right, and execute my just disdain.
Let not the Trojans, with a feign'd pretense
Of proffer'd peace, delude the Latian prince.
Expel from Italy that odious name, 7260
And let not Juno suffer in her fame.
'T is thine to ruin realms, o'erturn a state,
Betwixt the dearest friends to raise debate,
And kindle kindred blood to mutual hate.
Thy hand o'er towns the fun'ral torch displays, 7265
And forms a thousand ills ten thousand ways.
Now shake, out thy fruitful breast, the seeds
Of envy, discord, and of cruel deeds:
Confound the peace establish'd, and prepare
Their souls to hatred, and their hands to war." 7270

Smear'd as she was with black Gorgonian blood,
The Fury sprang above the Stygian flood;
And on her wicker wings, sublime thro' night,
She to the Latian palace took her flight:
There sought the queen's apartment, stood before 7275
The peaceful threshold, and besieg'd the door.
Restless Amata lay, her swelling breast
Fir'd with disdain for Turnus disposess'd,
And the new nuptials of the Trojan guest.
From her black bloody locks the Fury shakes 7280
Her darling plague, the fav'rite of her snakes;
With her full force she threw the poisonous dart,
And fix'd it deep within Amata's heart,
That, thus envenom'd, she might kindle rage,
And sacrifice to strife her house husband's age. 7285
Unseen, unfelt, the fiery serpent skims
Betwixt her linen and her naked limbs;
His baleful breath inspiring, as he glides,
Now like a chain around her neck he rides,
Now like a fillet to her head repairs, 7290
And with his circling volumes folds her hairs.
At first the silent venom slid with ease,
And seiz'd her cooler senses by degrees;
Then, ere th' infected mass was fir'd too far,
In plaintive accents she began the war, 7295
And thus bespoke her husband: "Shall," she said,

- “A wand’ring prince enjoy Lavinia’s bed?
 If nature plead not in a parent’s heart,
 Pity my tears, and pity her desert. 7300
 I know, my dearest lord, the time will come,
 You in vain, reverse your cruel doom;
 The faithless pirate soon will set to sea,
 And bear the royal virgin far away!
 A guest like him, a Trojan guest before, 7305
 In shew of friendship sought the Spartan shore,
 And ravish’d Helen from her husband bore.
 Think on a king’s inviolable word;
 And think on Turnus, her once plighted lord:
 To this false foreigner you give your throne,
 And wrong a friend, a kinsman, and a son. 7310
 Resume your ancient care; and, if the god
 Your sire, and you, resolve on foreign blood,
 Know all are foreign, in a larger sense,
 Not born your subjects, or deriv’d from hence.
 Then, if the line of Turnus you retrace, 7315
 He springs from Inachus of Argive race.”
- But when she saw her reasons idly spent,
 And could not move him from his fix’d intent,
 She flew to rage; for now the snake possess’d 7320
 Her vital parts, and poison’d all her breast;
 She raves, she runs with a distracted pace,
 And fills with horrid howls the public place.
 And, as young striplings whip the top for sport,
 On the smooth pavement of an empty court;
 The wooden engine flies and whirls about, 7325
 Admir’d, with clamors, of the beardless rout;
 They lash aloud; each other they provoke,
 And lend their little souls at ev’ry stroke:
 Thus fares the queen; and thus her fury blows 7330
 Amidst the crowd, and kindles as she goes.
 Nor yet content, she strains her malice more,
 And adds new ills to those contriv’d before:
 She flies the town, and, mixing with a throng
 Of madding matrons, bears the bride along, 7335
 Wand’ring thro’ woods and wilds, and devious ways,
 And with these arts the Trojan match delays.
 She feign’d the rites of Bacchus; cried aloud,
 And to the buxom god the virgin vow’d.
 “Evoe! O Bacchus!” thus began the song;
 And “Evoe!” answer’d all the female throng. 7340
 “O virgin! worthy thee alone!” she cried;
 “O worthy thee alone!” the crew replied.
 “For thee she feeds her hair, she leads thy dance,
 And with thy winding ivy wreathes her lance.” 7345
 Like fury seiz’d the rest; the progress known,
 All seek the mountains, and forsake the town:
 All, clad in skins of beasts, the jav’lin bear,
 Give to the wanton winds their flowing hair,
 And shrieks and shoutings rend the suff’ring air.
 The queen herself, inspir’d with rage divine, 7350
 Shook high above her head a flaming pine;
 Then roll’d her haggard eyes around the throng,

And sung, in Turnus' name, the nuptial song:
 "Io, ye Latian dames! if any here
 Hold your unhappy queen, Amata, dear; 7355
 If there be here," she said, "who dare maintain
 My right, nor think the name of mother vain;
 Unbind your fillets, loose your flowing hair,
 And orgies and nocturnal rites prepare."

Amata's breast the Fury thus invades, 7360
 And fires with rage, amid the sylvan shades;
 Then, when she found her venom spread so far,
 The royal house embroil'd in civil war,
 Rais'd on her dusky wings, she cleaves the skies,
 And seeks the palace where young Turnus lies. 7365
 His town, as fame reports, was built of old
 By Danae, pregnant with almighty gold,
 Who fled her father's rage, and, with a train
 Of following Argives, thro' the stormy main,
 Driv'n by the southern blasts, was fated here to reign. 7370
 'T was Ardua once; now Ardea's name it bears;
 Once a fair city, now consum'd with years.
 Here, in his lofty palace, Turnus lay,
 Betwixt the confines of the night and day,
 Secure in sleep. The Fury laid aside 7375
 Her looks and limbs, and with new methods tried
 The foulness of th' infernal form to hide.
 Propp'd on a staff, she takes a trembling mien:
 Her face is furrow'd, and her front obscene;
 Deep-dinted wrinkles on her cheek she draws; 7380
 Sunk are her eyes, and toothless are her jaws;
 Her hoary hair with holy fillets bound,
 Her temples with an olive wreath are crown'd.
 Old Chalybe, who kept the sacred fane
 Of Juno, now she seem'd, and thus began, 7385
 Appearing in a dream, to rouse the careless man:
 "Shall Turnus then such endless toil sustain
 In fighting fields, and conquer towns in vain?
 Win, for a Trojan head to wear the prize,
 Usurp thy crown, enjoy thy victories? 7390
 The bride and scepter which thy blood has bought,
 The king transfers; and foreign heirs are sought.
 Go now, deluded man, and seek again
 New toils, new dangers, on the dusty plain.
 Repel the Tuscan foes; their city seize; 7395
 Protect the Latians in luxurious ease.
 This dream all-pow'rful Juno sends; I bear
 Her mighty mandates, and her words you hear.
 Haste; arm your Ardeans; issue to the plain;
 With fate to friend, assault the Trojan train: 7400
 Their thoughtless chiefs, their painted ships, that lie
 In Tiber's mouth, with fire and sword destroy.
 The Latian king, unless he shall submit,
 Own his old promise, and his new forget—
 Let him, in arms, the pow'r of Turnus prove, 7405
 And learn to fear whom he disdains to love.
 For such is Heav'n's command." The youthful prince
 With scorn replied, and made this bold defense:

- “You tell me, mother, what I knew before:
 The Phrygian fleet is landed on the shore. 7410
 I neither fear nor will provoke the war;
 My fate is Juno’s most peculiar care.
 But time has made you dote, and vainly tell
 Of arms imagin’d in your lonely cell.
 Go; be the temple and the gods your care; 7415
 Permit to men the thought of peace and war.”
- These haughty words Alecto’s rage provoke,
 And frighted Turnus trembled as she spoke.
 Her eyes grow stiffen’d, and with sulphur burn;
 Her hideous looks and hellish form return; 7420
 Her curling snakes with hissings fill the place,
 And open all the furies of her face:
 Then, darting fire from her malignant eyes,
 She cast him backward as he strove to rise,
 And, ling’ring, sought to frame some new replies. 7425
 High on her head she rears two twisted snakes,
 Her chains she rattles, and her whip she shakes;
 And, churning bloody foam, thus loudly speaks:
 “Behold whom time has made to dote, and tell
 Of arms imagin’d in her lonely cell! 7430
 Behold the Fates’ infernal minister!
 War, death, destruction, in my hand I bear.”
- Thus having said, her smold’ring torch, impress’d
 With her full force, she plung’d into his breast. 7435
 Aghast he wak’d; and, starting from his bed,
 Cold sweat, in clammy drops, his limbs o’erspread.
 “Arms! arms!” he cries: “my sword and shield prepare!”
 He breathes defiance, blood, and mortal war.
 So, when with crackling flames a caldron fries,
 The bubbling waters from the bottom rise: 7440
 Above the brims they force their fiery way;
 Black vapors climb aloft, and cloud the day.
- The peace polluted thus, a chosen band
 He first commissions to the Latian land,
 In threat’ning embassy; then rais’d the rest, 7445
 To meet in arms th’ intruding Trojan guest,
 To force the foes from the Lavinian shore,
 And Italy’s indanger’d peace restore.
 Himself alone an equal match he boasts,
 To fight the Phrygian and Ausonian hosts. 7450
 The gods invok’d, the Rutuli prepare
 Their arms, and warn each other to the war.
 His beauty these, and those his blooming age,
 The rest his house and his own fame engage.
- While Turnus urges thus his enterprise, 7455
 The Stygian Fury to the Trojans flies;
 New frauds invents, and takes a steepy stand,
 Which overlooks the vale with wide command;
 Where fair Ascanius and his youthful train,
 With horns and hounds, a hunting match ordain, 7460
 And pitch their toils around the shady plain.

The Fury fires the pack; they snuff, they vent,
 And feed their hungry nostrils with the scent.
 'Twas of a well-grown stag, whose antlers rise
 High o'er his front; his beams invade the skies. 7465
 From this light cause th' infernal maid prepares
 The country churls to mischief, hate, and wars.

The stately beast the two Tyrrhidae bred,
 Snatch'd from his dams, and the tame youngling fed.
 Their father Tyrrheus did his fodder bring, 7470
 Tyrrheus, chief ranger to the Latian king:
 Their sister Silvia cherish'd with her care
 The little wanton, and did wreaths prepare
 To hang his budding horns, with ribbons tied
 His tender neck, and comb'd his silken hide, 7475
 And bathed his body. Patient of command
 In time he grew, and, growing us'd to hand,
 He waited at his master's board for food;
 Then sought his salvage kindred in the wood,
 Where grazing all the day, at night he came 7480
 To his known lodgings, and his country dame.

This household beast, that us'd the woodland grounds,
 Was view'd at first by the young hero's hounds,
 As down the stream he swam, to seek retreat
 In the cool waters, and to quench his heat. 7485
 Ascanius young, and eager of his game,
 Soon bent his bow, uncertain in his aim;
 But the dire fiend the fatal arrow guides,
 Which pierc'd his bowels thro' his panting sides.
 The bleeding creature issues from the floods, 7490
 Possess'd with fear, and seeks his known abodes,
 His old familiar hearth and household gods.
 He falls; he fills the house with heavy groans,
 Implores their pity, and his pain bemoans.
 Young Silvia beats her breast, and cries aloud 7495
 For succor from the clownish neighborhood:
 The churls assemble; for the fiend, who lay
 In the close woody covert, urg'd their way.
 One with a brand yet burning from the flame,
 Arm'd with a knotty club another came: 7500
 Whate'er they catch or find, without their care,
 Their fury makes an instrument of war.
 Tyrrheus, the foster father of the beast,
 Then clench'd a hatchet in his horny fist,
 But held his hand from the descending stroke, 7505
 And left his wedge within the cloven oak,
 To whet their courage and their rage provoke.
 And now the goddess, exercis'd in ill,
 Who watch'd an hour to work her impious will,
 Ascends the roof, and to her crooked horn, 7510
 Such as was then by Latian shepherds borne,
 Adds all her breath: the rocks and woods around,
 And mountains, tremble at th' infernal sound.
 The sacred lake of Trivia from afar,
 The Veline fountains, and sulphureous Nar, 7515
 Shake at the baleful blast, the signal of the war.

Young mothers wildly stare, with fear possess'd,
And strain their helpless infants to their breast.

The clowns, a boist'rous, rude, ungovern'd crew,
With furious haste to the loud summons flew. 7520

The pow'rs of Troy, then issuing on the plain,
With fresh recruits their youthful chief sustain:
Not theirs a raw and unexperienc'd train,
But a firm body of embattled men. 7525

At first, while fortune favor'd neither side,
The fight with clubs and burning brands was tried;
But now, both parties reinforc'd, the fields
Are bright with flaming swords and brazen shields.
A shining harvest either host displays,
And shoots against the sun with equal rays. 7530

Thus, when a black-brow'd gust begins to rise,
White foam at first on the curl'd ocean fries;
Then roars the main, the billows mount the skies;
Till, by the fury of the storm full blown,
The muddy bottom o'er the clouds is thrown. 7535

First Almon falls, old Tyrrheus' eldest care,
Pierc'd with an arrow from the distant war:
Fix'd in his throat the flying weapon stood,
And stopp'd his breath, and drank his vital blood
Huge heaps of slain around the body rise: 7540

Among the rest, the rich Galesus lies;
A good old man, while peace he preach'd in vain,
Amidst the madness of th' unruly train:
Five herds, five bleating flocks, his pastures fill'd;
His lands a hundred yoke of oxen till'd. 7545

Thus, while in equal scales their fortune stood
The Fury bath'd them in each other's blood;
Then, having fix'd the fight, exulting flies,
And bears fulfill'd her promise to the skies.
To Juno thus she speaks: "Behold! It is done, 7550

The blood already drawn, the war begun;
The discord is complete; nor can they cease
The dire debate, nor you command the peace.
Now, since the Latian and the Trojan brood
Have tasted vengeance and the sweets of blood; 7555

Speak, and my pow'r shall add this office more:
The neighb'ring nations of th' Ausonian shore
Shall hear the dreadful rumor, from afar,
Of arm'd invasion, and embrace the war."
Then Juno thus: "The grateful work is done, 7560

The seeds of discord sow'd, the war begun;
Frauds, fears, and fury have possess'd the state,
And fix'd the causes of a lasting hate.
A bloody Hymen shall th' alliance join
Betwixt the Trojan and Ausonian line: 7565

But thou with speed to night and hell repair;
For not the gods, nor angry Jove, will bear
Thy lawless wand'ring walks in upper air.
Leave what remains to me." Saturnia said:
The sullen fiend her sounding wings display'd, 7570
Unwilling left the light, and sought the nether shade.

In midst of Italy, well known to fame,
 There lies a lake (Amsanctus is the name)
 Below the lofty mounts: on either side
 Thick forests the forbidden entrance hide. 7575
 Full in the center of the sacred wood
 An arm arises of the Stygian flood,
 Which, breaking from beneath with bellowing sound,
 Whirls the black waves and rattling stones around.
 Here Pluto pants for breath from out his cell, 7580
 And opens wide the grinning jaws of hell.
 To this infernal lake the Fury flies;
 Here hides her hated head, and frees the lab'ring skies.

Saturnian Juno now, with double care,
 Attends the fatal process of the war. 7580
 The clowns, return'd, from battle bear the slain,
 Implore the gods, and to their king complain.
 The corps of Almon and the rest are shown;
 Shrieks, clamors, murmurs, fill the frightened town.
 Ambitious Turnus in the press appears, 7585
 And, aggravating crimes, augments their fears;
 Proclaims his private injuries aloud,
 A solemn promise made, and disavow'd;
 A foreign son is sought, and a mix'd mungril brood.
 Then they, whose mothers, frantic with their fear, 7590
 In woods and wilds the flags of Bacchus bear,
 And lead his dances with dishevel'd hair,
 Increase the clamor, and the war demand,
 (Such was Amata's interest in the land,)

Against the public sanctions of the peace, 7595
 Against all omens of their ill success.
 With fates averse, the rout in arms resort,
 To force their monarch, and insult the court.
 But, like a rock unmov'd, a rock that braves
 The raging tempest and the rising waves— 7600
 Propp'd on himself he stands; his solid sides
 Wash off the seaweeds, and the sounding tides—
 So stood the pious prince, unmov'd, and long
 Sustain'd the madness of the noisy throng.
 But, when he found that Juno's pow'r prevail'd, 7605
 And all the methods of cool counsel fail'd,
 He calls the gods to witness their offense,
 Disclaims the war, asserts his innocence.
 "Hurried by fate," he cries, "and borne before
 A furious wind, we have the faithful shore. 7610
 O more than madmen! you yourselves shall bear
 The guilt of blood and sacrilegious war:
 Thou, Turnus, shalt atone it by thy fate,
 And pray to Heav'n for peace, but pray too late.
 For me, my stormy voyage at an end, 7615
 I to the port of death securely tend.
 The fun'ral pomp which to your kings you pay,
 Is all I want, and all you take away."
 He said no more, but, in his walls confin'd,
 Shut out the woes which he too well divin'd 7620
 Nor with the rising storm would vainly strive,
 But left the helm, and let the vessel drive.

A solemn custom was observ'd of old,
 Which Latium held, and now the Romans hold,
 Their standard when in fighting fields they rear 7625
 Against the fierce Hyrcanians, or declare
 The Scythian, Indian, or Arabian war;
 Or from the boasting Parthians would regain
 Their eagles, lost in Carrhae's bloody plain.
 Two gates of steel (the name of Mars they bear, 7630
 And still are worship'd with religious fear)
 Before his temple stand: the dire abode,
 And the fear'd issues of the furious god,
 Are fenc'd with brazen bolts; without the gates,
 The wary guardian Janus doubly waits. 7635
 Then, when the sacred senate votes the wars,
 The Roman consul their decree declares,
 And in his robes the sounding gates unbars.
 The youth in military shouts arise,
 And the loud trumpets break the yielding skies. 7640
 These rites, of old by sov'reign princes us'd,
 Were the king's office; but the king refus'd,
 Deaf to their cries, nor would the gates unbar
 Of sacred peace, or loose th' imprison'd war;
 But hid his head, and, safe from loud alarms, 7645
 Abhorr'd the wicked ministry of arms.
 Then heav'n's imperious queen shot down from high:
 At her approach the brazen hinges fly;
 The gates are forc'd, and ev'ry falling bar;
 And, like a tempest, issues out the war. 7650

The peaceful cities of th' Ausonian shore,
 Lull'd in their ease, and undisturb'd before,
 Are all on fire; and some, with studious care,
 Their restiff steeds in sandy plains prepare;
 Some their soft limbs in painful marches try, 7655
 And war is all their wish, and arms the gen'ral cry.
 Part scour the rusty shields with seam; and part
 New grind the blunted ax, and point the dart:
 With joy they view the waving ensigns fly,
 And hear the trumpet's clangor pierce the sky. 7660
 Five cities forge their arms: th' Atinian pow'rs,
 Antemnae, Tibur with her lofty tow'rs,
 Ardea the proud, the Crustumerian town:
 All these of old were places of renown.
 Some hammer helmets for the fighting field; 7665
 Some twine young sallows to support the shield;
 The croslet some, and some the cuishes mold,
 With silver plated, and with ductile gold.
 The rustic honors of the scythe and share
 Give place to swords and plumes, the pride of war. 7670
 Old fauchions are new temper'd in the fires;
 The sounding trumpet ev'ry soul inspires.
 The word is giv'n; with eager speed they lace
 The shining headpiece, and the shield embrace.
 The neighing steeds are to the chariot tied; 7675
 The trusty weapon sits on ev'ry side.

And now the mighty labor is begun

Ye Muses, open all your Helicon.
 Sing you the chiefs that sway'd th' Ausonian land,
 Their arms, and armies under their command; 7680
 What warriors in our ancient clime were bred;
 What soldiers follow'd, and what heroes led.
 For well you know, and can record alone,
 What fame to future times conveys but darkly down.
 Mezentius first appear'd upon the plain: 7685
 Scorn sate upon his brows, and sour disdain,
 Defying earth and heav'n. Etruria lost,
 He brings to Turnus' aid his baffled host.
 The charming Lausus, full of youthful fire,
 Rode in the rank, and next his sullen sire; 7690
 To Turnus only second in the grace
 Of manly mien, and features of the face.
 A skilful horseman, and a huntsman bred,
 With fates averse a thousand men he led:
 His sire unworthy of so brave a son; 7695
 Himself well worthy of a happier throne.

Next Aventinus drives his chariot round
 The Latian plains, with palms and laurels crown'd.
 Proud of his steeds, he smokes along the field;
 His father's hydra fills his ample shield: 7700
 A hundred serpents hiss about the brims;
 The son of Hercules he justly seems
 By his broad shoulders and gigantic limbs;
 Of heav'nly part, and part of earthly blood,
 A mortal woman mixing with a god. 7705
 For strong Alcides, after he had slain
 The triple Geryon, drove from conquer'd Spain
 His captive herds; and, thence in triumph led,
 On Tuscan Tiber's flow'ry banks they fed.
 Then on Mount Aventine the son of Jove 7710
 The priestess Rhea found, and forc'd to love.
 For arms, his men long piles and jav'lins bore;
 And poles with pointed steel their foes in battle gore.
 Like Hercules himself his son appears,
 In salvage pomp; a lion's hide he wears; 7720
 About his shoulders hangs the shaggy skin;
 The teeth and gaping jaws severely grin.
 Thus, like the god his father, homely dress'd,
 He strides into the hall, a horrid guest.

Then two twin brothers from fair Tibur came, 7725
 (Which from their brother Tiburs took the name,)
 Fierce Coras and Catillus, void of fear:
 Arm'd Argive horse they led, and in the front appear.
 Like cloud-born Centaurs, from the mountain's height
 With rapid course descending to the fight; 7730
 They rush along; the rattling woods give way;
 The branches bend before their sweepy sway.

Nor was Praeneste's founder wanting there,
 Whom fame reports the son of Mulciber:
 Found in the fire, and foster'd in the plains, 7735
 A shepherd and a king at once he reigns,

And leads to Turnus' aid his country swains.
 His own Praeneste sends a chosen band,
 With those who plow Saturnia's Sabine land;
 Besides the succor which cold Anien yields, 7740
 The rocks of Hernicus, and dewy fields,
 Anagnia fat, and Father Amasene—
 A num'rous rout, but all of naked men:
 Nor arms they wear, nor swords and bucklers wield,
 Nor drive the chariot thro' the dusty field, 7745
 But whirl from leathern slings huge balls of lead,
 And spoils of yellow wolves adorn their head;
 The left foot naked, when they march to fight,
 But in a bull's raw hide they sheathe the right.
 Messapus next, (great Neptune was his sire,) 7750
 Secure of steel, and fated from the fire,
 In pomp appears, and with his ardor warms
 A heartless train, unexercis'd in arms:
 The just Faliscans he to battle brings,
 And those who live where Lake Ciminia springs; 7755
 And where Feronia's grove and temple stands,
 Who till Fescennian or Flavinian lands.
 All these in order march, and marching sing
 The warlike actions of their sea-born king;
 Like a long team of snowy swans on high, 7760
 Which clap their wings, and cleave the liquid sky,
 When, homeward from their wat'ry pastures borne,
 They sing, and Asia's lakes their notes return.
 Not one who heard their music from afar,
 Would think these troops an army train'd to war, 7765
 But flocks of fowl, that, when the tempests roar,
 With their hoarse gabbling seek the silent shore.

Then Clausus came, who led a num'rous band
 Of troops embodied from the Sabine land,
 And, in himself alone, an army brought. 7770
 'T was he, the noble Claudian race begot,
 The Claudian race, ordain'd, in times to come,
 To share the greatness of imperial Rome.
 He led the Cures forth, of old renown,
 Mutuscans from their olive-bearing town, 7775
 And all th' Eretian pow'rs; besides a band
 That follow'd from Velinum's dewy land,
 And Amiternian troops, of mighty fame,
 And mountaineers, that from Severus came,
 And from the craggy cliffs of Tetrica, 7780
 And those where yellow Tiber takes his way,
 And where Himella's wanton waters play.
 Casperia sends her arms, with those that lie
 By Fabaris, and fruitful Foruli:
 The warlike aids of Horta next appear, 7785
 And the cold Nursians come to close the rear,
 Mix'd with the natives born of Latine blood,
 Whom Allia washes with her fatal flood.
 Not thicker billows beat the Libyan main,
 When pale Orion sets in wintry rain; 7790
 Nor thicker harvests on rich Hermus rise,
 Or Lycian fields, when Phoebus burns the skies,

Than stand these troops: their bucklers ring around;
Their trampling turns the turf, and shakes the solid ground.

High in his chariot then Halesus came, 7795
A foe by birth to Troy's unhappy name:
From Agamemnon born—to Turnus' aid
A thousand men the youthful hero led,
Who till the Massic soil, for wine renown'd,
And fierce Auruncans from their hilly ground, 7800
And those who live by Sidicinian shores,
And where with shoaly fords Vulturnus roars,
Cales' and Oscan's old inhabitants,
And rough Saticulans, inur'd to wants:
Light demi-lances from afar they throw, 7805
Fasten'd with leathern thongs, to gall the foe.
Short crooked swords in closer fight they wear;
And on their warding arm light bucklers bear.

Nor Oebalus, shalt thou be left unsung,
From nymph Semethis and old Telon sprung, 7810
Who then in Teleboan Capri reign'd;
But that short isle th' ambitious youth disdain'd,
And o'er Campania stretch'd his ample sway,
Where swelling Sarnus seeks the Tyrrhene sea;
O'er Batulum, and where Abella sees, 7815
From her high tow'rs, the harvest of her trees.
And these (as was the Teuton use of old)
Wield brazen swords, and brazen bucklers hold;
Sling weighty stones, when from afar they fight;
Their casques are cork, a covering thick and light. 7820

Next these in rank, the warlike Ufens went,
And led the mountain troops that Nursia sent.
The rude Equicolae his rule obey'd;
Hunting their sport, and plund'ring was their trade.
In arms they plow'd, to battle still prepar'd: 7825
Their soil was barren, and their hearts were hard.

Umbro the priest the proud Marrubians led,
By King Archippus sent to Turnus' aid,
And peaceful olives crown'd his hoary head.
His wand and holy words, the viper's rage, 7830
And venom'd wounds of serpents could assuage.
He, when he pleas'd with powerful juice to steep
Their temples, shut their eyes in pleasing sleep.
But vain were Marsian herbs, and magic art,
To cure the wound giv'n by the Dardan dart: 7835
Yet his untimely fate th' Angitian woods
In sighs remurmur'd to the Fucine floods.

The son of fam'd Hippolytus was there,
Fam'd as his sire, and, as his mother, fair;
Whom in Egerian groves Aricia bore, 7840
And nurs'd his youth along the marshy shore,
Where great Diana's peaceful altars flame,
In fruitful fields; and Virbius was his name.
Hippolytus, as old records have said,

- Was by his stepdam sought to share her bed; 7845
 But, when no female arts his mind could move,
 She turn'd to furious hate her impious love.
 Torn by wild horses on the sandy shore,
 Another's crimes th' unhappy hunter bore,
 Glutting his father's eyes with guiltless gore. 7850
 But chaste Diana, who his death deplor'd,
 With Aesculapian herbs his life restor'd.
 Then Jove, who saw from high, with just disdain,
 The dead inspir'd with vital breath again,
 Struck to the center, with his flaming dart, 7855
 Th' unhappy founder of the godlike art.
 But Trivia kept in secret shades alone
 Her care, Hippolytus, to fate unknown;
 And call'd him Virbius in th' Egerian grove,
 Where then he liv'd obscure, but safe from Jove. 7860
 For this, from Trivia's temple and her wood
 Are coursers driv'n, who shed their master's blood,
 Affrighted by the monsters of the flood.
 His son, the second Virbius, yet retain'd
 His father's art, and warrior steeds he rein'd. 7865
- Amid the troops, and like the leading god,
 High o'er the rest in arms the graceful Turnus rode:
 A triple of plumes his crest adorn'd,
 On which with belching flames Chimaera burn'd:
 The more the kindled combat rises high'r, 7870
 The more with fury burns the blazing fire.
 Fair Io grac'd his shield; but Io now
 With horns exalted stands, and seems to low—
 A noble charge! Her keeper by her side,
 To watch her walks, his hundred eyes applied; 7875
 And on the brims her sire, the wat'ry god,
 Roll'd from a silver urn his crystal flood.
 A cloud of foot succeeds, and fills the fields
 With swords, and pointed spears, and clatt'ring shields;
 Of Argives, and of old Sicanian bands, 7880
 And those who plow the rich Rutulian lands;
 Auruncan youth, and those Sacrana yields,
 And the proud Labicans, with painted shields,
 And those who near Numician streams reside,
 And those whom Tiber's holy forests hide, 7885
 Or Circe's hills from the main land divide;
 Where Ufens glides along the lowly lands,
 Or the black water of Pomptina stands.
- Last, from the Volscians fair Camilla came,
 And led her warlike troops, a warrior dame; 7890
 Unbred to spinning, in the loom unskill'd,
 She chose the nobler Pallas of the field.
 Mix'd with the first, the fierce virago fought,
 Sustain'd the toils of arms, the danger sought,
 Outstripp'd the winds in speed upon the plain, 7895
 Flew o'er the fields, nor hurt the bearded grain:
 She swept the seas, and, as she skimm'd along,
 Her flying feet unbath'd on billows hung.
 Men, boys, and women, stupid with surprise,

Where'er she passes, fix their wond'ring eyes: 7900
 Longing they look, and, gaping at the sight,
 Devour her o'er and o'er with vast delight;
 Her purple habit sits with such a grace
 On her smooth shoulders, and so suits her face;
 Her head with ringlets of her hair is crown'd, 7905
 And in a golden caul the curls are bound.
 She shakes her myrtle jav'lin; and, behind,
 Her Lycian quiver dances in the wind.

Book VIII

When Turnus had assembled all his pow'rs,
 His standard planted on Laurentum's tow'rs; 7910
 When now the sprightly trumpet, from afar,
 Had giv'n the signal of approaching war,
 Had rous'd the neighing steeds to scour the fields,
 While the fierce riders clatter'd on their shields;
 Trembling with rage, the Latian youth prepare 7915
 To join th' allies, and headlong rush to war.
 Fierce Ufens, and Messapus, led the crowd,
 With bold Mezentius, who blasphem'd aloud.
 These thro' the country took their wasteful course,
 The fields to forage, and to gather force. 7920
 Then Venulus to Diomede they send,
 To beg his aid Ausonia to defend,
 Declare the common danger, and inform
 The Grecian leader of the growing storm:
 Aeneas, landed on the Latian coast, 7925
 With banish'd gods, and with a baffled host,
 Yet now aspir'd to conquest of the state,
 And claim'd a title from the gods and fate;
 What num'rous nations in his quarrel came,
 And how they spread his formidable name. 7930
 What he design'd, what mischief might arise,
 If fortune favor'd his first enterprise,
 Was left for him to weigh, whose equal fears,
 And common interest, was involv'd in theirs.

While Turnus and th' allies thus urge the war, 7935
 The Trojan, floating in a flood of care,
 Beholds the tempest which his foes prepare.
 This way and that he turns his anxious mind;
 Thinks, and rejects the counsels he design'd;
 Explores himself in vain, in ev'ry part, 7940
 And gives no rest to his distracted heart.
 So, when the sun by day, or moon by night,
 Strike on the polish'd brass their trembling light,
 The glitt'ring species here and there divide,
 And cast their dubious beams from side to side; 7945
 Now on the walls, now on the pavement play,
 And to the ceiling flash the glaring day.

'T was night; and weary nature lull'd asleep
 The birds of air, and fishes of the deep,
 And beasts, and mortal men. The Trojan chief 7950
 Was laid on Tiber's banks, oppress'd with grief,

And found in silent slumber late relief.
 Then, thro' the shadows of the poplar wood,
 Arose the father of the Roman flood; 7955
 An azure robe was o'er his body spread,
 A wreath of shady reeds adorn'd his head:
 Thus, manifest to sight, the god appear'd,
 And with these pleasing words his sorrow cheer'd:
 "Undoubted offspring of ethereal race,
 O long expected in this promis'd place! 7960
 Who thro' the foes hast borne thy banish'd gods,
 Restor'd them to their hearths, and old abodes;
 This is thy happy home, the clime where fate
 Ordains thee to restore the Trojan state.
 Fear not! The war shall end in lasting peace, 7965
 And all the rage of haughty Juno cease.
 And that this nightly vision may not seem
 Th' effect of fancy, or an idle dream,
 A sow beneath an oak shall lie along,
 All white herself, and white her thirty young. 7970
 When thirty rolling years have run their race,
 Thy son Ascanius, on this empty space,
 Shall build a royal town, of lasting fame,
 Which from this omen shall receive the name.
 Time shall approve the truth. For what remains, 7975
 And how with sure success to crown thy pains,
 With patience next attend. A banish'd band,
 Driv'n with Evander from th' Arcadian land,
 Have planted here, and plac'd on high their walls;
 Their town the founder Pallanteum calls, 7980
 Deriv'd from Pallas, his great-grandsire's name:
 But the fierce Latians old possession claim,
 With war infesting the new colony.
 These make thy friends, and on their aid rely.
 To thy free passage I submit my streams. 7985
 Wake, son of Venus, from thy pleasing dreams;
 And, when the setting stars are lost in day,
 To Juno's pow'r thy just devotion pay;
 With sacrifice the wrathful queen appease:
 Her pride at length shall fall, her fury cease. 7990
 When thou return'st victorious from the war,
 Perform thy vows to me with grateful care.
 The god am I, whose yellow water flows
 Around these fields, and fattens as it goes:
 Tiber my name; among the rolling floods 7995
 Renown'd on earth, esteem'd among the gods.
 This is my certain seat. In times to come,
 My waves shall wash the walls of mighty Rome."

He said, and plung'd below. While yet he spoke,
 His dream Aeneas and his sleep forsook. 8000
 He rose, and looking up, beheld the skies
 With purple blushing, and the day arise.
 Then water in his hollow palm he took
 From Tiber's flood, and thus the pow'rs bespoke:
 "Laurentian nymphs, by whom the streams are fed, 8005
 And Father Tiber, in thy sacred bed
 Receive Aeneas, and from danger keep.

Whatever fount, whatever holy deep,
 Conceals thy wat'ry stores; where'er they rise,
 And, bubbling from below, salute the skies; 8010
 Thou, king of horned floods, whose plenteous urn
 Suffices fatness to the fruitful corn,
 For this thy kind compassion of our woes,
 Shalt share my morning song and ev'ning vows.
 But, O be present to thy people's aid, 8015
 And firm the gracious promise thou hast made!"
 Thus having said, two galleys from his stores,
 With care he chooses, mans, and fits with oars.
 Now on the shore the fatal swine is found.
 Wondrous to tell!—She lay along the ground: 8020
 Her well-fed offspring at her udders hung;
 She white herself, and white her thirty young.
 Aeneas takes the mother and her brood,
 And all on Juno's altar are bestow'd.

The foll'wing night, and the succeeding day, 8025
 Propitious Tiber smooth'd his wat'ry way:
 He roll'd his river back, and pois'd he stood,
 A gentle swelling, and a peaceful flood.
 The Trojans mount their ships; they put from shore,
 Borne on the waves, and scarcely dip an oar. 8030
 Shouts from the land give omen to their course,
 And the pitch'd vessels glide with easy force.
 The woods and waters wonder at the gleam
 Of shields, and painted ships that stem the stream.
 One summer's night and one whole day they pass 8035
 Betwixt the greenwood shades, and cut the liquid glass.
 The fiery sun had finish'd half his race,
 Look'd back, and doubted in the middle space,
 When they from far beheld the rising tow'rs,
 The tops of sheds, and shepherds' lowly bow'rs, 8040
 Thin as they stood, which, then of homely clay,
 Now rise in marble, from the Roman sway.
 These cots (Evander's kingdom, mean and poor)
 The Trojan saw, and turn'd his ships to shore.
 'T was on a solemn day: th' Arcadian states, 8045
 The king and prince, without the city gates,
 Then paid their off'rings in a sacred grove
 To Hercules, the warrior son of Jove.
 Thick clouds of rolling smoke involve the skies,
 And fat of entrails on his altar fries. 8050

But, when they saw the ships that stemm'd the flood,
 And glitter'd thro' the covert of the wood,
 They rose with fear, and left th' unfinish'd feast,
 Till dauntless Pallas reassur'd the rest
 To pay the rites. Himself without delay 8055
 A jav'lin seiz'd, and singly took his way;
 Then gain'd a rising ground, and call'd from far:
 "Resolve me, strangers, whence, and what you are;
 Your bus'ness here; and bring you peace or war?"
 High on the stern Aeneas his stand, 8060
 And held a branch of olive in his hand,
 While thus he spoke: "The Phrygians' arms you see,

- Expell'd from Troy, provok'd in Italy
 By Latian foes, with war unjustly made;
 At first affianc'd, and at last betray'd. 8065
 This message bear: The Trojans and their chief
 Bring holy peace, and beg the king's relief."
 Struck with so great a name, and all on fire,
 The youth replies: "Whatever you require,
 Your fame exacts. Upon our shores descend. 8070
 A welcome guest, and, what you wish, a friend."
 He said, and, downward hasting to the strand,
 Embrac'd the stranger prince, and join'd his hand.
- Conducted to the grove, Aeneas broke
 The silence first, and thus the king bespoke: 8075
 "Best of the Greeks, to whom, by fate's command,
 I bear these peaceful branches in my hand,
 Undaunted I approach you, tho' I know
 Your birth is Grecian, and your land my foe;
 From Atreus tho' your ancient lineage came, 8080
 And both the brother kings your kindred claim;
 Yet, my self-conscious worth, your high renown,
 Your virtue, thro' the neighb'ring nations blown,
 Our fathers' mingled blood, Apollo's voice,
 Have led me hither, less by need than choice. 8085
 Our founder Dardanus, as fame has sung,
 And Greeks acknowledge, from Electra sprung:
 Electra from the loins of Atlas came;
 Atlas, whose head sustains the starry frame.
 Your sire is Mercury, whom long before 8090
 On cold Cyllene's top fair Maia bore.
 Maia the fair, on fame if we rely,
 Was Atlas' daughter, who sustains the sky.
 Thus from one common source our streams divide;
 Ours is the Trojan, yours th' Arcadian side. 8095
 Rais'd by these hopes, I sent no news before,
 Nor ask'd your leave, nor did your faith implore;
 But come, without a pledge, my own ambassador.
 The same Rutulians, who with arms pursue
 The Trojan race, are equal foes to you. 8100
 Our host expell'd, what farther force can stay
 The victor troops from universal sway?
 Then will they stretch their pow'r athwart the land,
 And either sea from side to side command.
 Receive our offer'd faith, and give us thine; 8105
 Ours is a gen'rous and experience'd line:
 We want not hearts nor bodies for the war;
 In council cautious, and in fields we dare."
- He said; and while spoke, with piercing eyes
 Evander view'd the man with vast surprise, 8110
 Pleas'd with his action, ravish'd with his face:
 Then answer'd briefly, with a royal grace:
 "O valiant leader of the Trojan line,
 In whom the features of thy father shine,
 How I recall Anchises! how I see 8115
 His motions, mien, and all my friend, in thee!
 Long tho' it be, 't is fresh within my mind,

When Priam to his sister's court design'd
 A welcome visit, with a friendly stay,
 And thro' th' Arcadian kingdom took his way. 8120
 Then, past a boy, the callow down began
 To shade my chin, and call me first a man.
 I saw the shining train with vast delight,
 And Priam's goodly person pleas'd my sight:
 But great Anchises, far above the rest, 8125
 With awful wonder fir'd my youthful breast.
 I long'd to join in friendship's holy bands
 Our mutual hearts, and plight our mutual hands.
 I first accosted him: I sued, I sought,
 And, with a loving force, to Pheneus brought. 8130
 He gave me, when at length constrain'd to go,
 A Lycian quiver and a Gnessian bow,
 A vest embroider'd, glorious to behold,
 And two rich bridles, with their bits of gold,
 Which my son's coursers in obedience hold. 8135
 The league you ask, I offer, as your right;
 And, when to-morrow's sun reveals the light,
 With swift supplies you shall be sent away.
 Now celebrate with us this solemn day,
 Whose holy rites admit no long delay. 8140
 Honor our annual feast; and take your seat,
 With friendly welcome, at a homely treat."
 Thus having said, the bowls (remov'd for fear)
 The youths replac'd, and soon restor'd the cheer.
 On sods of turf he set the soldiers round: 8145
 A maple throne, rais'd higher from the ground,
 Receiv'd the Trojan chief; and, o'er the bed,
 A lion's shaggy hide for ornament they spread.
 The loaves were serv'd in canisters; the wine
 In bowls; the priest renew'd the rites divine: 8150
 Broil'd entrails are their food, and beef's continued chine.

But when the rage of hunger was repress'd,
 Thus spoke Evander to his royal guest:
 "These rites, these altars, and this feast, O king,
 From no vain fears or superstition spring, 8155
 Or blind devotion, or from blinder chance,
 Or heady zeal, or brutal ignorance;
 But, sav'd from danger, with a grateful sense,
 The labors of a god we recompense.
 See, from afar, yon rock that mates the sky, 8160
 About whose feet such heaps of rubbish lie;
 Such indigested ruin; bleak and bare,
 How desart now it stands, expos'd in air!
 'T was once a robber's den, inclos'd around
 With living stone, and deep beneath the ground. 8165
 The monster Cacus, more than half a beast,
 This hold, impervious to the sun, possess'd.
 The pavement ever foul with human gore;
 Heads, and their mangled members, hung the door.
 Vulcan this plague begot; and, like his sire, 8170
 Black clouds he belch'd, and flakes of livid fire.
 Time, long expected, eas'd us of our load,
 And brought the needful presence of a god.

- Th' avenging force of Hercules, from Spain,
 Arriv'd in triumph, from Geryon slain: 8175
 Thrice liv'd the giant, and thrice liv'd in vain.
 His prize, the lowing herds, Alcides drove
 Near Tiber's bank, to graze the shady grove.
 Allur'd with hope of plunder, and intent
 By force to rob, by fraud to circumvent, 8180
 The brutal Cacus, as by chance they stray'd,
 Four oxen thence, and four fair kine convey'd;
 And, lest the printed footsteps might be seen,
 He dragg'd 'em backwards to his rocky den.
 The tracks averse a lying notice gave, 8185
 And led the searcher backward from the cave.
- "Meantime the herdsman hero shifts his place,
 To find fresh pasture and untrodden grass.
 The beasts, who miss'd their mates, fill'd all around
 With bellowings, and the rocks restor'd the sound. 8190
 One heifer, who had heard her love complain,
 Roar'd from the cave, and made the project vain.
 Alcides found the fraud; with rage he shook,
 And toss'd about his head his knotted oak.
 Swift as the winds, or Scythian arrows' flight, 8195
 He clomb, with eager haste, th' aerial height.
 Then first we saw the monster mend his pace;
 Fear his eyes, and paleness in his face,
 Confess'd the god's approach. Trembling he springs,
 As terror had increas'd his feet with wings; 8200
 Nor stay'd for stairs; but down the depth he threw
 His body, on his back the door he drew
 (The door, a rib of living rock; with pains
 His father hew'd it out, and bound with iron chains):
 He broke the heavy links, the mountain clos'd, 8205
 And bars and levers to his foe oppos'd.
 The wretch had hardly made his dungeon fast;
 The fierce avenger came with bounding haste;
 Survey'd the mouth of the forbidden hold,
 And here and there his raging eyes he roll'd. 8210
 He gnash'd his teeth; and thrice he compass'd round
 With winged speed the circuit of the ground.
 Thrice at the cavern's mouth he pull'd in vain,
 And, panting, thrice desisted from his pain.
 A pointed flinty rock, all bare and black, 8215
 Grew gibbous from behind the mountain's back;
 Owls, ravens, all ill omens of the night,
 Here built their nests, and hither wing'd their flight.
 The leaning head hung threat'ning o'er the flood,
 And nodded to the left. The hero stood 8220
 Adverse, with planted feet, and, from the right,
 Tugg'd at the solid stone with all his might.
 Thus heav'd, the fix'd foundations of the rock
 Gave way; heav'n echo'd at the rattling shock.
 Tumbling, it chok'd the flood: on either side 8225
 The banks leap backward, and the streams divide;
 The sky shrunk upward with unusual dread,
 And trembling Tiber div'd beneath his bed.
 The court of Cacus stands reveal'd to sight;

The cavern glares with new-admitted light. 8230
 So the pent vapors, with a rumbling sound,
 Heave from below, and rend the hollow ground;
 A sounding flaw succeeds; and, from on high,
 The gods with hate beheld the nether sky:
 The ghosts repine at violated night, 8235
 And curse th' invading sun, and sicken at the sight.
 The graceless monster, caught in open day,
 Inclos'd, and in despair to fly away,
 Howls horrible from underneath, and fills
 His hollow palace with unmanly yells. 8240
 The hero stands above, and from afar
 Plies him with darts, and stones, and distant war.
 He, from his nostrils huge mouth, expires
 Black clouds of smoke, amidst his father's fires,
 Gath'ring, with each repeated blast, the night, 8245
 To make uncertain aim, and erring sight.
 The wrathful god then plunges from above,
 And, where in thickest waves the sparkles drove,
 There lights; and wades thro' fumes, and gropes his way,
 Half sing'd, half stifled, till he grasps his prey. 8250
 The monster, spewing fruitless flames, he found;
 He squeez'd his throat; he writh'd his neck around,
 And in a knot his crippled members bound;
 Then from their sockets tore his burning eyes:
 Roll'd on a heap, the breathless robber lies. 8255
 The doors, unbarr'd, receive the rushing day,
 And thoro' lights disclose the ravish'd prey.
 The bulls, redeem'd, breathe open air again.
 Next, by the feet, they drag him from his den.
 The wond'ring neighborhood, with glad surprise, 8260
 Behold his shagged breast, his giant size,
 His mouth that flames no more, and his extinguish'd eyes.
 From that auspicious day, with rites divine,
 We worship at the hero's holy shrine.
 Potitius first ordain'd these annual vows: 8265
 As priests, were added the Pinarian house,
 Who rais'd this altar in the sacred shade,
 Where honors, ever due, for ever shall be paid.
 For these deserts, and this high virtue shown,
 Ye warlike youths, your heads with garlands crown: 8270
 Fill high the goblets with a sparkling flood,
 And with deep draughts invoke our common god."

This said, a double wreath Evander twin'd,
 And poplars black and white his temples bind. 8275
 Then brims his ample bowl. With like design
 The rest invoke the gods, with sprinkled wine.
 Meantime the sun descended from the skies,
 And the bright evening star began to rise.
 And now the priests, Potitius at their head,
 In skins of beasts involv'd, the long procession led; 8280
 Held high the flaming tapers in their hands,
 As custom had prescrib'd their holy bands;
 Then with a second course the tables load,
 And with full chargers offer to the god.
 The Salii sing, and cense his altars round 8285

- With Saban smoke, their heads with poplar bound—
 One choir of old, another of the young,
 To dance, and bear the burthen of the song.
 The lay records the labors, and the praise,
 And all th' immortal acts of Hercules: 8290
 First, how the mighty babe, when swath'd in bands,
 The serpents strangled with his infant hands;
 Then, as in years and matchless force he grew,
 Th' Oechalian walls, and Trojan, overthrew. 8295
 Besides, a thousand hazards they relate,
 Procur'd by Juno's and Eurystheus' hate:
 "Thy hands, unconquer'd hero, could subdue
 The cloud-born Centaurs, and the monster crew:
 Nor thy resistless arm the bull withstood,
 Nor he, the roaring terror of the wood. 8300
 The triple porter of the Stygian seat,
 With lolling tongue, lay fawning at thy feet,
 And, seiz'd with fear, forgot his mangled meat.
 Th' infernal waters trembled at thy sight;
 Thee, god, no face of danger could affright; 8305
 Not huge Typhoeus, nor th' unnumber'd snake,
 Increas'd with hissing heads, in Lerna's lake.
 Hail, Jove's undoubted son! an added grace
 To heav'n and the great author of thy race!
 Receive the grateful off'rings which we pay,
 And smile propitious on thy solemn day!" 8310
 In numbers thus they sung; above the rest,
 The den and death of Cacus crown the feast.
 The woods to hollow vales convey the sound,
 The vales to hills, and hills the notes rebound. 8315
 The rites perform'd, the cheerful train retire.
- Betwixt young Pallas and his aged sire,
 The Trojan pass'd, the city to survey,
 And pleasing talk beguil'd the tedious way. 8320
 The stranger cast around his curious eyes,
 New objects viewing still, with new surprise;
 With greedy joy enquires of various things,
 And acts and monuments of ancient kings.
 Then thus the founder of the Roman tow'rs:
 "These woods were first the seat of sylvan pow'rs, 8325
 Of Nymphs and Fauns, and salvage men, who took
 Their birth from trunks of trees and stubborn oak.
 Nor laws they knew, nor manners, nor the care
 Of lab'ring oxen, or the shining share,
 Nor arts of gain, nor what they gain'd to spare. 8330
 Their exercise the chase; the running flood
 Supplied their thirst, the trees supplied their food.
 Then Saturn came, who fled the pow'r of Jove,
 Robb'd of his realms, and banish'd from above.
 The men, dispers'd on hills, to towns he brought, 8335
 And laws ordain'd, and civil customs taught,
 And Latium call'd the land where safe he lay
 From his unduteous son, and his usurping sway.
 With his mild empire, peace and plenty came;
 And hence the golden times deriv'd their name. 8340
 A more degenerate and discolor'd age

Succeeded this, with avarice and rage.
 Th' Ausonians then, and bold Sicanians came;
 And Saturn's empire often chang'd the name.
 Then kings, gigantic Tybris, and the rest, 8345
 With arbitrary sway the land oppress'd:
 For Tiber's flood was Albula before,
 Till, from the tyrant's fate, his name it bore.
 I last arriv'd, driv'n from my native home
 By fortune's pow'r, and fate's resistless doom. 8350
 Long toss'd on seas, I sought this happy land,
 Warn'd by my mother nymph, and call'd by Heav'n's command."

Thus, walking on, he spoke, and shew'd the gate,
 Since call'd Carmental by the Roman state;
 Where stood an altar, sacred to the name 8355
 Of old Carmenta, the prophetic dame,
 Who to her son foretold th' Aenean race,
 Sublime in fame, and Rome's imperial place:
 Then shews the forest, which, in after times,
 Fierce Romulus for perpetrated crimes 8360
 A sacred refuge made; with this, the shrine
 Where Pan below the rock had rites divine:
 Then tells of Argus' death, his murder'd guest,
 Whose grave and tomb his innocence attest.
 Thence, to the steep Tarpeian rock he leads; 8365
 Now roof'd with gold, then thatch'd with homely reeds.
 A reverent fear (such superstition reigns
 Among the rude) ev'n then possess'd the swains.
 Some god, they knew—what god, they could not tell—
 Did there amidst the sacred horror dwell. 8370
 Th' Arcadians thought him Jove; and said they saw
 The mighty Thund'rer with majestic awe,
 Who took his shield, and dealt his bolts around,
 And scatter'd tempests on the teeming ground.
 Then saw two heaps of ruins, (once they stood 8375
 Two stately towns, on either side the flood,) Saturnia's and Janicula's remains;
 And either place the founder's name retains.
 Discoursing thus together, they resort
 Where poor Evander kept his country court. 8380
 They view'd the ground of Rome's litigious hall;
 (Once oxen low'd, where now the lawyers bawl;)
 Then, stooping, thro' the narrow gate they press'd,
 When thus the king bespoke his Trojan guest:
 "Mean as it is, this palace, and this door, 8385
 Receiv'd Alcides, then a conqueror.
 Dare to be poor; accept our homely food,
 Which feasted him, and emulate a god."
 Then underneath a lowly roof he led
 The weary prince, and laid him on a bed; 8390
 The stuffing leaves, with hides of bears oerspread.
 Now Night had shed her silver dews around,
 And with her sable wings embrac'd the ground,
 When love's fair goddess, anxious for her son,
 (New tumults rising, and new wars begun,) 8395
 Couch'd with her husband in his golden bed,
 With these alluring words invokes his aid;

And, that her pleasing speech his mind may move,
 Inspires each accent with the charms of love:
 “While cruel fate conspir’d with Grecian pow’rs, 8400
 To level with the ground the Trojan tow’rs,
 I ask’d not aid th’ unhappy to restore,
 Nor did the succor of thy skill implore;
 Nor urg’d the labors of my lord in vain,
 A sinking empire longer to sustain, 8405
 Tho’ much I ow’d to Priam’s house, and more
 The dangers of Aeneas did deplore.
 But now, by Jove’s command, and fate’s decree,
 His race is doom’d to reign in Italy:
 With humble suit I beg thy needful art, 8410
 O still propitious pow’r, that rules my heart!
 A mother kneels a suppliant for her son.
 By Thetis and Aurora thou wert won
 To forge impenetrable shields, and grace
 With fated arms a less illustrious race. 8415
 Behold, what haughty nations are combin’d
 Against the relics of the Phrygian kind,
 With fire and sword my people to destroy,
 And conquer Venus twice, in conqu’ring Troy.”
 She said; and straight her arms, of snowy hue, 8420
 About her unresolving husband threw.
 Her soft embraces soon infuse desire;
 His bones and marrow sudden warmth inspire;
 And all the godhead feels the wonted fire.
 Not half so swift the rattling thunder flies, 8425
 Or forked lightnings flash along the skies.
 The goddess, proud of her successful wiles,
 And conscious of her form, in secret smiles.

Then thus the pow’r, obnoxious to her charms,
 Panting, and half dissolving in her arms: 8430
 “Why seek you reasons for a cause so just,
 Or your own beauties or my love distrust?
 Long since, had you requir’d my helpful hand,
 Th’ artificer and art you might command,
 To labor arms for Troy: nor Jove, nor fate, 8435
 Confin’d their empire to so short a date.
 And, if you now desire new wars to wage,
 My skill I promise, and my pains engage.
 Whatever melting metals can conspire,
 Or breathing bellows, or the forming fire, 8440
 Is freely yours: your anxious fears remove,
 And think no task is difficult to love.”
 Trembling he spoke; and, eager of her charms,
 He snatch’d the willing goddess to his arms;
 Till in her lap infus’d, he lay possess’d 8445
 Of full desire, and sunk to pleasing rest.
 Now when the Night her middle race had rode,
 And his first slumber had refresh’d the god—
 The time when early housewives leave the bed;
 When living embers on the hearth they spread, 8450
 Supply the lamp, and call the maids to rise—
 With yawning mouths, and with half-open’d eyes,
 They ply the distaff by the winking light,

And to their daily labor add the night:
 Thus frugally they earn their children's bread, 8455
 And uncorrupted keep the nuptial bed—
 Not less concern'd, nor at a later hour,
 Rose from his downy couch the forging pow'r.

Sacred to Vulcan's name, an isle there lay,
 Betwixt Sicilia's coasts and Lipare, 8460
 Rais'd high on smoking rocks; and, deep below,
 In hollow caves the fires of Aetna glow.

The Cyclops here their heavy hammers deal;
 Loud strokes, and hissings of tormented steel, 8465
 Are heard around; the boiling waters roar,
 And smoky flames thro' fuming tunnels soar.

Hether the Father of the Fire, by night,
 Thro' the brown air precipitates his flight.
 On their eternal anvils here he found
 The brethren beating, and the blows go round. 8470

A load of pointless thunder now there lies
 Before their hands, to ripen for the skies:
 These darts, for angry Jove, they daily cast;
 Consum'd on mortals with prodigious waste. 8475

Three rays of writhen rain, of fire three more,
 Of winged southern winds and cloudy store
 As many parts, the dreadful mixture frame;
 And fears are added, and avenging flame.

Inferior ministers, for Mars, repair
 His broken axletrees and blunted war, 8480
 And send him forth again with furbish'd arms,
 To wake the lazy war with trumpets' loud alarms.

The rest refresh the scaly snakes that fold
 The shield of Pallas, and renew their gold.
 Full on the crest the Gorgon's head they place, 8485
 With eyes that roll in death, and with distorted face.

"My sons," said Vulcan, "set your tasks aside;
 Your strength and master-skill must now be tried.
 Arms for a hero forge; arms that require
 Your force, your speed, and all your forming fire." 8490

He said. They set their former work aside,
 And their new toils with eager haste divide.
 A flood of molten silver, brass, and gold,
 And deadly steel, in the large furnace roll'd;
 Of this, their artful hands a shield prepare, 8495
 Alone sufficient to sustain the war.

Sev'n orbs within a spacious round they close:
 One stirs the fire, and one the bellows blows.
 The hissing steel is in the smithy drown'd;
 The grot with beaten anvils groans around. 8500

By turns their arms advance, in equal time;
 By turns their hands descend, and hammers chime.
 They turn the glowing mass with crooked tongs;
 The fiery work proceeds, with rustic songs.

While, at the Lemnian god's command, they urge
 Their labors thus, and ply th' Aeolian forge, 8505
 The cheerful morn salutes Evander's eyes,

And songs of chirping birds invite to rise.
 He leaves his lowly bed: his buskins meet
 Above his ankles; sandals sheathe his feet: 8510
 He sets his trusty sword upon his side,
 And o'er his shoulder throws a panther's hide.
 Two menial dogs before their master press'd.
 Thus clad, and guarded thus, he seeks his kingly guest.
 Mindful of promis'd aid, he mends his pace, 8520
 But meets Aeneas in the middle space.
 Young Pallas did his father's steps attend,
 And true Achates waited on his friend.
 They join their hands; a secret seat they choose;
 Th' Arcadian first their former talk renews: 8525
 "Undaunted prince, I never can believe
 The Trojan empire lost, while you survive.
 Command th' assistance of a faithful friend;
 But feeble are the succors I can send.
 Our narrow kingdom here the Tiber bounds; 8530
 That other side the Latian state surrounds,
 Insults our walls, and wastes our fruitful grounds.
 But mighty nations I prepare, to join
 Their arms with yours, and aid your just design.
 You come, as by your better genius sent, 8535
 And fortune seems to favor your intent.
 Not far from hence there stands a hilly town,
 Of ancient building, and of high renown,
 Torn from the Tuscans by the Lydian race,
 Who gave the name of Caere to the place, 8540
 Once Agyllina call'd. It flourish'd long,
 In pride of wealth and warlike people strong,
 Till curs'd Mezentius, in a fatal hour,
 Assum'd the crown, with arbitrary pow'r.
 What words can paint those execrable times, 8545
 The subjects' sufferings, and the tyrant's crimes!
 That blood, those murders, O ye gods, replace
 On his own head, and on his impious race!
 The living and the dead at his command
 Were coupled, face to face, and hand to hand, 8550
 Till, chok'd with stench, in loath'd embraces tied,
 The ling'ring wretches pin'd away and died.
 Thus plung'd in ills, and meditating more—
 The people's patience, tir'd, no longer bore
 The raging monster; but with arms beset 8555
 His house, and vengeance and destruction threat.
 They fire his palace: while the flame ascends,
 They force his guards, and execute his friends.
 He cleaves the crowd, and, favor'd by the night,
 To Turnus' friendly court directs his flight. 8560
 By just revenge the Tuscans set on fire,
 With arms, their king to punishment require:
 Their num'rous troops, now muster'd on the strand,
 My counsel shall submit to your command.
 Their navy swarms upon the coasts; they cry 8565
 To hoist their anchors, but the gods deny.
 An ancient augur, skill'd in future fate,
 With these foreboding words restrains their hate:
 'Ye brave in arms, ye Lydian blood, the flow'r

Of Tuscan youth, and choice of all their pow'r, 8570
 Whom just revenge against Mezentius arms,
 To seek your tyrant's death by lawful arms;
 Know this: no native of our land may lead
 This pow'rful people; seek a foreign head.
 Aw'd with these words, in camps they still abide, 8575
 And wait with longing looks their promis'd guide.
 Tarchon, the Tuscan chief, to me has sent
 Their crown, and ev'ry regal ornament:
 The people join their own with his desire;
 And all my conduct, as their king, require. 8580
 But the chill blood that creeps within my veins,
 And age, and listless limbs unfit for pains,
 And a soul conscious of its own decay,
 Have forc'd me to refuse imperial sway.
 My Pallas were more fit to mount the throne, 8585
 And should, but he's a Sabine mother's son,
 And half a native; but, in you, combine
 A manly vigor, and a foreign line.
 Where Fate and smiling Fortune shew the way,
 Pursue the ready path to sov'reign sway. 8590
 The staff of my declining days, my son,
 Shall make your good or ill success his own;
 In fighting fields from you shall learn to dare,
 And serve the hard apprenticeship of war;
 Your matchless courage and your conduct view, 8595
 And early shall begin t' admire and copy you.
 Besides, two hundred horse he shall command;
 Tho' few, a warlike and well-chosen band.
 These in my name are listed; and my son
 As many more has added in his own." 8600

Scarce had he said; Achates and his guest,
 With downcast eyes, their silent grief express'd;
 Who, short of succors, and in deep despair,
 Shook at the dismal prospect of the war.
 But his bright mother, from a breaking cloud, 8605
 To cheer her issue, thunder'd thrice aloud;
 Thrice forky lightning flash'd along the sky,
 And Tyrrhene trumpets thrice were heard on high.
 Then, gazing up, repeated peals they hear;
 And, in a heav'n serene, refulgent arms appear: 8610
 Redd'ning the skies, and glitt'ring all around,
 The temper'd metals clash, and yield a silver sound.
 The rest stood trembling, struck with awe divine;
 Aeneas only, conscious to the sign,
 Presag'd th' event, and joyful view'd, above, 8615
 Th' accomplish'd promise of the Queen of Love.
 Then, to th' Arcadian king: "This prodigy
 (Dismiss your fear) belongs alone to me.
 Heav'n calls me to the war: th' expected sign
 Is giv'n of promis'd aid, and arms divine. 8620
 My goddess mother, whose indulgent care
 Foresaw the dangers of the growing war,
 This omen gave, when bright Vulcanian arms,
 Fated from force of steel by Stygian charms,
 Suspended, shone on high: she then foreshow'd 8625

Approaching fights, and fields to float in blood.
 Turnus shall dearly pay for faith forsworn;
 And corps, and swords, and shields, on Tiber borne,
 Shall choke his flood: now sound the loud alarms;
 And, Latian troops, prepare your perjur'd arms." 8630

He said, and, rising from his homely throne,
 The solemn rites of Hercules begun,
 And on his altars wak'd the sleeping fires;
 Then cheerful to his household gods retires;
 There offers chosen sheep. Th' Arcadian king 8635
 And Trojan youth the same oblations bring.
 Next, of his men and ships he makes review;
 Draws out the best and ablest of the crew.

Down with the falling stream the refuse run,
 To raise with joyful news his drooping son. 8640
 Steeds are prepar'd to mount the Trojan band,
 Who wait their leader to the Tyrrhene land.

A sprightly courser, fairer than the rest,
 The king himself presents his royal guest:
 A lion's hide his back and limbs infold, 8645
 Precious with studded work, and paws of gold.

Fame thro' the little city spreads aloud
 Th' intended march, amid the fearful crowd:
 The matrons beat their breasts, dissolve in tears,
 And double their devotion in their fears. 8650
 The war at hand appears with more affright,
 And rises ev'ry moment to the sight.

Then old Evander, with a close embrace,
 Strain'd his departing friend; and tears o'erflow his face.
 "Would Heav'n," said he, "my strength and youth recall, 8655
 Such as I was beneath Praeneste's wall;

Then when I made the foremost foes retire,
 And set whole heaps of conquer'd shields on fire;
 When Herilus in single fight I slew,
 Whom with three lives Feronia did endue; 8660

And thrice I sent him to the Stygian shore,
 Till the last ebbing soul return'd no more—
 Such if I stood renew'd, not these alarms,
 Nor death, should rend me from my Pallas' arms;

Nor proud Mezentius, thus unpunish'd, boast
 His rapes and murders on the Tuscan coast.
 Ye gods, and mighty Jove, in pity bring
 Relief, and hear a father and a king!

If fate and you reserve these eyes, to see
 My son return with peace and victory; 8670
 If the lov'd boy shall bless his father's sight;
 If we shall meet again with more delight;

Then draw my life in length; let me sustain,
 In hopes of his embrace, the worst of pain.
 But if your hard decrees—which, O! I dread—
 Have doom'd to death his undeserving head; 8675

This, O this very moment, let me die!
 While hopes and fears in equal balance lie;
 While, yet possess'd of all his youthful charms,
 I strain him close within these aged arms; 8680

Before that fatal news my soul shall wound!"
 He said, and, swooning, sunk upon the ground.
 His servants bore him off, and softly laid
 His languish'd limbs upon his homely bed.

The horsemen march; the gates are open'd wide; 8685
 Aeneas at their head, Achates by his side.
 Next these, the Trojan leaders rode along;
 Last follows in the rear th' Arcadian throng.
 Young Pallas shone conspicuous o'er the rest;
 Gilded his arms, embroider'd was his vest. 8690
 So, from the seas, exerts his radiant head
 The star by whom the lights of heav'n are led;
 Shakes from his rosy locks the pearly dew,
 Dispels the darkness, and the day renews.
 The trembling wives the walls and turrets crowd, 8695
 And follow, with their eyes, the dusty cloud,
 Which winds disperse by fits, and shew from far
 The blaze of arms, and shields, and shining war.
 The troops, drawn up in beautiful array,
 O'er heathy plains pursue the ready way. 8700
 Repeated peals of shouts are heard around;
 The neighing coursers answer to the sound,
 And shake with horny hoofs the solid ground.

A greenwood shade, for long religion known,
 Stands by the streams that wash the Tuscan town, 8705
 Incompass'd round with gloomy hills above,
 Which add a holy horror to the grove.
 The first inhabitants of Grecian blood,
 That sacred forest to Silvanus vow'd,
 The guardian of their flocks and fields; and pay 8710
 Their due devotions on his annual day.
 Not far from hence, along the river's side,
 In tents secure, the Tuscan troops abide,
 By Tarchon led. Now, from a rising ground,
 Aeneas cast his wond'ring eyes around, 8715
 And all the Tyrrhene army had in sight,
 Stretch'd on the spacious plain from left to right.
 Thether his warlike train the Trojan led,
 Refresh'd his men, and wearied horses fed.

Meantime the mother goddess, crown'd with charms, 8720
 Breaks thro' the clouds, and brings the fated arms.
 Within a winding vale she finds her son,
 On the cool river's banks, retir'd alone.
 She shews her heav'nly form without disguise,
 And gives herself to his desiring eyes. 8725
 "Behold," she said, "perform'd in ev'ry part,
 My promise made, and Vulcan's labor'd art.
 Now seek, secure, the Latian enemy,
 And haughty Turnus to the field defy."
 She said; and, having first her son embrac'd, 8730
 The radiant arms beneath an oak she plac'd,
 Proud of the gift, he roll'd his greedy sight
 Around the work, and gaz'd with vast delight.
 He lifts, he turns, he poises, and admires

The crested helm, that vomits radiant fires: 8735
 His hands the fatal sword and corslet hold,
 One keen with temper'd steel, one stiff with gold:
 Both ample, flaming both, and beamy bright;
 So shines a cloud, when edg'd with adverse light.
 He shakes the pointed spear, and longs to try 8740
 The plated cuishes on his manly thigh;
 But most admires the shield's mysterious mold,
 And Roman triumphs rising on the gold:
 For these, emboss'd, the heav'nly smith had wrought
 (Not in the rolls of future fate untaught) 8745
 The wars in order, and the race divine
 Of warriors issuing from the Julian line.
 The cave of Mars was dress'd with mossy greens:
 There, by the wolf, were laid the martial twins.
 Intrepid on her swelling dugs they hung; 8750
 The foster dam loll'd out her fawning tongue:
 They suck'd secure, while, bending back her head,
 She lick'd their tender limbs, and form'd them as they fed.
 Not far from thence new Rome appears, with games
 Projected for the rape of Sabine dames. 8755
 The pit resounds with shrieks; a war succeeds,
 For breach of public faith, and unexampled deeds.
 Here for revenge the Sabine troops contend;
 The Romans there with arms the prey defend.
 Wearied with tedious war, at length they cease; 8760
 And both the kings and kingdoms plight the peace.
 The friendly chiefs before Jove's altar stand,
 Both arm'd, with each a charger in his hand:
 A fatted sow for sacrifice is led,
 With imprecations on the perjurd head. 8765
 Near this, the traitor Metius, stretch'd between Four fiery steeds, is dragg'd along the green,
 By Tullus' doom: the brambles drink his blood,
 And his torn limbs are left the vulture's food.
 There, Porsena to Rome proud Tarquin brings, 8770
 And would by force restore the banish'd kings.
 One tyrant for his fellow-tyrant fights;
 The Roman youth assert their native rights.
 Before the town the Tuscan army lies,
 To win by famine, or by fraud surprise. 8775
 Their king, half-threat'ning, half-disdaining stood,
 While Cocles broke the bridge, and stemm'd the flood.
 The captive maids there tempt the raging tide,
 Scap'd from their chains, with Cloelia for their guide.
 High on a rock heroic Manlius stood, 8780
 To guard the temple, and the temple's god.
 Then Rome was poor; and there you might behold
 The palace thatch'd with straw, now roof'd with gold.
 The silver goose before the shining gate
 There flew, and, by her cackle, sav'd the state. 8785
 She told the Gauls' approach; th' approaching Gauls,
 Obscure in night, ascend, and seize the walls.
 The gold dissembled well their yellow hair,
 And golden chains on their white necks they wear.
 Gold are their vests; long Alpine spears they wield, 8790
 And their left arm sustains a length of shield.

Hard by, the leaping Salian priests advance;
 And naked thro' the streets the mad Luperci dance,
 In caps of wool; the targets dropp'd from heav'n.
 Here modest matrons, in soft litters driv'n, 8795
 To pay their vows in solemn pomp appear,
 And odorous gums in their chaste hands they bear.
 Far hence remov'd, the Stygian seats are seen;
 Pains of the damn'd, and punish'd Catiline 8800
 Hung on a rock—the traitor; and, around,
 The Furies hissing from the nether ground.
 Apart from these, the happy souls he draws,
 And Cato's holy ghost dispensing laws.

Betwixt the quarters flows a golden sea;
 But foaming surges there in silver play. 8805
 The dancing dolphins with their tails divide
 The glitt'ring waves, and cut the precious tide.
 Amid the main, two mighty fleets engage
 Their brazen beaks, oppos'd with equal rage.
 Actium surveys the well-disputed prize; 8810
 Leucate's wat'ry plain with foamy billows fries.
 Young Caesar, on the stern, in armor bright,
 Here leads the Romans and their gods to fight:
 His beamy temples shoot their flames afar,
 And o'er his head is hung the Julian star. 8815
 Agrippa seconds him, with prosp'rous gales,
 And, with propitious gods, his foes assails:
 A naval crown, that binds his manly brows,
 The happy fortune of the fight foreshows.
 Rang'd on the line oppos'd, Antonius brings 8820
 Barbarian aids, and troops of Eastern kings;
 Th' Arabians near, and Bactrians from afar,
 Of tongues discordant, and a mingled war:
 And, rich in gaudy robes, amidst the strife,
 His ill fate follows him—th' Egyptian wife. 8825
 Moving they fight; with oars and forky prows
 The froth is gather'd, and the water glows.
 It seems, as if the Cyclades again
 Were rooted up, and justled in the main;
 Or floating mountains floating mountains meet; 8830
 Such is the fierce encounter of the fleet.
 Fireballs are thrown, and pointed jav'lins fly;
 The fields of Neptune take a purple dye.
 The queen herself, amidst the loud alarms,
 With cymbals toss'd her fainting soldiers warms— 8835
 Fool as she was! who had not yet divin'd
 Her cruel fate, nor saw the snakes behind.
 Her country gods, the monsters of the sky,
 Great Neptune, Pallas, and Love's Queen defy:
 The dog Anubis barks, but barks in vain, 8840
 Nor longer dares oppose th' ethereal train.
 Mars in the middle of the shining shield
 Is grav'd, and strides along the liquid field.
 The Dirae souse from heav'n with swift descent;
 And Discord, dyed in blood, with garments rent, 8845
 Divides the prease: her steps Bellona treads,
 And shakes her iron rod above their heads.

This seen, Apollo, from his Actian height,
 Pours down his arrows; at whose winged flight
 The trembling Indians and Egyptians yield, 8850
 And soft Sabaeans quit the wat'ry field.
 The fatal mistress hoists her silken sails,
 And, shrinking from the fight, invokes the gales.
 Aghast she looks, and heaves her breast for breath,
 Panting, and pale with fear of future death. 8855
 The god had figur'd her as driv'n along
 By winds and waves, and scudding thro' the throng.
 Just opposite, sad Nilus opens wide
 His arms and ample bosom to the tide,
 And spreads his mantle o'er the winding coast, 8860
 In which he wraps his queen, and hides the flying host.
 The victor to the gods his thanks express'd,
 And Rome, triumphant, with his presence bless'd.
 Three hundred temples in the town he plac'd;
 With spoils and altars ev'ry temple grac'd. 8865
 Three shining nights, and three succeeding days,
 The fields resound with shouts, the streets with praise,
 The domes with songs, the theaters with plays.
 All altars flame: before each altar lies,
 Drench'd in his gore, the destin'd sacrifice. 8870
 Great Caesar sits sublime upon his throne,
 Before Apollo's porch of Parian stone;
 Accepts the presents vow'd for victory,
 And hangs the monumental crowns on high.
 Vast crowds of vanquish'd nations march along, 8875
 Various in arms, in habit, and in tongue.
 Here, Mulciber assigns the proper place
 For Carians, and th' ungirt Numidian race;
 Then ranks the Thracians in the second row,
 With Scythians, expert in the dart and bow. 8880
 And here the tam'd Euphrates humbly glides,
 And there the Rhine submits her swelling tides,
 And proud Araxes, whom no bridge could bind;
 The Danes' unconquer'd offspring march behind,
 And Morini, the last of humankind. 8885

These figures, on the shield divinely wrought,
 By Vulcan labor'd, and by Venus brought,
 With joy and wonder fill the hero's thought.
 Unknown the names, he yet admires the grace,
 And bears aloft the fame and fortune of his race. 8890

Book IX

While these affairs in distant places pass'd,
 The various Iris Juno sends with haste,
 To find bold Turnus, who, with anxious thought,
 The secret shade of his great grandsire sought. 8895
 Retir'd alone she found the daring man,
 And op'd her rosy lips, and thus began:
 "What none of all the gods could grant thy vows,
 That, Turnus, this auspicious day bestows.
 Aeneas, gone to seek th' Arcadian prince,
 Has left the Trojan camp without defense; 8900

And, short of succors there, employs his pains
 In parts remote to raise the Tuscan swains.
 Now snatch an hour that favors thy designs;
 Unite thy forces, and attack their lines.”
 This said, on equal wings she pois'd her weight, 8905
 And form'd a radiant rainbow in her flight.

The Daunian hero lifts his hands and eyes,
 And thus invokes the goddess as she flies:
 “Iris, the grace of heav'n, what pow'r divine
 Has sent thee down, thro' dusky clouds to shine? 8910
 See, they divide; immortal day appears,
 And glitt'ring planets dancing in their spheres!
 With joy, these happy omens I obey,
 And follow to the war the god that leads the way.”
 Thus having said, as by the brook he stood, 8915
 He scoop'd the water from the crystal flood;
 Then with his hands the drops to heav'n he throws,
 And loads the pow'rs above with offer'd vows.

Now march the bold confed'rates thro' the plain,
 Well hors'd, well clad; a rich and shining train. 8920
 Messapus leads the van; and, in the rear,
 The sons of Tyrrheus in bright arms appear.
 In the main battle, with his flaming crest,
 The mighty Turnus tow'rs above the rest.
 Silent they move, majestically slow, 8925
 Like ebbing Nile, or Ganges in his flow.
 The Trojans view the dusty cloud from far,
 And the dark menace of the distant war.
 Caicus from the rampire saw it rise,
 Black'ning the fields, and thick'ning thro' the skies. 8930
 Then to his fellows thus aloud he calls:
 “What rolling clouds, my friends, approach the walls?
 Arm! arm! and man the works! prepare your spears
 And pointed darts! the Latian host appears.”

Thus warn'd, they shut their gates; with shouts ascend 8935
 The bulwarks, and, secure, their foes attend:
 For their wise gen'ral, with foreseeing care,
 Had charg'd them not to tempt the doubtful war,
 Nor, tho' provok'd, in open fields advance,
 But close within their lines attend their chance. 8940
 Unwilling, yet they keep the strict command,
 And sourly wait in arms the hostile band.
 The fiery Turnus flew before the rest:
 A piebald steed of Thracian strain he press'd;
 His helm of massy gold, and crimson was his crest. 8945
 With twenty horse to second his designs,
 An unexpected foe, he fac'd the lines.
 “Is there,” he said, “in arms, who bravely dare
 His leader's honor and his danger share?”
 Then spurring on, his brandish'd dart he threw, 8950
 In sign of war: applauding shouts ensue.

Amaz'd to find a dastard race, that run
 Behind the rampires and the battle shun,

- He rides around the camp, with rolling eyes,
 And stops at ev'ry post, and ev'ry passage tries. 8955
 So roams the nightly wolf about the fold:
 Wet with descending show'rs, and stiff with cold,
 He howls for hunger, and he grins for pain,
 (His gnashing teeth are exercis'd in vain.)
 And, impotent of anger, finds no way 8960
 In his distended paws to grasp the prey.
 The mothers listen; but the bleating lambs
 Securely swig the dug, beneath the dams.
 Thus ranges eager Turnus o'er the plain.
 Sharp with desire, and furious with disdain; 8965
 Surveys each passage with a piercing sight,
 To force his foes in equal field to fight.
 Thus while he gazes round, at length he spies,
 Where, fenc'd with strong redoubts, their navy lies,
 Close underneath the walls; the washing tide 8970
 Secures from all approach this weaker side.
 He takes the wish'd occasion, fills his hand
 With ready fires, and shakes a flaming brand.
 Urg'd by his presence, ev'ry soul is warm'd,
 And ev'ry hand with kindled firs is arm'd. 8975
 From the fir'd pines the scatt'ring sparkles fly;
 Fat vapors, mix'd with flames, involve the sky.
 What pow'r, O Muses, could avert the flame
 Which threaten'd, in the fleet, the Trojan name?
 Tell: for the fact, thro' length of time obscure, 8980
 Is hard to faith; yet shall the fame endure.
- 'T is said that, when the chief prepar'd his flight,
 And fell'd his timber from Mount Ida's height,
 The grandam goddess then approach'd her son,
 And with a mother's majesty begun: 8985
 "Grant me," she said, "the sole request I bring,
 Since conquer'd heav'n has own'd you for its king.
 On Ida's brows, for ages past, there stood,
 With firs and maples fill'd, a shady wood;
 And on the summit rose a sacred grove, 8990
 Where I was worship'd with religious love.
 Those woods, that holy grove, my long delight,
 I gave the Trojan prince, to speed his flight.
 Now, fill'd with fear, on their behalf I come;
 Let neither winds o'erset, nor waves intomb 8995
 The floating forests of the sacred pine;
 But let it be their safety to be mine."
 Then thus replied her awful son, who rolls
 The radiant stars, and heav'n and earth controls:
 "How dare you, mother, endless date demand 9000
 For vessels molded by a mortal hand?
 What then is fate? Shall bold Aeneas ride,
 Of safety certain, on th' uncertain tide?
 Yet, what I can, I grant; when, wafted o'er,
 The chief is landed on the Latian shore, 9005
 Whatever ships escape the raging storms,
 At my command shall change their fading forms
 To nymphs divine, and plow the wat'ry way,
 Like Dotis and the daughters of the sea."

To seal his sacred vow, by Styx he swore, 9010
 The lake of liquid pitch, the dreary shore,
 And Phlegethon's innavigable flood,
 And the black regions of his brother god.
 He said; and shook the skies with his imperial nod.

And now at length the number'd hours were come, 9015
 Prefix'd by fate's irrevocable doom,
 When the great Mother of the Gods was free
 To save her ships, and finish Jove's decree.

First, from the quarter of the morn, there sprung 9020
 A light that sign'd the heav'ns, and shot along;
 Then from a cloud, fring'd round with golden fires,
 Were timbrels heard, and Berecynthian choirs;
 And, last, a voice, with more than mortal sounds,
 Both hosts, in arms oppos'd, with equal horror wounds:

"O Trojan race, your needless aid forbear, 9025
 And know, my ships are my peculiar care.
 With greater ease the bold Rutulian may,

With hissing brands, attempt to burn the sea,
 Than singe my sacred pines. But you, my charge, 9030
 Loos'd from your crooked anchors, launch at large,
 Exalted each a nymph: forsake the sand,

And swim the seas, at Cybele's command."
 No sooner had the goddess ceas'd to speak,

When, lo! th' obedient ships their haulsers break; 9035
 And, strange to tell, like dolphins, in the main
 They plunge their prows, and dive, and spring again:

As many beauteous maids the billows sweep,
 As rode before tall vessels on the deep.

The foes, surpris'd with wonder, stood aghast;
 Messapus curb'd his fiery courser's haste; 9040
 Old Tiber roar'd, and, raising up his head,
 Call'd back his waters to their oozy bed.

Turnus alone, undaunted, bore the shock,
 And with these words his trembling troops bespoke:

"These monsters for the Trojans' fate are meant, 9045
 And are by Jove for black presages sent.
 He takes the cowards' last relief away;

For fly they cannot, and, constrain'd to stay,
 Must yield unfought, a base inglorious prey.

The liquid half of all the globe is lost; 9050
 Heav'n shuts the seas, and we secure the coast.
 Theirs is no more than that small spot of ground
 Which myriads of our martial men surround.

Their fates I fear not, or vain oracles.
 'T was giv'n to Venus they should cross the seas, 9055
 And land secure upon the Latian plains:

Their promis'd hour is pass'd, and mine remains.
 'T is in the fate of Turnus to destroy,
 With sword and fire, the faithless race of Troy.

Shall such affronts as these alone inflame 9060
 The Grecian brothers, and the Grecian name?
 My cause and theirs is one; a fatal strife,
 And final ruin, for a ravish'd wife.

Was 't not enough, that, punish'd for the crime,

Was 't not enough, that, punish'd for the crime,

Was 't not enough, that, punish'd for the crime,

Was 't not enough, that, punish'd for the crime,

Was 't not enough, that, punish'd for the crime,

- They fell; but will they fall a second time? 9065
 One would have thought they paid enough before,
 To curse the costly sex, and durst offend no more.
 Can they securely trust their feeble wall,
 A slight partition, a thin interval,
 Betwixt their fate and them; when Troy, tho' built 9070
 By hands divine, yet perish'd by their guilt?
 Lend me, for once, my friends, your valiant hands,
 To force from out their lines these dastard bands.
 Less than a thousand ships will end this war,
 Nor Vulcan needs his fated arms prepare. 9075
 Let all the Tuscans, all th' Arcadians, join!
 Nor these, nor those, shall frustrate my design.
 Let them not fear the treasons of the night,
 The robb'd Palladium, the pretended flight:
 Our onset shall be made in open light. 9080
 No wooden engine shall their town betray;
 Fires they shall have around, but fires by day.
 No Grecian babes before their camp appear,
 Whom Hector's arms detain'd to the tenth tardy year.
 Now, since the sun is rolling to the west, 9085
 Give we the silent night to needful rest:
 Refresh your bodies, and your arms prepare;
 The morn shall end the small remains of war."
- The post of honor to Messapus falls,
 To keep the nightly guard, to watch the walls, 9090
 To pitch the fires at distances around,
 And close the Trojans in their scanty ground.
 Twice seven Rutulian captains ready stand,
 And twice seven hundred horse these chiefs command;
 All clad in shining arms the works invest, 9095
 Each with a radiant helm and waving crest.
 Stretch'd at their length, they press the grassy ground;
 They laugh, they sing, (the jolly bowls go round,)
 With lights and cheerful fires renew the day,
 And pass the wakeful night in feasts and play. 9100
- The Trojans, from above, their foes beheld,
 And with arm'd legions all the rampires fill'd.
 Seiz'd with affright, their gates they first explore;
 Join works to works with bridges, tow'r to tow'r:
 Thus all things needful for defense abound. 9105
 Mnestheus and brave Seresthus walk the round,
 Commission'd by their absent prince to share
 The common danger, and divide the care.
 The soldiers draw their lots, and, as they fall,
 By turns relieve each other on the wall. 9110
- Nigh where the foes their utmost guards advance,
 To watch the gate was warlike Nisus' chance.
 His father Hyrtacus of noble blood;
 His mother was a huntress of the wood,
 And sent him to the wars. Well could he bear 9115
 His lance in fight, and dart the flying spear,
 But better skill'd unerring shafts to send.
 Beside him stood Euryalus, his friend:

Euryalus, than whom the Trojan host
 No fairer face, or sweeter air, could boast— 9120
 Scarce had the down to shade his cheeks begun.
 One was their care, and their delight was one:
 One common hazard in the war they shar'd,
 And now were both by choice upon the guard.

Then Nisus thus: “Or do the gods inspire 9125
 This warmth, or make we gods of our desire?
 A gen'rous ardor boils within my breast,
 Eager of action, enemy to rest:

This urges me to fight, and fires my mind
 To leave a memorable name behind. 9130

Thou see'st the foe secure; how faintly shine
 Their scatter'd fires! the most, in sleep supine
 Along the ground, an easy conquest lie:
 The wakeful few the fuming flagon ply;
 All hush'd around. Now hear what I revolve— 9135

A thought unripe—and scarcely yet resolve.
 Our absent prince both camp and council mourn;
 By message both would hasten his return:
 If they confer what I demand on thee,
 (For fame is recompense enough for me,) 9140
 Methinks, beneath yon hill, I have espied
 A way that safely will my passage guide.”

Euryalus stood list'ning while he spoke,
 With love of praise and noble envy struck;
 Then to his ardent friend expos'd his mind: 9145
 “All this, alone, and leaving me behind!

Am I unworthy, Nisus, to be join'd?
 Thinkist thou I can my share of glory yield,
 Or send thee unassisted to the field?

Not so my father taught my childhood arms; 9150
 Born in a siege, and bred among alarms!

Nor is my youth unworthy of my friend,
 Nor of the heav'n-born hero I attend.
 The thing call'd life, with ease I can disclaim,
 And think it over-sold to purchase fame.” 9155

Then Nisus thus: “Alas! thy tender years
 Would minister new matter to my fears.
 So may the gods, who view this friendly strife,
 Restore me to thy lov'd embrace with life,
 Condemn'd to pay my vows, (as sure I trust,) 9160
 This thy request is cruel and unjust.

But if some chance—as many chances are,
 And doubtful hazards, in the deeds of war—
 If one should reach my head, there let it fall,
 And spare thy life; I would not perish all. 9165

Thy bloomy youth deserves a longer date:
 Live thou to mourn thy love's unhappy fate;
 To bear my mangled body from the foe,
 Or buy it back, and fun'ral rites bestow.
 Or, if hard fortune shall those dues deny, 9170
 Thou canst at least an empty tomb supply.
 O let not me the widow's tears renew!

- Nor let a mother's curse my name pursue:
 Thy pious parent, who, for love of thee,
 Forsook the coasts of friendly Sicily, 9175
 Her age committing to the seas and wind,
 When ev'ry weary matron stay'd behind."
 To this, Euryalus: "You plead in vain,
 And but protract the cause you cannot gain.
 No more delays, but haste!" With that, he wakes 9180
 The nodding watch; each to his office takes.
 The guard reliev'd, the gen'rous couple went
 To find the council at the royal tent.
- All creatures else forgot their daily care,
 And sleep, the common gift of nature, share; 9185
 Except the Trojan peers, who wakeful sate
 In nightly council for th' indanger'd state.
 They vote a message to their absent chief,
 Shew their distress, and beg a swift relief.
 Amid the camp a silent seat they chose, 9190
 Remote from clamor, and secure from foes.
 On their left arms their ample shields they bear,
 The right reclin'd upon the bending spear.
 Now Nisus and his friend approach the guard,
 And beg admission, eager to be heard; 9195
 Th' affair important, not to be deferr'd.
 Ascanius bids 'em be conducted in,
 Ord'ring the more experienced to begin.
 Then Nisus thus: "Ye fathers, lend your ears;
 Nor judge our bold attempt beyond our years. 9200
 The foe, securely drench'd in sleep and wine,
 Neglect their watch; the fires but thinly shine;
 And where the smoke in cloudy vapors flies,
 Cov'ring the plain, and curling to the skies,
 Betwixt two paths, which at the gate divide, 9205
 Close by the sea, a passage we have spied,
 Which will our way to great Aeneas guide.
 Expect each hour to see him safe again,
 Loaded with spoils of foes in battle slain.
 Snatch we the lucky minute while we may; 9210
 Nor can we be mistaken in the way;
 For, hunting in the vale, we both have seen
 The rising turrets, and the stream between,
 And know the winding course, with ev'ry ford."
- He ceas'd; and old Alethes took the word: 9215
 "Our country gods, in whom our trust we place,
 Will yet from ruin save the Trojan race,
 While we behold such dauntless worth appear
 In dawning youth, and souls so void of fear."
 Then into tears of joy the father broke; 9220
 Each in his longing arms by turns he took;
 Panted and paus'd; and thus again he spoke:
 "Ye brave young men, what equal gifts can we,
 In recompense of such desert, decree?
 The greatest, sure, and best you can receive, 9225
 The gods and your own conscious worth will give.

The rest our grateful gen'ral will bestow,
And young Ascanius till his manhood owe."

"And I, whose welfare in my father lies," Ascanius adds, "by the great deities, 9230
By my dear country, by my household gods,
By hoary Vesta's rites and dark abodes,
Adjure you both, (on you my fortune stands;
That and my faith I plight into your hands,) 9235
Make me but happy in his safe return,
Whose wanted presence I can only mourn;
Your common gift shall two large goblets be
Of silver, wrought with curious imagery,
And high emboss'd, which, when old Priam reign'd,
My conqu'ring sire at sack'd Arisba gain'd; 9240
And more, two tripods cast in antic mold,
With two great talents of the finest gold;
Beside a costly bowl, ingrav'd with art,
Which Dido gave, when first she gave her heart.
But, if in conquer'd Italy we reign, 9245
When spoils by lot the victor shall obtain—
Thou saw'st the courser by proud Turnus press'd:
That, Nisus, and his arms, and nodding crest,
And shield, from chance exempt, shall be thy share:
Twelve lab'ring slaves, twelve handmaids young and fair 9250
All clad in rich attire, and train'd with care;
And, last, a Latian field with fruitful plains,
And a large portion of the king's domains.
But thou, whose years are more to mine allied—
No fate my vow'd affection shall divide 9255
From thee, heroic youth! Be wholly mine;
Take full possession; all my soul is thine.
One faith, one fame, one fate, shall both attend;
My life's companion, and my bosom friend:
My peace shall be committed to thy care, 9260
And to thy conduct my concerns in war."

Then thus the young Euryalus replied:
"Whatever fortune, good or bad, betide,
The same shall be my age, as now my youth;
No time shall find me wanting to my truth. 9265
This only from your goodness let me gain
(And, this ungranted, all rewards are vain)
Of Priam's royal race my mother came—
And sure the best that ever bore the name—
Whom neither Troy nor Sicily could hold 9270
From me departing, but, o'erspent and old,
My fate she follow'd. Ignorant of this Whatever danger, neither parting kiss,
Nor pious blessing taken, her I leave,
And in this only act of all my life deceive. 9275
By this right hand and conscious Night I swear,
My soul so sad a farewell could not bear.
Be you her comfort; fill my vacant place
(Permit me to presume so great a grace)
Support her age, forsaken and distress'd. 9280

That hope alone will fortify my breast
Against the worst of fortunes, and of fears.”
He said. The mov’d assistants melt in tears.

Then thus Ascanius, wonderstruck to see
That image of his filial piety: 9285

“So great beginnings, in so green an age,
Exact the faith which I again engage.
Thy mother all the dues shall justly claim,
Creusa had, and only want the name.

Whate’er event thy bold attempt shall have, 9290
‘T is merit to have borne a son so brave.

Now by my head, a sacred oath, I swear,
(My father us’d it,) what, returning here
Crown’d with success, I for thyself prepare,
That, if thou fail, shall thy lov’d mother share.” 9295

He said, and weeping, while he spoke the word,
From his broad belt he drew a shining sword,
Magnificent with gold. Lycaon made,
And in an ivory scabbard sheath’d the blade.
This was his gift. Great Mnestheus gave his friend 9300
A lion’s hide, his body to defend;
And good Alethes furnish’d him, beside,
With his own trusty helm, of temper tried.

Thus arm’d they went. The noble Trojans wait
Their issuing forth, and follow to the gate 9305
With prayers and vows. Above the rest appears
Ascanius, manly far beyond his years,
And messages committed to their care,
Which all in winds were lost, and flitting air.

The trenches first they pass’d; then took their way 9310
Where their proud foes in pitch’d pavilions lay;
To many fatal, ere themselves were slain.

They found the careless host dispers’d upon the plain,
Who, gorg’d, and drunk with wine, supinely snore.
Unharness’d chariots stand along the shore: 9315

Amidst the wheels and reins, the goblet by,
A medley of debauch and war, they lie.
Observing Nisus shew’d his friend the sight:
“Behold a conquest gain’d without a fight.
Occasion offers, and I stand prepar’d; 9320

There lies our way; be thou upon the guard,
And look around, while I securely go,
And hew a passage thro’ the sleeping foe.”

Softly he spoke; then striding took his way,
With his drawn sword, where haughty Rhamnes lay; 9325

His head rais’d high on tapestry beneath,
And heaving from his breast, he drew his breath;
A king and prophet, by King Turnus lov’d:
But fate by prescience cannot be remov’d.

Him and his sleeping slaves he slew; then spies 9330
Where Remus, with his rich retinue, lies.
His armor-bearer first, and next he kills
His charioteer, intrench’d betwixt the wheels

And his lov'd horses; last invades their lord;
 Full on his neck he drives the fatal sword: 9335
 The gasping head flies off; a purple flood
 Flows from the trunk, that welters in the blood,
 Which, by the spurning heels dispers'd around,
 The bed besprinkles and bedews the ground.
 Lamus the bold, and Lamyrus the strong, 9340
 He slew, and then Serranus fair and young.
 From dice and wine the youth retir'd to rest,
 And puff'd the fummy god from out his breast:
 Ev'n then he dreamt of drink and lucky play—
 More lucky, had it lasted till the day. 9345
 The famish'd lion thus, with hunger bold,
 O'erleaps the fences of the nightly fold,
 And tears the peaceful flocks: with silent awe
 Trembling they lie, and pant beneath his paw.

Nor with less rage Euryalus employs 9350
 The wrathful sword, or fewer foes destroys;
 But on th' ignoble crowd his fury flew;
 He Fadus, Hebesus, and Rhoetus slew.
 Oppress'd with heavy sleep the former fell,
 But Rhoetus wakeful, and observing all: 9355
 Behind a spacious jar he slink'd for fear;
 The fatal iron found and reach'd him there;
 For, as he rose, it pierc'd his naked side,
 And, reeking, thence return'd in crimson dyed.
 The wound pours out a stream of wine and blood; 9360
 The purple soul comes floating in the flood.

Now, where Messapus quarter'd, they arrive.
 The fires were fainting there, and just alive;
 The warrior-horses, tied in order, fed.
 Nisus observ'd the discipline, and said: 9365
 "Our eager thirst of blood may both betray;
 And see the scatter'd streaks of dawning day,
 Foe to nocturnal thefts. No more, my friend;
 Here let our glutt'd execution end.
 A lane thro' slaughter'd bodies we have made." 9370
 The bold Euryalus, tho' loth, obey'd.
 Of arms, and arras, and of plate, they find
 A precious load; but these they leave behind.
 Yet, fond of gaudy spoils, the boy would stay
 To make the rich caparison his prey, 9375
 Which on the steed of conquer'd Rhamnes lay.
 Nor did his eyes less longingly behold
 The girdle-belt, with nails of burnish'd gold.
 This present Caedicus the rich bestow'd
 On Remulus, when friendship first they vow'd, 9380
 And, absent, join'd in hospitable ties:
 He, dying, to his heir bequeath'd the prize;
 Till, by the conqu'ring Ardean troops oppress'd,
 He fell; and they the glorious gift possess'd.
 These glitt'ring spoils (now made the victor's gain) 9385
 He to his body suits, but suits in vain:
 Messapus' helm he finds among the rest,
 And laces on, and wears the waving crest.

Proud of their conquest, prouder of their prey,
They leave the camp, and take the ready way. 9390

But far they had not pass'd, before they spied
Three hundred horse, with Volscens for their guide.
The queen a legion to King Turnus sent;
But the swift horse the slower foot prevent,
And now, advancing, sought the leader's tent. 9395

They saw the pair; for, thro' the doubtful shade,
His shining helm Euryalus betray'd,
On which the moon with full reflection play'd.
"T is not for naught," cried Volscens from the crowd,
"These men go there;" then rais'd his voice aloud: 9400

"Stand! stand! why thus in arms? And whither bent?
From whence, to whom, and on what errand sent?"
Silent they scud away, and haste their flight
To neighb'ring woods, and trust themselves to night.
The speedy horse all passages belay, 9405

And spur their smoking steeds to cross their way,
And watch each entrance of the winding wood.
Black was the forest: thick with beech it stood,
Horrid with fern, and intricate with thorn;
Few paths of human feet, or tracks of beasts, were worn. 9410

The darkness of the shades, his heavy prey,
And fear, misled the younger from his way.
But Nisus hit the turns with happier haste,
And, thoughtless of his friend, the forest pass'd,
And Alban plains, from Alba's name so call'd, 9415

Where King Latinus then his oxen stall'd;
Till, turning at the length, he stood his ground,
And miss'd his friend, and cast his eyes around:
"Ah wretch!" he cried, "where have I left behind
Th' unhappy youth? where shall I hope to find? 9420

Or what way take?" Again he ventures back,
And treads the mazes of his former track.
He winds the wood, and, list'ning, hears the noise
Of tramping coursers, and the riders' voice.
The sound approach'd; and suddenly he view'd 9425

The foes inclosing, and his friend pursued,
Forelaid and taken, while he strove in vain
The shelter of the friendly shades to gain.
What should he next attempt? what arms employ,
What fruitless force, to free the captive boy? 9430

Or desperate should he rush and lose his life,
With odds oppress'd, in such unequal strife?

Resolv'd at length, his pointed spear he shook;
And, casting on the moon a mournful look:
"Guardian of groves, and goddess of the night,
Fair queen," he said, "direct my dart aright. 9435

If e'er my pious father, for my sake,
Did grateful off'rings on thy altars make,
Or I increas'd them with my sylvan toils,
And hung thy holy roofs with savage spoils, 9440
Give me to scatter these." Then from his ear
He pois'd, and aim'd, and launch'd the trembling spear.
The deadly weapon, hissing from the grove,

Impetuous on the back of Sulmo drove;
 Pierc'd his thin armor, drank his vital blood, 9445
 And in his body left the broken wood.
 He staggers round; his eyeballs roll in death,
 And with short sobs he gasps away his breath.
 All stand amaz'd—a second jav'lin flies
 With equal strength, and quivers thro' the skies. 9450
 This thro' thy temples, Tagus, forc'd the way,
 And in the brainpan warmly buried lay.
 Fierce Volscens foams with rage, and, gazing round,
 Descried not him who gave the fatal wound,
 Nor knew to fix revenge: "But thou," he cries, 9455
 "Shalt pay for both," and at the pris'ner flies
 With his drawn sword. Then, struck with deep despair,
 That cruel sight the lover could not bear;
 But from his covert rush'd in open view,
 And sent his voice before him as he flew: 9460
 "Me! me!" he cried—"turn all your swords alone
 On me—the fact confess'd, the fault my own.
 He neither could nor durst, the guiltless youth:
 Ye moon and stars, bear witness to the truth!
 His only crime (if friendship can offend) 9465
 Is too much love to his unhappy friend."
 Too late he speaks: the sword, which fury guides,
 Driv'n with full force, had pierc'd his tender sides.
 Down fell the beauteous youth: the yawning wound
 Gush'd out a purple stream, and stain'd the ground. 9470
 His snowy neck reclines upon his breast,
 Like a fair flow'r by the keen share oppress'd;
 Like a white poppy sinking on the plain,
 Whose heavy head is overcharg'd with rain.
 Despair, and rage, and vengeance justly vow'd, 9475
 Drove Nisus headlong on the hostile crowd.
 Volscens he seeks; on him alone he bends:
 Borne back and bor'd by his surrounding friends,
 Onward he press'd, and kept him still in sight;
 Then whirl'd aloft his sword with all his might: 9480
 Th' unerring steel descended while he spoke,
 Piered his wide mouth, and thro' his weazon broke.
 Dying, he slew; and, stagg'ring on the plain,
 With swimming eyes he sought his lover slain;
 Then quiet on his bleeding bosom fell, 9485
 Content, in death, to be reveng'd so well.

O happy friends! for, if my verse can give Immortal life, your fame shall ever live,
 Fix'd as the Capitol's foundation lies,
 And spread, where'er the Roman eagle flies! 9490

The conqu'ring party first divide the prey,
 Then their slain leader to the camp convey.
 With wonder, as they went, the troops were fill'd,
 To see such numbers whom so few had kill'd.
 Serranus, Rhamnes, and the rest, they found: 9495
 Vast crowds the dying and the dead surround;
 And the yet reeking blood oerflows the ground.
 All knew the helmet which Messapus lost,

But mourn'd a purchase that so dear had cost. 9500
 Now rose the ruddy morn from Tithon's bed,
 And with the dawn of day the skies o'erspread;
 Nor long the sun his daily course withheld,
 But added colors to the world reveal'd:
 When early Turnus, wak'ning with the light,
 All clad in armor, calls his troops to fight. 9505
 His martial men with fierce harangue he fir'd,
 And his own ardor in their souls inspir'd.
 This done—to give new terror to his foes,
 The heads of Nisus and his friend he shows,
 Rais'd high on pointed spears—a ghastly sight: 9510
 Loud peals of shouts ensue, and barbarous delight.

Meantime the Trojans run, where danger calls;
 They line their trenches, and they man their walls.
 In front extended to the left they stood;
 Safe was the right, surrounded by the flood. 9515
 But, casting from their tow'rs a frightful view,
 They saw the faces, which too well they knew,
 Tho' then disguis'd in death, and smear'd all o'er
 With filth obscene, and dropping putrid gore.
 Soon hasty fame thro' the sad city bears 9520
 The mournful message to the mother's ears.
 An icy cold benumbs her limbs; she shakes;
 Her cheeks the blood, her hand the web forsakes.
 She runs the rampires round amidst the war,
 Nor fears the flying darts; she rends her hair, 9525
 And fills with loud laments the liquid air.
 "Thus, then, my lov'd Euryalus appears!
 Thus looks the prop my declining years!
 Was't on this face my famish'd eyes I fed?
 Ah! how unlike the living is the dead! 9530
 And could'st thou leave me, cruel, thus alone?
 Not one kind kiss from a departing son!
 No look, no last adieu before he went,
 In an ill-boding hour to slaughter sent!
 Cold on the ground, and pressing foreign clay, 9535
 To Latian dogs and fowls he lies a prey!
 Nor was I near to close his dying eyes,
 To wash his wounds, to weep his obsequies,
 To call about his corpse his crying friends,
 Or spread the mantle (made for other ends) 9540
 On his dear body, which I wove with care,
 Nor did my daily pains or nightly labor spare.
 Where shall I find his corpse? what earth sustains
 His trunk dismember'd, and his cold remains?
 For this, alas! I left my needful ease, 9545
 Expos'd my life to winds and winter seas!
 If any pity touch Rutulian hearts,
 Here empty all your quivers, all your darts;
 Or, if they fail, thou, Jove, conclude my woe,
 And send me thunderstruck to shades below!" 9550
 Her shrieks and clamors pierce the Trojans' ears,
 Unman their courage, and augment their fears;
 Nor young Ascanius could the sight sustain,
 Nor old Ilioneus his tears restrain,

But Actor and Idaeus jointly sent, 9555
To bear the madding mother to her tent.

And now the trumpets terribly, from far,
With rattling clangor, rouse the sleepy war.
The soldiers' shouts succeed the brazen sounds;
And heav'n, from pole to pole, the noise rebounds. 9560

The Volscians bear their shields upon their head,
And, rushing forward, form a moving shed.
These fill the ditch; those pull the bulwarks down:
Some raise the ladders; others scale the town. 9565
But, where void spaces on the walls appear,
Or thin defense, they pour their forces there.

With poles and missive weapons, from afar,
The Trojans keep aloof the rising war.
Taught, by their ten years' siege, defensive fight,
They roll down ribs of rocks, an unresisted weight, 9570
To break the penthouse with the pond'rous blow,
Which yet the patient Volscians undergo:

But could not bear th' unequal combat long;
For, where the Trojans find the thickest throng,
The ruin falls: their shatter'd shields give way, 9575
And their crush'd heads become an easy prey.
They shrink for fear, abated of their rage,
Nor longer dare in a blind fight engage;

Contented now to gall them from below
With darts and slings, and with the distant bow. 9580

Elsewhere Mezentius, terrible to view,
A blazing pine within the trenches threw.
But brave Messapus, Neptune's warlike son,
Broke down the palisades, the trenches won,
And loud for ladders calls, to scale the town. 9585

Calliope, begin! Ye sacred Nine,
Inspire your poet in his high design,
To sing what slaughter manly Turnus made,
What souls he sent below the Stygian shade,
What fame the soldiers with their captain share, 9590
And the vast circuit of the fatal war;
For you in singing martial facts excel;
You best remember, and alone can tell.

There stood a tow'r, amazing to the sight,
Built up of beams, and of stupendous height: 9595
Art, and the nature of the place, conspir'd
To furnish all the strength that war requir'd.
To level this, the bold Italians join;

The wary Trojans obviate their design;
With weighty stones o'erwhelm their troops below, 9600
Shoot thro' the loopholes, and sharp jav'lins throw.
Turnus, the chief, toss'd from his thund'ring hand
Against the wooden walls, a flaming brand:

It stuck, the fiery plague; the winds were high;
The planks were season'd, and the timber dry. 9605
Contagion caught the posts; it spread along,
Scorch'd, and to distance drove the scatter'd throng.

- The Trojans fled; the fire pursued amain,
 Still gath'ring fast upon the trembling train;
 Till, crowding to the corners of the wall, 9610
 Down the defense and the defenders fall.
 The mighty flaw makes heav'n itself resound:
 The dead and dying Trojans strew the ground.
 The tow'r, that follow'd on the fallen crew,
 Whelm'd o'er their heads, and buried whom it slew: 9615
 Some stuck upon the darts themselves had sent;
 All the same equal ruin underwent.
- Young Lycus and Helenor only scape;
 Sav'd—how, they know not—from the steepy leap.
 Helenor, elder of the two: by birth, 9620
 On one side royal, one a son of earth,
 Whom to the Lydian king Licymnia bare,
 And sent her boasted bastard to the war
 (A privilege which none but freemen share).
 Slight were his arms, a sword and silver shield: 9625
 No marks of honor charg'd its empty field.
 Light as he fell, so light the youth arose,
 And rising, found himself amidst his foes;
 Nor flight was left, nor hopes to force his way.
 Embolden'd by despair, he stood at bay; 9630
 And—like a stag, whom all the troop surrounds
 Of eager huntsmen and invading hounds—
 Resolv'd on death, he dissipates his fears,
 And bounds aloft against the pointed spears:
 So dares the youth, secure of death; and throws 9635
 His dying body on his thickest foes.
 But Lycus, swifter of his feet by far,
 Runs, doubles, winds and turns, amidst the war;
 Springs to the walls, and leaves his foes behind,
 And snatches at the beam he first can find; 9640
 Looks up, and leaps aloft at all the stretch,
 In hopes the helping hand of some kind friend to reach.
 But Turnus follow'd hard his hunted prey
 (His spear had almost reach'd him in the way,
 Short of his reins, and scarce a span behind) 9645
 “Fool!” said the chief, “tho' fleeter than the wind,
 Couldst thou presume to scape, when I pursue?”
 He said, and downward by the feet he drew
 The trembling dastard; at the tug he falls;
 Vast ruins come along, rent from the smoking walls. 9650
 Thus on some silver swan, or tim'rous hare,
 Jove's bird comes sousing down from upper air;
 Her crooked talons truss the fearful prey:
 Then out of sight she soars, and wings her way.
 So seizes the grim wolf the tender lamb, 9655
 In vain lamented by the bleating dam.
- Then rushing onward with a barb'rous cry,
 The troops of Turnus to the combat fly.
 The ditch with fagots fill'd, the daring foe
 Toss'd firebrands to the steepy turrets throw. 9660
- Ilioneus, as bold Lucetius came
 To force the gate, and feed the kindling flame,

Roll'd down the fragment of a rock so right,
 It crush'd him double underneath the weight. 9665
 Two more young Liger and Asylas slew:
 To bend the bow young Liger better knew;
 Asylas best the pointed jav'lin threw.
 Brave Caeneus laid Ortygius on the plain;
 The victor Caeneus was by Turnus slain. 9670
 By the same hand, Clonius and Itys fall,
 Sagar, and Ida, standing on the wall.
 From Capys' arms his fate Privernus found:
 Hurt by Themilla first-but slight the wound—
 His shield thrown by, to mitigate the smart,
 He clapp'd his hand upon the wounded part: 9675
 The second shaft came swift and unespied,
 And pierc'd his hand, and nail'd it to his side,
 Transfix'd his breathing lungs and beating heart:
 The soul came issuing out, and hiss'd against the dart.

The son of Arcens shone amid the rest, 9680
 In glitt'ring armor and a purple vest,
 (Fair was his face, his eyes inspiring love,)
 Bred by his father in the Martian grove,
 Where the fat altars of Palicus flame,
 And send in arms to purchase early fame. 9685
 Him when he spied from far, the Tuscan king
 Laid by the lance, and took him to the sling,
 Thrice whirl'd the thong around his head, and threw:
 The heated lead half melted as it flew;
 It pierc'd his hollow temples and his brain; 9690
 The youth came tumbling down, and spurn'd the plain.

Then young Ascanius, who, before this day,
 Was wont in woods to shoot the savage prey,
 First bent in martial strife the twanging bow,
 And exercis'd against a human foe— 9695
 With this bereft Numanus of his life,
 Who Turnus' younger sister took to wife.
 Proud of his realm, and of his royal bride,
 Vaunting before his troops, and lengthen'd with a stride,
 In these insulting terms the Trojans he defied: 9700

“Twice-conquer'd cowards, now your shame is shown—
 Coop'd up a second time within your town!
 Who dare not issue forth in open field,
 But hold your walls before you for a shield.
 Thus threat you war? thus our alliance force? 9705
 What gods, what madness, hether steer'd your course?
 You shall not find the sons of Atreus here,
 Nor need the frauds of sly Ulysses fear.
 Strong from the cradle, of a sturdy brood,
 We bear our newborn infants to the flood; 9710
 There bath'd amid the stream, our boys we hold,
 With winter harden'd, and inur'd to cold.
 They wake before the day to range the wood,
 Kill ere they eat, nor taste unconquer'd food.
 No sports, but what belong to war, they know: 9715
 To break the stubborn colt, to bend the bow.
 Our youth, of labor patient, earn their bread;

- Hardly they work, with frugal diet fed.
 From plows and harrows sent to seek renown,
 They fight in fields, and storm the shaken town. 9720
 No part of life from toils of war is free,
 No change in age, or diff'rence in degree.
 We plow and till in arms; our oxen feel,
 Instead of goads, the spur and pointed steel;
 Th' inverted lance makes furrows in the plain. 9725
 Ev'n time, that changes all, yet changes us in vain:
 The body, not the mind; nor can control
 Th' immortal vigor, or abate the soul.
 Our helms defend the young, disguise the gray:
 We live by plunder, and delight in prey. 9730
 Your vests embroider'd with rich purple shine;
 In sloth you glory, and in dances join.
 Your vests have sweeping sleeves; with female pride
 Your turbants underneath your chins are tied.
 Go, Phrygians, to your Dindymus again! 9735
 Go, less than women, in the shapes of men!
 Go, mix'd with eunuchs, in the Mother's rites,
 Where with unequal sound the flute invites;
 Sing, dance, and howl, by turns, in Ida's shade:
 Resign the war to men, who know the martial trade!" 9740
- This foul reproach Ascanius could not hear
 With patience, or a vow'd revenge forbear.
 At the full stretch of both his hands he drew,
 And almost join'd the horns of the tough yew.
 But, first, before the throne of Jove he stood, 9745
 And thus with lifted hands invok'd the god:
 "My first attempt, great Jupiter, succeed!
 An annual off'ring in thy grove shall bleed;
 A snow-white steer, before thy altar led,
 Who, like his mother, bears aloft his head, 9750
 Butts with his threat'ning brows, and bellowing stands,
 And dares the fight, and spurns the yellow sands."
- Jove bow'd the heav'ns, and lent a gracious ear,
 And thunder'd on the left, amidst the clear.
 Sounded at once the bow; and swiftly flies 9755
 The feather'd death, and hisses thro' the skies.
 The steel thro' both his temples forc'd the way:
 Extended on the ground, Numanus lay.
 "Go now, vain boaster, and true valor scorn!
 The Phrygians, twice subdued, yet make this third return." 9760
 Ascanius said no more. The Trojans shake
 The heav'ns with shouting, and new vigor take.
- Apollo then bestrode a golden cloud,
 To view the feats of arms, and fighting crowd;
 And thus the beardless victor he bespoke aloud: 9765
 "Advance, illustrious youth, increase in fame,
 And wide from east to west extend thy name;
 Offspring of gods thyself; and Rome shall owe
 To thee a race of demigods below.
 This is the way to heav'n: the pow'rs divine 9770
 From this beginning date the Julian line.

To thee, to them, and their victorious heirs,
 The conquer'd war is due, and the vast world is theirs.
 Troy is too narrow for thy name." He said,
 And plunging downward shot his radiant head; 9775
 Dispell'd the breathing air, that broke his flight:
 Shorn of his beams, a man to mortal sight.
 Old Butes' form he took, Anchises' squire,
 Now left, to rule Ascanius, by his sire:
 His wrinkled visage, and his hoary hairs, 9780
 His mien, his habit, and his arms, he wears,
 And thus salutes the boy, too forward for his years:
 "Suffice it thee, thy father's worthy son,
 The warlike prize thou hast already won.
 The god of archers gives thy youth a part 9785
 Of his own praise, nor envies equal art.
 Now tempt the war no more." He said, and flew
 Obscure in air, and vanish'd from their view.
 The Trojans, by his arms, their patron know,
 And hear the twanging of his heav'nly bow. 9790
 Then duteous force they use, and Phoebus' name,
 To keep from fight the youth too fond of fame.
 Undaunted, they themselves no danger shun;
 From wall to wall the shouts and clamors run.
 They bend their bows; they whirl their slings around; 9795
 Heaps of spent arrows fall, and strew the ground;
 And helms, and shields, and rattling arms resound.
 The combat thickens, like the storm that flies
 From westward, when the show'ry Kids arise;
 Or patt'ring hail comes pouring on the main, 9800
 When Jupiter descends in harden'd rain,
 Or bellowing clouds burst with a stormy sound,
 And with an armed winter strew the ground.

Pand'rus and Bitias, thunderbolts of war,
 Whom Hiera to bold Alcanor bare 9805
 On Ida's top, two youths of height and size
 Like firs that on their mother mountain rise,
 Presuming on their force, the gates unbar,
 And of their own accord invite the war.
 With fates averse, against their king's command, 9810
 Arm'd, on the right and on the left they stand,
 And flank the passage: shining steel they wear,
 And waving crests above their heads appear.
 Thus two tall oaks, that Padus' banks adorn,
 Lift up to heav'n their leafy heads unshorn, 9815
 And, overpress'd with nature's heavy load,
 Dance to the whistling winds, and at each other nod.
 In flows a tide of Latians, when they see
 The gate set open, and the passage free;
 Bold Quercens, with rash Tmarus, rushing on, 9820
 Equicolus, that in bright armor shone,
 And Haemon first; but soon repuls'd they fly,
 Or in the well-defended pass they die.
 These with success are fir'd, and those with rage,
 And each on equal terms at length engage. 9825
 Drawn from their lines, and issuing on the plain,
 The Trojans hand to hand the fight maintain.

- Fierce Turnus in another quarter fought,
 When suddenly th' unhop'd-for news was brought,
 The foes had left the fastness of their place, 9830
 Prevail'd in fight, and had his men in chase.
 He quits th' attack, and, to prevent their fate,
 Runs where the giant brothers guard the gate.
 The first he met, Antiphates the brave,
 But base-begotten on a Theban slave, 9835
 Sarpedon's son, he slew: the deadly dart
 Found passage thro' his breast, and pierc'd his heart.
 Fix'd in the wound th' Italian cornel stood,
 Warm'd in his lungs, and in his vital blood.
 Aphidnus next, and Erymanthus dies, 9840
 And Meropes, and the gigantic size
 Of Bitias, threat'ning with his ardent eyes.
 Not by the feeble dart he fell oppress'd
 (A dart were lost within that roomy breast),
 But from a knotted lance, large, heavy, strong, 9845
 Which roar'd like thunder as it whirl'd along:
 Not two bull hides th' impetuous force withhold,
 Nor coat of double mail, with scales of gold.
 Down sunk the monster bulk and press'd the ground;
 His arms and clatt'ring shield on the vast body sound, 9850
 Not with less ruin than the Bajan mole,
 Rais'd on the seas, the surges to control—
 At once comes tumbling down the rocky wall;
 Prone to the deep, the stones disjointed fall
 Of the vast pile; the scatter'd ocean flies; 9855
 Black sands, discolor'd froth, and mingled mud arise:
 The frighted billows roll, and seek the shores;
 Then trembles Prochyta, then Ischia roars:
 Typhoeus, thrown beneath, by Jove's command,
 Astonish'd at the flaw that shakes the land, 9860
 Soon shifts his weary side, and, scarce awake,
 With wonder feels the weight press lighter on his back.
- The warrior god the Latian troops inspir'd,
 New strung their sinews, and their courage fir'd,
 But chills the Trojan hearts with cold affright: 9865
 Then black despair precipitates their flight.
- When Pandarus beheld his brother kill'd,
 The town with fear and wild confusion fill'd,
 He turns the hinges of the heavy gate
 With both his hands, and adds his shoulders to the weight 9870
 Some happier friends within the walls inclos'd;
 The rest shut out, to certain death expos'd:
 Fool as he was, and frantic in his care,
 T' admit young Turnus, and include the war!
 He thrust amid the crowd, securely bold, 9875
 Like a fierce tiger pent amid the fold.
 Too late his blazing buckler they descry,
 And sparkling fires that shot from either eye,
 His mighty members, and his ample breast,
 His rattling armor, and his crimson crest. 9880

Far from that hated face the Trojans fly,
 All but the fool who sought his destiny.
 Mad Pandarus steps forth, with vengeance vow'd
 For Bitias' death, and threatens thus aloud:
 "These are not Ardea's walls, nor this the town
 Amata proffers with Lavinia's crown: 9885
 'T is hostile earth you tread. Of hope bereft,
 No means of safe return by flight are left."
 To whom, with count'nance calm, and soul sedate,
 Thus Turnus: "Then begin, and try thy fate: 9890
 My message to the ghost of Priam bear;
 Tell him a new Achilles sent thee there."

A lance of tough ground ash the Trojan threw,
 Rough in the rind, and knotted as it grew:
 With his full force he whirl'd it first around; 9895
 But the soft yielding air receiv'd the wound:

Imperial Juno turn'd the course before,
And fix'd the wand'ring weapon in the door.

- “But hope not thou,” said Turnus, “when I strike,
To shun thy fate: our force is not alike, 9900
Nor thy steel temper'd by the Lemnian god.”
Then rising, on his utmost stretch he stood,
And aim'd from high: the full descending blow
Cleaves the broad front and beardless cheeks in two. 9905
Down sinks the giant with a thund'ring sound:
His pond'rous limbs oppress the trembling ground;
Blood, brains, and foam gush from the gaping wound:
Scalp, face, and shoulders the keen steel divides,
And the shar'd visage hangs on equal sides. 9910
The Trojans fly from their approaching fate;
And, had the victor then secur'd the gate,
And to his troops without unclos'd the bars,
One lucky day had ended all his wars.
But boiling youth, and blind desire of blood,
Push'd on his fury, to pursue the crowd. 9915
Hamstring'd behind, unhappy Gyges died;
Then Phalaris is added to his side.
The pointed jav'lines from the dead he drew,
And their friends' arms against their fellows threw. 9920
Strong Halys stands in vain; weak Phlegys flies;
Saturnia, still at hand, new force and fire supplies.
Then Halius, Prytanis, Alcander fall—
Ingag'd against the foes who scal'd the wall:
But, whom they fear'd without, they found within. 9925
At last, tho' late, by Lynceus he was seen.
He calls new succors, and assaults the prince:
But weak his force, and vain is their defense.
Turn'd to the right, his sword the hero drew,
And at one blow the bold aggressor slew. 9930
He joints the neck; and, with a stroke so strong,
The helm flies off, and bears the head along.
Next him, the huntsman Amycus he kill'd,
In darts invenom'd and in poison skill'd.
Then Clytius fell beneath his fatal spear,
And Creteus, whom the Muses held so dear: 9935
He fought with courage, and he sung the fight;
Arms were his bus'ness, verses his delight.
- The Trojan chiefs behold, with rage and grief,
Their slaughter'd friends, and hasten their relief. 9940
Bold Mnestheus rallies first the broken train,
Whom brave Seresthus and his troop sustain.
To save the living, and revenge the dead,
Against one warrior's arms all Troy they led.
“O, void of sense and courage!” Mnestheus cried,
“Where can you hope your coward heads to hide? 9945
Ah! where beyond these rampires can you run?
One man, and in your camp inclos'd, you shun!
Shall then a single sword such slaughter boast,
And pass unpunish'd from a num'rous host?
Forsaking honor, and renouncing fame, 9945
Your gods, your country, and your king you shame!”

This just reproach their virtue does excite:
They stand, they join, they thicken to the fight.

Now Turnus doubts, and yet disdains to yield,
But with slow paces measures back the field, 9950
And inches to the walls, where Tiber's tide,
Washing the camp, defends the weaker side.
The more he loses, they advance the more,
And tread in ev'ry step he trod before.
They shout: they bear him back; and, whom by might 9955
They cannot conquer, they oppress with weight.

As, compass'd with a wood of spears around,
The lordly lion still maintains his ground;
Grins horrible, retires, and turns again;
Threats his distended paws, and shakes his mane; 9960
He loses while in vain he presses on,
Nor will his courage let him dare to run:
So Turnus fares, and, unresolved of flight,
Moves tardy back, and just recedes from fight.
Yet twice, inrag'd, the combat he renews, 9965
Twice breaks, and twice his broken foes pursues.
But now they swarm, and, with fresh troops supplied,
Come rolling on, and rush from ev'ry side:
Nor Juno, who sustain'd his arms before,
Dares with new strength suffice th' exhausted store; 9970
For Jove, with sour commands, sent Iris down,
To force th' invader from the frightened town.

With labor spent, no longer can he wield
The heavy fanchion, or sustain the shield,
O'erwhelm'd with darts, which from afar they fling: 9975
The weapons round his hollow temples ring;
His golden helm gives way, with stony blows
Batter'd, and flat, and beaten to his brows.
His crest is rash'd away; his ample shield
Is falsified, and round with jav'lins fill'd. 9980

The foe, now faint, the Trojans overwhelm;
And Mnestheus lays hard load upon his helm.
Sick sweat succeeds; he drops at ev'ry pore;
With driving dust his cheeks are pasted o'er;
Shorter and shorter ev'ry gasp he takes; 9985
And vain efforts and hurtless blows he makes.
Plung'd in the flood, and made the waters fly.
The yellow god the welcome burthen bore,
And wip'd the sweat, and wash'd away the gore;
Then gently wafts him to the farther coast, 9990
And sends him safe to cheer his anxious host.

Book X

The gates of heav'n unfold: Jove summons all
The gods to council in the common hall.
Sublimely seated, he surveys from far
The fields, the camp, the fortune of the war, 9995
And all th' inferior world. From first to last,
The sov'reign senate in degrees are plac'd.

Then thus th' almighty sire began: "Ye gods,
 Natives or denizens of blest abodes,
 From whence these murmurs, and this change of mind, 10000
 This backward fate from what was first design'd?
 Why this protracted war, when my commands
 Pronounc'd a peace, and gave the Latian lands?
 What fear or hope on either part divides
 Our heav'ns, and arms our powers on diff'rent sides? 10005
 A lawful time of war at length will come,
 (Nor need your haste anticipate the doom),
 When Carthage shall contend the world with Rome,
 Shall force the rigid rocks and Alpine chains,
 And, like a flood, come pouring on the plains. 10010
 Then is your time for faction and debate,
 For partial favor, and permitted hate.
 Let now your immature dissension cease;
 Sit quiet, and compose your souls to peace."

Thus Jupiter in few unfolds the charge; 10015
 But lovely Venus thus replies at large:
 "O pow'r immense, eternal energy,
 (For to what else protection can we fly?)
 Seest thou the proud Rutulians, how they dare
 In fields, unpunish'd, and insult my care? 10020
 How lofty Turnus vaunts amidst his train,
 In shining arms, triumphant on the plain?
 Ev'n in their lines and trenches they contend,
 And scarce their walls the Trojan troops defend:
 The town is fill'd with slaughter, and o'erfloats, 10025
 With a red deluge, their increasing moats.
 Aeneas, ignorant, and far from thence,
 Has left a camp expos'd, without defense.
 This endless outrage shall they still sustain?
 Shall Troy renew'd be forc'd and fir'd again? 10030
 A second siege my banish'd issue fears,
 And a new Diomedé in arms appears.
 One more audacious mortal will be found;
 And I, thy daughter, wait another wound.
 Yet, if with fates averse, without thy leave, 10035
 The Latian lands my progeny receive,
 Bear they the pains of violated law,
 And thy protection from their aid withdraw.
 But, if the gods their sure success foretell;
 If those of heav'n consent with those of hell, 10040
 To promise Italy; who dare debate
 The pow'r of Jove, or fix another fate?
 What should I tell of tempests on the main,
 Of Aeolus usurping Neptune's reign?
 Of Iris sent, with Bacchanalian heat 10045
 T' inspire the matrons, and destroy the fleet?
 Now Juno to the Stygian sky descends,
 Solicits hell for aid, and arms the fiends.
 That new example wanted yet above:
 An act that well became the wife of Jove! 10050
 Alecto, rais'd by her, with rage inflames
 The peaceful bosoms of the Latian dames.
 Imperial sway no more exalts my mind;

(Such hopes I had indeed, while Heav'n was kind;) 10055
 Now let my happier foes possess my place,
 Whom Jove prefers before the Trojan race;
 And conquer they, whom you with conquest grace.
 Since you can spare, from all your wide command,
 No spot of earth, no hospitable land, 10060
 Which may my wand'ring fugitives receive;
 (Since haughty Juno will not give you leave;) 10065
 Then, father, (if I still may use that name,)
 By ruin'd Troy, yet smoking from the flame,
 I beg you, let Ascanius, by my care,
 Be freed from danger, and dismiss'd the war: 10070
 Inglorious let him live, without a crown.
 The father may be cast on coasts unknown,
 Struggling with fate; but let me save the son.
 Mine is Cythera, mine the Cyprian tow'rs:
 In those recesses, and those sacred bow'rs, 10075
 Obscurely let him rest; his right resign
 To promis'd empire, and his Julian line.
 Then Carthage may th' Ausonian towns destroy,
 Nor fear the race of a rejected boy. 10080
 What profits it my son to scape the fire,
 Arm'd with his gods, and loaded with his sire;
 To pass the perils of the seas and wind;
 Evade the Greeks, and leave the war behind;
 To reach th' Italian shores; if, after all, 10085
 Our second Pergamus is doom'd to fall?
 Much better had he curb'd his high desires,
 And hover'd o'er his ill-extinguish'd fires.
 To Simois' banks the fugitives restore,
 And give them back to war, and all the woes before."

Deep indignation swell'd Saturnia's heart: 10085
 "And must I own," she said, "my secret smart—
 What with more decence were in silence kept,
 And, but for this unjust reproach, had slept?
 Did god or man your fav'rite son advise,
 With war unhop'd the Latians to surprise? 10090
 By fate, you boast, and by the gods' decree,
 He left his native land for Italy!
 Confess the truth; by mad Cassandra, more
 Than Heav'n inspir'd, he sought a foreign shore!
 Did I persuade to trust his second Troy 10095
 To the raw conduct of a beardless boy,
 With walls unfinish'd, which himself forsakes,
 And thro' the waves a wand'ring voyage takes?
 When have I urg'd him meanly to demand
 The Tuscan aid, and arm a quiet land? 10100
 Did I or Iris give this mad advice,
 Or made the fool himself the fatal choice?
 You think it hard, the Latians should destroy
 With swords your Trojans, and with fires your Troy!
 Hard and unjust indeed, for men to draw 10105
 Their native air, nor take a foreign law!
 That Turnus is permitted still to live,
 To whom his birth a god and goddess give!
 But yet is just and lawful for your line

- To drive their fields, and force with fraud to join; 10110
 Realms, not your own, among your clans divide,
 And from the bridegroom tear the promis'd bride;
 Petition, while you public arms prepare;
 Pretend a peace, and yet provoke a war!
 'T was giv'n to you, your darling son to shroud, 10115
 To draw the dastard from the fighting crowd,
 And, for a man, obtend an empty cloud.
 From flaming fleets you turn'd the fire away,
 And chang'd the ships to daughters of the sea.
 But is my crime—the Queen of Heav'n offends, 10120
 If she presume to save her suff'ring friends!
 Your son, not knowing what his foes decree,
 You say, is absent: absent let him be.
 Yours is Cythera, yours the Cyprian tow'rs,
 The soft recesses, and the sacred bow'rs. 10125
 Why do you then these needless arms prepare,
 And thus provoke a people prone to war?
 Did I with fire the Trojan town deface,
 Or hinder from return your exil'd race?
 Was I the cause of mischief, or the man 10130
 Whose lawless lust the fatal war began?
 Think on whose faith th' adult'rous youth relied;
 Who promis'd, who procur'd, the Spartan bride?
 When all th' united states of Greece combin'd,
 To purge the world of the perfidious kind, 10135
 Then was your time to fear the Trojan fate:
 Your quarrels and complaints are now too late.”
- Thus Juno. Murmurs rise, with mix'd applause,
 Just as they favor or dislike the cause.
 So winds, when yet unfledg'd in woods they lie, 10140
 In whispers first their tender voices try,
 Then issue on the main with bellowing rage,
 And storms to trembling mariners presage.
- Then thus to both replied th' imperial god,
 Who shakes heav'n's axles with his awful nod. 10145
 (When he begins, the silent senate stand
 With rev'rence, list'ning to the dread command:
 The clouds dispel; the winds their breath restrain;
 And the hush'd waves lie flatted on the main.)
 “Celestials, your attentive ears incline! 10150
 Since,” said the god, “the Trojans must not join
 In wish'd alliance with the Latian line;
 Since endless jarrings and immortal hate
 Tend but to discompose our happy state;
 The war henceforward be resign'd to fate: 10155
 Each to his proper fortune stand or fall;
 Equal and unconcern'd I look on all.
 Rutulians, Trojans, are the same to me;
 And both shall draw the lots their fates decree.
 Let these assault, if Fortune be their friend; 10160
 And, if she favors those, let those defend:
 The Fates will find their way.” The Thund'rer said,
 And shook the sacred honors of his head,
 Attesting Styx, th' inviolable flood,

And the black regions of his brother god. 10165
 Trembled the poles of heav'n, and earth confess'd the nod.
 This end the sessions had: the senate rise,
 And to his palace wait their sov'reign thro' the skies.

Meantime, intent upon their siege, the foes 10170
 Within their walls the Trojan host inclose:
 They wound, they kill, they watch at ev'ry gate;
 Renew the fires, and urge their happy fate.

Th' Aeneans wish in vain their wanted chief,
 Hopeless of flight, more hopeless of relief. 10175
 Thin on the tow'rs they stand; and ev'n those few
 A feeble, fainting, and dejected crew.

Yet in the face of danger some there stood:
 The two bold brothers of Sarpedon's blood,
 Asius and Acmon; both th' Assaraci; 10180
 Young Haemon, and tho' young, resolv'd to die.
 With these were Clarus and Thymoetes join'd;
 Tibris and Castor, both of Lycian kind.

From Acmon's hands a rolling stone there came,
 So large, it half deserv'd a mountain's name:
 Strong-sinew'd was the youth, and big of bone; 10185
 His brother Mnestheus could not more have done,
 Or the great father of th' intrepid son.
 Some firebrands throw, some flights of arrows send;
 And some with darts, and some with stones defend.

Amid the press appears the beauteous boy, 10190
 The care of Venus, and the hope of Troy.
 His lovely face unarm'd, his head was bare;
 In ringlets o'er his shoulders hung his hair.

His forehead circled with a diadem;
 Distinguish'd from the crowd, he shines a gem, 10195
 Enchas'd in gold, or polish'd iv'ry set,
 Amidst the meaner foil of sable jet.

Nor Ismarus was wanting to the war,
 Directing pointed arrows from afar, 10200
 And death with poison arm'd—in Lydia born,
 Where plenteous harvests the fat fields adorn;
 Where proud Pactolus floats the fruitful lands,
 And leaves a rich manure of golden sands.

There Capys, author of the Capuan name,
 And there was Mnestheus too, increas'd in fame, 10205
 Since Turnus from the camp he cast with shame.

Thus mortal war was wag'd on either side.
 Meantime the hero cuts the nightly tide:
 For, anxious, from Evander when he went, 10210
 He sought the Tyrrhene camp, and Tarchon's tent;
 Expos'd the cause of coming to the chief;

His name and country told, and ask'd relief;
 Propos'd the terms; his own small strength declar'd;
 What vengeance proud Mezentius had prepar'd:
 What Turnus, bold and violent, design'd; 10215
 Then shew'd the slipp'ry state of humankind,

And fickle fortune; warn'd him to beware,
 And to his wholesome counsel added pray'r.
 Tarchon, without delay, the treaty signs,
 And to the Trojan troops the Tuscan joins. 10220

They soon set sail; nor now the fates withstand;
 Their forces trusted with a foreign hand.
 Aeneas leads; upon his stern appear
 Two lions carv'd, which rising Ida bear—
 Ida, to wand'ring Trojans ever dear. 10225

Under their grateful shade Aeneas sate,
 Revolving war's events, and various fate.
 His left young Pallas kept, fix'd to his side,
 And oft of winds enquir'd, and of the tide;
 Oft of the stars, and of their wat'ry way;
 And what he suffer'd both by land and sea. 10230

Now, sacred sisters, open all your spring!
 The Tuscan leaders, and their army sing,
 Which follow'd great Aeneas to the war:
 Their arms, their numbers, and their names declare. 10235

A thousand youths brave Massicus obey,
 Borne in the Tiger thro' the foaming sea;
 From Asium brought, and Cosa, by his care:
 For arms, light quivers, bows and shafts, they bear.
 Fierce Abas next: his men bright armor wore;
 His stern Apollo's golden statue bore. 10240

Six hundred Populonia sent along,
 All skill'd in martial exercise, and strong.
 Three hundred more for battle Ilva joins,
 An isle renown'd for steel, and unexhausted mines. 10245

Asylas on his prow the third appears,
 Who heav'n interprets, and the wand'ring stars;
 From offer'd entrails prodigies expounds,
 And peals of thunder, with presaging sounds.
 A thousand spears in warlike order stand,
 Sent by the Pisans under his command. 10250

Fair Astur follows in the wat'ry field,
 Proud of his manag'd horse and painted shield.
 Gravisca, noisome from the neighb'ring fen,
 And his own Caere, sent three hundred men;
 With those which Minio's fields and Pyrgi gave,
 All bred in arms, unanimous, and brave. 10255

Thou, Muse, the name of Cinyras renew,
 And brave Cupavo follow'd but by few;
 Whose helm confess'd the lineage of the man,
 And bore, with wings display'd, a silver swan. 10260

Love was the fault of his fam'd ancestry,
 Whose forms and fortunes in his ensigns fly.
 For Cycnus lov'd unhappy Phaeton,
 And sung his loss in poplar groves, alone, 10265
 Beneath the sister shades, to soothe his grief.
 Heav'n heard his song, and hasten'd his relief,
 And chang'd to snowy plumes his hoary hair,

And wing'd his flight, to chant aloft in air.
 His son Cupavo brush'd the briny flood: 10270
 Upon his stern a brawny Centaur stood,
 Who heav'd a rock, and, threat'ning still to throw,
 With lifted hands alarm'd the seas below:
 They seem'd to fear the formidable sight,
 And roll'd their billows on, to speed his flight. 10275

Ocnus was next, who led his native train
 Of hardy warriors thro' the wat'ry plain:
 The son of Manto by the Tuscan stream,
 From whence the Mantuan town derives the name—
 An ancient city, but of mix'd descent: 10280
 Three sev'ral tribes compose the government;
 Four towns are under each; but all obey
 The Mantuan laws, and own the Tuscan sway.

Hate to Mezentius arm'd five hundred more,
 Whom Mincius from his sire Benacus bore: 10285
 Mincius, with wreaths of reeds his forehead cover'd o'er.
 These grave Auletes leads: a hundred sweep
 With stretching oars at once the glassy deep.
 Him and his martial train the Triton bears;
 High on his poop the sea-green god appears: 10290
 Frowning he seems his crooked shell to sound,
 And at the blast the billows dance around.
 A hairy man above the waist he shows;
 A porpoise tail beneath his belly grows;
 And ends a fish: his breast the waves divides, 10295
 And froth and foam augment the murm'ring tides.

Full thirty ships transport the chosen train
 For Troy's relief, and scour the briny main.

Now was the world forsaken by the sun,
 And Phoebe half her nightly race had run. 10300
 The careful chief, who never clos'd his eyes,
 Himself the rudder holds, the sails supplies.
 A choir of Nereids meet him on the flood,
 Once his own galleys, hewn from Ida's wood;
 But now, as many nymphs, the sea they sweep, 10305
 As rode, before, tall vessels on the deep.
 They know him from afar; and in a ring
 Inclose the ship that bore the Trojan king.
 Cymodoce, whose voice excell'd the rest,
 Above the waves advanc'd her snowy breast; 10310
 Her right hand stops the stern; her left divides
 The curling ocean, and corrects the tides.
 She spoke for all the choir, and thus began
 With pleasing words to warn th' unknowing man:
 "Sleeps our lov'd lord? O goddess-born, awake! 10315
 Spread ev'ry sail, pursue your wat'ry track,
 And haste your course. Your navy once were we,
 From Ida's height descending to the sea;
 Till Turnus, as at anchor fix'd we stood,
 Presum'd to violate our holy wood. 10320
 Then, loos'd from shore, we fled his fires profane

- (Unwillingly we broke our master's chain),
 And since have sought you thro' the Tuscan main.
 The mighty Mother chang'd our forms to these, 10325
 And gave us life immortal in the seas.
 But young Ascanius, in his camp distress'd,
 By your insulting foes is hardly press'd.
 Th' Arcadian horsemen, and Etrurian host,
 Advance in order on the Latian coast:
 To cut their way the Daunian chief designs, 10330
 Before their troops can reach the Trojan lines.
 Thou, when the rosy morn restores the light,
 First arm thy soldiers for th' ensuing fight:
 Thyself the fated sword of Vulcan wield,
 And bear aloft th' impenetrable shield. 10335
 To-morrow's sun, unless my skill be vain,
 Shall see huge heaps of foes in battle slain."
 Parting, she spoke; and with immortal force
 Push'd on the vessel in her wat'ry course;
 For well she knew the way. Impell'd behind, 10340
 The ship flew forward, and outstripp'd the wind.
 The rest make up. Unknowing of the cause,
 The chief admires their speed, and happy omens draws.
- Then thus he pray'd, and fix'd on heav'n his eyes:
 "Hear thou, great Mother of the deities. 10345
 With turrets crown'd! (on Ida's holy hill Fierce tigers, rein'd and curb'd, obey thy will.)
 Firm thy own omens; lead us on to fight;
 And let thy Phrygians conquer in thy right."
- He said no more. And now renewing day 10350
 Had chas'd the shadows of the night away.
 He charg'd the soldiers, with preventing care,
 Their flags to follow, and their arms prepare;
 Warn'd of th' ensuing fight, and bade 'em hope the war.
 Now, his lofty poop, he view'd below 10355
 His camp incompass'd, and th' inclosing foe.
 His blazing shield, imbrac'd, he held on high;
 The camp receive the sign, and with loud shouts reply.
 Hope arms their courage: from their tow'rs they throw
 Their darts with double force, and drive the foe. 10360
 Thus, at the signal giv'n, the cranes arise
 Before the stormy south, and blacken all the skies.
- King Turnus wonder'd at the fight renew'd,
 Till, looking back, the Trojan fleet he view'd,
 The seas with swelling canvas cover'd o'er, 10365
 And the swift ships descending on the shore.
 The Latians saw from far, with dazzled eyes,
 The radiant crest that seem'd in flames to rise,
 And dart diffusive fires around the field,
 And the keen glitt'ring of the golden shield. 10370
 Thus threat'ning comets, when by night they rise,
 Shoot sanguine streams, and sadden all the skies:
 So Sirius, flashing forth sinister lights,
 Pale humankind with plagues and with dry famine fright:

Yet Turnus with undaunted mind is bent 10375
 To man the shores, and hinder their descent,
 And thus awakes the courage of his friends:
 "What you so long have wish'd, kind Fortune sends;
 In ardent arms to meet th' invading foe:
 You find, and find him at advantage now. 10380
 Yours is the day: you need but only dare;
 Your swords will make you masters of the war.
 Your sires, your sons, your houses, and your lands,
 And dearest wives, are all within your hands.
 Be mindful of the race from whence you came, 10385
 And emulate in arms your fathers' fame.
 Now take the time, while stagg'ring yet they stand
 With feet unfirm, and prepossess the strand:
 Fortune befriends the bold." Nor more he said,
 But balanc'd whom to leave, and whom to lead; 10390
 Then these elects, the landing to prevent;
 And those he leaves, to keep the city pent.

Meantime the Trojan sends his troops ashore:
 Some are by boats expos'd, by bridges more. 10395
 With lab'ring oars they bear along the strand,
 Where the tide languishes, and leap aland.
 Tarchon observes the coast with careful eyes,
 And, where no ford he finds, no water fries,
 Nor billows with unequal murmurs roar,
 But smoothly slide along, and swell the shore, 10400
 That course he steer'd, and thus he gave command:
 "Here ply your oars, and at all hazard land:
 Force on the vessel, that her keel may wound
 This hated soil, and furrow hostile ground.
 Let me securely land—I ask no more; 10405
 Then sink my ships, or shatter on the shore."

This fiery speech inflames his fearful friends:
 They tug at ev'ry oar, and ev'ry stretcher bends;
 They run their ships aground; the vessels knock,
 (Thus forc'd ashore,) and tremble with the shock. 10410
 Tarchon's alone was lost, that stranded stood,
 Stuck on a bank, and beaten by the flood:
 She breaks her back; the loosen'd sides give way,
 And plunge the Tuscan soldiers in the sea.
 Their broken oars and floating planks withstand 10415
 Their passage, while they labor to the land,
 And ebbing tides bear back upon th' uncertain sand.

Now Turnus leads his troops without delay,
 Advancing to the margin of the sea. 10420
 The trumpets sound: Aeneas first assail'd
 The clowns new-raisd and raw, and soon prevail'd.
 Great Theron fell, an omen of the fight;
 Great Theron, large of limbs, of giant height.
 He first in open field defied the prince:
 But armor scal'd with gold was no defense 10425
 Against the fated sword, which open'd wide
 His plated shield, and pierc'd his naked side.
 Next, Lichas fell, who, not like others born,

- Was from his wretched mother ripp'd and torn;
Sacred, O Phoebus, from his birth to thee; 10430
For his beginning life from biting steel was free.
Not far from him was Gyas laid along,
Of monstrous bulk; with Cisseus fierce and strong;
Vain bulk and strength! for, when the chief assail'd,
Nor valor nor Herculean arms avail'd, 10435
Nor their fam'd father, wont in war to go
With great Alcides, while he toil'd below.
The noisy Pharos next receiv'd his death:
Aeneas writh'd his dart, and stopp'd his bawling breath.
Then wretched Cydon had receiv'd his doom, 10440
Who courted Clytius in his beardless bloom,
And sought with lust obscene polluted joys:
The Trojan sword had curd his love of boys,
Had not his sev'n bold brethren stopp'd the course 10445
Of the fierce champions, with united force.
Sev'n darts were thrown at once; and some rebound
From his bright shield, some on his helmet sound:
The rest had reach'd him; but his mother's care
Prevented those, and turn'd aside in air.
- The prince then call'd Achates, to supply 10450
The spears that knew the way to victory—
“Those fatal weapons, which, inur'd to blood,
In Grecian bodies under Ilium stood:
Not one of those my hand shall toss in vain 10455
Against our foes, on this contended plain.”
He said; then seiz'd a mighty spear, and threw;
Which, wing'd with fate, thro' Maeon's buckler flew,
Pierc'd all the brazen plates, and reach'd his heart:
He stagger'd with intolerable smart.
Alcanor saw; and reach'd, but reach'd in vain, 10460
His helping hand, his brother to sustain.
A second spear, which kept the former course,
From the same hand, and sent with equal force,
His right arm pierc'd, and holding on, bereft
His use of both, and pinion'd down his left. 10465
Then Numitor from his dead brother drew
Th' ill-omen'd spear, and at the Trojan threw:
Preventing fate directs the lance awry,
Which, glancing, only mark'd Achates' thigh.
- In pride of youth the Sabine Clausus came, 10470
And, from afar, at Dryops took his aim.
The spear flew hissing thro' the middle space,
And pierc'd his throat, directed at his face;
It stopp'd at once the passage of his wind,
And the free soul to flitting air resign'd: 10475
His forehead was the first that struck the ground;
Lifeblood and life rush'd mingled thro' the wound.
He slew three brothers of the Borean race,
And three, whom Ismarus, their native place,
Had sent to war, but all the sons of Thrace. 10480
Halesus, next, the bold Aurunci leads:
The son of Neptune to his aid succeeds,
Conspicuous on his horse. On either hand,

These fight to keep, and those to win, the land.
 With mutual blood th' Ausonian soil is dyed, 10485
 While on its borders each their claim decide.
 As wintry winds, contending in the sky,
 With equal force of lungs their titles try:
 They rage, they roar; the doubtful rack of heav'n
 Stands without motion, and the tide undriv'n: 10490
 Each bent to conquer, neither side to yield,
 They long suspend the fortune of the field.
 Both armies thus perform what courage can;
 Foot set to foot, and mingled man to man.

But, in another part, th' Arcadian horse 10495
 With ill success ingage the Latin force:
 For, where th' impetuous torrent, rushing down,
 Huge craggy stones and rooted trees had thrown,
 They left their coursers, and, unus'd to fight
 On foot, were scatter'd in a shameful flight. 10500
 Pallas, who with disdain and grief had view'd
 His foes pursuing, and his friends pursued,
 Us'd threat'nings mix'd with pray'rs, his last resource,
 With these to move their minds, with those to fire their force
 "Which way, companions? whether would you run?
 By you yourselves, and mighty battles won,
 By my great sire, by his establish'd name,
 And early promise of my future fame;
 By my youth, emulous of equal right
 To share his honors—shun ignoble flight! 10510
 Trust not your feet: your hands must hew way
 Thro' yon black body, and that thick array:
 'T is thro' that forward path that we must come;
 There lies our way, and that our passage home.
 Nor pow'rs above, nor destinies below 10515
 Oppress our arms: with equal strength we go,
 With mortal hands to meet a mortal foe.
 See on what foot we stand: a scanty shore,
 The sea behind, our enemies before;
 No passage left, unless we swim the main; 10520
 Or, forcing these, the Trojan trenches gain."
 This said, he strode with eager haste along,
 And bore amidst the thickest of the throng.
 Lagus, the first he met, with fate to foe,
 Had heav'd a stone of mighty weight, to throw: 10525
 Stooping, the spear descended on his chine,
 Just where the bone distinguished either loin:
 It stuck so fast, so deeply buried lay,
 That scarce the victor forc'd the steel away.
 Hisbon came on: but, while he mov'd too slow 10530
 To wish'd revenge, the prince prevents his blow;
 For, warding his at once, at once he press'd,
 And plung'd the fatal weapon in his breast.
 Then lewd Anchemolus he laid in dust,
 Who stain'd his stepdam's bed with impious lust. 10535
 And, after him, the Daucian twins were slain,
 Laris and Thymbrus, on the Latian plain;
 So wondrous like in feature, shape, and size,
 As caus'd an error in their parents' eyes—

- Grateful mistake! but soon the sword decides 10540
 The nice distinction, and their fate divides:
 For Thymbrus' head was lopp'd; and Laris' hand,
 Dismember'd, sought its owner on the strand:
 The trembling fingers yet the fauchion strain,
 And threaten still th' intended stroke in vain. 10545
- Now, to renew the charge, th' Arcadians came:
 Sight of such acts, and sense of honest shame,
 And grief, with anger mix'd, their minds inflame.
 Then, with a casual blow was Rhoeteus slain,
 Who chanc'd, as Pallas threw, to cross the plain: 10550
 The flying spear was after Ilus sent;
 But Rhoeteus happen'd on a death unmeant:
 From Teuthras and from Tyres while he fled,
 The lance, athwart his body, laid him dead:
 Roll'd from his chariot with a mortal wound, 10555
 And intercepted fate, he spurn'd the ground.
 As when, in summer, welcome winds arise,
 The watchful shepherd to the forest flies,
 And fires the midmost plants; contagion spreads,
 And catching flames infect the neighb'ring heads; 10560
 Around the forest flies the furious blast,
 And all the leafy nation sinks at last,
 And Vulcan rides in triumph o'er the waste;
 The pastor, pleas'd with his dire victory,
 Beholds the satiate flames in sheets ascend the sky: 10565
 So Pallas' troops their scatter'd strength unite,
 And, pouring on their foes, their prince delight.
- Halesus came, fierce with desire of blood;
 But first collected in his arms he stood:
 Advancing then, he plied the spear so well, 10570
 Ladon, Demodocus, and Pheres fell.
 Around his head he toss'd his glitt'ring brand,
 And from Strymonius hew'd his better hand,
 Held up to guard his throat; then hurl'd a stone
 At Thoas' ample front, and pierc'd the bone: 10575
 It struck beneath the space of either eye;
 And blood, and mingled brains, together fly.
 Deep skill'd in future fates, Halesus' sire
 Did with the youth to lonely groves retire:
 But, when the father's mortal race was run, 10580
 Dire destiny laid hold upon the son,
 And haul'd him to the war, to find, beneath
 Th' Evandrian spear, a memorable death.
 Pallas th' encounter seeks, but, ere he throws,
 To Tuscan Tiber thus address'd his vows: 10585
 "O sacred stream, direct my flying dart,
 And give to pass the proud Halesus' heart!
 His arms and spoils thy holy oak shall bear."
 Pleas'd with the bribe, the god receiv'd his pray'r:
 For, while his shield protects a friend distress'd, 10590
 The dart came driving on, and pierc'd his breast.
- But Lausus, no small portion of the war,
 Permits not panic fear to reign too far,

Caus'd by the death of so renown'd a knight;
 But by his own example cheers the fight. 10595
 Fierce Abas first he slew; Abas, the stay
 Of Trojan hopes, and hindrance of the day.
 The Phrygian troops escap'd the Greeks in vain:
 They, and their mix'd allies, now load the plain.
 To the rude shock of war both armies came; 10600
 Their leaders equal, and their strength the same.
 The rear so press'd the front, they could not wield
 Their angry weapons, to dispute the field.
 Here Pallas urges on, and Lausus there:
 Of equal youth and beauty both appear, 10605
 But both by fate forbid to breathe their native air.
 Their congress in the field great Jove withstands:
 Both doom'd to fall, but fall by greater hands.

Meantime Juturna warns the Daunian chief
 Of Lausus' danger, urging swift relief. 10610
 With his driv'n chariot he divides the crowd,
 And, making to his friends, thus calls aloud:
 "Let none presume his needless aid to join;
 Retire, and clear the field; the fight is mine:
 To this right hand is Pallas only due; 10615
 O were his father here, my just revenge to view!"
 From the forbidden space his men retir'd.
 Pallas their awe, and his stern words, admir'd;
 Survey'd him o'er and o'er with wond'ring sight,
 Struck with his haughty mien, and tow'ring height. 10620
 Then to the king: "Your empty vaunts forbear;
 Success I hope, and fate I cannot fear;
 Alive or dead, I shall deserve a name;
 Jove is impartial, and to both the same."
 He said, and to the void advanc'd his pace: 10625
 Pale horror sate on each Arcadian face.
 Then Turnus, from his chariot leaping light,
 Address'd himself on foot to single fight.
 And, as a lion—when he spies from far
 A bull that seems to meditate the war, 10630
 Bending his neck, and spurning back the sand—
 Runs roaring downward from his hilly stand:
 Imagine eager Turnus not more slow,
 To rush from high on his unequal foe.

Young Pallas, when he saw the chief advance 10635
 Within due distance of his flying lance,
 Prepares to charge him first, resolv'd to try
 If fortune would his want of force supply;
 And thus to Heav'n and Hercules address'd:
 "Alcides, once on earth Evander's guest, 10640
 His son adjures you by those holy rites,
 That hospitable board, those genial nights;
 Assist my great attempt to gain this prize,
 And let proud Turnus view, with dying eyes,
 His ravish'd spoils." 'T was heard, the vain request; 10645
 Alcides mourn'd, and stifled sighs within his breast.
 Then Jove, to soothe his sorrow, thus began:
 "Short bounds of life are set to mortal man.

- 'T is virtue's work alone to stretch the narrow span.
 So many sons of gods, in bloody fight, 10650
 Around the walls of Troy, have lost the light:
 My own Sarpedon fell beneath his foe;
 Nor I, his mighty sire, could ward the blow.
 Ev'n Turnus shortly shall resign his breath,
 And stands already on the verge of death." 10655
 This said, the god permits the fatal fight,
 But from the Latian fields averts his sight.
- Now with full force his spear young Pallas threw,
 And, having thrown, his shining fauchion drew
 The steel just graz'd along the shoulder joint, 10660
 And mark'd it slightly with the glancing point,
 Fierce Turnus first to nearer distance drew,
 And pois'd his pointed spear, before he threw:
 Then, as the winged weapon whizz'd along,
 "See now," said he, "whose arm is better strung." 10665
 The spear kept on the fatal course, unstay'd
 By plates of ir'n, which o'er the shield were laid:
 Thro' folded brass and tough bull hides it pass'd,
 His corslet pierc'd, and reach'd his heart at last.
 In vain the youth tugs at the broken wood; 10670
 The soul comes issuing with the vital blood:
 He falls; his arms upon his body sound;
 And with his bloody teeth he bites the ground.
- Turnus bestrode the corpse: "Arcadians, hear,"
 Said he; "my message to your master bear: 10675
 Such as the sire deserv'd, the son I send;
 It costs him dear to be the Phrygians' friend.
 The lifeless body, tell him, I bestow,
 Unask'd, to rest his wand'ring ghost below."
 He said, and trampled down with all the force 10680
 Of his left foot, and spurn'd the wretched corse;
 Then snatch'd the shining belt, with gold inlaid;
 The belt Eurytion's artful hands had made,
 Where fifty fatal brides, express'd to sight,
 All in the compass of one mournful night, 10685
 Depriv'd their bridegrooms of returning light.
- In an ill hour insulting Turnus tore
 Those golden spoils, and in a worse he wore.
 O mortals, blind in fate, who never know
 To bear high fortune, or endure the low! 10690
 The time shall come, when Turnus, but in vain,
 Shall wish untouch'd the trophies of the slain;
 Shall wish the fatal belt were far away,
 And curse the dire remembrance of the day.
- The sad Arcadians, from th' unhappy field, 10695
 Bear back the breathless body on a shield.
 O grace and grief of war! at once restor'd,
 With praises, to thy sire, at once deplor'd!
 One day first sent thee to the fighting field,
 Beheld whole heaps of foes in battle kill'd; 10700
 One day beheld thee dead, and borne upon thy shield.

This dismal news, not from uncertain fame,
 But sad spectators, to the hero came:
 His friends upon the brink of ruin stand,
 Unless reliev'd by his victorious hand. 10705
 He whirls his sword around, without delay,
 And hews thro' adverse foes an ample way,
 To find fierce Turnus, of his conquest proud:
 Evander, Pallas, all that friendship ow'd
 To large deserts, are present to his eyes; 10710
 His plighted hand, and hospitable ties.

Four sons of Sulmo, four whom Ufens bred,
 He took in fight, and living victims led,
 To please the ghost of Pallas, and expire,
 In sacrifice, before his fun'ral fire. 10715
 At Magus next he threw: he stoop'd below
 The flying spear, and shunn'd the promis'd blow;
 Then, creeping, clasp'd the hero's knees, and pray'd:
 "By young Iulus, by thy father's shade,
 O spare my life, and send me back to see 10720
 My longing sire, and tender progeny!
 A lofty house I have, and wealth untold,
 In silver ingots, and in bars of gold:
 All these, and sums besides, which see no day,
 The ransom of this one poor life shall pay. 10725
 If I survive, will Troy the less prevail?
 A single soul's too light to turn the scale."
 He said. The hero sternly thus replied:
 "Thy bars and ingots, and the sums beside,
 Leave for thy children's lot. Thy Turnus broke 10730
 All rules of war by one relentless stroke,
 When Pallas fell: so deems, nor deems alone
 My father's shadow, but my living son."
 Thus having said, of kind remorse bereft,
 He seiz'd his helm, and dragg'd him with his left; 10735
 Then with his right hand, while his neck he wreath'd,
 Up to the hilts his shining fauchion sheath'd.

Apollo's priest, Emonides, was near;
 His holy fillets on his front appear;
 Glitt'ring in arms, he shone amidst the crowd; 10740
 Much of his god, more of his purple, proud.
 Him the fierce Trojan follow'd thro' the field:
 The holy coward fell; and, forc'd to yield,
 The prince stood o'er the priest, and, at one blow,
 Sent him an off'ring to the shades below. 10745
 His arms Seresthus on his shoulders bears,
 Design'd a trophy to the God of Wars.

Vulcanian Caeculus renews the fight,
 And Umbro, born upon the mountains' height.
 The champion cheers his troops t' encounter those, 10750
 And seeks revenge himself on other foes.
 At Anxur's shield he drove; and, at the blow,
 Both shield and arm to ground together go.
 Anxur had boasted much of magic charms,
 And thought he wore impenetrable arms, 10755

- So made by mutter'd spells; and, from the spheres,
 Had life secur'd, in vain, for length of years.
 Then Tarquitus the field in triumph trod;
 A nymph his mother, his sire a god.
 Exulting in bright arms, he braves the prince: 10760
 With his protended lance he makes defense;
 Bears back his feeble foe; then, pressing on,
 Arrests his better hand, and drags him down;
 Stands o'er the prostrate wretch, and, as he lay,
 Vain tales inventing, and prepar'd to pray, 10765
 Mows off his head: the trunk a moment stood,
 Then sunk, and roll'd along the sand in blood.
 The vengeful victor thus upbraids the slain:
 "Lie there, proud man, unpitied, on the plain;
 Lie there, inglorious, and without a tomb, 10770
 Far from thy mother and thy native home,
 Exposed to savage beasts, and birds of prey,
 Or thrown for food to monsters of the sea."
- On Lycas and Antaeus next he ran,
 Two chiefs of Turnus, and who led his van. 10775
 They fled for fear; with these, he chas'd along
 Camers the yellow-lock'd, and Numa strong;
 Both great in arms, and both were fair and young.
 Camers was son to Volscens lately slain,
 In wealth surpassing all the Latian train, 10780
 And in Amycla fix'd his silent easy reign.
 And, as Aegaeon, when with heav'n he strove,
 Stood opposite in arms to mighty Jove;
 Mov'd all his hundred hands, provok'd the war,
 Defied the forky lightning from afar; 10785
 At fifty mouths his flaming breath expires,
 And flash for flash returns, and fires for fires;
 In his right hand as many swords he wields,
 And takes the thunder on as many shields:
 With strength like his, the Trojan hero stood; 10790
 And soon the fields with falling corps were strow'd,
 When once his fauchion found the taste of blood.
 With fury scarce to be conceiv'd, he flew
 Against Niphaeus, whom four coursers drew.
 They, when they see the fiery chief advance, 10795
 And pushing at their chests his pointed lance,
 Wheel'd with so swift a motion, mad with fear,
 They threw their master headlong from the chair.
 They stare, they start, nor stop their course, before
 They bear the bounding chariot to the shore. 10800
- Now Lucagus and Liger scour the plains,
 With two white steeds; but Liger holds the reins,
 And Lucagus the lofty seat maintains:
 Bold brethren both. The former way'd in air
 His flaming sword: Aeneas couch'd his spear, 10805
 Unus'd to threats, and more unus'd to fear.
 Then Liger thus: "Thy confidence is vain
 To scape from hence, as from the Trojan plain:
 Nor these the steeds which Diomed bestrode,
 Nor this the chariot where Achilles rode; 10810

Nor Venus' veil is here, near Neptune's shield;
 Thy fatal hour is come, and this the field."
 Thus Liger vainly vaunts: the Trojan peer
 Return'd his answer with his flying spear.

As Lucagus, to lash his horses, bends, 10815
 Prone to the wheels, and his left foot protends,
 Prepar'd for fight; the fatal dart arrives,
 And thro' the borders of his buckler drives;
 Pass'd thro' and pierc'd his groin: the deadly wound,
 Cast from his chariot, roll'd him on the ground. 10820
 Whom thus the chief upbraids with scornful spite:
 "Blame not the slowness of your steeds in flight;
 Vain shadows did not force their swift retreat;
 But you yourself forsake your empty seat."
 He said, and seiz'd at once the loosen'd rein; 10825
 For Liger lay already on the plain,
 By the same shock: then, stretching out his hands,
 The recreant thus his wretched life demands:
 "Now, by thyself, O more than mortal man!
 By her and him from whom thy breath began, 10830
 Who form'd thee thus divine, I beg thee, spare
 This forfeit life, and hear thy suppliant's pray'r."
 Thus much he spoke, and more he would have said;
 But the stern hero turn'd aside his head,
 And cut him short: "I hear another man; 10835
 You talk'd not thus before the fight began.
 Now take your turn; and, as a brother should,
 Attend your brother to the Stygian flood."
 Then thro' his breast his fatal sword he sent,
 And the soul issued at the gaping vent. 10840

As storms the skies, and torrents tear the ground,
 Thus rag'd the prince, and scatter'd deaths around.
 At length Ascanius and the Trojan train
 Broke from the camp, so long besieg'd in vain.

Meantime the King of Gods and Mortal Man 10845
 Held conference with his queen, and thus began:
 "My sister goddess, and well-pleasing wife,
 Still think you Venus' aid supports the strife—
 Sustains her Trojans—or themselves, alone, 10850
 With inborn valor force their fortune on?
 How fierce in fight, with courage undecay'd!
 Judge if such warriors want immortal aid."
 To whom the goddess with the charming eyes,
 Soft in her tone, submissively replies: 10855
 "Why, O my sov'reign lord, whose frown I fear,
 And cannot, unconcern'd, your anger bear;
 Why urge you thus my grief? when, if I still (As once I was) were mistress of your will,
 From your almighty pow'r your pleasing wife 10860
 Might gain the grace of length'ning Turnus' life,
 Securely snatch him from the fatal fight,
 And give him to his aged father's sight.
 Now let him perish, since you hold it good,
 And glut the Trojans with his pious blood.
 Yet from our lineage he derives his name, 10865

And, in the fourth degree, from god Pilumnus came;
 Yet he devoutly pays you rites divine,
 And offers daily incense at your shrine.”

- Then shortly thus the sov'reign god replied:
 “Since in my pow'r and goodness you confide, 10870
 If for a little space, a lengthen'd span,
 You beg reprieve for this expiring man,
 I grant you leave to take your Turnus hence
 From instant fate, and can so far dispense.
 But, if some secret meaning lies beneath, 10875
 To save the short-liv'd youth from destin'd death,
 Or if a farther thought you entertain,
 To change the fates; you feed your hopes in vain.”
 To whom the goddess thus, with weeping eyes:
 “And what if that request, your tongue denies, 10880
 Your heart should grant; and not a short reprieve,
 But length of certain life, to Turnus give?
 Now speedy death attends the guiltless youth,
 If my presaging soul divines with truth;
 Which, O! I wish, might err thro' causeless fears, 10885
 And you (for you have pow'r) prolong his years!”
- Thus having said, involv'd in clouds, she flies,
 And drives a storm before her thro' the skies.
 Swift she descends, alighting on the plain,
 Where the fierce foes a dubious fight maintain. 10890
 Of air condens'd a specter soon she made;
 And, what Aeneas was, such seem'd the shade.
 Adorn'd with Dardan arms, the phantom bore
 His head aloft; a plumy crest he wore;
 This hand appear'd a shining sword to wield, 10895
 And that sustain'd an imitated shield.
 With manly mien he stalk'd along the ground,
 Nor wanted voice belied, nor vaunting sound.
 (Thus haunting ghosts appear to waking sight,
 Or dreadful visions in our dreams by night.) 10900
 The specter seems the Daunian chief to dare,
 And flourishes his empty sword in air.
 At this, advancing, Turnus hurl'd his spear:
 The phantom wheel'd, and seem'd to fly for fear.
 Deluded Turnus thought the Trojan fled, 10905
 And with vain hopes his haughty fancy fed.
 “Whether, O coward?” (thus he calls aloud,
 Nor found he spoke to wind, and chas'd a cloud,
 “Why thus forsake your bride! Receive from me
 The fated land you sought so long by sea.” 10910
 He said, and, brandishing at once his blade,
 With eager pace pursued the flying shade.
 By chance a ship was fasten'd to the shore,
 Which from old Clusium King Osinius bore:
 The plank was ready laid for safe ascent; 10915
 For shelter there the trembling shadow bent,
 And skipp't and skulk'd, and under hatches went.
 Exulting Turnus, with regardless haste,
 Ascends the plank, and to the galley pass'd.
 Scarce had he reach'd the prow: Saturnia's hand 10920

The haulers cuts, and shoots the ship from land.
 With wind in poop, the vessel plows the sea,
 And measures back with speed her former way.
 Meantime Aeneas seeks his absent foe,
 And sends his slaughter'd troops to shades below. 10925

The guileful phantom now forsook the shroud,
 And flew sublime, and vanish'd in a cloud.
 Too late young Turnus the delusion found,
 Far on the sea, still making from the ground. 10930
 Then, thankless for a life redeem'd by shame,
 With sense of honor stung, and forfeit fame,

Fearful besides of what in fight had pass'd,
 His hands and haggard eyes to heav'n he cast;
 "O Jove!" he cried, "for what offense have Deserv'd to bear this endless infamy? 10935
 Whence am I forc'd, and whether am I borne?
 How, and with what reproach, shall I return?
 Shall ever I behold the Latian plain,
 Or see Laurentum's lofty tow'rs again?

What will they say of their deserting chief 10940
 The war was mine: I fly from their relief;
 I led to slaughter, and in slaughter leave;
 And ev'n from hence their dying groans receive.
 Here, overmatch'd in fight, in heaps they lie;
 There, scatter'd o'er the fields, ignobly fly. 10945
 Gape wide, O earth, and draw me down alive!
 Or, O ye pitying winds, a wretch relieve!

On sands or shelves the splitting vessel drive;
 Or set me shipwreck'd on some desart shore,
 Where no Rutulian eyes may see me more, 10950
 Unknown to friends, or foes, or conscious Fame,
 Lest she should follow, and my flight proclaim."

Thus Turnus rav'd, and various fates resolv'd:
 The choice was doubtful, but the death resolv'd. 10955
 And now the sword, and now the sea took place,
 That to revenge, and this to purge disgrace.
 Sometimes he thought to swim the stormy main,
 By stretch of arms the distant shore to gain.
 Thrice he the sword assay'd, and thrice the flood;
 But Juno, mov'd with pity, both withstood. 10960
 And thrice repress'd his rage; strong gales supplied,
 And push'd the vessel o'er the swelling tide.
 At length she lands him on his native shores,
 And to his father's longing arms restores.

Meantime, by Jove's impulse, Mezentius arm'd, 10965
 Succeeding Turnus, with his ardor warm'd
 His fainting friends, reproach'd their shameful flight,
 Repell'd the victors, and renew'd the fight.
 Against their king the Tuscan troops conspire;
 Such is their hate, and such their fierce desire 10970
 Of wish'd revenge: on him, and him alone,
 All hands employ'd, and all their darts are thrown.
 He, like a solid rock by seas inclos'd,
 To raging winds and roaring waves oppos'd,

- From his proud summit looking down, disdains
Their empty menace, and unmov'd remains. 10975
- Beneath his feet fell haughty Hebrus dead,
Then Latagus, and Palmus as he fled.
At Latagus a weighty stone he flung:
His face was flatted, and his helmet rung. 10980
But Palmus from behind receives his wound;
Hamstring'd he falls, and grovels on the ground:
His crest and armor, from his body torn,
Thy shoulders, Lausus, and thy head adorn. 10985
Evas and Mimas, both of Troy, he slew.
Mimas his birth from fair Theano drew,
Born on that fatal night, when, big with fire,
The queen produc'd young Paris to his sire:
But Paris in the Phrygian fields was slain,
Unthinking Mimas on the Latian plain. 10990
- And, as a savage boar, on mountains bred,
With forest mast and fatt'ning marshes fed,
When once he sees himself in toils inclos'd,
By huntsmen and their eager hounds oppos'd—
He whets his tusks, and turns, and dares the war; 10995
Th' invaders dart their jav'lins from afar:
All keep aloof, and safely shout around;
But none presumes to give a nearer wound:
He frets and froths, erects his bristled hide,
And shakes a grove of lances from his side: 11000
Not otherwise the troops, with hate inspir'd,
And just revenge against the tyrant fir'd,
Their darts with clamor at a distance drive,
And only keep the languish'd war alive.
- From Coritus came Acron to the fight, 11005
Who left his spouse betroth'd, and unconsummated night.
Mezentius sees him thro' the squadrons ride,
Proud of the purple favors of his bride.
Then, as a hungry lion, who beholds
A gamesome goat, who frisks about the folds, 11010
Or beamy stag, that grazes on the plain—
He runs, he roars, he shakes his rising mane,
He grins, and opens wide his greedy jaws;
The prey lies panting underneath his paws:
He fills his famish'd maw; his mouth runs o'er 11015
With unchew'd morsels, while he churns the gore:
So proud Mezentius rushes on his foes,
And first unhappy Acron overthrows:
Stretch'd at his length, he spurns the swarthy ground;
The lance, besmear'd with blood, lies broken in the wound. 11020
Then with disdain the haughty victor view'd
Orodes flying, nor the wretch pursued,
Nor thought the dastard's back deserv'd a wound,
But, running, gain'd th' advantage of the ground:
Then turning short, he met him face to face, 11025
To give his victor the better grace.
Orodes falls, in equal fight oppress'd:
Mezentius fix'd his foot upon his breast,

And rested lance; and thus aloud he cries:
 "Lo! here the champion of my rebels lies!" 11030
 The fields around with Io Paeon! ring;
 And peals of shouts applaud the conqu'ring king.
 At this the vanquish'd, with his dying breath,
 Thus faintly spoke, and prophesied in death:
 "Nor thou, proud man, unpunish'd shalt remain: 11035
 Like death attends thee on this fatal plain."
 Then, sourly smiling, thus the king replied:
 "For what belongs to me, let Jove provide;
 But die thou first, whatever chance ensue."
 He said, and from the wound the weapon drew. 11040
 A hov'ring mist came swimming o'er his sight,
 And seal'd his eyes in everlasting night.

By Caedicus, Alcathous was slain;
 Sacrator laid Hydaspes on the plain;
 Orses the strong to greater strength must yield; 11045
 He, with Parthenius, were by Rapo kill'd.
 Then brave Messapus Ericetes slew,
 Who from Lycaon's blood his lineage drew.
 But from his headstrong horse his fate he found,
 Who threw his master, as he made a bound: 11050
 The chief, alighting, stuck him to the ground;
 Then Clonius, hand to hand, on foot assails:
 The Trojan sinks, and Neptune's son prevails.
 Agis the Lycian, stepping forth with pride,
 To single fight the boldest foe defied; 11055
 Whom Tuscan Valerus by force o'ercame,
 And not belied his mighty father's fame.
 Salius to death the great Antronius sent:
 But the same fate the victor underwent,
 Slain by Nealces' hand, well-skill'd to throw 11060
 The flying dart, and draw the far-deceiving bow.

Thus equal deaths are dealt with equal chance;
 By turns they quit their ground, by turns advance:
 Victors and vanquish'd, in the various field,
 Nor wholly overcome, nor wholly yield. 11065
 The gods from heav'n survey the fatal strife,
 And mourn the miseries of human life.
 Above the rest, two goddesses appear
 Concern'd for each: here Venus, Juno there.
 Amidst the crowd, infernal Ate shakes 11070
 Her scourge aloft, and crest of hissing snakes.

Once more the proud Mezentius, with disdain,
 Brandish'd his spear, and rush'd into the plain,
 Where tow'ring in the midmost rank she stood,
 Like tall Orion stalking o'er the flood. 11075
 (When with his brawny breast he cuts the waves,
 His shoulders scarce the topmost billow laves),
 Or like a mountain ash, whose roots are spread,
 Deep fix'd in earth; in clouds he hides his head.

The Trojan prince beheld him from afar, 11080
 And dauntless undertook the doubtful war.

- Collected in his strength, and like a rock,
 Pois'd on his base, Mezentius stood the shock.
 He stood, and, measuring first with careful eyes
 The space his spear could reach, aloud he cries: 11085
 "My strong right hand, and sword, assist my stroke!
 (Those only gods Mezentius will invoke.)
 His armor, from the Trojan pirate torn,
 By my triumphant Lausus shall be worn."
 He said; and with his utmost force he threw 11090
 The massy spear, which, hissing as it flew,
 Reach'd the celestial shield, that stopp'd the course;
 But, glancing thence, the yet unbroken force
 Took a new bent obliquely, and betwixt
 The side and bowels fam'd Anthores fix'd. 11095
 Anthores had from Argos travel'd far,
 Alcides' friend, and brother of the war;
 Till, tir'd with toils, fair Italy he chose,
 And in Evander's palace sought repose.
 Now, falling by another's wound, his eyes 11100
 He cast to heav'n, on Argos thinks, and dies.
- The pious Trojan then his jav'lin sent;
 The shield gave way; thro' treble plates it went
 Of solid brass, of linen trebly roll'd,
 And three bull hides which round the buckler fold. 11105
 All these it pass'd, resistless in the course,
 Transpierc'd his thigh, and spent its dying force.
 The gaping wound gush'd out a crimson flood.
 The Trojan, glad with sight of hostile blood,
 His faunchion drew, to closer fight address'd, 11110
 And with new force his fainting foe oppress'd.
- His father's peril Lausus view'd with grief;
 He sigh'd, he wept, he ran to his relief.
 And here, heroic youth, 't is here I must
 To thy immortal memory be just, 11115
 And sing an act so noble and so new,
 Posterity will scarce believe 't is true.
 Pain'd with his wound, and useless for the fight,
 The father sought to save himself by flight:
 Incumber'd, slow he dragg'd the spear along, 11120
 Which pierc'd his thigh, and in his buckler hung.
 The pious youth, resolv'd on death, below
 The lifted sword springs forth to face the foe;
 Protects his parent, and prevents the blow.
 Shouts of applause ran ringing thro' the field, 11125
 To see the son the vanquish'd father shield.
 All, fir'd with gen'rous indignation, strive,
 And with a storm of darts to distance drive
 The Trojan chief, who, held at bay from far,
 On his Vulcanian orb sustain'd the war. 11130
- As, when thick hail comes rattling in the wind,
 The plowman, passenger, and lab'ring hind
 For shelter to the neighb'ring covert fly,
 Or hous'd, or safe in hollow caverns lie;

But, that o'erblown, when heav'n above 'em smiles, 11135
 Return to travel, and renew their toils:
 Aeneas thus, o'erwhelmed on ev'ry side,
 The storm of darts, undaunted, did abide;
 And thus to Lausus loud with friendly threat'ning cried:
 "Why wilt thou rush to certain death, and rage 11140
 In rash attempts, beyond thy tender age,
 Betray'd by pious love?" Nor, thus forborne,
 The youth desists, but with insulting scorn
 Provokes the ling'ring prince, whose patience, tir'd,
 Gave place; and all his breast with fury fir'd. 11145
 For now the Fates prepar'd their sharpen'd shears;
 And lifted high the flaming sword appears,
 Which, full descending with a frightful sway,
 Thro' shield and corslet forc'd th' impetuous way,
 And buried deep in his fair bosom lay. 11150
 The purple streams thro' the thin armor strove,
 And drench'd th' imbroider'd coat his mother wove;
 And life at length forsook his heaving heart,
 Loth from so sweet a mansion to depart.

But when, with blood and paleness all o'erspread, 11155
 The pious prince beheld young Lausus dead,
 He griev'd; he wept; the sight an image brought
 Of his own filial love, a sadly pleasing thought:
 Then stretch'd his hand to hold him up, and said:
 "Poor hapless youth! what praises can be paid 11160
 To love so great, to such transcendent store
 Of early worth, and sure presage of more?
 Accept whate'er Aeneas can afford;
 Untouch'd thy arms, untaken be thy sword;
 And all that pleas'd thee living, still remain 11165
 Inviolate, and sacred to the slain.
 Thy body on thy parents I bestow,
 To rest thy soul, at least, if shadows know,
 Or have a sense of human things below.
 There to thy fellow ghosts with glory tell:
 "T was by the great Aeneas hand I fell." 11170
 With this, his distant friends he beckons near,
 Provokes their duty, and prevents their fear:
 Himself assists to lift him from the ground,
 With clotted locks, and blood that well'd from out the wound. 11175

Meantime, his father, now no father, stood,
 And wash'd his wounds by Tiber's yellow flood:
 Oppress'd with anguish, panting, and o'erspent,
 His fainting limbs against an oak he leant. 11180
 A bough his brazen helmet did sustain;
 His heavier arms lay scatter'd on the plain:
 A chosen train of youth around him stand;
 His drooping head was rested on his hand:
 His grisly beard his pensive bosom sought;
 And all on Lausus ran his restless thought. 11185
 Careful, concern'd his danger to prevent,
 He much enquir'd, and many a message sent
 To warn him from the field—alas! in vain!

Behold, his mournful followers bear him slain!
 O'er his broad shield still gush'd the yawning wound, 11190
 And drew a bloody trail along the ground.
 Far off he heard their cries, far off divin'd
 The dire event, with a foreboding mind.
 With dust he sprinkled first his hoary head;
 Then both his lifted hands to heav'n he spread; 11195
 Last, the dear corpse embracing, thus he said:
 "What joys, alas! could this frail being give,
 That I have been so covetous to live?
 To see my son, and such a son, resign
 His life, a ransom for preserving mine! 11200
 And am I then preserv'd, and art thou lost?
 How much too dear has that redemption cost!
 'T is now my bitter banishment I feel:
 This is a wound too deep for time to heal.
 My guilt thy growing virtues did defame; 11205
 My blackness blotted thy unblemish'd name.
 Chas'd from a throne, abandon'd, and exil'd
 For foul misdeeds, were punishments too mild:
 I ow'd my people these, and, from their hate,
 With less resentment could have borne my fate. 11210
 And yet I live, and yet sustain the sight
 Of hated men, and of more hated light:
 But will not long." With that he rais'd from ground
 His fainting limbs, that stagger'd with his wound;
 Yet, with a mind resolv'd, and unappall'd 11215
 With pains or perils, for his courser call'd
 Well-mouth'd, well-manag'd, whom himself did dress
 With daily care, and mounted with success;
 His aid in arms, his ornament in peace.

Soothing his courage with a gentle stroke, 11220
 The steed seem'd sensible, while thus he spoke:
 "O Rhoebus, we have liv'd too long for me—
 If life and long were terms that could agree!
 This day thou either shalt bring back the head
 And bloody trophies of the Trojan dead; 11225
 This day thou either shalt revenge my woe,
 For murder'd Lausus, on his cruel foe;
 Or, if inexorable fate deny
 Our conquest, with thy conquer'd master die:
 For, after such a lord, I rest secure, 11230
 Thou wilt no foreign reins, or Trojan load endure."
 He said; and straight th' officious courser kneels,
 To take his wonted weight. His hands he fills
 With pointed jav'lins; on his head he lac'd
 His glitt'ring helm, which terribly was grac'd 11235
 With waving horsehair, nodding from afar;
 Then spurr'd his thund'ring steed amidst the war.
 Love, anguish, wrath, and grief, to madness wrought,
 Despair, and secret shame, and conscious thought
 Of inborn worth, his lab'ring soul oppress'd, 11240
 Roll'd in his eyes, and rag'd within his breast.
 Then loud he call'd Aeneas thrice by name:
 The loud repeated voice to glad Aeneas came.
 "Great Jove," he said, "and the far-shooting god,

Inspire thy mind to make thy challenge good!" 11245
 He spoke no more; but hasten'd, void of fear,
 And threaten'd with his long protended spear.

To whom Mezentius thus: "Thy vaunts are vain.
 My Lausus lies extended on the plain:
 He's lost! thy conquest is already won; 11250
 The wretched sire is murther'd in the son.
 Nor fate I fear, but all the gods defy.
 Forbear thy threats: my bus'ness is to die;
 But first receive this parting legacy."
 He said; and straight a whirling dart he sent; 11255
 Another after, and another went.

Round in a spacious ring he rides the field,
 And vainly plies th' impenetrable shield.
 Thrice rode he round; and thrice Aeneas wheel'd,
 Turn'd as he turn'd: the golden orb withstood 11260
 The strokes, and bore about an iron wood.
 Impatient of delay, and weary grown,
 Still to defend, and to defend alone,

To wrench the darts which in his buckler light,
 Urg'd and o'er-labor'd in unequal fight; 11265
 At length resolv'd, he throws with all his force
 Full at the temples of the warrior horse.

Just where the stroke was aim'd, th' unerring spear
 Made way, and stood transfix'd thro' either ear.
 Seiz'd with unwonted pain, surpris'd with fright, 11270
 The wounded steed curvets, and, rais'd upright,
 Lights on his feet before; his hoofs behind
 Spring up in air aloft, and lash the wind.
 Down comes the rider headlong from his height:
 His horse came after with unwieldy weight, 11275
 And, flound'ring forward, pitching on his head,
 His lord's incumber'd shoulder overlaid.

From either host, the mingled shouts and cries
 Of Trojans and Rutulians rend the skies.
 Aeneas, hast'ning, wav'd his fatal sword 11280
 High o'er his head, with this reproachful word:
 "Now; where are now thy vaunts, the fierce disdain
 Of proud Mezentius, and the lofty strain?"

Struggling, and wildly staring on the skies,
 With scarce recover'd sight he thus replies: 11285
 "Why these insulting words, this waste of breath,
 To souls undaunted, and secure of death?

'T is no dishonor for the brave to die,
 Nor came I here with hope victory;
 Nor ask I life, nor fought with that design: 11290
 As I had us'd my fortune, use thou thine.
 My dying son contracted no such band;
 The gift is hateful from his murd'rer's hand.

For this, this only favor let me sue,
 If pity can to conquer'd foes be due: 11295
 Refuse it not; but let my body have
 The last retreat of humankind, a grave.
 Too well I know th' insulting people's hate;

Protect me from their vengeance after fate:
 This refuge for my poor remains provide, 11300
 And lay my much-lov'd Lausus by my side."
 He said, and to the sword his throat applied.
 The crimson stream distain'd his arms around,
 And the disdainful soul came rushing thro' the wound.

Book XI

Scarce had the rosy Morning rais'd her head 11305
 Above the waves, and left her wat'ry bed;
 The pious chief, whom double cares attend
 For his unburied soldiers and his friend,
 Yet first to Heav'n perform'd a victor's vows:
 He bar'd an ancient oak of all her boughs; 11310
 Then on a rising ground the trunk he plac'd,
 Which with the spoils of his dead foe he grac'd.
 The coat of arms by proud Mezentius worn,
 Now on a naked snag in triumph borne,
 Was hung on high, and glitter'd from afar, 11315
 A trophy sacred to the God of War.
 Above his arms, fix'd on the leafless wood,
 Appear'd his plummy crest, besmear'd with blood:
 His brazen buckler on the left was seen;
 Truncheons of shiver'd lances hung between; 11320
 And on the right was placed his corslet, bor'd;
 And to the neck was tied his unavailing sword.

A crowd of chiefs inclose the godlike man,
 Who thus, conspicuous in the midst, began:
 "Our toils, my friends, are crown'd with sure success; 11325
 The greater part perform'd, achieve the less.
 Now follow cheerful to the trembling town;
 Press but an entrance, and presume it won.
 Fear is no more, for fierce Mezentius lies,
 As the first fruits of war, a sacrifice. 11330
 Turnus shall fall extended on the plain,
 And, in this omen, is already slain.
 Prepar'd in arms, pursue your happy chance;
 That none unwarn'd may plead his ignorance,
 And I, at Heav'n's appointed hour, may find 11335
 Your warlike ensigns waving in the wind.
 Meantime the rites and fun'ral pomps prepare,
 Due to your dead companions of the war:
 The last respect the living can bestow,
 To shield their shadows from contempt below. 11340
 That conquer'd earth be theirs, for which they fought,
 And which for us with their own blood they bought;
 But first the corpse of our unhappy friend
 To the sad city of Evander send,
 Who, not inglorious, in his age's bloom, 11345
 Was hurried hence by too severe a doom."

Thus, weeping while he spoke, he took his way,
 Where, new in death, lamented Pallas lay.
 Acoetes watch'd the corpse; whose youth deserv'd
 The father's trust; and now the son he serv'd 11350
 With equal faith, but less auspicious care.

Th' attendants of the slain his sorrow share.
 A troop of Trojans mix'd with these appear,
 And mourning matrons with dishevel'd hair. 11355
 Soon as the prince appears, they raise a cry;
 All beat their breasts, and echoes rend the sky.
 They rear his drooping forehead from the ground;
 But, when Aeneas view'd the grisly wound
 Which Pallas in his manly bosom bore,
 And the fair flesh distain'd with purple gore; 11360
 First, melting into tears, the pious man
 Deplor'd so sad a sight, then thus began:
 "Unhappy youth! when Fortune gave the rest
 Of my full wishes, she refus'd the best!
 She came; but brought not thee along, to bless 11365
 My longing eyes, and share in my success:
 She grudg'd thy safe return, the triumphs due
 To prosp'rous valor, in the public view.
 Not thus I promis'd, when thy father lent
 Thy needless succor with a sad consent; 11370
 Embrac'd me, parting for th' Etrurian land,
 And sent me to possess a large command.
 He warn'd, and from his own experience told,
 Our foes were warlike, disciplin'd, and bold. 11375
 And now perhaps, in hopes of thy return,
 Rich odors on his loaded altars burn,
 While we, with vain officious pomp, prepare
 To send him back his portion of the war,
 A bloody breathless body, which can owe 11380
 No farther debt, but to the pow'rs below.
 The wretched father, ere his race is run,
 Shall view the fun'ral honors of his son.
 These are my triumphs of the Latian war,
 Fruits of my plighted faith and boasted care!
 And yet, unhappy sire, thou shalt not see 11385
 A son whose death disgrac'd his ancestry;
 Thou shalt not blush, old man, however griev'd:
 Thy Pallas no dishonest wound receiv'd.
 He died no death to make thee wish, too late,
 Thou hadst not liv'd to see his shameful fate: 11390
 But what a champion has th' Ausonian coast,
 And what a friend hast thou, Ascanius, lost!"

Thus having mourn'd, he gave the word around,
 To raise the breathless body from the ground; 11395
 And chose a thousand horse, the flow'r of all
 His warlike troops, to wait the funeral,
 To bear him back and share Evander's grief:
 A well-becoming, but a weak relief.
 Of oaken twigs they twist an easy bier,
 Then on their shoulders the sad burden rear. 11400
 The body on this rural hearse is borne:
 Strew'd leaves and funeral greens the bier adorn.
 All pale he lies, and looks a lovely flow'r,
 New cropp'd by virgin hands, to dress the bow'r:
 Unfaded yet, but yet unfed below, 11405
 No more to mother earth or the green stern shall owe.
 Then two fair vests, of wondrous work and cost,
 Of purple woven, and with gold emboss'd,

- For ornament the Trojan hero brought,
Which with her hands Sidonian Dido wrought. 11410
One vest array'd the corpse; and one they spread
O'er his clos'd eyes, and wrapp'd around his head,
That, when the yellow hair in flame should fall,
The catching fire might burn the golden caul.
Besides, the spoils of foes in battle slain, 11415
When he descended on the Latian plain;
Arms, trappings, horses, by the hearse are led
In long array—th' achievements of the dead.
Then, pinion'd with their hands behind, appear
Th' unhappy captives, marching in the rear, 11420
Appointed off'rings in the victor's name,
To sprinkle with their blood the fun'ral flame.
Inferior trophies by the chiefs are borne;
Gauntlets and helms their loaded hands adorn;
And fair inscriptions fix'd, and titles read 11425
Of Latian leaders conquer'd by the dead.
- Acoetes on his pupil's corpse attends,
With feeble steps, supported by his friends.
Pausing at ev'ry pace, in sorrow drown'd,
Betwixt their arms he sinks upon the ground; 11430
Where grov'ling while he lies in deep despair,
He beats his breast, and rends his hoary hair.
The champion's chariot next is seen to roll,
Besmear'd with hostile blood, and honorably foul.
To close the pomp, Aethon, the steed of state, 11435
Is led, the fun'rals of his lord to wait.
Stripp'd of his trappings, with a sullen pace
He walks; and the big tears run rolling down his face.
The lance of Pallas, and the crimson crest,
Are borne behind: the victor seiz'd the rest. 11440
The march begins: the trumpets hoarsely sound;
The pikes and lances trail along the ground.
Thus while the Trojan and Arcadian horse
To Pallantean tow'rs direct their course,
In long procession rank'd, the pious chief 11445
Stopp'd in the rear, and gave a vent to grief:
"The public care," he said, "which war attends,
Diverts our present woes, at least suspends.
Peace with the manes of great Pallas dwell!
Hail, holy relics! and a last farewell!" 11450
He said no more, but, inly thro' he mourn'd,
Restrained his tears, and to the camp return'd.
- Now suppliants, from Laurentum sent, demand
A truce, with olive branches in their hand;
Obtest his clemency, and from the plain 11455
Beg leave to draw the bodies of their slain.
They plead, that none those common rites deny
To conquer'd foes that in fair battle die.
All cause of hate was ended in their death;
Nor could he war with bodies void of breath. 11460
A king, they hop'd, would hear a king's request,
Whose son he once was call'd, and once his guest.

Their suit, which was too just to be denied,
 The hero grants, and farther thus replied:
 “O Latian princes, how severe a fate 11465
 In causeless quarrels has involv’d your state,
 And arm’d against an unoffending man,
 Who sought your friendship ere the war began!
 You beg a truce, which I would gladly give,
 Not only for the slain, but those who live. 11470
 I came not hither but by Heav’n’s command,
 And sent by fate to share the Latian land.
 Nor wage I wars unjust: your king denied
 My proffer’d friendship, and my promis’d bride;
 Left me for Turnus. Turnus then should try 11475
 His cause in arms, to conquer or to die.
 My right and his are in dispute: the slain
 Fell without fault, our quarrel to maintain.
 In equal arms let us alone contend;
 And let him vanquish, whom his fates befriend. 11480
 This is the way (so tell him) to possess
 The royal virgin, and restore the peace.
 Bear this message back, with ample leave,
 That your slain friends may fun’ral rites receive.”

Thus having said—th’ ambassadors, amaz’d, 11485
 Stood mute a while, and on each other gaz’d.
 Drances, their chief, who harbor’d in his breast
 Long hate to Turnus, as his foe profess’d,
 Broke silence first, and to the godlike man,
 With graceful action bowing, thus began: 11490
 “Auspicious prince, in arms a mighty name,
 But yet whose actions far transcend your fame;
 Would I your justice or your force express,
 Thought can but equal; and all words are less.
 Your answer we shall thankfully relate, 11495
 And favors granted to the Latian state.
 If wish’d success our labor shall attend,
 Think peace concluded, and the king your friend:
 Let Turnus leave the realm to your command,
 And seek alliance in some other land: 11500
 Build you the city which your fates assign;
 We shall be proud in the great work to join.”

Thus Drances; and his words so well persuade
 The rest impower’d, that soon a truce is made. 11505
 Twelve days the term allow’d: and, during those,
 Latians and Trojans, now no longer foes,
 Mix’d in the woods, for fun’ral piles prepare
 To fell the timber, and forget the war.
 Loud axes thro’ the groaning groves resound;
 Oak, mountain ash, and poplar spread the ground; 11510
 First fall from high; and some the trunks receive
 In loaden wains; with wedges some they cleave.

And now the fatal news by Fame is blown
 Thro’ the short circuit of th’ Arcadian town,
 Of Pallas slain—by Fame, which just before 11515
 His triumphs on distended pinions bore.

Rushing from out the gate, the people stand,
 Each with a fun'ral flambeau in his hand.
 Wildly they stare, distracted with amaze:
 The fields are lighten'd with a fiery blaze, 11520
 That cast a sullen splendor on their friends,
 The marching troop which their dead prince attends.
 Both parties meet: they raise a doleful cry;
 The matrons from the walls with shrieks reply,
 And their mix'd mourning rends the vaulted sky. 11525
 The town is fill'd with tumult and with tears,
 Till the loud clamors reach Evander's ears:
 Forgetful of his state, he runs along,
 With a disorder'd pace, and cleaves the throng;
 Falls on the corpse; and groaning there he lies, 11530
 With silent grief, that speaks but at his eyes.
 Short sighs and sobs succeed; till sorrow breaks
 A passage, and at once he weeps and speaks:

"O Pallas! thou hast fail'd thy plighted word,
 To fight with caution, not to tempt the sword! 11535
 I warn'd thee, but in vain; for well I knew
 What perils youthful ardor would pursue,
 That boiling blood would carry thee too far,
 Young as thou wert in dangers, raw to war!
 O curst essay of arms, disastrous doom, 11540
 Prelude of bloody fields, and fights to come!
 Hard elements of unauspicious war,
 Vain vows to Heav'n, and unavailing care!
 Thrice happy thou, dear partner of my bed,
 Whose holy soul the stroke of Fortune fled, 11545
 Praescious of ills, and leaving me behind,
 To drink the dregs of life by fate assign'd!
 Beyond the goal of nature I have gone:
 My Pallas late set out, but reach'd too soon.
 If, for my league against th' Ausonian state, 11550
 Amidst their weapons I had found my fate,
 (Deserv'd from them,) then I had been return'd
 A breathless victor, and my son had mourn'd.
 Yet will I not my Trojan friend upbraid,
 Nor grudge th' alliance I so gladly made. 11555
 'T was not his fault, my Pallas fell so young,
 But my own crime, for having liv'd too long.
 Yet, since the gods had destin'd him to die,
 At least he led the way to victory:
 First for his friends he won the fatal shore, 11560
 And sent whole herds of slaughter'd foes before;
 A death too great, too glorious to deplore.
 Nor will I add new honors to thy grave,
 Content with those the Trojan hero gave:
 That funeral pomp thy Phrygian friends design'd, 11565
 In which the Tuscan chiefs and army join'd.
 Great spoils and trophies, gain'd by thee, they bear:
 Then let thy own achievements be thy share.
 Even thou, O Turnus, hadst a trophy stood,
 Whose mighty trunk had better grac'd the wood, 11570
 If Pallas had arriv'd, with equal length
 Of years, to match thy bulk with equal strength.

But why, unhappy man, dost thou detain
 These troops, to view the tears thou shedd'st in vain?
 Go, friends, this message to your lord relate: 11575
 Tell him, that, if I bear my bitter fate,
 And, after Pallas' death, live ling'ring on,
 'T is to behold his vengeance for my son.
 I stay for Turnus, whose devoted head
 Is owing to the living and the dead. 11580
 My son and I expect it from his hand;
 'T is all that he can give, or we demand.
 Joy is no more; but I would gladly go,
 To greet my Pallas with such news below."

The morn had now dispell'd the shades of night, 11585
 Restoring toils, when she restor'd the light.
 The Trojan king and Tuscan chief command
 To raise the piles along the winding strand.
 Their friends convey the dead fun'ral fires;
 Black smold'ring smoke from the green wood expires; 11590
 The light of heav'n is chok'd, and the new day retires.
 Then thrice around the kindled piles they go
 (For ancient custom had ordain'd it so)
 Thrice horse and foot about the fires are led;
 And thrice, with loud laments, they hail the dead. 11595
 Tears, trickling down their breasts, bedew the ground,
 And drums and trumpets mix their mournful sound.
 Amid the blaze, their pious brethren throw
 The spoils, in battle taken from the foe:
 Helms, bits emboss'd, and swords of shining steel; 11600
 One casts a target, one a chariot wheel;
 Some to their fellows their own arms restore:
 The fauchions which in luckless fight they bore,
 Their bucklers pierc'd, their darts bestow'd in vain, 11605
 And shiver'd lances gather'd from the plain.
 Whole herds of offer'd bulls, about the fire,
 And bristled boars, and woolly sheep expire.
 Around the piles a careful troop attends,
 To watch the wasting flames, and weep their burning friends;
 Ling'ring along the shore, till dewy night 11610
 New decks the face of heav'n with starry light.

The conquer'd Latians, with like pious care,
 Piles without number for their dead prepare.
 Part in the places where they fell are laid;
 And part are to the neighb'ring fields convey'd. 11615
 The corps of kings, and captains of renown,
 Borne off in state, are buried in the town;
 The rest, unhonor'd, and without a name,
 Are cast a common heap to feed the flame. 11620
 Trojans and Latians vie with like desires
 To make the field of battle shine with fires,
 And the promiscuous blaze to heav'n aspires.

Now had the morning thrice renew'd the light,
 And thrice dispell'd the shadows of the night,
 When those who round the wasted fires remain, 11625
 Perform the last sad office to the slain.

They rake the yet warm ashes from below;
 These, and the bones unburn'd, in earth bestow;
 These relics with their country rites they grace,
 And raise a mound of turf to mark the place. 11630

But, in the palace of the king, appears
 A scene more solemn, and a pomp of tears.
 Maids, matrons, widows, mix their common moans;
 Orphans their sires, and sires lament their sons.
 All in that universal sorrow share, 11635

And curse the cause of this unhappy war:
 A broken league, a bride unjustly sought,
 A crown usurp'd, which with their blood is bought!
 These are the crimes with which they load the name
 Of Turnus, and on him alone exclaim: 11640

“Let him who lords it o'er th' Ausonian land
 Engage the Trojan hero hand to hand:
 His is the gain; our lot is but to serve;
 'T is just, the sway he seeks, he should deserve.” 11645

This Drances aggravates; and adds, with spite:
 “His foe expects, and dares him to the fight.”
 Nor Turnus wants a party, to support
 His cause and credit in the Latian court.
 His former acts secure his present fame,
 And the queen shades him with her mighty name. 11650

While thus their factious minds with fury burn,
 The legates from th' Aetolian prince return:
 Sad news they bring, that, after all the cost
 And care employ'd, their embassy is lost;
 That Diomedes refus'd his aid in war, 11655
 Unmov'd with presents, and as deaf to pray'r.
 Some new alliance must elsewhere be sought,
 Or peace with Troy on hard conditions bought.

Latinus, sunk in sorrow, finds too late,
 A foreign son is pointed out by fate; 11660
 And, till Aeneas shall Lavinia wed,
 The wrath of Heav'n is hov'ring o'er his head.

The gods, he saw, espous'd the juster side,
 When late their titles in the field were tried:
 Witness the fresh laments, and fun'ral tears undried. 11665

Thus, full of anxious thought, he summons all
 The Latian senate to the council hall.
 The princes come, commanded by their head,
 And crowd the paths that to the palace lead.
 Supreme in pow'r, and reverenc'd for his years, 11670
 He takes the throne, and in the midst appears.
 Majestically sad, he sits in state,
 And bids his envoys their success relate.

When Venulus began, the murmuring sound
 Was hush'd, and sacred silence reign'd around. 11675
 “We have,” said he, “perform'd your high command,
 And pass'd with peril a long tract of land:
 We reach'd the place desir'd; with wonder fill'd,
 The Grecian tents and rising tow'rs beheld.

Great Diomede has compass'd round with walls 11680
 The city, which Argyripa he calls,
 From his own Argos nam'd. We touch'd, with joy,
 The royal hand that raz'd unhappy Troy.
 When introduc'd, our presents first we bring,
 Then crave an instant audience from the king. 11685
 His leave obtain'd, our native soil we name,
 And tell th' important cause for which we came.
 Attentively he heard us, while we spoke;
 Then, with soft accents, and a pleasing look,
 Made this return: 'Ausonian race, of old 11690
 Renown'd for peace, and for an age of gold,
 What madness has your alter'd minds possess'd,
 To change for war hereditary rest,
 Solicit arms unknown, and tempt the sword,
 A needless ill your ancestors abhorr'd? 11695
 We—for myself I speak, and all the name
 Of Grecians, who to Troy's destruction came,
 Omitting those who were in battle slain,
 Or borne by rolling Simois to the main—
 Not one but suffer'd, and too dearly bought 11700
 The prize of honor which in arms he sought;
 Some doom'd to death, and some in exile driv'n.
 Outcasts, abandon'd by the care of Heav'n;
 So worn, so wretched, so despis'd a crew,
 As ev'n old Priam might with pity view. 11705
 Witness the vessels by Minerva toss'd
 In storms; the vengeful Capharean coast;
 Th' Euboean rocks! the prince, whose brother led
 Our armies to revenge his injur'd bed,
 In Egypt lost! Ulysses with his men 11710
 Have seen Charybdis and the Cyclops' den.
 Why should I name Idomeneus, in vain
 Restor'd to scepters, and expell'd again?
 Or young Achilles, by his rival slain?
 Ev'n he, the King of Men, the foremost name 11715
 Of all the Greeks, and most renown'd by fame,
 The proud revenger of another's wife,
 Yet by his own adult'ress lost his life;
 Fell at his threshold; and the spoils of Troy
 The foul polluters of his bed enjoy. 11720
 The gods have envied me the sweets of life,
 My much lov'd country, and my more lov'd wife:
 Banish'd from both, I mourn; while in the sky,
 Transform'd to birds, my lost companions fly:
 Hov'ring about the coasts, they make their moan, 11725
 And cuff the cliffs with pinions not their own.
 What squalid specters, in the dead of night,
 Break my short sleep, and skim before my sight!
 I might have promis'd to myself those harms,
 Mad as I was, when I, with mortal arms, 11730
 Presum'd against immortal pow'rs to move,
 And violate with wounds the Queen of Love.
 Such arms this hand shall never more employ;
 No hate remains with me to ruin'd Troy.
 I war not with its dust; nor am I glad 11735
 To think of past events, or good or bad.

- Your presents I return: whate'er you bring
 To buy my friendship, send the Trojan king.
 We met in fight; I know him, to my cost:
 With what a whirling force his lance he toss'd! 11740
 Heav'ns! what a spring was in his arm, to throw!
 How high he held his shield, and rose at ev'ry blow!
 Had Troy produc'd two more his match in might,
 They would have chang'd the fortune of the fight:
 Th' invasion of the Greeks had been return'd, 11745
 Our empire wasted, and our cities burn'd.
 The long defense the Trojan people made,
 The war protracted, and the siege delay'd,
 Were due to Hector's and this hero's hand:
 Both brave alike, and equal in command; 11750
 Aeneas, not inferior in the field,
 In pious reverence to the gods excell'd.
 Make peace, ye Latians, and avoid with care
 Th' impending dangers of a fatal war.
 He said no more; but, with this cold excuse, 11755
 Refus'd th' alliance, and advis'd a truce.”
- Thus Venulus concluded his report.
 A jarring murmur fill'd the factious court:
 As, when a torrent rolls with rapid force,
 And dashes o'er the stones that stop the course, 11760
 The flood, constrain'd within a scanty space,
 Roars horrible along th' uneasy race;
 White foam in gath'ring eddies floats around;
 The rocky shores rebellow to the sound.
- The murmur ceas'd: then from his lofty throne 11765
 The king invoc'd the gods, and thus begun:
 “I wish, ye Latins, what we now debate
 Had been resolv'd before it was too late.
 Much better had it been for you and me,
 Unforc'd by this our last necessity, 11770
 To have been earlier wise, than now to call
 A council, when the foe surrounds the wall.
 O citizens, we wage unequal war,
 With men not only Heav'n's peculiar care,
 But Heav'n's own race; unconquer'd in the field, 11775
 Or, conquer'd, yet unknowing how to yield.
 What hopes you had in Diomedes, lay down:
 Our hopes must center on ourselves alone.
 Yet those how feeble, and, indeed, how vain,
 You see too well; nor need my words explain. 11780
 Vanquish'd without resource; laid flat by fate;
 Factions within, a foe without the gate!
 Not but I grant that all perform'd their parts
 With manly force, and with undaunted hearts:
 With our united strength the war we wag'd; 11785
 With equal numbers, equal arms, engag'd.
 You see th' event.—Now hear what I propose,
 To save our friends, and satisfy our foes.
 A tract of land the Latins have possess'd
 Along the Tiber, stretching to the west, 11790
 Which now Rutulians and Auruncans till,
 And their mix'd cattle graze the fruitful hill.

Those mountains fill'd with firs, that lower land,
 If you consent, the Trojan shall command,
 Call'd into part of what is ours; and there, 11795
 On terms agreed, the common country share.
 There let'em build and settle, if they please;
 Unless they choose once more to cross the seas,
 In search of seats remote from Italy,
 And from unwelcome inmates set us free. 11800
 Then twice ten galleys let us build with speed,
 Or twice as many more, if more they need.
 Materials are at hand; a well-grown wood
 Runs equal with the margin of the flood:
 Let them the number and the form assign; 11805
 The care and cost of all the stores be mine.
 To treat the peace, a hundred senators
 Shall be commission'd hence with ample pow'rs,
 With olive the presents they shall bear,
 A purple robe, a royal iv'ry chair, 11810
 And all the marks of sway that Latian monarchs wear,
 And sums of gold. Among yourselves debate
 This great affair, and save the sinking state."

Then Drances took the word, who grudg'd, long since,
 The rising glories of the Daunian prince. 11815
 Factious and rich, bold at the council board,
 But cautious in the field, he shunn'd the sword;
 A close caballer, and tongue-valiant lord.
 Noble his mother was, and near the throne;
 But, what his father's parentage, unknown. 11820
 He rose, and took th' advantage of the times,
 To load young Turnus with invidious crimes.
 "Such truths, O king," said he, "your words contain,
 As strike the sense, and all replies are vain;
 Nor are your loyal subjects now to seek 11825
 What common needs require, but fear to speak.
 Let him give leave of speech, that haughty man,
 Whose pride this unauspicious war began;
 For whose ambition (let me dare to say,
 Fear set apart, tho' death is in my way) 11830
 The plains of Latium run with blood around.
 So many valiant heroes bite the ground;
 Dejected grief in ev'ry face appears;
 A town in mourning, and a land in tears;
 While he, th' undoubted author of our harms, 11835
 The man who menaces the gods with arms,
 Yet, after all his boasts, forsook the fight,
 And sought his safety in ignoble flight.
 Now, best of kings, since you propose to send
 Such bounteous presents to your Trojan friend; 11840
 Add yet a greater at our joint request,
 One which he values more than all the rest:
 Give him the fair Lavinia for his bride;
 With that alliance let the league be tied,
 And for the bleeding land a lasting peace provide. 11845
 Let insolence no longer awe the throne;
 But, with a father's right, bestow your own.
 For this maligner of the general good,
 If still we fear his force, he must be wood;

His haughty godhead we with pray'rs implore, 11850
 Your scepter to release, and our just rights restore.
 O cursed cause of all our ills, must we
 Wage wars unjust, and fall in fight, for thee!
 What right hast thou to rule the Latian state,
 And send us out to meet our certain fate? 11855
 'T is a destructive war: from Turnus' hand
 Our peace and public safety we demand.
 Let the fair bride to the brave chief remain;
 If not, the peace, without the pledge, is vain.
 Turnus, I know you think me not your friend, 11860
 Nor will I much with your belief contend:
 I beg your greatness not to give the law
 In others' realms, but, beaten, to withdraw.
 Pity your own, or pity our estate;
 Nor twist our fortunes with your sinking fate. 11865
 Your interest is, the war should never cease;
 But we have felt enough to wish the peace:
 A land exhausted to the last remains,
 Depopulated towns, and driven plains.
 Yet, if desire of fame, and thirst of pow'r, 11870
 A beauteous princess, with a crown in dow'r,
 So fire your mind, in arms assert your right,
 And meet your foe, who dares you to the fight.
 Mankind, it seems, is made for you alone;
 We, but the slaves who mount you to the throne: 11875
 A base ignoble crowd, without a name,
 Unwept, unworthy, of the fun'ral flame,
 By duty bound to forfeit each his life,
 That Turnus may possess a royal wife.
 Permit not, mighty man, so mean a crew 11880
 Should share such triumphs, and detain from you
 The post of honor, your undoubted due.
 Rather alone your matchless force employ,
 To merit what alone you must enjoy."

These words, so full of malice mix'd with art, 11885
 Inflam'd with rage the youthful hero's heart.
 Then, groaning from the bottom of his breast,
 He heav'd for wind, and thus his wrath express'd:
 "You, Drances, never want a stream of words,
 Then, when the public need requires our swords. 11890
 First in the council hall to steer the state,
 And ever foremost in a tongue-debate,
 While our strong walls secure us from the foe,
 Ere yet with blood our ditches overflow:
 But let the potent orator declaim, 11895
 And with the brand of coward blot my name;
 Free leave is giv'n him, when his fatal hand
 Has cover'd with more corps the sanguine strand,
 And high as mine his tow'ring trophies stand.
 If any doubt remains, who dares the most, 11900
 Let us decide it at the Trojan's cost,
 And issue both abreast, where honor calls—
 Foes are not far to seek without the walls—
 Unless his noisy tongue can only fight,
 And feet were giv'n him but to speed his flight. 11905
 I beaten from the field? I forc'd away?

Who, but so known a dastard, dares to say?
 Had he but ev'n beheld the fight, his eyes
 Had witness'd for me what his tongue denies: 11910
 What heaps of Trojans by this hand were slain,
 And how the bloody Tiber swell'd the main.
 All saw, but he, th' Arcadian troops retire
 In scatter'd squadrons, and their prince expire.
 The giant brothers, in their camp, have found,
 I was not forc'd with ease to quit my ground. 11915
 Not such the Trojans tried me, when, inclos'd,
 I singly their united arms oppos'd:
 First forc'd an entrance thro' their thick array;
 Then, glutted with their slaughter, freed my way.
 'T is a destructive war? So let it be, 11920
 But to the Phrygian pirate, and to thee!
 Meantime proceed to fill the people's ears
 With false reports, their minds with panic fears:
 Extol the strength of a twice-conquer'd race;
 Our foes encourage, and our friends debase. 11925
 Believe thy fables, and the Trojan town
 Triumphant stands; the Grecians are o'erthrown;
 Suppliant at Hector's feet Achilles lies,
 And Diomede from fierce Aeneas flies.
 Say rapid Aufidus with awful dread 11930
 Runs backward from the sea, and hides his head,
 When the great Trojan on his bank appears;
 For that's as true as thy dissembled fears
 Of my revenge. Dismiss that vanity:
 Thou, Drances, art below a death from me. 11935
 Let that vile soul in that vile body rest;
 The lodging is well worthy of the guest.

"Now, royal father, to the present state
 Of our affairs, and of this high debate:
 If in your arms thus early you diffide, 11940
 And think your fortune is already tried;
 If one defeat has brought us down so low,
 As never more in fields to meet the foe;
 Then I conclude for peace: 't is time to treat,
 And lie like vassals at the victor's feet. 11945
 But, O! if any ancient blood remains,
 One drop of all our fathers' in our veins,
 That man would I prefer before the rest,
 Who dar'd his death with an undaunted breast;
 Who comely fell, by no dishonest wound, 11950
 To shun that sight, and, dying, gnaw'd the ground.
 But, if we still have fresh recruits in store,
 If our confederates can afford us more;
 If the contended field we bravely fought,
 And not a bloodless victory was bought; 11955
 Their losses equal'd ours; and, for their slain,
 With equal fires they fill'd the shining plain;
 Why thus, unforc'd, should we so tamely yield,
 And, ere the trumpet sounds, resign the field?
 Good unexpected, evils unforeseen, 11960
 Appear by turns, as fortune shifts the scene:
 Some, rais'd aloft, come tumbling down amain;
 Then fall so hard, they bound and rise again.

- If Diomedes refuse his aid to lend,
 The great Messapus yet remains our friend: 11965
 Tolumnius, who foretells events, is ours;
 Th' Italian chiefs and princes join their pow'rs:
 Nor least in number, nor in name the last,
 Your own brave subjects have your cause embrac'd
 Above the rest, the Volscian Amazon 11970
 Contains an army in herself alone,
 And heads a squadron, terrible to sight,
 With glitt'ring shields, in brazen armor bright.
 Yet, if the foe a single fight demand,
 And I alone the public peace withstand; 11975
 If you consent, he shall not be refus'd,
 Nor find a hand to victory unus'd.
 This new Achilles, let him take the field,
 With fated armor, and Vulcanian shield!
 For you, my royal father, and my fame, 11980
 I, Turnus, not the least of all my name,
 Devote my soul. He calls me hand to hand,
 And I alone will answer his demand.
 Drances shall rest secure, and neither share
 The danger, nor divide the prize of war." 11985
- While they debate, nor these nor those will yield,
 Aeneas draws his forces to the field,
 And moves his camp. The scouts with flying speed
 Return, and thro' the frighted city spread
 Th' unpleasing news, the Trojans are descried, 11990
 In battle marching by the river side,
 And bending to the town. They take th' alarm:
 Some tremble, some are bold; all in confusion arm.
 Th' impetuous youth press forward to the field;
 They clash the sword, and clatter on the shield: 11995
 The fearful matrons raise a screaming cry;
 Old feeble men with fainter groans reply;
 A jarring sound results, and mingles in the sky,
 Like that of swans remurm'ring to the floods,
 Or birds of diff'ring kinds in hollow woods. 12000
- Turnus th' occasion takes, and cries aloud:
 "Talk on, ye quaint haranguers of the crowd:
 Declaim in praise of peace, when danger calls,
 And the fierce foes in arms approach the walls."
 He said, and, turning short, with speedy pace, 12005
 Casts back a scornful glance, and quits the place:
 "Thou, Volusus, the Volscian troops command
 To mount; and lead thyself our Ardean band.
 Messapus and Catillus, post your force
 Along the fields, to charge the Trojan horse. 12010
 Some guard the passes, others man the wall;
 Drawn up in arms, the rest attend my call."
- They swarm from ev'ry quarter of the town,
 And with disorder'd haste the rampires crown.
 Good old Latinus, when he saw, too late, 12015
 The gath'ring storm just breaking on the state,
 Dismiss'd the council till a fitter time,

And own'd his easy temper as his crime,
 Who, forc'd against his reason, had complied
 To break the treaty for the promis'd bride. 12020

Some help to sink new trenches; others aid
 To ram the stones, or raise the palisade.
 Hoarse trumpets sound th' alarm; around the walls
 Runs a distracted crew, whom their last labor calls.
 A sad procession in the streets is seen, 12025
 Of matrons, that attend the mother queen:
 High in her chair she sits, and, at her side,
 With downcast eyes, appears the fatal bride.
 They mount the cliff, where Pallas' temple stands;
 Pray'rs in their mouths, and presents in their hands, 12030
 With censers first they fume the sacred shrine,
 Then in this common supplication join:
 "O patroness of arms, unspotted maid,
 Propitious hear, and lend thy Latins aid!
 Break short the pirate's lance; pronounce his fate, 12045
 And lay the Phrygian low before the gate."

Now Turnus arms for fight. His back and breast
 Well-temper'd steel and scaly brass invest:
 The cuishes which his brawny thighs infold
 Are mingled metal damask'd o'er with gold. 12050
 His faithful fauchion sits upon his side;
 Nor casque, nor crest, his manly features hide:
 But, bare to view, amid surrounding friends,
 With godlike grace, he from the tow'r descends.
 Exulting in his strength, he seems to dare 12055
 His absent rival, and to promise war.
 Freed from his keepers, thus, with broken reins,
 The wanton courser prances o'er the plains,
 Or in the pride of youth o'erleaps the mounds,
 And snuffs the females in forbidden grounds. 12060
 Or seeks his wat'ring in the well-known flood,
 To quench his thirst, and cool his fiery blood:
 He swims luxuriant in the liquid plain,
 And o'er his shoulder flows his waving mane:
 He neighs, he snorts, he bears his head on high; 12065
 Before his ample chest the frothy waters fly.

Soon as the prince appears without the gate,
 The Volscians, with their virgin leader, wait
 His last commands. Then, with a graceful mien,
 Lights from her lofty steed the warrior queen: 12070
 Her squadron imitates, and each descends;
 Whose common suit Camilla thus commends:
 "If sense of honor, if a soul secure
 Of inborn worth, that can all tests endure,
 Can promise aught, or on itself rely 12075
 Greatly to dare, to conquer or to die;
 Then, I alone, sustain'd by these, will meet
 The Tyrrhene troops, and promise their defeat.
 Ours be the danger, ours the sole renown:
 You, gen'ral, stay behind, and guard the town." 12080

- Turnus a while stood mute, with glad surprise,
 And on the fierce virago fix'd his eyes;
 Then thus return'd: "O grace of Italy,
 With what becoming thanks can I reply?
 Not only words lie lab'ring in my breast, 12085
 But thought itself is by thy praise oppress'd.
 Yet rob me not of all; but let me join
 My toils, my hazard, and my fame, with thine.
 The Trojan, not in stratagem unskill'd,
 Sends his light horse before to scour the field: 12090
 Himself, thro' steep ascents and thorny brakes,
 A larger compass to the city takes.
 This news my scouts confirm, and I prepare
 To foil his cunning, and his force to dare;
 With chosen foot his passage to forelay, 12095
 And place an ambush in the winding way.
 Thou, with thy Volscians, face the Tuscan horse;
 The brave Messapus shall thy troops inforce
 With those of Tibur, and the Latian band,
 Subjected all to thy supreme command." 12100
 This said, he warns Messapus to the war,
 Then ev'ry chief exhorts with equal care.
 All thus encourag'd, his own troops he joins,
 And hastes to prosecute his deep designs.
- Inclos'd with hills, a winding valley lies, 12105
 By nature form'd for fraud, and fitted for surprise.
 A narrow track, by human steps untrode,
 Leads, thro' perplexing thorns, to this obscure abode.
 High o'er the vale a steepy mountain stands,
 Whence the surveying sight the nether ground commands. 12110
 The top is level, an offensive seat
 Of war; and from the war a safe retreat:
 For, on the right and left, is room to press
 The foes at hand, or from afar distress;
 To drive 'em headlong downward, and to pour 12115
 On their descending backs a stony show'r.
 Thither young Turnus took the well-known way,
 Possess'd the pass, and in blind ambush lay.
- Meantime Latonian Phoebe, from the skies,
 Beheld th' approaching war with hateful eyes, 12120
 And call'd the light-foot Opis to her aid,
 Her most belov'd and ever-trusty maid;
 Then with a sigh began: "Camilla goes
 To meet her death amidst her fatal foes:
 The nymphs I lov'd of all my mortal train, 12125
 Invested with Diana's arms, in vain.
 Nor is my kindness for the virgin new:
 'T was born with her; and with her years it grew.
 Her father Metabus, when forc'd away
 From old Privernum, for tyrannic sway, 12130
 Snatch'd up, and sav'd from his prevailing foes,
 This tender babe, companion of his woes.
 Casmilla was her mother; but he drown'd
 One hissing letter in a softer sound,
 And call'd Camilla. Thro' the woods he flies; 12135

Wrapp'd in his robe the royal infant lies.
 His foes in sight, he mends his weary pace;
 With shout and clamors they pursue the chase.
 The banks of Amasene at length he gains:

The raging flood his farther flight restrains, 12140
 Rais'd o'er the borders with unusual rains.
 Prepar'd to plunge into the stream, he fears,
 Not for himself, but for the charge he bears.
 Anxious, he stops a while, and thinks in haste;
 Then, desp'rate in distress, resolves at last. 12145
 A knotty lance of well-boil'd oak he bore;
 The middle part with cork he cover'd o'er:
 He clos'd the child within the hollow space;
 With twigs of bending osier bound the case;
 Then pois'd the spear, heavy with human weight, 12150
 And thus invok'd my favor for the freight:
 'Accept, great goddess of the woods,' he said,
 'Sent by her sire, this dedicated maid!
 Thro' air she flies a suppliant to thy shrine;
 And the first weapons that she knows, are thine.' 12155
 He said; and with full force the spear he threw:
 Above the sounding waves Camilla flew.
 Then, press'd by foes, he stemm'd the stormy tide,
 And gain'd, by stress of arms, the farther side.
 His fasten'd spear he pull'd from out the ground, 12160
 And, victor of his vows, his infant nymph unbound;
 Nor, after that, in towns which walls inclose,
 Would trust his hunted life amidst his foes;
 But, rough, in open air he chose to lie;
 Earth was his couch, his cov'ring was the sky. 12165
 On hills unshorn, or in a desert den,
 He shunn'd the dire society of men.
 A shepherd's solitary life he led;
 His daughter with the milk of mares he fed.
 The dugs of bears, and ev'ry salvage beast, 12170
 He drew, and thro' her lips the liquor press'd.
 The little Amazon could scarcely go:
 He loads her with a quiver and a bow;
 And, that she might her stagg'ring steps command,
 He with a slender jav'lin fills her hand. 12175
 Her flowing hair no golden fillet bound;
 Nor swept her trailing robe the dusty ground.
 Instead of these, a tiger's hide o'erspread
 Her back and shoulders, fasten'd to her head.
 The flying dart she first attempts to fling, 12180
 And round her tender temples toss'd the sling;
 Then, as her strength with years increas'd, began
 To pierce aloft in air the soaring swan,
 And from the clouds to fetch the heron and the crane.
 The Tuscan matrons with each other vied, 12185
 To bless their rival sons with such a bride;
 But she disdains their love, to share with me
 The sylvan shades and vow'd virginity.
 And, O! I wish, contented with my cares
 Of salvage spoils, she had not sought the wars! 12190
 Then had she been of my celestial train,

- And shunn'd the fate that dooms her to be slain.
 But since, opposing Heav'n's decree, she goes
 To find her death among forbidden foes, 12195
 Haste with these arms, and take thy steepy flight.
 Where, with the gods, averse, the Latins fight.
 This bow to thee, this quiver I bequeath,
 This chosen arrow, to revenge her death:
 By what'er hand Camilla shall be slain,
 Or of the Trojan or Italian train, 12200
 Let him not pass unpunish'd from the plain.
 Then, in a hollow cloud, myself will aid
 To bear the breathless body of my maid:
 Unspoild shall be her arms, and unprofan'd
 Her holy limbs with any human hand, 12205
 And in a marble tomb laid in her native land."
- She said. The faithful nymph descends from high
 With rapid flight, and cuts the sounding sky:
 Black clouds and stormy winds around her body fly.
- By this, the Trojan and the Tuscan horse, 12210
 Drawn up in squadrons, with united force,
 Approach the walls: the sprightly coursers bound,
 Press forward on their bits, and shift their ground.
 Shields, arms, and spears flash horribly from far;
 And the fields glitter with a waving war. 12215
 Oppos'd to these, come on with furious force
 Messapus, Coras, and the Latian horse;
 These in the body plac'd, on either hand
 Sustain'd and clos'd by fair Camilla's band.
 Advancing in a line, they couch their spears; 12220
 And less and less the middle space appears.
 Thick smoke obscures the field; and scarce are seen
 The neighing coursers, and the shouting men.
 In distance of their darts they stop their course;
 Then man to man they rush, and horse to horse. 12225
 The face of heav'n their flying jav'lines hide,
 And deaths unseen are dealt on either side.
 Tyrrhenus, and Aconteus, void of fear,
 By mettled coursers borne in full career,
 Meet first oppos'd; and, with a mighty shock, 12230
 Their horses' heads against each other knock.
 Far from his steed is fierce Aconteus cast,
 As with an engine's force, or lightning's blast:
 He rolls along in blood, and breathes his last.
 The Latin squadrons take a sudden fright, 12235
 And sling their shields behind, to save their backs in flight
 Spurring at speed to their own walls they drew;
 Close in the rear the Tuscan troops pursue,
 And urge their flight: Asylas leads the chase;
 Till, seiz'd, with shame, they wheel about and face, 12240
 Receive their foes, and raise a threat'ning cry.
 The Tuscans take their turn to fear and fly.
 So swelling surges, with a thund'ring roar,
 Driv'n on each other's backs, insult the shore,
 Bound o'er the rocks, incroach upon the land, 12245
 And far upon the beach eject the sand;

Then backward, with a swing, they take their way,
 Repuls'd from upper ground, and seek their mother sea;
 With equal hurry quit th' invaded shore,
 And swallow back the sand and stones they spew'd before. 12250

Twice were the Tuscans masters of the field,
 Twice by the Latins, in their turn, repell'd.
 Asham'd at length, to the third charge they ran;
 Both hosts resolv'd, and mingled man to man.
 Now dying groans are heard; the fields are strow'd 12255
 With falling bodies, and are drunk with blood.

Arms, horses, men, on heaps together lie:
 Confus'd the fight, and more confus'd the cry.
 Orsilochus, who durst not press too near
 Strong Remulus, at distance drove his spear, 12260
 And stuck the steel beneath his horse's ear.

The fiery steed, impatient of the wound,
 Curvets, and, springing upward with a bound,
 His helpless lord cast backward on the ground.
 Catillus pierc'd Iolas first; then drew 12265

His reeking lance, and at Herminius threw,
 The mighty champion of the Tuscan crew.
 His neck and throat unarm'd, his head was bare,
 But shaded with a length of yellow hair:
 Secure, he fought, expos'd on ev'ry part, 12270

A spacious mark for swords, and for the flying dart.
 Across the shoulders came the feather'd wound;
 Transfix'd he fell, and doubled to the ground.
 The sands with streaming blood are sanguine dyed,
 And death with honor sought on either side. 12275

Resistless thro' the war Camilla rode,
 In danger unappall'd, and pleas'd with blood.
 One side was bare for her exerted breast;
 One shoulder with her painted quiver press'd. 12280

Now from afar her fatal jav'lins play;
 Now with her ax's edge she hews her way:
 Diana's arms upon her shoulder sound;
 And when, too closely press'd, she quits the ground,
 From her bent bow she sends a backward wound. 12285

Her maids, in martial pomp, on either side,
 Larina, Tulla, fierce Tarpeia, ride:
 Italians all; in peace, their queen's delight;
 In war, the bold companions of the fight.
 So march'd the Tracian Amazons of old,
 When Thermodon with bloody billows roll'd: 12290

Such troops as these in shining arms were seen,
 When Theseus met in fight their maiden queen:
 Such to the field Penthisilea led,
 From the fierce virgin when the Grecians fled;
 With such, return'd triumphant from the war, 12295
 Her maids with cries attend the lofty car;
 They clash with manly force their moony shields;
 With female shouts resound the Phrygian fields.

Who foremost, and who last, heroic maid,
 On the cold earth were by thy courage laid? 12300

- Thy spear, of mountain ash, Eumenius first,
 With fury driv'n, from side to side transpierc'd:
 A purple stream came spouting from the wound;
 Bath'd in his blood he lies, and bites the ground.
 Liris and Pegasus at once she slew: 12305
 The former, as the slacken'd reins he drew
 Of his faint steed; the latter, as he stretch'd
 His arm to prop his friend, the jav'lin reach'd.
 By the same weapon, sent from the same hand,
 Both fall together, and both spurn the sand. 12310
 Amastrus next is added to the slain:
 The rest in rout she follows o'er the plain:
 Tereus, Harpalycus, Demophoon,
 And Chromis, at full speed her fury shun.
 Of all her deadly darts, not one she lost; 12315
 Each was attended with a Trojan ghost.
 Young Ornithus bestrode a hunter steed,
 Swift for the chase, and of Apulian breed.
 Him from afar she spied, in arms unknown:
 O'er his broad back an ox's hide was thrown; 12320
 His helm a wolf, whose gaping jaws were spread
 A cov'ring for his cheeks, and grinnd around his head,
 He clench'd within his hand an iron prong,
 And tower'd above the rest, conspicuous in the throng.
 Him soon she singled from the flying train, 12325
 And slew with ease; then thus insults the slain:
 "Vain hunter, didst thou think thro' woods to chase
 The savage herd, a vile and trembling race?
 Here cease thy vaunts, and own my victory:
 A woman warrior was too strong for thee. 12330
 Yet, if the ghosts demand the conqu'ror's name,
 Confessing great Camilla, save thy shame."
 Then Butes and Orsilochus she slew,
 The bulkiest bodies of the Trojan crew;
 But Butes breast to breast: the spear descends 12335
 Above the gorget, where his helmet ends,
 And o'er the shield which his left side defends.
 Orsilochus and she their courses ply:
 He seems to follow, and she seems to fly;
 But in a narrower ring she makes the race; 12340
 And then he flies, and she pursues the chase.
 Gath'ring at length on her deluded foe,
 She swings her ax, and rises to the blow
 Full on the helm behind, with such a sway
 The weapon falls, the riven steel gives way: 12345
 He groans, he roars, he sues in vain for grace;
 Brains, mingled with his blood, besmear his face.
- Astonish'd Aunus just arrives by chance,
 To see his fall; nor farther dares advance;
 But, fixing on the horrid maid his eye, 12350
 He stares, and shakes, and finds it vain to fly;
 Yet, like a true Ligurian, born to cheat,
 (At least while fortune favor'd his deceit.)
 Cries out aloud: "What courage have you shown,
 Who trust your courser's strength, and not your own?" 12355

Forego the vantage of your horse, alight,
 And then on equal terms begin the fight:
 It shall be seen, weak woman, what you can,
 When, foot to foot, you combat with a man,"

12360
 He said. She glows with anger and disdain,
 Dismounts with speed to dare him on the plain,
 And leaves her horse at large among her train;
 With her drawn sword defies him to the field,
 And, marching, lifts aloft her maiden shield.

12365
 The youth, who thought his cunning did succeed,
 Reins round his horse, and urges all his speed;
 Adds the remembrance of the spur, and hides
 The goring rowels in his bleeding sides.
 "Vain fool, and coward!" cries the lofty maid,
 "Caught in the train which thou thyself hast laid!"

12370
 On others practice thy Ligurian arts;
 Thin stratagems and tricks of little hearts
 Are lost on me: nor shalt thou safe retire,
 With vaunting lies, to thy fallacious sire."

12375
 At this, so fast her flying feet she sped,
 That soon she strain'd beyond his horse's head:
 Then turning short, at once she seiz'd the rein,
 And laid the boaster grov'ling on the plain.
 Not with more ease the falcon, from above,
 Trusses in middle air the trembling dove,

12380
 Then plumes the prey, in her strong pounces bound:
 The feathers, foul with blood, come tumbling to the ground.

Now mighty Jove, from his superior height,
 With his broad eye surveys th' unequal fight.

12385
 He fires the breast of Tarchon with disdain,
 And sends him to redeem th' abandon'd plain.
 Betwixt the broken ranks the Tuscan rides,
 And these encourages, and those he chides;
 Recalls each leader, by his name, from flight;
 Renews their ardor, and restores the fight.

12390
 "What panic fear has seiz'd your souls? O shame,
 O brand perpetual of th' Etrurian name!
 Cowards incurable, a woman's hand
 Drives, breaks, and scatters your ignoble band!

12395
 Now cast away the sword, and quit the shield!
 What use of weapons which you dare not wield?
 Not thus you fly your female foes by night,
 Nor shun the feast, when the full bowls invite;
 When to fat off' rings the glad augur calls,
 And the shrill hornpipe sounds to bacchanals.

12400
 These are your studied cares, your lewd delight:
 Swift to debauch, but slow to manly fight."
 Thus having said, he spurs amid the foes,
 Not managing the life he meant to lose.

12405
 The first he found he seiz'd with headlong haste,
 In his strong gripe, and clasp'd around the waist;
 'T was Venulus, whom from his horse he tore,
 And, laid athwart his own, in triumph bore.
 Loud shouts ensue; the Latins turn their eyes,
 And view th' unusual sight with vast surprise.

12410

- The fiery Tarchon, flying o'er the plains,
 Press'd in his arms the pond'rous prey sustains;
 Then, with his shorten'd spear, explores around
 His jointed arms, to fix a deadly wound.
 Nor less the captive struggles for his life: 12415
 He writhes his body to prolong the strife,
 And, fencing for his naked throat, exerts
 His utmost vigor, and the point averts.
 So stoops the yellow eagle from on high,
 And bears a speckled serpent thro' the sky, 12420
 Fast'ning his crooked talons on the prey:
 The pris'ner hisses thro' the liquid way;
 Resists the royal hawk; and, tho' oppress'd,
 She fights in volumes, and erects her crest:
 Turn'd to her foe, she stiffens ev'ry scale, 12425
 And shoots her forky tongue, and whisks her threat'ning tail.
 Against the victor, all defense is weak:
 Th' imperial bird still plies her with his beak;
 He tears her bowels, and her breast he gores;
 Then claps his pinions, and securely soars. 12430
 Thus, thro' the midst of circling enemies,
 Strong Tarchon snatch'd and bore away his prize.
 The Tyrrhene troops, that shrunk before, now press
 The Latins, and presume the like success.
- Then Aruns, doom'd to death, his arts assay'd, 12435
 To murder, unespied, the Volscian maid:
 This way and that his winding course he bends,
 And, whereso'er she turns, her steps attends.
 When she retires victorious from the chase,
 He wheels about with care, and shifts his place; 12440
 When, rushing on, she seeks her foes flight,
 He keeps aloof, but keeps her still in sight:
 He threats, and trembles, trying ev'ry way,
 Unseen to kill, and safely to betray.
 Chloreus, the priest of Cybele, from far, 12445
 Glitt'ring in Phrygian arms amidst the war,
 Was by the virgin view'd. The steed he press'd
 Was proud with trappings, and his brawny chest
 With scales of gilded brass was cover'd o'er;
 A robe of Tyrian dye the rider wore. 12450
 With deadly wounds he gall'd the distant foe;
 Gnosian his shafts, and Lycian was his bow:
 A golden helm his front and head surrounds
 A gilded quiver from his shoulder sounds.
 Gold, weav'd with linen, on his thighs he wore, 12455
 With flowers of needlework distinguish'd o'er,
 With golden buckles bound, and gather'd up before.
 Him the fierce maid beheld with ardent eyes,
 Fond and ambitious of so rich a prize,
 Or that the temple might his trophies hold, 12460
 Or else to shine herself in Trojan gold.
 Blind in her haste, she chases him alone.
 And seeks his life, regardless of her own.
- This lucky moment the sly traitor chose:
 Then, starting from his ambush, up he rose, 12465

And threw, but first to Heav'n address'd his vows:
 "O patron of Socrates' high abodes,
 Phoebus, the ruling pow'r among the gods,
 Whom first we serve, whole woods of unctuous pine
 Are fell'd for thee, and to thy glory shine; 12470
 By thee protected with our naked soles,
 Thro' flames unsing'd we march, and tread the kindled coals
 Give me, propitious pow'r, to wash away
 The stains of this dishonorable day:
 Nor spoils, nor triumph, from the fact I claim, 12475
 But with my future actions trust my fame.
 Let me, by stealth, this female plague o'ercome,
 And from the field return inglorious home."
 Apollo heard, and, granting half his pray'r,
 Shuffled in winds the rest, and toss'd in empty air. 12480
 He gives the death desir'd; his safe return
 By southern tempests to the seas is borne.

Now, when the jav'lin whizz'd along the skies,
 Both armies on Camilla turn'd their eyes,
 Directed by the sound. Of either host, 12485
 Th' unhappy virgin, tho' concern'd the most,
 Was only deaf; so greedy was she bent
 On golden spoils, and on her prey intent;
 Till in her pap the winged weapon stood
 Infix'd, and deeply drunk the purple blood. 12490
 Her sad attendants hasten to sustain
 Their dying lady, drooping on the plain.
 Far from their sight the trembling Aruns flies,
 With beating heart, and fear confus'd with joys;
 Nor dares he farther to pursue his blow, 12495
 Or ev'n to bear the sight of his expiring foe.
 As, when the wolf has torn a bullock's hide
 At unawares, or ranch'd a shepherd's side,
 Conscious of his audacious deed, he flies,
 And claps his quiv'ring tail between his thighs: 12500
 So, speeding once, the wretch no more attends,
 But, spurring forward, herds among his friends.

She wrench'd the jav'lin with her dying hands,
 But wedg'd within her breast the weapon stands; 12505
 The wood she draws, the steely point remains;
 She staggers in her seat with agonizing pains:
 (A gathering mist o'erclouds her cheerful eyes,
 And from her cheeks the rosy color flies.)
 Then turns to her, whom of her female train
 She trusted most, and thus she speaks with pain: 12510
 "Acca, 't is past! he swims before my sight,
 Inexorable Death; and claims his right.
 Bear my last words to Turnus; fly with speed,
 And bid him timely to my charge succeed,
 Repel the Trojans, and the town relieve: 12515
 Farewell! and in this kiss my parting breath receive."
 She said, and, sliding, sunk upon the plain:
 Dying, her open'd hand forsakes the rein;
 Short, and more short, she pants; by slow degrees
 Her mind the passage from her body frees. 12520

She drops her sword; she nods her plummy crest,
 Her drooping head declining on her breast:
 In the last sigh her struggling soul expires,
 And, murmur'ing with disdain, to Stygian sounds retires.

A shout, that struck the golden stars, ensued; 12525
 Despair and rage the languish'd fight renew'd.
 The Trojan troops and Tuscans, in a line,
 Advance to charge; the mix'd Arcadians join.

But Cynthia's maid, high seated, from afar 12530
 Surveys the field, and fortune of the war,
 Unmov'd a while, till, prostrate on the plain,
 Welt'ring in blood, she sees Camilla slain,
 And, round her corpse, of friends and foes a fighting train.

Then, from the bottom of her breast, she drew 12535
 A mournful sigh, and these sad words ensue:
 "Too dear a fine, ah much lamented maid,
 For warring with the Trojans, thou hast paid!
 Nor aught avail'd, in this unhappy strife,
 Diana's sacred arms, to save thy life.

Yet unreveng'd thy goddess will not leave 12540
 Her vot'ry's death, nor; with vain sorrow grieve.
 Branded the wretch, and be his name abhorr'd;
 But after ages shall thy praise record.

Th' inglorious coward soon shall press the plain:
 Thus vows thy queen, and thus the Fates ordain." 12545

High o'er the field there stood a hilly mound,
 Sacred the place, and spread with oaks around,
 Where, in a marble tomb, Dercennus lay,
 A king that once in Latium bore the sway. 12550
 The beauteous Opis thither bent her flight,
 To mark the traitor Aruns from the height.

Him in refulgent arms she soon espied,
 Swoln with success; and loudly thus she cried:
 "Thy backward steps, vain boaster, are too late;
 Turn like a man, at length, and meet thy fate. 12555
 Charg'd with my message, to Camilla go,
 And say I sent thee to the shades below,
 An honor undeserv'd from Cynthia's bow."

She said, and from her quiver chose with speed 12560
 The winged shaft, predestin'd for the deed;
 Then to the stubborn yew her strength applied,
 Till the far distant horns approach'd on either side.
 The bowstring touch'd her breast, so strong she drew;
 Whizzing in air the fatal arrow flew.

At once the twanging bow and sounding dart 12565
 The traitor heard, and felt the point within his heart.
 Him, beating with his heels in pangs of death,
 His flying friends to foreign fields bequeath.

The conqu'ring damsel, with expanded wings,
 The welcome message to her mistress brings. 12570

Their leader lost, the Volscians quit the field,
 And, unsustain'd, the chiefs of Turnus yield.

The frightened soldiers, when their captains fly,
 More on their speed than on their strength rely.
 Confus'd in flight, they bear each other down, 12575
 And spur their horses headlong to the town.
 Driv'n by their foes, and to their fears resign'd,
 Not once they turn, but take their wounds behind.
 These drop the shield, and those the lance forego,
 Or on their shoulders bear the slacken'd bow. 12580
 The hoofs of horses, with a rattling sound,
 Beat short and thick, and shake the rotten ground.
 Black clouds of dust come rolling in the sky,
 And o'er the darken'd walls and rampires fly.
 The trembling matrons, from their lofty stands, 12585
 Rend heav'n with female shrieks, and wring their hands.
 All pressing on, pursuers and pursued,
 Are crush'd in crowds, a mingled multitude.
 Some happy few escape: the throng too late
 Rush on for entrance, till they choke the gate. 12590
 Ev'n in the sight of home, the wretched sire
 Looks on, and sees his helpless son expire.
 Then, in a fright, the folding gates they close,
 But leave their friends excluded with their foes.
 The vanquish'd cry; the victors loudly shout; 12595
 'T is terror all within, and slaughter all without.
 Blind in their fear, they bounce against the wall,
 Or, to the moats pursued, precipitate their fall.

The Latian virgins, valiant with despair,
 Arm'd on the tow'rs, the common danger share: 12600
 So much of zeal their country's cause inspir'd;
 So much Camilla's great example fir'd.
 Poles, sharpen'd in the flames, from high they throw,
 With imitated darts, to gall the foe.
 Their lives for godlike freedom they bequeath, 12605
 And crowd each other to be first in death.
 Meantime to Turnus, ambush'd in the shade,
 With heavy tidings came th' unhappy maid:
 "The Volscians overthrown, Camilla kill'd;
 The foes, entirely masters of the field, 12610
 Like a resistless flood, come rolling on:
 The cry goes off the plain, and thickens to the town."

Inflam'd with rage, (for so the Furies fire
 The Daunian's breast, and so the Fates require,) 12615
 He leaves the hilly pass, the woods in vain
 Possess'd, and downward issues on the plain.
 Scarce was he gone, when to the straits, now freed
 From secret foes, the Trojan troops succeed.
 Thro' the black forest and the ferny brake, 12620
 Unknowingly secure, their way they take;
 From the rough mountains to the plain descend,
 And there, in order drawn, their line extend.
 Both armies now in open fields are seen;
 Nor far the distance of the space between.
 Both to the city bend. Aeneas sees, 12625
 Thro' smoking fields, his hast'ning enemies;
 And Turnus views the Trojans in array,

And hears th' approaching horses proudly neigh.
 Soon had their hosts in bloody battle join'd;
 But westward to the sea the sun declin'd. 12630
 Intrench'd before the town both armies lie,
 While Night with sable wings involves the sky.

Book XII

When Turnus saw the Latins leave the field,
 Their armies broken, and their courage quell'd,
 Himself become the mark of public spite, 12635
 His honor question'd for the promis'd fight;
 The more he was with vulgar hate oppress'd,
 The more his fury boil'd within his breast:
 He rous'd his vigor for the last debate,
 And rais'd his haughty soul to meet his fate. 12640

As, when the swains the Libyan lion chase,
 He makes a sour retreat, nor mends his pace;
 But, if the pointed jav'lin pierce his side,
 The lordly beast returns with double pride:
 He wrenches out the steel, he roars for pain; 12645
 His sides he lashes, and erects his mane:
 So Turnus fares; his eyeballs flash with fire,
 Thro' his wide nostrils clouds of smoke expire.

Trembling with rage, around the court he ran,
 At length approach'd the king, and thus began: 12650
 "No more excuses or delays: I stand
 In arms prepar'd to combat, hand to hand,
 This base deserter of his native land.
 The Trojan, by his word, is bound to take
 The same conditions which himself did make. 12655
 Renew the truce; the solemn rites prepare,
 And to my single virtue trust the war.
 The Latians unconcern'd shall see the fight;
 This arm unaided shall assert your right:
 Then, if my prostrate body press the plain, 12660
 To him the crown and beauteous bride remain."

To whom the king sedately thus replied:
 "Brave youth, the more your valor has been tried,
 The more becomes it us, with due respect,
 To weigh the chance of war, which you neglect. 12665
 You want not wealth, or a successive throne,
 Or cities which your arms have made your own:
 My towns and treasures are at your command,
 And stor'd with blooming beauties is my land;
 Laurentum more than one Lavinia sees, 12670
 Unmarried, fair, of noble families.
 Now let me speak, and you with patience hear,
 Things which perhaps may grate a lover's ear,
 But sound advice, proceeding from a heart
 Sincerely yours, and free from fraudulent art. 12675
 The gods, by signs, have manifestly shown,
 No prince Italian born should heir my throne:

Oft have our augurs, in prediction skill'd,
 And oft our priests, foreign son reveal'd. 12680
 Yet, won by worth that cannot be withstood,
 Brib'd by my kindness to my kindred blood,
 Urg'd by my wife, who would not be denied,
 I promis'd my Lavinia for your bride:
 Her from her plighted lord by force I took;
 All ties of treaties, and of honor, broke: 12685
 On your account I wag'd an impious war—
 With what success, 't is needless to declare;
 I and my subjects feel, and you have had your share.
 Twice vanquish'd while in bloody fields we strive,
 Scarce in our walls we keep our hopes alive: 12690
 The rolling flood runs warm with human gore;
 The bones of Latians blanch the neighb'ring shore.
 Why put I not an end to this debate,
 Still unresolv'd, and still a slave to fate?
 If Turnus' death a lasting peace can give, 12695
 Why should I not procure it whilst you live?
 Should I to doubtful arms your youth betray,
 What would my kinsmen the Rutulians say?
 And, should you fall in fight, (which Heav'n defend!)
 How curse the cause which hasten'd to his end 12700
 The daughter's lover and the father's friend?
 Weigh in your mind the various chance of war;
 Pity your parent's age, and ease his care."

Such balmy words he pour'd, but all in vain:
 The proffer'd med'cine but provok'd the pain. 12705
 The wrathful youth, disdain'g the relief,
 With intermitting sobs thus vents his grief:
 "The care, O best of fathers, which you take
 For my concerns, at my desire forsake.
 Permit me not to languish out my days, 12710
 But make the best exchange of life for praise.
 This arm, this lance, can well dispute the prize;
 And the blood follows, where the weapon flies.
 His goddess mother is not near, to shroud
 The flying coward with an empty cloud." 12715

But now the queen, who fear'd for Turnus' life,
 And loath'd the hard conditions of the strife,
 Held him by force; and, dying in his death,
 In these sad accents gave her sorrow breath:
 "O Turnus, I adjure thee by these tears, 12720
 And whate'er price Amata's honor bears
 Within thy breast, since thou art all my hope,
 My sickly mind's repose, my sinking age's prop;
 Since on the safety of thy life alone
 Depends Latinus, and the Latian throne: 12725
 Refuse me not this one, this only pray'r,
 To waive the combat, and pursue the war.
 Whatever chance attends this fatal strife,
 Think it includes, in thine, Amata's life.
 I cannot live a slave, or see my throne 12730
 Usurp'd by strangers or a Trojan son."

- At this, a flood of tears Lavinia shed;
 A crimson blush her beauteous face o'erspread,
 Varying her cheeks by turns with white and red.
 The driving colors, never at a stay, 12735
 Run here and there, and flush, and fade away.
 Delightful change! Thus Indian iv'ry shows,
 Which with the bord'ring paint of purple glows;
 Or lilies damask'd by the neighb'ring rose.
- The lover gaz'd, and, burning with desire, 12740
 The more he look'd, the more he fed the fire:
 Revenge, and jealous rage, and secret spite,
 Roll in his breast, and rouse him to the fight.
 Then fixing on the queen his ardent eyes,
 Firm to his first intent, he thus replies: 12745
 "O mother, do not by your tears prepare
 Such boding omens, and prejudge the war.
 Resolv'd on fight, I am no longer free
 To shun my death, if Heav'n my death decree."
 Then turning to the herald, thus pursues: 12750
 "Go, greet the Trojan with ungrateful news;
 Denounce from me, that, when to-morrow's light
 Shall gild the heav'ns, he need not urge the fight;
 The Trojan and Rutulian troops no more
 Shall dye, with mutual blood, the Latian shore: 12755
 Our single swords the quarrel shall decide,
 And to the victor be the beauteous bride."
- He said, and striding on, with speedy pace,
 He sought his coursers of the Thracian race.
 At his approach they toss their heads on high, 12760
 And, proudly neighing, promise victory.
 The sires of these Orythia sent from far,
 To grace Pilumnus, when he went to war.
 The drifts of Thracian snows were scarce so white,
 Nor northern winds in fleetness match'd their flight. 12765
 Officious grooms stand ready by his side;
 And some with combs their flowing manes divide,
 And others stroke their chests and gently soothe their pride.
- He sheath'd his limbs in arms; a temper'd mass
 Of golden metal those, and mountain brass. 12770
 Then to his head his glitt'ring helm he tied,
 And girt his faithful fauchion to his side.
 In his Aetnaean forge, the God of Fire
 That fauchion labor'd for the hero's sire;
 Immortal keenness on the blade bestow'd, 12775
 And plung'd it hissing in the Stygian flood.
 Propp'd on a pillar, which the ceiling bore,
 Was plac'd the lance Auruncan Actor wore;
 Which with such force he brandish'd in his hand,
 The tough ash trembled like an osier wand: 12780
 Then cried: "O pond'rous spoil of Actor slain,
 And never yet by Turnus toss'd in vain,
 Fail not this day thy wonted force; but go,
 Sent by this hand, to pierce the Trojan foe!
 Give me to tear his corslet from his breast, 12785

And from that eunuch head to rend the crest;
 Dragg'd in the dust, his frizzled hair to soil,
 Hot from the vexing ir'n, and smear'd with fragrant oil!"

Thus while he raves, from his wide nostrils flies
 A fiery steam, and sparkles from his eyes. 12790
 So fares the bull in his lov'd female's sight:
 Proudly he bellows, and preludes the fight;
 He tries his goring horns against a tree,
 And meditates his absent enemy;
 He pushes at the winds; he digs the strand 12795
 With his black hoofs, and spurns the yellow sand.

Nor less the Trojan, in his Lemnian arms,
 To future fight his manly courage warms:
 He whets his fury, and with joy prepares
 To terminate at once the ling'ring wars; 12800
 To cheer his chiefs and tender son, relates
 What Heav'n had promis'd, and expounds the fates.
 Then to the Latian king he sends, to cease
 The rage of arms, and ratify the peace.

The morn ensuing, from the mountain's height, 12805
 Had scarcely spread the skies with rosy light;
 Th' ethereal coursers, bounding from the sea,
 From out their flaming nostrils breath'd the day;
 When now the Trojan and Rutulian guard,
 In friendly labor join'd, the list prepar'd. 12810
 Beneath the walls they measure out the space;
 Then sacred altars rear, on sods of grass,
 Where, with religious their common gods they place.

In purest white the priests their heads attire;
 And living waters bear, and holy fire; 12815
 And, o'er their linen hoods and shaded hair,
 Long twisted wreaths of sacred veryain wear.

In order issuing from the town appears
 The Latin legion, arm'd with pointed spears;
 And from the fields, advancing on a line, 12820
 The Trojan and the Tuscan forces join:
 Their various arms afford a pleasing sight;
 A peaceful train they seem, in peace prepar'd for fight.

Betwixt the ranks the proud commanders ride,
 Glitt'ring with gold, and vests in purple dyed; 12825
 Here Mnestheus, author of the Memmian line,
 And there Messapus, born of seed divine.

The sign is giv'n; and, round the listed space,
 Each man in order fills his proper place.
 Reclining on their ample shields, they stand, 12830
 And fix their pointed lances in the sand.

Now, studious of the sight, a num'rous throng
 Of either sex promiscuous, old and young,
 Swarm the town: by those who rest behind,
 The gates and walls and houses' tops are lind. 12835
 Meantime the Queen of Heav'n beheld the sight,
 With eyes unpleas'd, from Mount Albano's height
 (Since call'd Albano by succeeding fame,

- But then an empty hill, without a name).
 She thence survey'd the field, the Trojan pow'rs, 12840
 The Latian squadrons, and Laurentine tow'rs.
 Then thus the goddess of the skies bespoke,
 With sighs and tears, the goddess of the lake,
 King Turnus' sister, once a lovely maid,
 Ere to the lust of lawless Jove betray'd: 12845
 Compress'd by force, but, by the grateful god,
 Now made the Nais of the neighb'ring flood.
 "O nymph, the pride of living lakes," said she,
 "O most renown'd, and most belov'd by me,
 Long hast thou known, nor need I to record, 12850
 The wanton sallies of my wand'ring lord.
 Of ev'ry Latian fair whom Jove misled
 To mount by stealth my violated bed,
 To thee alone I grudg'd not his embrace,
 But gave a part of heav'n, and an unenvied place. 12855
 Now learn from me thy near approaching grief,
 Nor think my wishes want to thy relief.
 While fortune favor'd, nor Heav'n's King denied
 To lend my succor to the Latian side,
 I sav'd thy brother, and the sinking state: 12860
 But now he struggles with unequal fate,
 And goes, with gods averse, o'ermatch'd in might,
 To meet inevitable death in fight;
 Nor must I break the truce, nor can sustain the sight.
 Thou, if thou dar'st thy present aid supply; 12865
 It well becomes a sister's care to try."
- At this the lovely nymph, with grief oppress'd,
 Thrice tore her hair, and beat her comely breast.
 To whom Saturnia thus: "Thy tears are late:
 Haste, snatch him, if he can be snatch'd from fate: 12870
 New tumults kindle; violate the truce:
 Who knows what changeful fortune may produce?
 'T is not a crime t' attempt what I decree;
 Or, if it were, discharge the crime on me."
 She said, and, sailing on the winged wind, 12875
 Left the sad nymph suspended in her mind.
- And now pomp the peaceful kings appear:
 Four steeds the chariot of Latinus bear;
 Twelve golden beams around his temples play,
 To mark his lineage from the God of Day. 12880
 Two snowy coursers Turnus' chariot yoke,
 And in his hand two massy spears he shook:
 Then issued from the camp, in arms divine,
 Aeneas, author of the Roman line;
 And by his side Ascanius took his place, 12885
 The second hope of Rome's immortal race.
 Adorn'd in white, a rev'rend priest appears,
 And off'rings to the flaming altars bears;
 A porket, and a lamb that never suffer'd shears.
 Then to the rising sun he turns his eyes, 12890
 And strews the beasts, design'd for sacrifice,
 With salt and meal: with like officious care
 He marks their foreheads, and he clips their hair.

Betwixt their horns the purple wine he sheds;
With the same gen'rous juice the flame he feeds. 12895

Aeneas then unsheath'd his shining sword,
And thus with pious pray'rs the gods ador'd:
"All-seeing sun, and thou, Ausonian soil,
For which I have sustain'd so long a toil,
Thou, King of Heav'n, and thou, the Queen of Air, 12900
Propitious now, and reconcil'd by pray'r;
Thou, God of War, whose unresisted sway
The labors and events of arms obey;
Ye living fountains, and ye running floods,
All pow'rs of ocean, all ethereal gods, 12905
Hear, and bear record: if I fall in field,
Or, recreant in the fight, to Turnus yield,
My Trojans shall encrease Evander's town;
Ascanius shall renounce th' Ausonian crown:
All claims, all questions of debate, shall cease; 12910
Nor he, nor they, with force infringe the peace.
But, if my juster arms prevail in fight,
(As sure they shall, if I divine aright,)
My Trojans shall not o'er th' Italians reign:
Both equal, both unconquer'd shall remain, 12915
Join'd in their laws, their lands, and their abodes;
I ask but altars for my weary gods.
The care of those religious rites be mine;
The crown to King Latinus I resign:
His be the sov'reign sway. Nor will I share 12920
His pow'r in peace, or his command in war.
For me, my friends another town shall frame,
And bless the rising tow'rs with fair Lavinia's name."

Thus he. Then, with erected eyes and hands,
The Latian king before his altar stands. 12925
"By the same heav'n," said he, "and earth, and main,
And all the pow'rs that all the three contain;
By hell below, and by that upper god
Whose thunder signs the peace, who seals it with his nod;
So let Latona's double offspring hear, 12930
And double-fronted Janus, what I swear:
I touch the sacred altars, touch the flames,
And all those pow'rs attest, and all their names;
Whatever chance befall on either side,
No term of time this union shall divide: 12935
No force, no fortune, shall my vows unbind,
Or shake the steadfast tenor of my mind;
Not tho' the circling seas should break their bound,
O'erflow the shores, or sap the solid ground;
Not tho' the lamps of heav'n their spheres forsake, 12940
Hurl'd down, and hissing in the nether lake:
Ev'n as this royal scepter" (for he bore
A scepter in his hand) "shall never more
Shoot out in branches, or renew the birth:
An orphan now, cut from the mother earth 12945
By the keen ax, dishonor'd of its hair,
And cas'd in brass, for Latian kings to bear."

- When thus in public view the peace was tied
 With solemn vows, and sworn on either side,
 All dues perform'd which holy rites require; 12950
 The victim beasts are slain before the fire,
 The trembling entrails from their bodies torn,
 And to the fatten'd flames in chargers borne.
- Already the Rutulians deem their man
 O'ermatch'd in arms, before the fight began. 12955
 First rising fears are whisper'd thro' the crowd;
 Then, gathering sound, they murmur more aloud.
 Now, side to side, they measure with their eyes
 The champions' bulk, their sinews, and their size:
 The nearer they approach, the more is known 12960
 Th' apparent disadvantage of their own.
 Turnus himself appears in public sight
 Conscious of fate, desponding of the fight.
 Slowly he moves, and at his altar stands
 With eyes dejected, and with trembling hands; 12965
 And, while he mutters undistinguish'd pray'rs,
 A livid deadness in his cheeks appears.
- With anxious pleasure when Juturna view'd
 Th' increasing fright of the mad multitude,
 When their short sighs and thick'ning sobs she heard, 12970
 And found their ready minds for change prepar'd;
 Dissembling her immortal form, she took Camertus' mien, his habit, and his look;
 A chief of ancient blood; in arms well known
 Was his great sire, and he his greater son. 12975
 His shape assum'd, amid the ranks she ran,
 And humoring their first motions, thus began:
 "For shame, Rutulians, can you bear the sight
 Of one expos'd for all, in single fight?
 Can we, before the face of heav'n, confess 12980
 Our courage colder, or our numbers less?
 View all the Trojan host, th' Arcadian band,
 And Tuscan army; count 'em as they stand:
 Undaunted to the battle if we go,
 Scarce ev'ry second man will share a foe. 12985
 Turnus, 't is true, in this unequal strife,
 Shall lose, with honor, his devoted life,
 Or change it rather for immortal fame,
 Succeeding to the gods, from whence he came:
 But you, a servile and inglorious band, 12990
 For foreign lords shall sow your native land,
 Those fruitful fields your fighting fathers gain'd,
 Which have so long their lazy sons sustain'd."
 With words like these, she carried her design:
 A rising murmur runs along the line. 12995
 Then ev'n the city troops, and Latians, tir'd
 With tedious war, seem with new souls inspir'd:
 Their champion's fate with pity they lament,
 And of the league, so lately sworn, repent.
- Nor fails the goddess to foment the rage 13000
 With lying wonders, and a false presage;

But adds a sign, which, present to their eyes,
 Inspires new courage, and a glad surprise.
 For, sudden, in the fiery tracts above,
 Appears in pomp th' imperial bird of Jove: 13005
 A plump of fowl he spies, that swim the lakes,
 And o'er their heads his sounding pinions shakes;
 Then, stooping on the fairest of the train,
 In his strong talons truss'd a silver swan. 13010
 Th' Italians wonder at th' unusual sight;
 But, while he lags, and labors in his flight,
 Behold, the dastard fowl return anew,
 And with united force the foe pursue:
 Clam'rous around the royal hawk they fly,
 And, thick'ning in a cloud, o'ershade the sky. 13015
 They cuff, they scratch, they cross his airy course;
 Nor can th' incumber'd bird sustain their force;
 But vex'd, not vanquish'd, drops the pond'rous prey,
 And, lightend of his burthen, wings his way.

Th' Ausonian bands with shouts salute the sight, 13020
 Eager of action, and demand the fight.
 Then King Tolumnius, vers'd in augurs' arts,
 Cries out, and thus his boasted skill imparts:
 "At length 't is granted, what I long desir'd!
 This, this is what my frequent vows requir'd. 13025
 Ye gods, I take your omen, and obey.
 Advance, my friends, and charge! I lead the way.
 These are the foreign foes, whose impious band,
 Like that rapacious bird, infest our land:
 But soon, like him, they shall be forc'd to sea 13030
 By strength united, and forego the prey.
 Your timely succor to your country bring,
 Haste to the rescue, and redeem your king."

He said; and, pressing onward thro' the crew,
 Pois'd in his lifted arm, his lance he threw. 13035
 The winged weapon, whistling in the wind,
 Came driving on, nor miss'd the mark design'd.
 At once the cornel rattled in the skies;
 At once tumultuous shouts and clamors rise.
 Nine brothers in a goodly band there stood, 13040
 Born of Arcadian mix'd with Tuscan blood,
 Gylippus' sons: the fatal jav'lin flew,
 Aim'd at the midmost of the friendly crew.
 A passage thro' the jointed arms it found,
 Just where the belt was to the body bound, 13045
 And struck the gentle youth extended on the ground.
 Then, fir'd with pious rage, the gen'rous train
 Run madly forward to revenge the slain.
 And some with eager haste their jav'lins throw;
 And some with sword in hand assault the foe. 13050

The wish'd insult the Latine troops embrace,
 And meet their ardor in the middle space.
 The Trojans, Tuscans, and Arcadian line,
 With equal courage obviate their design.
 Peace leaves the violated fields, and hate 13055

- Both armies urges to their mutual fate.
 With impious haste their altars are o'erturn'd,
 The sacrifice half-broil'd, and half-unburn'd.
 Thick storms of steel from either army fly,
 And clouds of clashing darts obscure the sky; 13060
 Brands from the fire are missive weapons made,
 With chargers, bows, and all the priestly trade.
 Latinus, frighted, hastens from the fray,
 And bears his unregarded gods away.
 These on their horses vault; those yoke the car; 13065
 The rest, with swords on high, run headlong to the war.
- Messapus, eager to confound the peace,
 Spurr'd his hot courser thro' the fighting prease,
 At King Aulestes, by his purple known
 A Tuscan prince, and by his regal crown; 13070
 And, with a shock encount'ring, bore him down.
 Backward he fell; and, as his fate design'd,
 The ruins of an altar were behind:
 There, pitching on his shoulders and his head,
 Amid the scatt'ring fires he lay supinely spread. 13075
 The beamy spear, descending from above,
 His cuirass pierc'd, and thro' his body drove.
 Then, with a scornful smile, the victor cries:
 "The gods have found a fitter sacrifice."
 Greedy of spoils, th' Italians strip the dead 13080
 Of his rich armor, and uncrown his head.
- Priest Corynaeus, arm'd his better hand,
 From his own altar, with a blazing brand;
 And, as Ebusus with a thund'ring pace
 Advanc'd to battle, dash'd it on his face: 13085
 His bristly beard shines out with sudden fires;
 The crackling crop a noisome scent expires.
 Following the blow, he seiz'd his curling crown
 With his left hand; his other cast him down.
 The prostrate body with his knees he press'd, 13090
 And plung'd his holy poniard in his breast.
- While Podalirius, with his sword, pursued
 The shepherd Alsus thro' the flying crowd,
 Swiftly he turns, and aims a deadly blow
 Full on the front of his unwary foe. 13095
 The broad ax enters with a crashing sound,
 And cleaves the chin with one continued wound;
 Warm blood, and mingled brains, besmear his arms around
 An iron sleep his stupid eyes oppress'd,
 And seal'd their heavy lids in endless rest. 13100
- But good Aeneas rush'd amid the bands;
 Bare was his head, and naked were his hands,
 In sign of truce: then thus he cries aloud:
 "What sudden rage, what new desire of blood,
 Inflames your alter'd minds? O Trojans, cease 13105
 From impious arms, nor violate the peace!
 By human sanctions, and by laws divine,

The terms are all agreed; the war is mine.
Dismiss your fears, and let the fight ensue;
This hand alone shall right the gods and you: 13110
Our injur'd altars, and their broken vow,
To this avenging sword the faithless Turnus owe."

Thus while he spoke, unmindful of defense,
A winged arrow struck the pious prince.
But, whether from some human hand it came, 13115
Or hostile god, is left unknown by fame:
No human hand or hostile god was found,
To boast the triumph of so base a wound.

When Turnus saw the Trojan quit the plain,
His chiefs dismay'd, his troops a fainting train, 13120
Th' unhop'd event his heighten'd soul inspires:

At once his arms and coursers he requires;
Then, with a leap, his lofty chariot gains,
And with a ready hand assumes the reins.
He drives impetuous, and, where'er he goes, 13125
He leaves behind a lane of slaughter'd foes.

These his lance reaches; over those he rolls
His rapid car, and crushes out their souls:
In vain the vanquish'd fly; the victor sends 13130
The dead men's weapons at their living friends.

Thus, on the banks of Hebrus' freezing flood,
The God of Battles, in his angry mood,
Clashing his sword against his brazen shield,
Let loose the reins, and scours along the field:
Before the wind his fiery coursers fly; 13135

Groans the sad earth, resounds the rattling sky.
Wrath, Terror, Treason, Tumult, and Despair
(Dire faces, and deform'd) surround the car;
Friends of the god, and followers of the war.

With fury not unlike, nor less disdain, 13140
Exulting Turnus flies along the plain:
His smoking horses, at their utmost speed,
He lashes on, and urges o'er the dead.

Their fetlocks run with blood; and, when they bound,
The gore and gath'ring dust are dash'd around. 13145
Thamyris and Pholus, masters of the war,
He kill'd at hand, but Sthenelus afar:

From far the sons of Imbracus he slew,
Glaucus and Lades, of the Lycian crew;
Both taught to fight on foot, in battle join'd, 13150
Or mount the courser that outstrips the wind.

Meantime Eumedes, vaunting in the field,
New fir'd the Trojans, and their foes repell'd.
This son of Dolon bore his grandsire's name,
But emulated more his father's fame; 13155

His guileful father, sent a nightly spy,
The Grecian camp and order to descry:
Hard enterprise! and well he might require
Achilles' car and horses, for his hire:
But, met upon the scout, th' Aetolian prince 13160

- In death bestow'd a juster recompense.
 Fierce Turnus view'd the Trojan from afar,
 And launch'd his jav'lin from his lofty car;
 Then lightly leaping down, pursued the blow,
 And, pressing with his foot his prostrate foe, 13165
 Wrench'd from his feeble hold the shining sword,
 And plung'd it in the bosom of its lord.
 "Possess," said he, "the fruit of all thy pains,
 And measure, at thy length, our Latian plains.
 Thus are my foes rewarded by my hand; 13170
 Thus may they build their town, and thus enjoy the land!"
- Then Dares, Butes, Sybaris he slew,
 Whom o'er his neck his flound'ring courser threw.
 As when loud Boreas, with his blust'ring train,
 Stoops from above, incumbent on the main; 13175
 Where'er he flies, he drives the rack before,
 And rolls the billows on th' Aegaeon shore:
 So, where resistless Turnus takes his course,
 The scatter'd squadrons bend before his force;
 His crest of horses' hair is blown behind 13180
 By adverse air, and rustles in the wind.
- This haughty Phegeus saw with high disdain,
 And, as the chariot roll'd along the plain,
 Light from the ground he leapt, and seiz'd the rein.
 Thus hung in air, he still retain'd his hold, 13185
 The coursers frighted, and their course controll'd.
 The lance of Turnus reach'd him as he hung,
 And pierc'd his plated arms, but pass'd along,
 And only raz'd the skin. He turn'd, and held
 Against his threat'ning foe his ample shield; 13190
 Then call'd for aid: but, while he cried in vain,
 The chariot bore him backward on the plain.
 He lies revers'd; the victor king descends,
 And strikes so justly where his helmet ends,
 He lops the head. The Latian fields are drunk 13195
 With streams that issue from the bleeding trunk.
- While he triumphs, and while the Trojans yield,
 The wounded prince is forc'd to leave the field:
 Strong Mnestheus, and Achates often tried,
 And young Ascanius, weeping by his side, 13200
 Conduct him to his tent. Scarce can he rear
 His limbs from earth, supported on his spear.
 Resolv'd in mind, regardless of the smart,
 He tugs with both his hands, and breaks the dart.
 The steel remains. No readier way he found 13205
 To draw the weapon, than t' enlarge the wound.
 Eager of fight, impatient of delay,
 He begs; and his unwilling friends obey.
- Iapis was at hand to prove his art,
 Whose blooming youth so fir'd Apollo's heart, 13210
 That, for his love, he proffer'd to bestow
 His tuneful harp and his unerring bow.
 The pious youth, more studious how to save

His aged sire, now sinking to the grave,
 Preferr'd the pow'r of plants, and silent praise 13215
 Of healing arts, before Phoebean bays.

Propp'd on his lance the pensive hero stood,
 And heard and saw, unmov'd, the mourning crowd.
 The fam'd physician tucks his robes around
 With ready hands, and hastens to the wound. 13220

With gentle touches he performs his part,
 This way and that, soliciting the dart,
 And exercises all his heav'nly art.
 All soft'ning simples, known of sov'reign use,
 He presses out, and pours their noble juice. 13225
 These first infus'd, to lenify the pain,
 He tugs with pincers, but he tugs in vain.
 Then to the patron of his art he pray'd:
 The patron of his art refus'd his aid.

Meantime the war approaches to the tents; 13230
 Th' alarm grows hotter, and the noise augments:
 The driving dust proclaims the danger near;
 And first their friends, and then their foes appear:
 Their friends retreat; their foes pursue the rear.
 The camp is fill'd with terror and affright: 13235
 The hissing shafts within the trench alight;
 An undistinguish'd noise ascends the sky,
 The shouts of those who kill, and groans of those who die.

But now the goddess mother, mov'd with grief,
 And pierc'd with pity, hastens her relief. 13240

A branch of healing dittany she brought,
 Which in the Cretan fields with care she sought:
 Rough is the stern, which woolly leaves surround;
 The leaves with flow'rs, the flow'rs with purple crown'd,
 Well known to wounded goats; a sure relief 13245
 To draw the pointed steel, and ease the grief.

This Venus brings, in clouds involv'd, and brews
 Th' extracted liquor with ambrosian dews,
 And odorous panacee. Unseen she stands,
 Temp'ring the mixture with her heav'nly hands, 13250
 And pours it in a bowl, already crown'd

With juice of med'c'nal herbs prepar'd to bathe the wound.
 The leech, unknowing of superior art
 Which aids the cure, with this foment the part;
 And in a moment ceas'd the raging smart. 13255

Stanch'd is the blood, and in the bottom stands:
 The steel, but scarcely touch'd with tender hands,
 Moves up, and follows of its own accord,
 And health and vigor are at once restor'd.

Iapis first perceiv'd the closing wound, 13260
 And first the footsteps of a god he found.

"Arms! arms!" he cries; "the sword and shield prepare,
 And send the willing chief, renew'd, to war.
 This is no mortal work, no cure of mine,
 Nor art's effect, but done by hands divine. 13265

Some god our general to the battle sends;
 Some god preserves his life for greater ends."

- The hero arms in haste; his hands infold
 His thighs with cuishes of refulgent gold:
 Inflam'd to fight, and rushing to the field, 13270
 That hand sustaining the celestial shield,
 This gripes the lance, and with such vigor shakes,
 That to the rest the beamy weapon quakes.
 Then with a close embrace he strain'd his son,
 And, kissing thro' his helmet, thus begun: 13275
 "My son, from my example learn the war,
 In camps to suffer, and in fields to dare;
 But happier chance than mine attend thy care!
 This day my hand thy tender age shall shield,
 And crown with honors of the conquer'd field: 13280
 Thou, when thy riper years shall send thee forth
 To toils of war, be mindful of my worth;
 Assert thy birthright, and in arms be known,
 For Hector's nephew, and Aeneas' son."
 He said; and, striding, issued on the plain. 13285
 Anteus and Mnestheus, and a num'rous train,
 Attend his steps; the rest their weapons take,
 And, crowding to the field, the camp forsake.
 A cloud of blinding dust is rais'd around,
 Labors beneath their feet the trembling ground. 13290
- Now Turnus, posted on a hill, from far
 Beheld the progress of the moving war:
 With him the Latins view'd the cover'd plains,
 And the chill blood ran backward in their veins.
 Juturna saw th' advancing troops appear, 13295
 And heard the hostile sound, and fled for fear.
 Aeneas leads; and draws a sweeping train,
 Clos'd in their ranks, and pouring on the plain.
 As when a whirlwind, rushing to the shore
 From the mid ocean, drives the waves before; 13300
 The painful hind with heavy heart foresees
 The flatted fields, and slaughter of the trees;
 With like impetuous rage the prince appears
 Before his doubled front, nor less destruction bears.
 And now both armies shock in open field; 13305
 Osiris is by strong Thymbraeus kill'd.
 Archetius, Ufens, Epulon, are slain
 (All fam'd in arms, and of the Latian train)
 By Gyas', Mnestheus', and Achates' hand.
 The fatal augur falls, by whose command 13310
 The truce was broken, and whose lance, embrued
 With Trojan blood, th' unhappy fight renew'd.
 Loud shouts and clamors rend the liquid sky,
 And o'er the field the frighted Latins fly.
 The prince disdains the dastards to pursue, 13315
 Nor moves to meet in arms the fighting few;
 Turnus alone, amid the dusky plain,
 He seeks, and to the combat calls in vain.
 Juturna heard, and, seiz'd with mortal fear,
 Forc'd from the beam her brother's charioteer; 13320
 Assumes his shape, his armor, and his mien,
 And, like Metiscus, in his seat is seen.

As the black swallow near the palace plies;
 O'er empty courts, and under arches, flies; 13325
 Now hawks aloft, now skims along the flood,
 To furnish her loquacious nest with food:
 So drives the rapid goddess o'er the plains;
 The smoking horses run with loosen'd reins.
 She steers a various course among the foes;
 Now here, now there, her conqu'ring brother shows; 13330
 Now with a straight, now with a wheeling flight,
 She turns, and bends, but shuns the single fight.
 Aeneas, fir'd with fury, breaks the crowd,
 And seeks his foe, and calls by name aloud:
 He runs within a narrower ring, and tries 13335
 To stop the chariot; but the chariot flies.
 If he but gain a glimpse, Juturna fears,
 And far away the Daunian hero bears.

What should he do! Nor arts nor arms avail;
 And various cares in vain his mind assail. 13340
 The great Messapus, thund'ring thro' the field,
 In his left hand two pointed jav'lines held:
 Encount'ring on the prince, one dart he drew,
 And with unerring aim and utmost vigor threw.
 Aeneas saw it come, and, stooping low 13345
 Beneath his buckler, shunn'd the threat'ning blow.
 The weapon hiss'd above his head, and tore
 The waving plume which on his helm he wore.
 Forced by this hostile act, and fir'd with spite,
 That flying Turnus still declin'd the fight, 13350
 The Prince, whose piety had long repell'd
 His inborn ardor, now invades the field;
 Invokes the pow'rs of violated peace,
 Their rites and injur'd altars to redress;
 Then, to his rage abandoning the rein, 13355
 With blood and slaughter'd bodies fills the plain.

What god can tell, what numbers can display,
 The various labors of that fatal day;
 What chiefs and champions fell on either side, 13360
 In combat slain, or by what deaths they died;
 Whom Turnus, whom the Trojan hero kill'd;
 Who shar'd the fame and fortune of the field!
 Jove, could'st thou view, and not avert thy sight,
 Two jarring nations join'd in cruel fight,
 Whom leagues of lasting love so shortly shall unite! 13365

Aeneas first Rutulian Sucro found,
 Whose valor made the Trojans quit their ground;
 Betwixt his ribs the jav'lin drove so just,
 It reach'd his heart, nor needs a second thrust. 13370
 Now Turnus, at two blows, two brethren slew;
 First from his horse fierce Amycus he threw:
 Then, leaping on the ground, on foot assail'd
 Dioreas, and in equal fight prevail'd.
 Their lifeless trunks he leaves upon the place;
 Their heads, distilling gore, his chariot grace. 13375

- Three cold on earth the Trojan hero threw,
Whom without respite at one charge he slew:
Cethegus, Tanais, Tagus, fell oppress'd,
And sad Onythes, added to the rest,
Of Theban blood, whom Peridia bore. 13380
- Turnus two brothers from the Lycian shore,
And from Apollo's fane to battle sent,
O'erthrew; nor Phoebus could their fate prevent.
Peaceful Menoetes after these he kill'd,
Who long had shunn'd the dangers of the field: 13385
On Lerna's lake a silent life he led,
And with his nets and angle earn'd his bread;
Nor pompous cares, nor palaces, he knew,
But wisely from th' infectious world withdrew:
Poor was his house; his father's painful hand 13390
Discharg'd his rent, and plow'd another's land.
- As flames among the lofty woods are thrown
On diff'rent sides, and both by winds are blown;
The laurels crackle in the sputt'ring fire;
The frightened sylvans from their shades retire: 13395
Or as two neighb'ring torrents fall from high;
Rapid they run; the foamy waters fry;
They roll to sea with unresisted force,
And down the rocks precipitate their course:
Not with less rage the rival heroes take 13400
Their diff'rent ways, nor less destruction make.
With spears afar, with swords at hand, they strike;
And zeal of slaughter fires their souls alike.
Like them, their dauntless men maintain the field;
And hearts are pierc'd, unknowing how to yield: 13405
They blow for blow return, and wound for wound;
And heaps of bodies raise the level ground.
- Murranus, boasting of his blood, that springs
From a long royal race of Latian kings,
Is by the Trojan from his chariot thrown, 13410
Crush'd with the weight of an unwieldy stone:
Betwixt the wheels he fell; the wheels, that bore
His living load, his dying body tore.
His starting steeds, to shun the glitt'ring sword,
Paw down his trampled limbs, forgetful of their lord. 13415
- Fierce Hyllus threaten'd high, and, face to face,
Affronted Turnus in the middle space:
The prince encounter'd him in full career,
And at his temples aim'd the deadly spear;
So fatally the flying weapon sped, 13420
That thro' his helm it pierc'd his head.
Nor, Cisseus, couldst thou scape from Turnus' hand,
In vain the strongest of th' Arcadian band:
Nor to Cupentus could his gods afford
Availing aid against th' Aenean sword, 13425
Which to his naked heart pursued the course;
Nor could his plated shield sustain the force.

Iolas fell, whom not the Grecian pow'rs,
 Nor great subverter of the Trojan tow'rs,
 Were doom'd to kill, while Heav'n prolong'd his date; 13430
 But who can pass the bounds, prefix'd by fate?
 In high Lyrnessus, and in Troy, he held
 Two palaces, and was from each expell'd:
 Of all the mighty man, the last remains
 A little spot of foreign earth contains. 13435

And now both hosts their broken troops unite
 In equal ranks, and mix in mortal fight.
 Seresthus and undaunted Mnestheus join
 The Trojan, Tuscan, and Arcadian line: 13440
 Sea-born Messapus, with Atinas, heads
 The Latin squadrons, and to battle leads.
 They strike, they push, they throng the scanty space,
 Resolv'd on death, impatient of disgrace;
 And, where one falls, another fills his place.

The Cyprian goddess now inspires her son 13445
 To leave th' unfinish'd fight, and storm the town:
 For, while he rolls his eyes around the plain
 In quest of Turnus, whom he seeks in vain,
 He views th' unguarded city from afar,
 In careless quiet, and secure of war. 13450
 Occasion offers, and excites his mind
 To dare beyond the task he first design'd.
 Resolv'd, he calls his chiefs; they leave the fight:
 Attended thus, he takes a neighb'ring height;
 The crowding troops about their gen'ral stand, 13455
 All under arms, and wait his high command.
 Then thus the lofty prince: "Hear and obey,
 Ye Trojan bands, without the least delay
 Jove is with us; and what I have decreed
 Requires our utmost vigor, and our speed. 13460
 Your instant arms against the town prepare,
 The source of mischief, and the seat of war.
 This day the Latian tow'rs, that mate the sky,
 Shall level with the plain in ashes lie:
 The people shall be slaves, unless in time 13465
 They kneel for pardon, and repent their crime.
 Twice have our foes been vanquish'd on the plain:
 Then shall I wait till Turnus will be slain?
 Your force against the perjurd city bend.
 There it began, and there the war shall end. 13470
 The peace profand our rightful arms requires;
 Cleanse the polluted place with purging fires."

He finish'd; and, one soul inspiring all,
 Form'd in a wedge, the foot approach the wall. 13475
 Without the town, an unprovided train
 Of gaping, gazing citizens are slain.
 Some firebrands, others scaling ladders bear,
 And those they toss aloft, and these they rear:
 The flames now launch'd, the feather'd arrows fly,
 And clouds of missive arms obscure the sky. 13480
 Advancing to the front, the hero stands,

And, stretching out to heav'n his pious hands,
 Attests the gods, asserts his innocence,
 Upbraids with breach of faith th' Ausonian prince;
 Declares the royal honor doubly stain'd, 13485
 And twice the rites of holy peace profand.

Dissenting clamors in the town arise;
 Each will be heard, and all at once advise.
 One part for peace, and one for war contends;
 Some would exclude their foes, and some admit their friends. 13490

The helpless king is hurried in the throng,
 And, whate'er tide prevails, is borne along.
 Thus, when the swain, within a hollow rock,
 Invades the bees with suffocating smoke,
 They run around, or labor on their wings, 13495
 Disus'd to flight, and shoot their sleepy stings;
 To shun the bitter fumes in vain they try;
 Black vapors, issuing from the vent, involve the sky.

But fate and envious fortune now prepare
 To plunge the Latins in the last despair. 13500

The queen, who saw the foes invade the town,
 And brands on tops of burning houses thrown,
 Cast round her eyes, distracted with her fear—
 No troops of Turnus in the field appear.

Once more she stares abroad, but still in vain, 13505
 And then concludes the royal youth is slain.

Mad with her anguish, impotent to bear
 The mighty grief, she loathes the vital air.
 She calls herself the cause of all this ill,
 And owns the dire effects of her ungovern'd will; 13510

She raves against the gods; she beats her breast;
 She tears with both her hands her purple vest:
 Then round a beam a running noose she tied,
 And, fasten'd by the neck, obscenely died.

Soon as the fatal news by Fame was blown, 13515
 And to her dames and to her daughter known,

The sad Lavinia rends her yellow hair
 And rosy cheeks; the rest her sorrow share:
 With shrieks the palace rings, and madness of despair. 13520

The spreading rumor fills the public place:
 Confusion, fear, distraction, and disgrace,
 And silent shame, are seen in ev'ry face.

Latinus tears his garments as he goes,
 Both for his public and his private woes;
 With filth his venerable beard besmears, 13525
 And sordid dust deforms his silver hairs.

And much he blames the softness of his mind,
 Obnoxious to the charms of womankind,
 And soon seduc'd to change what he so well design'd;
 To break the solemn league so long desir'd, 13530
 Nor finish what his fates, and those of Troy, requir'd.

Now Turnus rolls aloof o'er empty plains,
 And here and there some straggling foes he gleans.

His flying coursers please him less and less,
 Asham'd of easy fight and cheap success. 13535
 Thus half-contented, anxious in his mind,
 The distant cries come driving in the wind,
 Shouts from the walls, but shouts in murmurs drown'd;
 A jarring mixture, and a boding sound.
 "Alas!" said he, "what mean these dismal cries?
 What doleful clamors from the town arise?" 13540
 Confus'd, he stops, and backward pulls the reins.
 She who the driver's office now sustains,
 Replies: "Neglect, my lord, these new alarms;
 Here fight, and urge the fortune of your arms: 13545
 There want not others to defend the wall.
 If by your rival's hand th' Italians fall,
 So shall your fatal sword his friends oppress,
 In honor equal, equal in success."

To this, the prince: "O sister—for I knew 13550
 The peace infring'd proceeded first from you;
 I knew you, when you mingled first in fight;
 And now in vain you would deceive my sight—
 Why, goddess, this unprofitable care?
 Who sent you down from heav'n, involv'd in air, 13555
 Your share of mortal sorrows to sustain,
 And see your brother bleeding on the plain?
 For to what pow'r can Turnus have recourse,
 Or how resist his fate's prevailing force?
 These eyes beheld Murranus bite the ground: 13560
 Mighty the man, and mighty was the wound.
 I heard my dearest friend, with dying breath,
 My name invoking to revenge his death.
 Brave Ufens fell with honor on the place,
 To shun the shameful sight of my disgrace. 13565
 On earth supine, a manly corpse he lies;
 His vest and armor are the victor's prize.
 Then, shall I see Laurentum in a flame,
 Which only wanted, to complete my shame?
 How will the Latins hoot their champion's flight! 13570
 How Drances will insult and point them to the sight!
 Is death so hard to bear? Ye gods below,
 (Since those above so small compassion show,)
 Receive a soul unsullied yet with shame,
 Which not belies my great forefather's name!" 13575

He said; and while he spoke, with flying speed
 Came Sages urging on his foamy steed:
 Fix'd on his wounded face a shaft he bore,
 And, seeking Turnus, sent his voice before: 13580
 "Turnus, on you, on you alone, depends
 Our last relief: compassionate your friends!
 Like lightning, fierce Aeneas, rolling on,
 With arms invests, with flames invades the town:
 The brands are toss'd on high; the winds conspire
 To drive along the deluge of the fire. 13585
 All eyes are fix'd on you: your foes rejoice;
 Ev'n the king staggers, and suspends his choice;

- Doubts to deliver or defend the town,
Whom to reject, or whom to call his son.
The queen, on whom your utmost hopes were plac'd, 13590
Herself suborning death, has breath'd her last.
'T is true, Messapus, fearless of his fate,
With fierce Atinas' aid, defends the gate:
On ev'ry side surrounded by the foe,
The more they kill, the greater numbers grow; 13595
An iron harvest mounts, and still remains to mow.
You, far aloof from your forsaken bands,
Your rolling chariot drive o'er empty sands.
- Stupid he sate, his eyes on earth declin'd,
And various cares revolving in his mind: 13600
Rage, boiling from the bottom of his breast,
And sorrow mix'd with shame, his soul oppress'd;
And conscious worth lay lab'ring in his thought,
And love by jealousy to madness wrought.
By slow degrees his reason drove away 13605
The mists of passion, and resum'd her sway.
Then, rising on his car, he turn'd his look,
And saw the town involv'd in fire and smoke.
A wooden tow'r with flames already blaz'd,
Which his own hands on beams and rafters rais'd; 13610
And bridges laid above to join the space,
And wheels below to roll from place to place.
"Sister, the Fates have vanquish'd: let us go
The way which Heav'n and my hard fortune show.
The fight is fix'd; nor shall the branded name 13615
Of a base coward blot your brother's fame.
Death is my choice; but suffer me to try
My force, and vent my rage before I die."
He said; and, leaping down without delay,
Thro' crowds of scatter'd foes he freed his way. 13620
Striding he pass'd, impetuous as the wind,
And left the grieving goddess far behind.
As when a fragment, from a mountain torn
By raging tempests, or by torrents borne,
Or sapp'd by time, or loosen'd from the roots— 13625
Prone thro' the void the rocky ruin shoots,
Rolling from crag to crag, from steep to steep;
Down sink, at once, the shepherds and their sheep:
Involv'd alike, they rush to nether ground;
Stunn'd with the shock they fall, and stunn'd from earth rebound: 13630
So Turnus, hasting headlong to the town,
Should'ring and shoving, bore the squadrons down.
Still pressing onward, to the walls he drew,
Where shafts, and spears, and darts promiscuous flew,
And sanguine streams the slipp'ry ground embrue. 13635
First stretching out his arm, in sign of peace,
He cries aloud, to make the combat cease:
"Rutulians, hold; and Latin troops, retire!
The fight is mine; and me the gods require.
'T is just that I should vindicate alone 13640
The broken truce, or for the breach atone.
This day shall free from wars th' Ausonian state,

Or finish my misfortunes in my fate.”

Both armies from their bloody work desist,
 And, bearing backward, form a spacious list. 13645
 The Trojan hero, who receiv'd from fame
 The welcome sound, and heard the champion's name,
 Soon leaves the taken works and mounted walls,
 Greedy of war where greater glory calls.
 He springs to fight, exulting in his force 13650
 His jointed armor rattles in the course.
 Like Eryx, or like Athos, great he shows,
 Or Father Apennine, when, white with snows,
 His head divine obscure in clouds he hides,
 And shakes the sounding forest on his sides. 13655
 The nations, overaw'd, surcease the fight;
 Immovable their bodies, fix'd their sight.
 Ev'n death stands still; nor from above they throw
 Their darts, nor drive their batt'ring-rams below.
 In silent order either army stands, 13660
 And drop their swords, unknowing, from their hands.
 Th' Ausonian king beholds, with wond'ring sight,
 Two mighty champions match'd in single fight,
 Born under climes remote, and brought by fate,
 With swords to try their titles to the state. 13665

Now, in clos'd field, each other from afar
 They view; and, rushing on, begin the war.
 They launch their spears; then hand to hand they meet;
 The trembling soil resounds beneath their feet:
 Their bucklers clash; thick blows descend from high, 13670
 And flakes of fire from their hard helmets fly.
 Courage conspires with chance, and both engage
 With equal fortune yet, and mutual rage.
 As when two bulls for their fair female fight
 In Sila's shades, or on Taburnus' height; 13675
 With horns adverse they meet; the keeper flies;
 Mute stands the herd; the heifers roll their eyes,
 And wait th' event; which victor they shall bear,
 And who shall be the lord, to rule the lusty year:
 With rage of love the jealous rivals burn, 13680
 And push for push, and wound for wound return;
 Their dewlaps gor'd, their sides are lav'd in blood;
 Loud cries and roaring sounds rebellow thro' the wood:
 Such was the combat in the listed ground;
 So clash their swords, and so their shields resound. 13685

Jove sets the beam; in either scale he lays
 The champions' fate, and each exactly weighs.
 On this side, life and lucky chance ascends;
 Loaded with death, that other scale descends.
 Rais'd on the stretch, young Turnus aims a blow 13690
 Full on the helm of his unguarded foe:
 Shrill shouts and clamors ring on either side,
 As hopes and fears their panting hearts divide.
 But all in pieces flies the traitor sword,
 And, in the middle stroke, deserts his lord. 13695

- Now is but death, or flight; disarm'd he flies,
 When in his hand an unknown hilt he spies.
 Fame says that Turnus, when his steeds he join'd,
 Hurrying to war, disorder'd in his mind,
 Snatch'd the first weapon which his haste could find. 13700
 'T was not the fated sword his father bore,
 But that his charioteer Metiscus wore.
 This, while the Trojans fled, the toughness held;
 But, vain against the great Vulcanian shield,
 The mortal-temper'd steel deceiv'd his hand: 13705
 The shiver'd fragments shone amid the sand.
- Surpris'd with fear, he fled along the field,
 And now forthright, and now in orbits wheel'd;
 For here the Trojan troops the list surround,
 And there the pass is clos'd with pools and marshy ground. 13710
 Aeneas hastens, tho' with heavier pace—
 His wound, so newly knit, retards the chase,
 And oft his trembling knees their aid refuse—
 Yet, pressing foot by foot, his foe pursues.
- Thus, when a fearful stag is clos'd around 13715
 With crimson toils, or in a river found,
 High on the bank the deep-mouth'd hound appears,
 Still opening, following still, where'er he steers;
 The persecuted creature, to and fro,
 Turns here and there, to scape his Umbrian foe: 13720
 Steep is th' ascent, and, if he gains the land,
 The purple death is pitch'd along the strand.
 His eager foe, determin'd to the chase,
 Stretch'd at his length, gains ground at ev'ry pace;
 Now to his beamy head he makes his way, 13725
 And now he holds, or thinks he holds, his prey:
 Just at the pinch, the stag springs out with fear;
 He bites the wind, and fills his sounding jaws with air:
 The rocks, the lakes, the meadows ring with cries;
 The mortal tumult mounts, and thunders in the skies. 13730
 Thus flies the Daunian prince, and, flying, blames
 His tardy troops, and, calling by their names,
 Demands his trusty sword. The Trojan threats
 The realm with ruin, and their ancient seats
 To lay in ashes, if they dare supply 13735
 With arms or aid his vanquish'd enemy:
 Thus menacing, he still pursues the course,
 With vigor, tho' diminish'd of his force.
 Ten times already round the listed place
 One chief had fled, and t' other giv'n the chase: 13740
 No trivial prize is play'd; for on the life
 Or death of Turnus now depends the strife.
- Within the space, an olive tree had stood,
 A sacred shade, a venerable wood,
 For vows to Faunus paid, the Latins' guardian god. 13745
 Here hung the vests, and tablets were ingrav'd,
 Of sinking mariners from shipwrack sav'd.
 With heedless hands the Trojans fell'd the tree,

To make the ground inclos'd for combat free.
 Deep in the root, whether by fate, or chance, 13750
 Or erring haste, the Trojan drove his lance;
 Then stoop'd, and tugg'd with force immense, to free
 Th' incumber'd spear from the tenacious tree;
 That, whom his fainting limbs pursued in vain,
 His flying weapon might from far attain. 13755

Confus'd with fear, bereft of human aid,
 Then Turnus to the gods, and first to Faunus pray'd:
 "O Faunus, pity! and thou Mother Earth,
 Where I thy foster son receiv'd my birth,
 Hold fast the steel! If my religious hand 13760
 Your plant has honor'd, which your foes profan'd,
 Propitious hear my pious pray'r!" He said,
 Nor with successful vows invok'd their aid.
 Th' incumbent hero wrench'd, and pull'd, and strain'd;
 But still the stubborn earth the steel detain'd. 13765
 Juturna took her time; and, while in vain
 He strove, assum'd Meticus' form again,
 And, in that imitated shape, restor'd
 To the despairing prince his Daunian sword.
 The Queen of Love, who, with disdain and grief, 13770
 Saw the bold nymph afford this prompt relief,
 T' assert her offspring with a greater deed,
 From the tough root the ling'ring weapon freed.

Once more erect, the rival chiefs advance:
 One trusts the sword, and one the pointed lance; 13775
 And both resolv'd alike to try their fatal chance.

Meantime imperial Jove to Juno spoke,
 Who from a shining cloud beheld the shock:
 "What new arrest, O Queen of Heav'n, is sent 13780
 To stop the Fates now lab'ring in th' event?
 What farther hopes are left thee to pursue?
 Divine Aeneas, (and thou know'st it too,)
 Foredoom'd, to these celestial seats are due.
 What more attempts for Turnus can be made,
 That thus thou ling'rest in this lonely shade? 13785
 Is it becoming of the due respect
 And awful honor of a god elect,
 A wound unworthy of our state to feel,
 Patient of human hands and earthly steel?
 Or seems it just, the sister should restore 13790
 A second sword, when one was lost before,
 And arm a conquer'd wretch against his conqueror?
 For what, without thy knowledge and avow,
 Nay more, thy dictate, durst Juturna do?
 At last, in deference to my love, forbear 13795
 To lodge within thy soul this anxious care;
 Reclin'd upon my breast, thy grief unload:
 Who should relieve the goddess, but the god?
 Now all things to their utmost issue tend,
 Push'd by the Fates to their appointed 13800
 While leave was giv'n thee, and a lawful hour

- For vengeance, wrath, and unresisted pow'r,
Toss'd on the seas, thou couldst thy foes distress,
And, driv'n ashore, with hostile arms oppress;
Deform the royal house; and, from the side 13805
Of the just bridegroom, tear the plighted bride:
Now cease at my command." The Thund'rer said;
And, with dejected eyes, this answer Juno made:
"Because your dread decree too well I knew,
From Turnus and from earth unwilling I withdrew. 13810
Else should you not behold me here, alone,
Involv'd in empty clouds, my friends bemoan,
But, girt with vengeful flames, in open sight
Engag'd against my foes in mortal fight.
'T is true, Juturna mingled in the strife 13815
By my command, to save her brother's life—
At least to try; but, by the Stygian lake,
(The most religious oath the gods can take,)
With this restriction, not to bend the bow,
Or toss the spear, or trembling dart to throw. 13820
And now, resign'd to your superior might,
And tir'd with fruitless toils, I loathe the fight.
This let me beg (and this no fates withstand)
Both for myself and for your father's land,
That, when the nuptial bed shall bind the peace, 13825
(Which I, since you ordain, consent to bless,)
The laws of either nation be the same;
But let the Latins still retain their name,
Speak the same language which they spoke before,
Wear the same habits which their grandsires wore. 13830
Call them not Trojans: perish the renown
And name of Troy, with that detested town.
Latium be Latium still; let Alba reign
And Rome's immortal majesty remain."
- Then thus the founder of mankind replies 13835
(Unruffled was his front, serene his eyes)
"Can Saturn's issue, and heav'n's other heir,
Such endless anger in her bosom bear?
Be mistress, and your full desires obtain;
But quench the choler you foment in vain. 13840
From ancient blood th' Ausonian people sprung,
Shall keep their name, their habit, and their tongue.
The Trojans to their customs shall be tied:
I will, myself, their common rites provide;
The natives shall command, the foreigners subside. 13845
All shall be Latium; Troy without a name;
And her lost sons forget from whence they came.
From blood so mix'd, a pious race shall flow,
Equal to gods, excelling all below.
No nation more respect to you shall pay, 13850
Or greater off'rings on your altars lay."
Juno consents, well pleas'd that her desires
Had found success, and from the cloud retires.
- The peace thus made, the Thund'rer next prepares
To force the wat'ry goddess from the wars. 13855

Deep in the dismal regions void of light,
 Three daughters at a birth were born to Night:
 These their brown mother, brooding on her care,
 Indued with windy wings to flit in air, 13860
 With serpents girt alike, and crown'd with hissing hair.
 In heav'n the Dirae call'd, and still at hand,
 Before the throne of angry Jove they stand,
 His ministers of wrath, and ready still
 The minds of mortal men with fears to fill, 13865
 Whene'er the moody sire, to wreak his hate
 On realms or towns deserving of their fate,
 Hurls down diseases, death and deadly care,
 And terrifies the guilty world with war.
 One sister plague if these from heav'n he sent,
 To fright Juturna with a dire portent. 13870
 The pest comes whirling down: by far more slow
 Springs the swift arrow from the Parthian bow,
 Or Cydon yew, when, traversing the skies,
 And drench'd in pois'nous juice, the sure destruction flies. 13875
 With such a sudden and unseen a flight
 Shot thro' the clouds the daughter of the night.
 Soon as the field inclos'd she had in view,
 And from afar her destin'd quarry knew,
 Contracted, to the boding bird she turns, 13880
 Which haunts the ruin'd piles and hallow'd urns,
 And beats about the tombs with nightly wings,
 Where songs obscene on sepulchers she sings.
 Thus lessend in her form, with frightful cries
 The Fury round unhappy Turnus flies, 13885
 Flaps on his shield, and flutters o'er his eyes.

A lazy chillness crept along his blood;
 Chok'd was his voice; his hair with horror stood.
 Juturna from afar beheld her fly,
 And knew th' ill omen, by her screaming cry 13890
 And stridor of her wings. Amaz'd with fear,
 Her beauteous breast she beat, and rent her flowing hair.

"Ah me!" she cries, "in this unequal strife
 What can thy sister more to save thy life?
 Weak as I am, can I, alas! contend 13895
 In arms with that inexorable fiend?
 Now, now, I quit the field! forbear to fright
 My tender soul, ye baleful birds of night;
 The lashing of your wings I know too well,
 The sounding flight, and fun'ral screams of hell! 13900
 These are the gifts you bring from haughty Jove,
 The worthy recompense of ravish'd love!
 Did he for this exempt my life from fate?
 O hard conditions of immortal state,
 Tho' born to death, not privileg'd to die, 13905
 But forc'd to bear impos'd eternity!
 Take back your envious bribes, and let me go
 Companion to my brother's ghost below!
 The joys are vanish'd: nothing now remains,
 Of life immortal, but immortal pains.

- What earth will open her devouring womb,
To rest a weary goddess in the tomb!"
She drew a length of sighs; nor more she said,
But in her azure mantle wrapp'd her head,
Then plung'd into her stream, with deep despair,
And her last sobs came bubbling up in air. 13910
- Now stern Aeneas his weighty spear
Against his foe, and thus upbraids his fear:
"What farther subterfuge can Turnus find?
What empty hopes are harbor'd in his mind?
'T is not thy swiftness can secure thy flight; 13920
Not with their feet, but hands, the valiant fight.
Vary thy shape in thousand forms, and dare
What skill and courage can attempt in war;
Wish for the wings of winds, to mount the sky;
Or hid, within the hollow earth to lie!" 13925
- The champion shook his head, and made this short reply:
"No threats of thine my manly mind can move;
'T is hostile heav'n I dread, and partial Jove."
He said no more, but, with a sigh, repress'd
The mighty sorrow in his swelling breast. 13930
- Then, as he roll'd his troubled eyes around,
An antique stone he saw, the common bound
Of neighb'ring fields, and barrier of the ground;
So vast, that twelve strong men of modern days
Th' enormous weight from earth could hardly raise. 13935
He heav'd it at a lift, and, pois'd on high,
Ran stagg'ring on against his enemy,
But so disorder'd, that he scarcely knew
His way, or what unwieldly weight he threw.
His knocking knees are bent beneath the load, 13940
And shiv'ring cold congeals his vital blood.
The stone drops from his arms, and, falling short
For want of vigor, mocks his vain effort.
And as, when heavy sleep has clos'd the sight,
The sickly fancy labors in the night; 13945
We seem to run; and, destitute of force,
Our sinking limbs forsake us in the course:
In vain we heave for breath; in vain we cry;
The nerves, unbrac'd, their usual strength deny;
And on the tongue the falt'ring accents die: 13950
So Turnus far'd; whatever means he tried,
All force of arms and points of art employ'd,
The Fury flew athwart, and made th' endeavor void.
- A thousand various thoughts his soul confound;
He star'd about, nor aid nor issue found; 13955
His own men stop the pass, and his own walls surround.
Once more he pauses, and looks out again,
And seeks the goddess charioteer in vain.
Trembling he views the thund'ring chief advance,
And brandishing aloft the deadly lance: 13960
Amaz'd he cow'rs beneath his conqu'ring foe,
Forgets to ward, and waits the coming blow.

Astonish'd while he stands, and fix'd with fear,
Aim'd at his shield he sees th' impending spear.

The hero measur'd first, with narrow view, 13965
The destin'd mark; and, rising as he threw,
With its full swing the fatal weapon flew.

Not with less rage the rattling thunder falls,
Or stones from batt'ring-engines break the walls: 13970
Swift as a whirlwind, from an arm so strong,

The lance drove on, and bore the death along.
Naught could his sev'nfold shield the prince avail,
Nor aught, beneath his arms, the coat of mail:

It pierc'd thro' all, and with a grisly wound 13975
Transfix'd his thigh, and doubled him to ground.
With groans the Latins rend the vaulted sky:
Woods, hills, and valleys, to the voice reply.

Now low on earth the lofty chief is laid,
With eyes cast upward, and with arms display'd, 13980
And, recreant, thus to the proud victor pray'd:

"I know my death deserv'd, nor hope to live:
Use what the gods and thy good fortune give.
Yet think, O think, if mercy may be shown—

Thou hadst a father once, and hast a son— 13985
Pity my sire, now sinking to the grave;
And for Anchises' sake old Daunus save!

Or, if thy vow'd revenge pursue my death,
Give to my friends my body void of breath!
The Latian chiefs have seen me beg my life;

Thine is the conquest, thine the royal wife: 13990
Against a yielded man, 't is mean ignoble strife."

In deep suspense the Trojan seem'd to stand,
And, just prepar'd to strike, repress'd his hand.
He roll'd his eyes, and ev'ry moment felt 13995
His manly soul with more compassion melt;

When, casting down a casual glance, he spied
The golden belt that glitter'd on his side,
The fatal spoils which haughty Turnus tore
From dying Pallas, and in triumph wore.

Then, rous'd anew to wrath, he loudly cries 14000
(Flames, while he spoke, came flashing from his eyes)
"Traitor, dost thou, dost thou to grace pretend,

Clad, as thou art, in trophies of my friend?
To his sad soul a grateful off'ring go!
'T is Pallas, Pallas gives this deadly blow." 14005

He rais'd his arm aloft, and, at the word,
Deep in his bosom drove the shining sword.
The streaming blood distain'd his arms around,
And the disdainful soul came rushing thro' the wound.

METAMORPHOSES

Ovid (43 B.C.E.-17 C.E.)

Published 8 C.E.

Rome

Ovid's Metamorphoses, a collection of many Greek and Roman myths, is written by a master poet of the ancient world. From the creation of the world to the apotheosis of Julius Caesar, Ovid traces the course of mythological history, putting together a narrative based on previous written and oral sources. In the Aeneid of Virgil, Ovid's older contemporary epic poet, the gods were portrayed as guiding history toward an end goal (the creation of Rome) with foresight and planning. In the Metamorphoses, Ovid demonstrates how the traditional stories reveal that there is very little planning in the actions of the gods, who often are motivated by lust or pride. His irreverent view of the world, combined with his previous (sometimes risqué) love poetry, probably led to his exile by Emperor Augustus in the same year that his Metamorphoses was published. In the Middle Ages, Ovid's Metamorphoses was widely translated, although often with "moralized" notes alongside the text that imposed allegorical interpretations on the stories. For most subsequent authors, the Metamorphoses became the source book on Greek and Roman mythology.

Book 1

Invocatio.

Invocation

My soul is wrought to sing of forms transformed to bodies new and strange! Immortal Gods inspire my heart, for ye have changed yourselves and all things you have changed! Oh lead my song in smooth and measured strains, from olden days when earth began to this completed time!

The Creation

Mundi origo.

Before the ocean and the earth appeared— before the skies had overspread them all— the face of Nature in a vast expanse was naught but Chaos uniformly waste. It was a rude and undeveloped mass, that nothing made except a ponderous weight; and all discordant elements confused, were there congested in a shapeless heap.

As yet the sun afforded earth no light, nor did the moon renew her crescent horns; the earth was not suspended in the air exactly balanced by her heavy weight. Not far along the margin of the shores had Amphitrite stretched her lengthened arms,— for all the land was mixed with sea and air. The land was soft, the sea unfit to sail, the atmosphere opaque, to naught was given a proper form, in everything was strife, and all was mingled in a seething mass— with hot the cold parts strove, and wet with dry and soft with hard, and weight with empty void.

But God, or kindly Nature, ended strife— he cut the land from skies, the sea from land, the heavens ethereal from material air; and when were all evolved from that dark mass he bound the fractious parts in tranquil peace. The fiery element of convex heaven leaped from the mass devoid of dragging weight, and chose the summit arch to which the air as next in quality was next in place. The earth more dense attracted grosser parts and moved by gravity sank underneath; and last of all the wide surrounding waves in deeper channels rolled around the globe.

And when this God—which one is yet unknown— had carved asunder that discordant mass, had thus reduced it to its elements, that every part should equally combine, when time began He rounded out the earth and moulded it to form a mighty globe. Then poured He forth the deeps and gave command that they should billow in the rapid winds, that they should compass every shore of earth. he also added fountains, pools and lakes, and bound with shelving banks the slanting streams, which partly are absorbed and partly join the boundless ocean. Thus received amid the wide expanse of uncontrolled waves, they beat the shores instead of crooked banks.

At His command the boundless plains extend, the valleys are depressed, the woods are clothed in green, the stony mountains rise. And as the heavens are intersected on the right by two broad zones, by two that cut the left, and by a fifth consumed with ardent heat, with such a number did the careful God mark off the compassed weight, and thus the earth received as many climes.—Such heat consumes the middle zone that none may dwell therein; and two extremes are covered with deep snow; and two are placed betwixt the hot and cold, which mixed together give a temperate clime; and over all the atmosphere suspends with weight proportioned to the fiery sky, exactly as the weight of earth compares with weight of water.

And He ordered mist to gather in the air and spread the clouds. He fixed the thunders that disturb our souls, and brought the lightning on destructive winds that also waft the cold. Nor did the great Artificer permit these mighty winds to blow unbounded in the pathless skies, but each discordant brother fixed in space, although His power can scarce restrain their rage to rend the universe. At His command to far Aurora, Eurus took his way, to Nabath, Persia, and that mountain range first gilded by the dawn; and Zephyr's flight was towards the evening star and peaceful shores, warm with the setting sun; and Boreas invaded Scythia and the northern snows; and Auster wafted to the distant south where clouds and rain encompass his abode.— and over these He fixed the liquid sky, devoid of weight and free from earthly dross.

And scarcely had He separated these and fixed their certain bounds, when all the stars, which long were pressed and hidden in the mass, began to gleam out from the plains of heaven, and traversed, with the Gods, bright ether fields: and lest some part might be bereft of life the gleaming waves were filled with twinkling fish; the earth was covered with wild animals; the agitated air was filled with birds.

But one more perfect and more sanctified, a being capable of lofty thought, intelligent to rule, was wanting still man was created! Did the Unknown God designing then a better world make man of seed divine? or did Prometheus take the new soil of earth (that still contained some godly element of Heaven's Life) and use it to create the race of man; first mingling it with water of new streams; so that his new creation, upright man, was made in image of commanding Gods? On earth the brute creation bends its gaze, but man was given a lofty countenance and was commanded to behold the skies; and with an upright face may view the stars:— and so it was that shapeless clay put on the form of man till then unknown to earth.

Quattuor aetates. Gigantes.

The Four Ages

First was the Golden Age. Then rectitude spontaneous in the heart prevailed, and faith. Avengers were not seen, for laws unframed were all unknown and needless. Punishment and fear of penalties existed not. No harsh decrees were fixed on brazen plates. No suppliant multitude the countenance of Justice feared, averting, for they dwelt without a judge in peace. Descended not the steeps, shorn from its height, the lofty pine, cleaving the trackless waves of alien shores, nor distant realms were known to wandering men. The towns were not entrenched for time of war; they had no brazen trumpets, straight, nor horns of curving brass, nor helmets, shields nor swords. There was no thought of martial pomp —secure a happy multitude enjoyed repose.

Then of her own accord the earth produced a store of every fruit. The harrow touched her not, nor did the plowshare wound her fields. And man content with given food, and none compelling, gathered arbut fruits and wild strawberries on the mountain sides, and ripe blackberries clinging to the bush, and corners and sweet acorns on the ground, down fallen from the spreading tree of Jove. Eternal Spring! Soft breathing zephyrs soothed and warmly cherished buds and blooms, produced without a seed. The valleys though unplowed gave many fruits; the fields though not renewed white glistened with the heavy bearded wheat: rivers flowed milk and nectar, and the trees, the very oak trees, then gave honey of themselves.

When Saturn had been banished into night and all the world was ruled by Jove supreme, the Silver Age, though not so good as gold but still surpassing yellow brass, prevailed.

Jove first reduced to years the Primal Spring, by him divided into periods four, unequal,—summer, autumn, winter, spring.— then glowed with tawny heat the parched air, or pendent icicles in winter froze and man stopped crouching in crude caverns, while he built his homes of tree rods, bark entwined. Then were the cereals planted in long rows, and bullocks groaned beneath the heavy yoke.

The third Age followed, called The Age of Bronze, when cruel people were inclined to arms but not to impious crimes. And last of all the ruthless and hard Age of Iron prevailed, from which malignant vein great evil sprung; and modesty and faith and truth took flight, and in their stead deceits and snares and frauds and violence and wicked love of gain, succeeded.—Then the sailor spread his sails to winds unknown, and keels that long had stood on lofty mountains pierced uncharted waves. Surveyors anxious marked with metes and bounds the lands, created free as light and air: nor need the rich ground furnish only crops, and give due nourishment by right required,— they penetrated to the bowels of earth and dug up wealth, bad cause of all our ills,— rich ores which long ago the earth had hid and deep removed to gloomy Stygian caves: and soon destructive iron and harmful gold were brought to light; and War, which uses both, came forth and shook with sanguinary grip his clashing arms. Rapacity broke forth—the guest was not protected from his host, the father in law from his own son in law; even brothers seldom could abide in peace. The husband threatened to destroy his wife, and she her husband: horrid step dames mixed the deadly henbane: eager sons inquired their fathers, ages. Piety was slain: and last of all the virgin deity, Astraea vanished from the blood-stained earth.

Giants

And lest ethereal heights should long remain less troubled than the earth, the throne of Heaven was threatened by the Giants; and they piled mountain on mountain to the lofty stars. But Jove, omnipotent, shot thunderbolts through Mount Olympus, and he overturned from Ossa huge, enormous Pelion. And while these dreadful bodies lay overwhelmed in their tremendous bulk, (so fame reports) the Earth was reeking with the copious blood of her gigantic sons; and thus replete with moisture she infused the steaming gore with life renewed. So that a monument of such ferocious stock should be retained, she made that offspring in the shape of man; but this new race alike despised the Gods, and by the greed of savage slaughter proved a sanguinary birth.

Lycaon.

Lycaon Changed to a Wolf

When, from his throne supreme, the Son of Saturn viewed their deeds, he deeply groaned: and calling to his mind the loathsome feast Lycaon had prepared, a recent deed not common to report, his soul conceived great anger—worthy Jove—and he convened a council. No delay detained the chosen Gods.

When skies are clear a path is well defined on high, which men, because so white, have named the Milky Way. It makes a passage for the deities and leads to mansions of the Thunder God, to Jove's imperial home. On either side of its wide way the noble Gods are seen, inferior Gods in other parts abide, but there the potent and renowned of Heaven have fixed their homes.—It is a glorious place, our most audacious verse might designate the “Palace of High Heaven.” When the Gods were seated, therefore, in its marble halls the King of all above the throng sat high, and leaning on his ivory scepter, thrice, and once again he shook his awful locks, wherewith he moved the earth, and seas and stars,— and thus indignantly began to speak; “The time when serpent footed giants strove to fix their hundred arms on captive Heaven, not more than this event could cause alarm for my dominion of the universe. Although it was a savage enemy, yet warred we with a single source derived of one. Now must I utterly destroy this mortal race wherever Nereus roars around the world. Yea, by the Infernal Streams that glide through Stygian groves beneath the world, I swear it. Every method has been tried. The knife must cut immedicable wounds, lest maladies infect untainted parts. “Beneath my sway are demi gods and fauns, nymphs, rustic deities, sylvans of the hills, satyrs;—all these, unworthy Heaven's abodes, we should at least permit to dwell on earth which we to them bequeathed. What think ye, Gods, is safety theirs when I, your sovereign lord, the Thunder-bolt Controller, am ensnared by fierce Lycaon?” Ardent in their wrath, the astonished Gods demand revenge overtake this miscreant; he who dared commit such crimes. ‘Twas even thus when raged that impious band to blot the Roman name in sacred blood of Caesar, sudden apprehensive fears of ruin absolute astonished man, and all the world convulsed. Nor is the love thy people bear to thee, Augustus, less than these displayed to Jupiter whose voice and gesture all the murmuring host restrained: and as indignant clamour ceased, suppressed by regnant majesty, Jove once again broke the deep silence with imperial words; “Dismiss your cares; he paid the penalty however all the crime and punishment now learn from this:—An infamous report of this unholy age had reached my ears, and wishing it were false, I sloped my course from high Olympus, and—although a God— disguised in human form I viewed the world. It would delay us to recount the crimes unnumbered, for reports were less than truth. “I traversed Maenalus where fearful dens abound, over Lycaeus, wintry slopes of pine tree groves, across Cyllene steep; and as the twilight warned of night's approach, I stopped in that Arcadian tyrant's realms and entered his inhospitable home:— and when I showed his people that a God had come, the lowly prayed and worshiped me, but this Lycaon mocked their pious vows and scoffing said; ‘A fair experiment will prove the truth if this be god or man.’ and he prepared to slay me in the night,— to end my slumbers in the sleep of death. So made he merry with his impious proof; but not content with this he cut the throat of a Molossian hostage sent to him, and partly softened his still quivering limbs in boiling water, partly roasted them on fires that burned beneath. And when this flesh was served to me on tables, I destroyed his dwelling and his worthless Household Gods, with thunder bolts avenging. Terror struck he took to flight, and on the silent plains is howling in his vain attempts to speak; he raves and rages and his greedy jaws, desiring their accustomed slaughter, turn against the sheep—still eager for their blood. His vesture separates in shaggy hair, his arms are changed to legs; and as a wolf he has the same grey locks, the same hard face, the same bright eyes, the same ferocious look.

The Deluge

“Thus fell one house, but not one house alone deserved to perish; over all the earth ferocious deeds prevail,—all men conspire in evil. Let them therefore feel the weight of dreadful penalties so justly earned, for such hath my unchanging will ordained.”

with exclamations some approved the words of Jove and added fuel to his wrath, while others gave assent: but all deplored and questioned the estate of earth deprived of mortals. Who could offer frankincense upon the altars? Would he suffer earth to be despoiled by hungry beasts of prey? Such idle questions of the state of man the King of Gods forbade, but granted soon to people earth with race miraculous, unlike the first.

Diluvium. Deucalion et Pyrrha.

And now his thunder bolts would Jove wide scatter, but he feared the flames, unnumbered, sacred ether might ignite and burn the axle of the universe: and he remembered in the scroll of fate, there is a time appointed when the sea and earth and Heavens shall melt, and fire destroy the universe of mighty labour wrought. Such weapons by the skill of Cyclops forged, for different punishment he laid aside— for straightway he preferred to overwhelm the mortal race beneath deep waves and storms from every raining sky. And instantly he shut the Northwind in Aeolian caves, and every other wind that might dispel the gathering clouds. He bade the Southwind blow:—

the Southwind flies abroad with dripping wings, concealing in the gloom his awful face: the drenching rain descends from his wet beard and hoary locks; dark clouds are on his brows and from his wings and garments drip the dews: his great hands press the overhanging clouds; loudly the thunders roll; the torrents pour; Iris, the messenger of Juno, clad in many coloured raiment, upward draws the steaming moisture to renew the clouds.

The standing grain is beaten to the ground, the rustic's crops are scattered in the mire, and he bewails the long year's fruitless toil.

The wrath of Jove was not content with powers that emanate from Heaven; he brought to aid his azure brother, lord of flowing waves, who called upon the Rivers and the Streams: and when they entered his impearled abode, Neptune, their ancient ruler, thus began; “A long appeal is needless; pour ye forth in rage of power; open up your fountains; rush over obstacles; let every stream pour forth in boundless floods.” Thus he commands, and none dissenting all the River Gods return, and opening up their fountains roll tumultuous to the deep unfruitful sea.

And Neptune with his trident smote the Earth, which trembling with unwonted throes heaved up the sources of her waters bare; and through her open plains the rapid rivers rushed resistless, onward bearing the waving grain, the budding groves, the houses, sheep and men,— and holy temples, and their sacred urns. The mansions that remained, resisting vast and total ruin, deepening waves concealed and whelmed their tottering turrets in the flood and whirling gulf. And now one vast expanse, the land and sea were mingled in the waste of endless waves—a sea without a shore.

One desperate man seized on the nearest hill; another sitting in his curved boat, plied the long oar where he was wont to plow; another sailed above his grain, above his hidden dwelling; and another hooked a fish that sported in a leafy elm. Perchance an anchor dropped in verdant fields, or curving keels were pushed through tangled vines; and where the gracile goat enjoyed the green, unsightly seals reposed. Beneath the waves were wondering Nereids, viewing cities, groves and houses. Dolphins darting mid the trees, meshed in the twisted branches, beat against the shaken oak trees. There the sheep, affrayed, swim with the frightened wolf, the surging waves float tigers and lions: availeth naught his lightning shock the wild boar, nor avails the stag's fleet footed speed. The wandering bird, seeking umbrageous groves and hidden vales, with wearied pinion droops into the sea. The waves increasing surge above the hills, and rising waters dash on mountain tops. Myriads by the waves are swept away, and those the waters spare, for lack of food, starvation slowly overcomes at last.

A fruitful land and fair but now submerged beneath a wilderness of rising waves, ‘Twixt Oeta and Aonia, Phocis lies, where through the clouds Parnassus' summits twain point upward to the stars, unmeasured height, save which the rolling billows covered all: there in a small and fragile boat, arrived, Deucalion and the consort of his couch, prepared to worship the Corycian Nymphs, the mountain deities, and Themis kind, who in that age revealed in oracles the voice of fate. As he no other lived so good and just, as she no other feared the Gods.

When Jupiter beheld the globe in ruin covered, swept with wasting waves, and when he saw one man of myriads left, one helpless woman left of myriads lone, both innocent and worshipping the Gods, he scattered all the clouds; he blew away the great storms by the cold northwind.

Once more the earth appeared to heaven and the skies appeared to earth. The fury of the main abated, for the Ocean ruler laid his trident down and pacified the waves, and called on azure Triton.—Triton arose above the waving seas, his shoulders mailed in purple shells.—He bade the Triton blow, blow in his sounding shell, the wandering streams and rivers to recall with signal known: a hollow wreathed trumpet, tapering wide and slender stemmed, the Triton took amain and wound the pearly shell at midmost sea. Betwixt the rising and the setting suns the wildered notes resounded shore to shore, and as it touched his lips, wet with the brine beneath his dripping beard, sounded retreat: and all the waters of the land and sea obeyed. Their fountains heard and ceased to flow; their waves subsided; hidden hills uprose; emerged the shores of ocean; channels filled with flowing streams; the soil appeared; the land increased its surface as the waves decreased: and after length of days the trees put forth, with ooze on bending boughs, their naked tops.

And all the wasted globe was now restored, but as he viewed the vast and silent world Deucalion wept and thus to Pyrrha spoke; “O sister! wife! alone of woman left! My kindred in descent and origin! Dearest companion of my marriage bed, doubly endeared by deepening dangers borne,— of all the dawn and eve behold of earth, but you and I are left—for the deep sea has kept the rest! And what prevents the tide from overwhelming us? Remaining clouds affright us. How could you endure your fears if you alone were rescued by this fate, and who would then console your bitter grief? Oh be assured, if you were buried in the waves, that I would follow you and be with you! Oh would that by my father’s art I might restore the people, and inspire this clay to take the form of man. Alas, the Gods decreed and only we are living!” Thus Deucalion’s plaint to Pyrrha;—and they wept.

And after he had spoken, they resolved to ask the aid of sacred oracles,— and so they hastened to Cephissian waves which rolled a turbid flood in channels known. Thence when their robes and brows were sprinkled well, they turned their footsteps to the goddess’ fane: its gables were befouled with reeking moss and on its altars every fire was cold. But when the twain had reached the temple steps they fell upon the earth, inspired with awe, and kissed the cold stone with their trembling lips, and said; “If righteous prayers appease the Gods, and if the wrath of high celestial powers may thus be turned, declare, O Themis! whence and what the art may raise humanity? O gentle goddess help the dying world!”

Moved by their supplications, she replied; “Depart from me and veil your brows; ungird your robes, and cast behind you as you go, the bones of your great mother.” Long they stood in dumb amazement: Pyrrha, first of voice, refused the mandate and with trembling lips implored the goddess to forgive—she feared to violate her mother’s bones and vex her sacred spirit. Often pondered they the words involved in such obscurity, repeating oft: and thus Deucalion to Epimetheus’ daughter uttered speech of soothing import; “Oracles are just and urge not evil deeds, or naught avails the skill of thought. Our mother is the Earth, and I may judge the stones of earth are bones that we should cast behind us as we go.”

And although Pyrrha by his words was moved she hesitated to comply; and both amazed doubted the purpose of the oracle, but deemed no harm to come of trial. They, descending from the temple, veiled their heads and loosed their robes and threw some stones behind them. It is much beyond belief, were not receding ages witness, hard and rigid stones assumed a softer form, enlarging as their brittle nature changed to milder substance,—till the shape of man appeared, imperfect, faintly outlined first, as marble statue chiseled in the rough. The soft moist parts were changed to softer flesh, the hard and brittle substance into bones, the veins retained their ancient name. And now the Gods supreme ordained that every stone Deucalion threw should take the form of man, and those by Pyrrha cast should woman’s form assume: so are we hardy to endure and prove by toil and deeds from what we sprung.

Python.

The Pythian Games

And after this the Earth spontaneous produced the world of animals, when all remaining moistures of the mirey fens fermented in the sun, and fruitful seeds in soils nutritious grew to shapes ordained. So when the seven streamed Nile from oozy fields returneth duly to her ancient bed, the sun’s ethereal rays impregn the slime, that haply as the peasants turn the soil they find strange animals unknown before: some in the moment of their birth, and some deprived of limbs, imperfect; often part alive and part of slime inanimate are fashioned in one body. Heat combined with moisture so conceives and life results from these two things. For though the flames may be the foes of water, everything that lives begins in humid vapour, and it seems discordant concord is the means of life.

When Earth, spread over with diluvian ooze, felt heat ethereal from the glowing sun, unnumbered species to the light she gave, and gave to being many an ancient form, or monster new created. Unwilling she created thus enormous Python.—Thou unheard of serpent spread so far athwart the side of a vast mountain, didst fill with fear the race of new created man. The God that bears the bow (a weapon used till then only to hunt the deer and agile goat) destroyed the monster with a myriad darts, and almost emptied all his quiver, till evenomed gore oozed forth from livid wounds.

Lest in a dark oblivion time should hide the fame of this achievement, sacred sports he instituted, from the Python called “The Pythian Games.” In these the happy youth who proved victorious in the chariot race, running and boxing, with an honoured crown of oak leaves was enwreathed. The laurel then was not created, wherefore Phoebus, bright and godlike, beauteous with his flowing hair, was wont to wreath his brows with various leaves.

Daphne.Daphne and Phoebus

Daphne, the daughter of a River God was first beloved by Phoebus, the great God of glorious light. 'Twas not a cause of chance but out of Cupid's vengeful spite that she was fated to torment the lord of light. For Phoebus, proud of Python's death, beheld that impish god of Love upon a time when he was bending his diminished bow, and voicing his contempt in anger said; "What, wanton boy, are mighty arms to thee, great weapons suited to the needs of war? The bow is only for the use of those large deities of heaven whose strength may deal wounds, mortal, to the savage beasts of prey; and who courageous overcome their foes.— it is a proper weapon to the use of such as slew with arrows Python, huge, whose pestilential carcase vast extent covered. Content thee with the flames thy torch enkindles (fires too subtle for my thought) and leave to me the glory that is mine."

To him, undaunted, Venus, son replied; "O Phoebus, thou canst conquer all the world with thy strong bow and arrows, but with this small arrow I shall pierce thy vaunting breast! And by the measure that thy might exceeds the broken powers of thy defeated foes, so is thy glory less than mine." No more he said, but with his wings expanded thence flew lightly to Parnassus, lofty peak. There, from his quiver he plucked arrows twain, most curiously wrought of different art; one love exciting, one repelling love. The dart of love was glittering, gold and sharp, the other had a blunted tip of lead; and with that dull lead dart he shot the Nymph, but with the keen point of the golden dart he pierced the bone and marrow of the God.

Immediately the one with love was filled, the other, scouting at the thought of love, rejoiced in the deep shadow of the woods, and as the virgin Phoebe (who denies the joys of love and loves the joys of chase) a maiden's fillet bound her flowing hair,— and her pure mind denied the love of man. Beloved and wooed she wandered silent paths, for never could her modesty endure the glance of man or listen to his love.

Her grieving father spoke to her, "Alas, my daughter, I have wished a son in law, and now you owe a grandchild to the joy of my old age." But Daphne only hung her head to hide her shame. The nuptial torch seemed criminal to her. She even clung, caressing, with her arms around his neck, and pled, "My dearest father let me live a virgin always, for remember Jove did grant it to Diana at her birth."

But though her father promised her desire, her loveliness prevailed against their will; for, Phoebus when he saw her waxed distraught, and filled with wonder his sick fancy raised delusive hopes, and his own oracles deceived him.—As the stubble in the field flares up, or as the stacked wheat is consumed by flames, enkindled from a spark or torch the chance pedestrian may neglect at dawn; so was the bosom of the god consumed, and so desire flamed in his stricken heart.

He saw her bright hair waving on her neck;—"How beautiful if properly arranged!" He saw her eyes like stars of sparkling fire, her lips for kissing sweetest, and her hands and fingers and her arms; her shoulders white as ivory;—and whatever was not seen more beautiful must be.

Swift as the wind from his pursuing feet the virgin fled, and neither stopped nor heeded as he called; "O Nymph! O Daphne! I entreat thee stay, it is no enemy that follows thee— why, so the lamb leaps from the raging wolf, and from the lion runs the timid faun, and from the eagle flies the trembling dove, all hasten from their natural enemy but I alone pursue for my dear love. Alas, if thou shouldst fall and mar thy face, or tear upon the bramble thy soft thighs, or should I prove unwilling cause of pain! “The wilderness is rough and dangerous, and I beseech thee be more careful—I will follow slowly.—Ask of whom thou wilt, and thou shalt learn that I am not a churl— I am no mountain dweller of rude caves, nor clown compelled to watch the sheep and goats; and neither canst thou know from whom thy feet fly fearful, or thou wouldst not leave me thus. “The Delphic Land, the Pataraean Realm, Claros and Tenedos revere my name, and my immortal sire is Jupiter. The present, past and future are through me in sacred oracles revealed to man, and from my harp the harmonies of sound are borrowed by their bards to praise the Gods. My bow is certain, but a flaming shaft surpassing mine has pierced my heart—untouched before. The art of medicine is my invention, and the power of herbs; but though the world declare my useful works there is no herb to medicate my wound, and all the arts that save have failed their lord.”

But even as he made his plaint, the Nymph with timid footsteps fled from his approach, and left him to his murmurs and his pain.

Lovely the virgin seemed as the soft wind exposed her limbs, and as the zephyrs fond fluttered amid her garments, and the breeze fanned lightly in her flowing hair. She seemed most lovely to his fancy in her flight; and mad with love he followed in her steps, and silent hastened his increasing speed.

As when the greyhound sees the frightened hare flit over the plain:—With eager nose outstretched, impetuous, he rushes on his prey, and gains upon her till he treads her feet, and almost fastens in her side his fangs;

but she, whilst dreading that her end is near, is suddenly delivered from her fright; so was it with the god and virgin: one with hope pursued, the other fled in fear; and he who followed, borne on wings of love, permitted her no rest and gained on her, until his warm breath mingled in her hair.

Her strength spent, pale and faint, with pleading eyes she gazed upon her father’s waves and prayed, “Help me my father, if thy flowing streams have virtue! Cover me, O mother Earth! Destroy the beauty that has injured me, or change the body that destroys my life.”

Before her prayer was ended, torpor seized on all her body, and a thin bark closed around her gentle bosom, and her hair became as moving leaves; her arms were changed to waving branches, and her active feet as clinging roots were fastened to the ground— her face was hidden with encircling leaves.—

Phoebus admired and loved the graceful tree, (For still, though changed, her slender form remained) and with his right hand lingering on the trunk he felt her bosom throbbing in the bark. He clung to trunk and branch as though to twine. His form with hers, and fondly kissed the wood that shrank from every kiss.

And thus the God; “Although thou canst not be my bride, thou shalt be called my chosen tree, and thy green leaves, O Laurel! shall forever crown my brows, be wreathed around my quiver and my lyre; the Roman heroes shall be crowned with thee, as long processions climb the Capitol and chanting throngs proclaim their victories; and as a faithful warden thou shalt guard the civic crown of oak leaves fixed between thy branches, and before Augustan gates. And as my youthful head is never shorn, so, also, shalt thou ever bear thy leaves unchanging to thy glory.”

Here the God, Phoebus Apollo, ended his lament, and unto him the Laurel bent her boughs, so lately fashioned; and it seemed to him her graceful nod gave answer to his love.

Io. Argus. Syrinx.

Io and Jupiter

There is a grove in Thessaly, enclosed on every side with crags, precipitous,— on which a forest grows—and this is called the Vale of Tempe—through this valley flows the River Peneus, white with foaming waves, that issue from the foot of Pindus, whence with sudden fall up gather steamy clouds that sprinkle mist upon the circling trees, and far away with mighty roar resound. It is the abode, the solitary home, that mighty River loves, where deep in gloom of rocky cavern, he resides and rules the flowing waters and the water nymphs abiding there. All rivers of that land now hasten thither, doubtful to console or flatter Daphne’s parent: poplar crowned Sperchios, swift Enipeus and the wild Amphrysos, old Apidanus and Aeas, with all their kindred streams that wandering maze and wearied seek the ocean. Inachus alone is absent, hidden in his cave obscure, deepening his waters with his tears— most wretchedly bewailing, for he deems his daughter Io lost. If she may live or roam a spirit in the nether shades he dares not even guess but dreads for Jove not long before had seen her while returning from her father’s stream, and said; “O virgin, worthy of immortal Jove, although some happy mortal’s chosen bride,— behold these shades of overhanging trees, and seek their cool recesses while the sun is glowing in the height of middle skies—” and as he spoke he pointed out the groves— “But should the dens of wild beasts frighten you, with safety you may enter the deep woods, conducted by a God—not with a God of small repute, but in the care of him who holds the heavenly scepter in his hand and fulminates the trackless thunder bolts.— forsake me not!” For while he spoke she fled, and swiftly left behind the pasture fields of Lerna, and Lyrcea's arbours, where the trees are planted thickly. But the God called forth a heavy shadow which involved the wide extended earth, and stopped her flight and ravished in that cloud her chastity.

Meanwhile, the goddess Juno gazing down on earth's expanse, with wonder saw the clouds as dark as night enfold those middle fields while day was bright above. She was convinced the clouds were none composed of river mist nor raised from marshy fens. Suspicious now, from oft detected amours of her spouse, she glanced around to find her absent lord, and quite convinced that he was far from heaven, she thus exclaimed; "This cloud deceives my mind, or Jove has wronged me." From the dome of heaven she glided down and stood upon the earth, and bade the clouds recede. But Jove had known the coming of his queen. He had transformed the lovely Io, so that she appeared a milk white heifer—formed so beautiful and fair that envious Juno gazed on her. She queried: "Whose? what herd? what pasture fields?" As if she guessed no knowledge of the truth. And Jupiter, false hearted, said the cow was earth begotten, for he feared his queen might make inquiry of the owner's name. Juno implored the heifer as a gift.— what then was left the Father of the Gods? 'Twould be a cruel thing to sacrifice his own beloved to a rival's wrath. Although refusal must imply his guilt the shame and love of her almost prevailed; but if a present of such little worth were now denied the sharer of his couch, the partner of his birth, 'twould prove indeed the earth born heifer other than she seemed— and so he gave his mistress up to her.

Juno regardful of Jove's cunning art, lest he might change her to her human form, gave the unhappy heifer to the charge of Argus, Aristorides, whose head was circled with a hundred glowing eyes; of which but two did slumber in their turn whilst all the others kept on watch and guard.

Whichever way he stood his gaze was fixed on Io—even if he turned away his watchful eyes on Io still remained. He let her feed by day; but when the sun was under the deep world he shut her up, and tied a rope around her tender neck.

She fed upon green leaves and bitter herbs and on the cold ground slept—too often bare, she could not rest upon a cushioned couch. She drank the troubled waters. Hoping aid she tried to stretch imploring arms to Argus, but all in vain for now no arms remained; the sound of bellowing was all she heard, and she was frightened with her proper voice.

Where former days she loved to roam and sport, she wandered by the banks of Inachus: there imaged in the stream she saw her horns and, startled, turned and fled. And Inachus and all her sister Naiads knew her not, although she followed them, they knew her not, although she suffered them to touch her sides and praise her.

When the ancient Inachus gathered sweet herbs and offered them to her, she licked his hands, kissing her father's palms, nor could she more restrain her falling tears. If only words as well as tears would flow, she might implore his aid and tell her name and all her sad misfortune; but, instead, she traced in dust the letters of her name with cloven hoof; and thus her sad estate was known. "Ah wretched me!" her father cried; and as he clung around her horns and neck repeated while she groaned, "Ah wretched me! Art thou my daughter sought in every clime? When lost I could not grieve for thee as now that thou art found; thy sighs instead of words heave up from thy deep breast, thy longings give me answer. I prepared the nuptial torch and bridal chamber, in my ignorance, since my first hope was for a son in law; and then I dreamed of children from the match: but now the herd may furnish thee a mate, and all thy issue of the herd must be. Oh that a righteous death would end my grief!— it is a dreadful thing to be a God! Behold the lethal gate of death is shut against me, and my growing grief must last throughout eternity."

While thus he moaned came starry Argus there, and Io bore from her lamenting father. Thence he led his charge to other pastures; and removed from her, upon a lofty mountain sat, whence he could always watch her, undisturbed.

The sovereign god no longer could endure to witness Io's woes. He called his son, whom Maia brightest of the Pleiades brought forth, and bade him slay the star eyed guard, argus. He seized his sleep compelling wand and fastened waving wings on his swift feet, and deftly fixed his brimmed hat on his head:— Io, Mercury, the favoured son of Jove, descending to the earth from heaven's plains, put off his cap and wings,— though still retained his wand with which he drove through pathless wilds some stray she goats, and as a shepherd fared, piping on oaten reeds melodious tunes.

Argus, delighted with the charming sound of this new art began; "Whoever thou art, sit with me on this stone beneath the trees in cooling shade, whilst browse the tended flock abundant herbs; for thou canst see the shade is fit for shepherds." Wherefore, Mercury sat down beside the keeper and conversed of various things—passing the laggard hours.—

then soothingly piped he on the joined reeds to lull those ever watchful eyes asleep; but Argus strove his languor to subdue, and though some drowsy eyes might slumber, still were some that vigil kept. Again he spoke, (for the pipes were yet a recent art) "I pray thee tell what chance discovered these."

To him the God, "A famous Naiad dwelt among the Hamadryads, on the cold Arcadian summit Nonacris, whose name was Syrinx. Often she escaped the Gods, that wandered in the groves of sylvan shades, and often fled from Satyrs that pursued. Vowing virginity, in all pursuits she strove to emulate Diana's ways: and as that graceful goddess wears her robe, so Syrinx girded hers that one might well believe Diana there. Even though her bow were made of horn, Diana's wrought of gold, yet might she well deceive. "Now chanced it Pan. Whose head was girt with prickly pines, espied the Nymph returning from the Lycian Hill, and these words uttered he:—"But Mercury refrained from further speech, and Pan's appeal remains untold. If he had told it all, the tale of Syrinx would have followed thus:—

but she despised the prayers of Pan, and fled through pathless wilds until she had arrived the placid Ladon's sandy stream, whose waves prevented her escape. There she implored her sister Nymphs to change her form: and Pan, believing he had caught her, held instead some marsh reeds for the body of the Nymph; and while he sighed the moving winds began to utter plaintive music in the reeds, so sweet and voice like that poor Pan exclaimed; "Forever this discovery shall remain a sweet communion binding thee to me."— and this explains why reeds of different length, when joined together by cementing wax, derive the name of Syrinx from the maid.

Such words the bright god Mercury would say; but now perceiving Argus' eyes were dimmed in languorous doze, he hushed his voice and touched the drooping eyelids with his magic wand, compelling slumber. Then without delay he struck the sleeper with his crescent sword, where neck and head unite, and hurled his head, blood dripping, down the rocks and rugged cliff.

Low lies Argus: dark is the light of all his hundred eyes, his many orbed lights extinguished in the universal gloom that night surrounds; but Saturn's daughter spread their glister on the feathers of her bird, emblazoning its tail with starry gems.

Juno made haste, inflamed with towering rage, to vent her wrath on Io; and she raised in thought and vision of the Grecian girl a dreadful Fury. Stings invisible, and pitiless, she planted in her breast, and drove her wandering throughout the globe.

The utmost limit of her laboured way, O Nile, thou didst remain. Which, having reached, and placed her tired knees on that river's edge, she laid her there, and as she raised her neck looked upward to the stars, and groaned and wept and mournfully bellowed: trying thus to plead, by all the means she had, that Jupiter might end her miseries. Repentant Jove embraced his consort, and entreated her to end the punishment: "Fear not," he said, "For she shall trouble thee no more." He spoke, and called on bitter Styx to hear his oath.

And now imperial Juno, pacified, permitted Io to resume her form,— at once the hair fell from her snowy sides; the horns absorbed, her dilate orbs decreased; the opening of her jaws contracted; hands appeared and shoulders; and each transformed hoof became five nails. And every mark or form that gave the semblance of a heifer changed, except her fair white skin; and the glad Nymph was raised erect and stood upon her feet. But long the very thought of speech, that she might bellow as a heifer, filled her mind with terror, till the words so long forgot for some sufficient cause were tried once more.

Phaethon.

and since that time, the linen wearing throng of Egypt have adored her as a God; for they believe the seed of Jove prevailed; and when her time was due she bore to him a son called Epaphus; who also dwells in temples with his mother in that land.

Now Phaethon, whose father was the Sun, was equal to his rival, Epaphus, in mind and years; and he was glad to boast of wonders, nor would yield to Epaphus for pride of Phoebus, his reputed sire. Unable to endure it, Io's son thus mocked him; "Poor, demented fellow, what will you not credit if your mother speaks, you are so puffed up with the fond conceit of your imagined sire, the Lord of Day."

shame crimsoned in his cheeks, but Phaethon withholding rage, reported all the taunts of Epaphus to Clymene his mother: "'Twill grieve you, mother, I, the bold and free, was silent; and it shames me to report this dark reproach remains unchallenged. Oh, if I am born of race divine, give proof of that illustrious descent and claim my right to Heaven." Around his mother's neck he drew his arms, and by the head of Merops, and by his own, and by the nuptial torch of his beloved sisters, he implored for some true token of his origin.

Or moved by Phaethon's importuned words, or by the grievous charge, who might declare? She raised her arms to Heaven, and gazing full upon the broad sun said; "I swear to you by yonder orb, so radiant and bright, which both beholds and hears us while we speak, that you are his begotten son.—You are the child of that great light which sways the world: and if I have not spoken what is true, let not mine eyes behold his countenance, and let this fatal moment be the last that I shall look upon the light of day! Nor will it weary you, my son, to reach your father's dwelling; for the very place where he appears at dawn is near our land. Go, if it please you, and the very truth learn from your father." Instantly sprang forth exultant Phaethon. Overjoyed with words so welcome, he imagined he could leap and touch the skies. And so he passed his land of Ethiopia, and the Indies, hot beneath the tawny sun, and there he turned his footsteps to his father's Land of Dawn.

Europa.

So from the land of Pallas went the God, his great revenge accomplished on the head of impious Aglauros; and he soared on waving wings into the opened skies: and there his father called him to his side, and said,—with words to hide his passion;—Son,— thou faithful minister of my commands.— let naught delay thee—swiftly take the way, accustomed, to the land of Sidon (which adores thy mother's star upon the left) when there, drive over to the sounding shore that royal herd, which far away is fed on mountain grass. He spoke, and instantly the herd was driven from the mountain side; then headed for the shore, as Jove desired,—to where the great king's daughter often went in play, attended by the maids of Tyre. Can love abide the majesty of kings? Love cannot always dwell upon a throne.

Europa and Jupiter: The House of Cadmus

Jove laid aside his glorious dignity, for he assumed the semblance of a bull and mingled with the bullocks in the groves, his colour white as virgin snow, untrod, unmelted by the watery Southern Wind.

His neck was thick with muscles, dewlaps hung between his shoulders; and his polished horns, so small and beautifully set, appeared the artifice of man; fashioned as fair and more transparent than a lucent gem. His forehead was not lowered for attack, nor was there fury in his open eyes; the love of peace was in his countenance.

When she beheld his beauty and mild eyes, the daughter of Agenor was amazed; but, daring not to touch him, stood apart until her virgin fears were quieted; then, near him, fragrant flowers in her hand she offered,—tempting, to his gentle mouth: and then the loving god in his great joy kissed her sweet hands, and could not wait her will.

Jove then began to frisk upon the grass, or laid his snow-white side on the smooth sand, yellow and golden. As her courage grew he gave his breast one moment for caress, or bent his head for garlands newly made, wreathed for his polished horns.

The royal maid, unwitting what she did, at length sat down upon the bull's broad back. Then by degrees the god moved from the land and from the shore, and placed his feet, that seemed but shining hoofs, in shallow water by the sandy merge; and not a moment resting bore her thence, across the surface of the Middle Sea, while she affrighted gazed upon the shore—so fast receding. And she held his horn with her right hand, and, steadied by the left, held on his ample back—and in the breeze her waving garments fluttered as they went.

Pyramus et Thisbe.Pyramus and Thisbe

When Pyramus and Thisbe, who were known the one most handsome of all youthful men, the other loveliest of all eastern girls,— lived in adjoining houses, near the walls that Queen Semiramis had built of brick around her famous city, they grew fond, and loved each other—meeting often there— and as the days went by their love increased.

They wished to join in marriage, but that joy their fathers had forbidden them to hope; and yet the passion that with equal strength inflamed their minds no parents could forbid. No relatives had guessed their secret love, for all their converse was by nods and signs; and as a smoldering fire may gather heat, the more 'tis smothered, so their love increased.

Now, it so happened, a partition built between their houses, many years ago, was made defective with a little chink; a small defect observed by none, although for ages there; but what is hid from love? Our lovers found the secret opening, and used its passage to convey the sounds of gentle, murmured words, whose tuneful note passed oft in safety through that hidden way.

There, many a time, they stood on either side, thisbe on one and Pyramus the other, and when their warm breath touched from lip to lip, their sighs were such as this: "Thou envious wall why art thou standing in the way of those who die for love? What harm could happen thee shouldst thou permit us to enjoy our love? But if we ask too much, let us persuade that thou wilt open while we kiss but once: for, we are not ungrateful; unto thee we own our debt; here thou hast left a way that breathed words may enter loving ears," so vainly whispered they, and when the night began to darken they exchanged farewells; made presence that they kissed a fond farewell vain kisses that to love might none avail.

When dawn removed the glimmering lamps of night, and the bright sun had dried the dewy grass again they met where they had told their love; and now complaining of their hapless fate, in murmurs gentle, they at last resolved, away to slip upon the quiet night, elude their parents, and, as soon as free, quit the great builded city and their homes.

Fearful to wander in the pathless fields, they chose a trysting place, the tomb of Ninus, where safely they might hide unseen, beneath the shadow of a tall mulberry tree, covered with snow-white fruit, close by a spring.

All is arranged according to their hopes: and now the daylight, seeming slowly moved, sinks in the deep waves, and the tardy night arises from the spot where day declines.

Quickly, the clever Thisbe having first deceived her parents, opened the closed door. She flitted in the silent night away; and, having veiled her face, reached the great tomb, and sat beneath the tree; love made her bold.

There, as she waited, a great lioness approached the nearby spring to quench her thirst: her frothing jaws incarnadined with blood of slaughtered oxen. As the moon was bright, Thisbe could see her, and affrighted fled with trembling footstep to a gloomy cave; and as she ran she slipped and dropped her veil, which fluttered to the ground. She did not dare to save it. Wherefore, when the savage beast had taken a great draft and slaked her thirst, and thence had turned to seek her forest lair, she found it on her way, and full of rage, tore it and stained it with her bloody jaws: but Thisbe, fortunate, escaped unseen.

Now Pyramus had not gone out so soon as Thisbe to the tryst; and, when he saw the certain traces of that savage beast, imprinted in the yielding dust, his face went white with fear; but when he found the veil covered with blood, he cried; "Alas, one night has caused the ruin of two lovers! Thou wert most deserving of completed days, but as for me, my heart is guilty! I destroyed thee! O my love! I bade thee come out in the dark night to a lonely haunt, and failed to go before. Oh! whatever lurks beneath this rock, though ravenous lion, tear my guilty flesh, and with most cruel jaws devour my cursed entrails! What? Not so; it is a craven's part to wish for death!"

So he stopped briefly; and took up the veil; went straightway to the shadow of the tree; and as his tears bedewed the well-known veil, he kissed it oft and sighing said, "Kisses and tears are thine, receive my blood as well."

And he imbrued the steel, girt at his side, deep in his bowels; and plucked it from the wound, a-faint with death. As he fell back to earth, his spurting blood shot upward in the air; so, when decay has rift a leaden pipe a hissing jet of water spurts on high.—

By that dark tide the berries on the tree assumed a deeper tint, for as the roots soaked up the blood the pendent mulberries were dyed a purple tint.

Thisbe returned, though trembling still with fright, for now she thought her lover must await her at the tree, and she should haste before he feared for her. Longing to tell him of her great escape she sadly looked for him with faithful eyes; but when she saw the spot and the changed tree, she doubted could they be the same, for so the colour of the hanging fruit deceived.

While doubt dismayed her, on the ground she saw the wounded body covered with its blood;— she started backward, and her face grew pale and ashen; and she shuddered like the sea, which trembles when its face is lightly skimmed by the chill breezes;—and she paused a space;— but when she knew it was the one she loved, she struck her tender breast and tore her hair. Then wreathing in her arms his loved form, she bathed the wound with tears, mingling her grief in his unquenched blood; and as she kissed his death-cold features wailed; "Ah Pyramus, what cruel fate has taken thy life away? Pyramus! Pyramus! awake! awake! It is thy dearest Thisbe calls thee! Lift thy drooping head! Alas,"—At Thisbe's name he raised his eyes, though languorous in death, and darkness gathered round him as he gazed.

And then she saw her veil; and near it lay his ivory sheath—but not the trusty sword and once again she wailed; "Thy own right hand, and thy great passion have destroyed thee!— And I? my hand shall be as bold as thine— my love shall nerve me to the fatal deed— thee, I will follow to eternity— though I be censured for the wretched cause, so surely I shall share thy wretched fate:— alas, whom death could me alone bereave, thou shalt not from my love be reft by death! And, O ye wretched parents, mine and his, let our misfortunes and our pleadings melt your hearts, that ye no more deny to those whom constant love and lasting death unite— entomb us in a single sepulchre.

"And, O thou tree of many-branching boughs, spreading dark shadows on the corpse of one, destined to cover twain, take thou our fate upon thy head; mourn our untimely deaths; let thy fruit darken for a memory, an emblem of our blood." No more she said; and having fixed the point below her breast, she fell on the keen sword, still warm with his red blood.

But though her death was out of Nature's law her prayer was answered, for it moved the Gods and moved their parents. Now the Gods have changed the ripened fruit which darkens on the branch: and from the funeral pile their parents sealed their gathered ashes in a single urn.

Section 1

Iason et Medea.

Jason and Medea

Over the storm-tossed waves, the Argonauts had sailed in Argo, their long ship to where King Phineus, needy in his old age, reigned— deprived of sight and feeble. When the sons of Boreas had landed on the shore, and seen the Harpies snatching from the king his nourishment, befouling it with beaks obscene, they drove those human-vultures thence.

And having suffered hardships and great toils, after the day they rescued the sad king from the vile Harpies, those twin valiant youths, Zetes and Calais came with their chief, the mighty Jason, where the Phasis flows.

From the green margin of that river, all the crew of Argonauts, by Jason led, went to the king Aeetes and required the Golden Fleece, that he received from Phryxus. When they had bargained with him, full of wiles he offered to restore the Golden Fleece only to those who might to him return, victorious from hard labors of great risk.

Medea, the king's daughter, near his throne, saw Jason, leader of the Argonauts, as he was pressing to secure a prize— and loved at sight with a consuming flame.

Although she struggled to suppress her love, unable to restrain herself, she said, "In vain I've striven to subdue my heart: some god it must be, which I cannot tell, is working to destroy my hapless life; or else it is the burning flame of love that in me rages. If it is not love, why do the mandates of my father seem too harsh? They surely are too harsh. Why do I fear that he may perish whom I have seen only once? What is the secret cause that I am agitated by such fears?— It is no other than the god of Love.

"Thrust from your virgin breast such burning flames and overcome their hot unhappiness— if I could do so, I should be myself: but some deluding power is holding me helpless against my will. Desire persuades me one way, but my reason still persuades another way. I see a better course and I approve, but follow its defeat. —

"O royal maiden, why are you consumed with love for this strange man, and why are you so willing to be carried by the nuptial ties so far from your own country, where, indeed, are many brave men worthy of your love?

"Whether for life or death his numbered hours are in the mercy of the living Gods, and that he may not suffer risk of death, too well foreseen, now let my prayers prevail— righteously uttered of a generous heart without the stress of love. What wicked thing has Jason done? His handsome person, youth, and noble ways, would move a heart of stone.

"Have I a heart of flint, or was I born a tigress to deny him timely aid?— Unless I interpose, he will be slain by the hot breath of brazen-footed bulls, or will be slaughtered by the warriors, sprung miraculous from earth, or will be given to satisfy the ravenous appetite of a huge dragon.

"Let my gloating eyes be satiate with his dying agonies! Let me incite the fury of these bulls! Stir to their blood-lust mad-born sons of Earth! Rouse up the never-sleeping dragon's rage!— "Avert it Gods!—

"But why should I cry out upon the Gods to save him from such wrong, when, by my actions and my power, myself may shield him from all evils?

"Such a course would wreck the kingdom of my father—and by me the wily stranger would escape from him; and spreading to the wind his ready sails he would forget and leave me to my fate.— Oh, if he should forget my sacrifice, and so prefer those who neglected him, let him then perish in his treachery.—

"But these are idle thoughts: his countenance, reveals innate nobility and grace, that should dispel all fear of treachery, and guarantee his ever-faithful heart. The Gods will witness our united souls, and he shall pledge his faith. Secure of it my fear will be removed. Be ready, then— and make a virtue of necessity: your Jason owes himself to you; and he must join you in true wedlock. Then you shall be celebrated through the land of Greece, by throngs of women, for the man you saved.

"Shall I then sail away, and so forsake my sister, brother, father, Gods, and land that gave me birth? My father is indeed a stern man, and my native land is all too barbarous; my brother is a child,— my sister's goodwill is good help for me; and heaven's supreme god is within my breast.

"I shall not so be leaving valued hopes, but will be going surely to great things. And I should gain applause from all the world, as having saved the threatened Argonauts, most noble of the Greeks; and in their land, which certainly is better than my own, become the bride of Jason, for whose love I should not hesitate to give the world— and in whose love the living Gods rejoice so greatly; for his sake they would bestow their favors on my head, and make the stars my habitation.

"Should I hesitate because the wreck-strewn mountains bar the way, and clash together in the Euxine waves; or fear Charybdis, fatal to large ships, that sucks the deep sea in its whirling gulf and spouts far upward, with alternate force, or Scylla, circled with infuriate hounds howling in rage from deep Sicilian waves?

"Safe in the shielding arms of him I love, on Jason's bosom leaning, I shall be borne safely over wide and hostile seas; and in his dear embrace forget my fears— or if for anything I suffer dread, it will be only for the one I love.—

"Alas, Medea, this vain argument has only furnished plausible excuse for criminal desires, and desecrates the marriage rite. It is a wicked thing to think upon. Before it is too late forget your passion and deny this guilt."

And after she had said these words, her eyes were opened to the prize of modesty, chaste virtue, and a pure affection: and Cupid, vanquished, turned away and fled.

Then, to an ancient altar of the goddess named Hecate, Persë's daughter took her way in the deep shadows of a forest. She was strong of purpose now, and all the flames of vanquished passion had died down; but when she saw the son of Aeson, dying flames leaped up again. Her cheeks grew red, then all her face went pale again; as a small spark when hid beneath the ashes, if fed by a breath of wind grows and regains its strength, as it is fanned to life; so now her love that had been smoldering, and which you would have thought was almost dead, when she had seen again his manly youth, blazed up once more.

For on that day his graceful person seemed as glorious as a God;—and as she gazed, and fixed her eyes upon his countenance, her frenzy so prevailed, she was convinced that he was not a mortal. And her eyes were fascinated; and she could not turn away from him. But when he spoke to her, and promised marriage, grasping her right hand: she answered, as her eyes suffused with tears; “I see what I will do, and ignorance of truth will not be my undoing now, but love itself. By my assistance you shall be preserved; but when preserved fulfill your promise.”

He swore that she could trust in him. Then by the goddess of the triple form, Diana, Trivia, or Luna called, and by her sacred groves and fanes, he vowed, and by the hallowed Sun that sees all things, and by his own adventures, and his life,— on these the youthful Jason took his oath.— With this she was assured and quickly gave to him the magic herbs: he learnt their use and full of joy withdrew into his house.

Now when the dawn had dimmed the glittering stars, the people hastened to the sacred field of Mars, and on the hills expectant stood.— Arrayed in purple, and in majesty distinguished by his ivory sceptre, sat the king, surrounded by a multitude. Below them on the visioned Field of Mars, huge brazen-footed bulls were breathing forth from adamantine nostrils living flames, blasting the verdant herbage in their path!

As forges glowing with hot flames resound, or as much quick-lime, burnt in earthen kilns, crackles and hisses as if mad with rage, sprinkled with water, liberating heat; so their hot throats and triple-heated sides, resounding told of pent-up fires within.

The son of Aeson went to meet them. As he came to meet them the fierce animals turned on him faces terrible, and sharp horns tipped with iron, and they pawed the dusty earth with cloven feet, and filled the place with fiery bellowings. The Minyans were stark with fear; he went up to the bulls not feeling their hot breath at all, so great the power of his charmed drugs; and while he was stroking their down-hanging dewlaps with a fearless hand, he placed the yoke down on their necks and made them draw the heavy plow, and cut through fields that never felt the steel before. The Colchians were amazed and silent; but the loud shouting of the Minyans increased their hero's courage. Taking then the serpent's teeth out of a brazen helmet he sowed them broadcast in the new-plowed field.

The moist earth softened these seeds that were steeped in virulent poison and the teeth swelled up and took new forms. And just as in its mother an infant gradually assumes the form of man, and is perfected through all parts within, and does not come forth to the light till fully formed; so, when the forms of men had been completed in the womb of earth made pregnant, they rose up from it, and what is yet more wonderful, each one clashed weapons that had been brought forth with him.

When his companions saw the warriors turn as if with one accord, to hurl their spears, sharp-pointed, at the head of Jason, fear unnerved the boldest and their courage failed. So, too, the maid whose sorcery had saved him from much danger, when she saw the youth encompassed by those raging enemies, and he alone against so many— struck with sudden panic, she turned ashen white, her bloodless cheeks were blanched; and chilled with fear she wilted to the ground; and lest the herbs, so lately given him, might fail his need she added incantations and invoked mysterious arts. While she protected him

He seized upon a heavy stone, and hurled it in the midst of his new enemies— distracted by this cast, and murderous, they turned from him, and clashing their new arms, those earth-born brothers fought among themselves till all were slaughtered in blood-thirsty strife.

Gladly the Greeks acclaimed him conqueror, and pressed around him for the first embrace. Then, too, Medea, barbarous Colchian maid, although her modesty restrained her heart, eagerly longed to fold him in her arms, but careful of her good name, held aloof,— rejoicing in deep, silent love; and she acknowledged to the Gods her mighty gift of incantations.

But the dragon, still alert,—magnificent and terrible with gorgeous crest and triple tongue, and fangs barbed as a javelin, guards the Golden Fleece: and Jason can obtain that quest only if slumber may seal up the monster's eyes.—

Jason, successful, sprinkled on his crest Lethæan juices of a magic herb, and then recited thrice the words which bring deep slumber, potent words which would becalm the storm-tossed ocean, and would stop the flow of the most rapid rivers of our earth: and slowly slumber sealed the dragon's eyes.

While that great monster slept, the hero took the Golden Fleece; and proudly sailed away bearing his treasure and the willing maid, (whose aid had saved him) to his native port Iolcus—victorious with the Argonauts.

Section 2

Aeson.

Rejuvenation of Aeson

Now when the valiant Argonauts returned to Thessaly, their happy relatives, fathers and mothers, praised the living Gods; and with their hallowed gifts enhanced the flames with precious incense; and they offered Jove a sacred bullock, rich with gilded horns.

But Jason's father, Aeson, came not down rejoicing to behold his son, for now worn out with many years, he waited death. And Jason to Medea grieving said:

"Dearest, to whom my life and love are due, although your kindness has been great to me, and you have granted more than I should ask, yet one thing more I beg of you; if your enchantments can accomplish my desire, take from my life some years that I should live and add them to my father's ending days."— And as he spoke he could not check his tears.

Medea, moved by his affection, thought how much less she had grieved for her loved sire: and she replied:—"A wicked thing you ask! Can I be capable of using you in such a manner as to take your life and give it to another? Ask not me a thing so dreadful! May the Gods forbid!— I will endeavor to perform for you a task much greater. By the powers of Night I will most certainly return to him the lost years of your father, but must not deprive you of your own. — Oh grant the power, great goddess of the triple form, that I may fail not to accomplish this great deed!"

Three nights were wanting for the moon to join her circling horns and form a perfect orb. When these were passed, the rounded light shone full and bright upon the earth.—Through the still night alone, Medea stole forth from the house with feet bare, and in flowing garment clothed— her long hair unadorned and not confined. Deep slumber has relaxed the world, and all that's living, animals and birds and men, and even the hedges and the breathing leaves are still—and motionless the laden air.

Only the stars are twinkling, and to them she looks and beckons with imploring hands. Now thrice around she paces, and three times besprinkles her long hair with water dipt from crystal streams, which having done she kneels a moment on the cold, bare ground, and screaming three times calls upon the Night,—

"O faithful Night, regard my mysteries! O golden-lighted Stars! O softly-moving Moon— genial, your fire succeeds the heated day! O Hecate! grave three-faced queen of these charms of enchanters and enchanters, arts! O fruitful Earth, giver of potent herbs! O gentle Breezes and destructive Winds! You Mountains, Rivers, Lakes and sacred Groves, and every dreaded god of silent Night! Attend upon me!—

"When my power commands, the rivers turn from their accustomed ways and roll far backward to their secret springs! I speak—and the wild, troubled sea is calm, and I command the waters to arise! The clouds I scatter—and I bring the clouds; I smooth the winds and ruffle up their rage; I weave my spells and I recite my charms; I pluck the fangs of serpents, and I move the living rocks and twist the rooted oaks; I blast the forests. Mountains at my word tremble and quake; and from her granite tombs the liberated ghosts arise as Earth astonished groans! From your appointed ways, O wonder-working Moon, I draw you down against the magic-making sound of gongs and brazen vessels of Temesa's ore; I cast my spells and veil the jeweled rays of Phoebus' wain, and quench Aurora's fires.

"At my command you tamed the flaming bulls which long disdained to bend beneath the yoke, until they pressed their necks against the plows; and, subject to my will, you raised up war till the strong company of dragon-birth were slaughtered as they fought amongst themselves; and, last, you lulled asleep the warden's eyes— guards of the Golden Fleece—till then awake and sleeping never—so, deceiving him, you sent the treasure to the Grecian cities!

"Witness my need of super-natured herbs, elixirs potent to renew the years of age, giving the bloom of youth.— You shall not fail to grant me this; for not in vain the stars are flashing confirmation; not in vain the flying dragons, harnessed by their necks, from skies descending bring my chariot down."

A chariot, sent from heaven, came to her— and soon as she had stroked the dragons' necks, and shaken in her hands the guiding reins— as soon as she had mounted, she was borne quickly above, through unresisting air. And, sailing over Thessaly, she saw the vale of Tempe, where the level soil is widely covered with a crumbling chalk— she turned her dragons towards new regions there: and she observed the herbs by Ossa born, the weeds on lofty Pelion, Othrys, Pindus and vast Olympus—and from here she plucked the needed roots, or there, the blossoms clipped all with a moon-curved sickle made of brass— many the wild weeds by Apidanus, as well as blue Amphrysus' banks, she chose, and not escaped Enipeus from her search; Peneian stretches and Spercheian banks all yielded what she chose:—and Boebe's shore where sway the rushes; and she plucked up grass, a secret grass, from fair Euboean fields life-giving virtues in their waving blades, as yet unknown for transformation wrought on Glaucus.

All those fields she visited, with ceaseless diligence in quest of charms, nine days and nine nights sought strong herbs, and the swift dragons with their active wings, failed not to guide the chariot where she willed— until they reached her home. The dragons then had not been even touched by anything, except the odor of surrounding herbs, and yet they sloughed their skins, the growth of years.

She would not cross the threshold of her home nor pass its gates; but, standing in the field, alone beneath the canopy of Heaven, she shunned all contact with her husband, while she built up from the ever-living turf two altars, one of which upon the right to Hecate was given, but the one upon the left was sacred then to you, O Hebe, goddess of eternal youth!

Festooning woodland boughs and sweet vervain adorned these altars, near by which she dug as many trenches. Then, when all was done, she slaughtered a black ram, and sprinkled with blood the thirsty trenches; after which she poured from rich carchesian goblets generous wine and warm milk, grateful to propitious Gods— the Deities of earth on whom she called— entreating, as she did so, Pluto, lord of ghostly shades, and ravished Proserpine, that they should not, in undue haste, deprive her patient's aged limbs of life.

When certain she compelled the God's regard, assured her incantations and long prayers were both approved and heard, she bade her people bring out the body of her father-in-law— old Aeson's worn out body—and when she had buried him in a deep slumber by her spells, as if he were a dead man, she then stretched him out upon a bed of herbs.

She ordered Jason and his servants thence, and warned them not to spy upon her rites, with eyes profane. As soon as they retired, Medea, with disheveled hair and wild abandon, as a Bacchanalian, paced times three around the blazing altars, while she dipped her torches, splintered at the top, into the trenches, dark: with blood, and lit the dipt ends in the sacred altar flames. Times three she purified the ancient man with flames, and thrice with water, and three times with sulphur,—as the boiling mixture seethed and bubbled in the brazen cauldron near.

And into this, acerbic juices, roots, and flowers and seeds—from vales Hemonian— and mixed elixirs, into which she cast stones of strange virtue from the Orient, and sifted sands of ebbing ocean's tide; white hoar-frost, gathered when the moon was full, the nauseating flesh and luckless wings of the uncanny screech-owl, and the entrails from a mysterious animal that changed from wolf to man, from man to wolf again; the scaly sloughing of a water-snake, the medic liver of a long-lived stag, and the hard beak and head of an old crow which was alive nine centuries before; these, and a thousand nameless things the foreign sorceress prepared and mixed, and blended all together with a branch of peaceful olive, old and dry with years. — And while she stirred the withered olive branch in the hot mixture, it began to change from brown to green; and presently put forth new leaves, and soon was heavy with a wealth of luscious olives.—As the ever-rising fire threw bubbling froth beyond the cauldron's rim, the ground was covered with fresh verdure — flowers and all luxuriant grasses, and green plants.

Medea, when she saw this wonder took her unsheathed knife and cut the old man's throat; then, letting all his old blood out of him she filled his ancient veins with rich elixir. As he received it through his lips or wound, his beard and hair no longer white with age, turned quickly to their natural vigor, dark and lustrous; and his wasted form renewed, appeared in all the vigor of bright youth, no longer lean and sallow, for new blood coursed in his well-filled veins.—Astonished, when released from his deep sleep, and strong in youth, his memory assured him, such he was years four times ten before that day!—

Bacchus, from his celestial vantage saw this marvel, and convinced his nurses might then all regain their former vigor, he pled with Medea to restore their youth. The Colchian woman granted his request.

but so her malice might be satisfied Medea feigned she had a quarrel with her husband, and for safety she had fled to Pelias. There, since the king himself was heavy with old age, his daughters gave her generous reception. And these girls the shrewd Medea in a short time won, by her false show of friendliness; and while among the most remarkable of her achievements she was telling how she had rejuvenated Aeson, and she dwelt particularly, on that strange event, these daughters were induced to hope that by some skill like this their father might regain his lost youth also. And they begged of her this boon, persuading her to name the price; no matter if it was large. She did not reply at once and seemed to hesitate, and so she held their fond minds in a deep suspense by her feigned meditation. When she had at length declared she would restore his youth, she said to them: “That you may have strong confidence in this my promised boon, the oldest leader of your flock of sheep shall be changed to a lamb again by my prized drugs.”

Straightway a woolly ram, worn out with length of untold years was brought, his great horns curved around his hollow temples. After she had cut his scrawny throat with her sharp knife Thessalian, barely staining it with his thin blood, Medea plunged his carcass in a bronze-made kettle, throwing in it at the same time juices of great potency. These made his body shrink and burnt away his two horns, and with horns his years. And now thin bleating was heard from within the pot; and even while they wondered at the sound, a lamb jumped out and frisking, ran away to find some udder with its needed milk.

Amazed the daughters looked on and, now that these promises had been performed, they urged more eagerly their first request. Three times Phoebus unyoked his steeds after their plunge in Ebro's stream, and on the fourth night stars shown brilliant on the dark foil of the sky, and then the treacherous daughter of Aetes set some clear water over a hot fire and put in it herbs of no potency. And now a death-like sleep held the king down, his body all relaxed, and with the king his guards, a sleep which incantations with the potency of magic words had given.

The sad king's daughters, as they had been bid, were in his room, and with Medea stood around his bed. "Why do you hesitate," Medea said. "You laggards, come and draw your swords; let out his old blood that I may refill his empty veins again with young blood. In your hands your father's life and youth are resting. You, his daughters, must have love for him, and if the hopes you have are not all vain, come, do your duty by your father; drive out old age at the point of your good weapons; and let out his blood enfeebled—cure him with the stroke of iron."

Spurred on by these words, as each one of them was filial she became the leader in the most unfilial act, and that she might not be most wicked did the wicked deed. Not one could bear to see her own blows, so they turned their eyes away; and every face averted so, they blindly struck him with their cruel hands. The old man streaming with his blood, still raised himself on elbow, and half mangled tried to get up from his bed; with all those swords around him, he stretched out his pale arms and he cried: "What will you do, my daughters? What has armed you to the death of your loved father?" Their wrong courage left them, and their hands fell. When he would have said still more, Medea cut his throat and plunged his mangled body into boiling water.

Medeae fuga.

Only because her winged dragons sailed swiftly with her up to the lofty sky, escaped Medea punishment for this unheard of crime.

Her chariot sailed above embowered Pelion—long the lofty home of Chiron—over Othrys, and the vale made famous where Cerambus met his fate. Cerambus, by the aid of nymphs, from there was wafted through the air on wings, when earth was covered by the overwhelming sea— and so escaped Deucalion's flood, uncrowned.

She passed by Pittane upon the left, with its huge serpent-image of hard stone, and also passed the grove called Ida's, where the stolen bull was changed by Bacchus' power into a hunted stag—in that same vale Paris lies buried in the sand; and over fields where Mera warning harked, Medea flew; over the city of Eurypylyus upon the Isle of Cos, whose women wore the horns of cattle when from there had gone the herd of Hercules; and over Rhodes beloved of Phoebus, where Telchinian tribes dwelt, whose bad eyes corrupting power shot forth;— Jove, utterly despising, thrust them deep beneath his brother's waves; over the walls of old Carthaea, where Alcidas had seen with wonder a tame dove arise from his own daughter's body.

And she saw the lakes of Hyrie in Teumesia's Vale, by swans frequented—There to satisfy his love for Cycnus, Phyllius gave two living vultures: shell for him subdued a lion, and delivered it to him; and mastered a great bull, at his command; but when the wearied Phyllius refused to render to his friend the valued bull. Indignant, the youth said, "You shall regret your hasty words;" which having said, he leaped from a high precipice, as if to death; but gliding through the air, on snow-white wings, was changed into a swan—Dissolved in tears, his mother Hyrie knew not he was saved; and weeping, formed the lake that bears her name.

And over Pleuron, where on trembling wings escaped the mother Combe from her sons, Medea flew; and over the far isle Calauria, sacred to Latona.—She beheld the conscious fields whose lawful king, together with his queen were changed to birds.

Upon her right Cyllene could be seen; there Menephon, degraded as a beast, outraged his mother. In the distance, she beheld Cephisius, who lamented long his hapless grandson, by Apollo changed into a bloated sea-calf. And she saw the house where king Eumelus mourned the death of his aspiring son.—Borne on the wings of her enchanted dragons, she arrived at Corinth, whose inhabitants, 'tis said, from many mushrooms, watered by the rain sprang into being.

There she spent some years. But after the new wife had been burnt by the Colchian witchcraft and two seas had seen the king's own palace all aflame, then, savagely she drew her sword, and bathed it in the blood of her own infant sons; by which atrocious act she was revenged; and she, a wife and mother, fled the sword of her own husband, Jason.

Medea amd Aegeus

On the wings of her enchanted Titan Dragons borne, she made escape, securely, nor delayed until she entered the defended walls of great Minerva's city, at the hour when aged Periphas—transformed by Jove, together with his queen, on eagle wings flew over its encircling walls: with whom the guilty Halcyone, skimming seas safely escaped, upon her balanced wings.

And after these events, Medea went to Aegeus, king of Athens, where she found protection from her enemies for all this evil done. With added wickedness Aegeus, after that, united her to him in marriage.—

Labyrinthus. Ariadnes corona.

Minos and the Minotaur

King Minos, when he reached the land of Crete and left his ships, remembered he had made a vow to Jupiter, and offered up a hundred bulls.—The splendid spoils of war adorned his palace.— Now the infamous reproach of Crete had grown, till it exposed the double-natured shame. So, Minos, moved to cover his disgrace, resolved to hide the monster in a prison, and he built with intricate design, by Daedalus contrived, an architect of wonderful ability, and famous. This he planned of mazy wanderings that deceived the eyes, and labyrinthic passages involved. So sports the clear Maeander, in the fields of Phrygia winding doubtful; back and forth it meets itself, until the wandering stream fatigued, impedes its wearied waters' flow; from source to sea, from sea to source involved. So Daedalus contrived innumerable paths, and windings vague, so intricate that he, the architect, hardly could retrace his steps. In this the Minotaur was long concealed, and there devoured Athenian victims sent three seasons, nine years each, till Theseus, son of Aegeus, slew him and retraced his way, finding the path by Ariadne's thread. Without delay the victor fled from Crete, together with the loving maid, and sailed for Dia Isle of Naxos, where he left the maid forlorn, abandoned. Her, in time, lamenting and deserted, Bacchus found and for his love immortalized her name. He set in the dark heavens the bright crown that rested on her brows. Through the soft air it whirled, while all the sparkling jewels changed to flashing fires, assuming in the sky between the Serpent-holder and the Kneeler the well-known shape of Ariadne's Crown.

A large part of my portion of this textbook came to fruition while time-traveling with my World Literature I students to familiar and unfamiliar places in the Ancient, Middle Ages, and Renaissance periods. I am first grateful for those students' participation and insights, and I give special thanks to Dr. Joyce Stavick, head of the English Department at UNG, who kindly arranged for me to teach those classes during the time of my writing. This textbook could not have been made possible without our past, present, and future students who are willing to take the journey to different parts of the world in different times.

Important acknowledgments go to the Complete College Georgia Grant that critically funded this project. I also express my sincere gratitude to Dr. B. J. Robinson, director of the university press, for her thoughtful leadership, Dr. Deborah Prosser, dean of libraries, for providing helpful feedback, and Terri E. Bell, senior library assistant, for her extensive work on public domain research and copyright compliance, as well as to the anonymous peer-reviewers. My gratitude also goes to Dr. Laura Getty, editor-in-chief, with her seasoned teaching experience and broad knowledge. I am also grateful to Corey Parson, managing editor, Amy Beard, assistant managing editor, and Matthew Pardue, project editor, for their tireless work. Last but not least, I thank my family for their support and understanding during the time I spent on this project.

Despite multiple examinations of this textbook, there may be errors and areas of improvement. Fortunately, this online textbook can be periodically updated. I hope that this textbook will be of good use to students and teachers alike.

Introduction

Reading about any culture foreign to one's own tends to create a form of culture shock in the reader. In a world literature class, students frequently face texts that are completely unfamiliar to them, and the typical culture shock reactions set in. We tend not to like things that we do not understand, in part because we do not like the feeling of not knowing something. I have had students complain that they did not "like" a story before we discussed it in class, and then the same students decide after the class discussion that they now like it. Again, understanding and liking go hand in hand. Give the literature a chance; something that might not make sense at first may end up being one of your favorite stories after finding a way to approach it.

That being said, whether students like a story is not the point of reading that text in a literature class. We read literature in these classes to learn something. It is a nice addition to the experience if students like the works, but we can read and analyze texts that we do not enjoy just as effectively as the ones we do: In some cases, it is actually easier. Critical thinking comes from taking something that is unfamiliar, breaking it down into manageable chunks of information, fitting it back together, and using the experience to replicate the process in other situations in the future.

A literature class is, of course, a perfect place to learn critical thinking skills. When interpreting a text, pretend that you are a lawyer in a courtroom arguing a case. Not all cases have smoking guns; most are won or lost on circumstantial evidence alone. The interpretation needs to be based primarily on evidence from the text; therefore, there can be more than one possible approach, but some interpretations can be wrong if there is no support in the text for the generalizations that the student uses. Evidence is the key; based on what the text tells us, what do we actually know? Expert opinions (secondary sources) may help, but remember that both sides in a court case usually can call some expert who will agree with them. Authorial intention is not entirely out of bounds in such an argument, but it operates on the same principles: What can we actually argue, based on the evidence? For instance, any knowledge of Hemingway's personal history makes it unlikely that the story "Soldier's Home" could be interpreted as unsupportive of soldiers. Alternately, there are cases when the author's life is of little or no help. Faulkner refused to tell an interviewer what the meaning of "A Rose for Emily" was, preferring perhaps that the reader not be limited by a simple (or simplistic) explanation of meaning.

In every interpretation, remember to distinguish between the views of the original audience and the views of the modern reader. While a text may remind students about their grandfathers, that association does not often help when interpreting a story written by someone years ago who did not know their grandfather. (It may, of course, help students interpret their interpretations, but, except for the very best reader response theorists out there, that approach is more commonly found in a different field of study.) If the story is about a grandfather in ancient Greece, the comparison with their grandfather would be most useful if it helped focus them on what the characters in that time period in Greek society thought about grandfathers (or treated them, or talked to them, etc.) back then that is similar to or different from modern expectations. In other words, what does the work tell us about the expectations of the original audience? Without at least a solid guess about what the original audience thought about the work, it is impossible to discuss whether the author is writing something that conforms to society's expectations or argues against them, let alone what the original audience was expected to learn from the story, or how it expected to be entertained.

The expectations of the audience bring us full circle to the issue of culture shock once again. Students in U.S. universities often feel more comfortable with American or British literature, since the K-12 school system in the U.S. usually emphasizes those works. Even if some students have not lived through the 1960s in the U.S., there is still a sense of familiarity to students raised in the U.S., although they might not understand as much of the deeper social context as they think they do. A world literature class may be the first place that some students have encountered European works, let alone non-Western texts. The emphasis in this anthology, therefore, is on non-Western and European works, with only the British authors who were the most influential to European and non-Western authors (such as Shakespeare, whose works have influenced authors around the world to the present day). In a world literature class, there is no way that a student can be equally familiar with all of the societies, contexts, time periods, cultures, religions, and languages that they will encounter; even though the works presented here are translated, students will face issues such as unfamiliar names and parts of the story (such as puns) that may not translate well or at all. Since these stories are rooted in their cultures and time periods, it is necessary to know the basic context of each work to understand the expectations of the original audience. The introductions in this anthology are meant to be just that: a basic overview of what students need to know before they begin reading, with topics that students can research further. An open access literature textbook cannot be a history book at the same time, but history is the great companion of literature: The more history students know, the easier it is for them to interpret literature.

These works can help students understand the present, as well. In an electronic age, with this text available to anyone with computer access around the world, it has never been more necessary to recognize and understand differences among nationalities and cultures. The literature in this anthology is foundational, in the sense that these works influenced the authors who followed them. For Western literature, it is necessary to know something about the Trojan War (and the Trojan Horse) to understand everything from literary references to them (for almost three thousand or so years) to why a computer virus would be named a “Trojan Horse” because of what it does. In India, the characters in the Mahabharata and the Ramayana still show up in regular conversations, and it would be impossible to read modern Indian literature without a basic knowledge of these texts, which are referenced frequently. Chinese literature is infused with Confucian concepts, which influenced Chinese culture for thousands of years. These are just a few of the examples of why these texts are important to this day, and the introductions will explain the influence of each work.

A word to the instructor: The texts have been chosen with the idea that they can be compared and contrasted, using common themes. Rather than numerous (and therefore often random) choices of texts from various periods, these selected works are meant to make both teaching and learning easier. Students often learn better when there is a theme or a set of themes that they can use to make sense of the stories. For example, the differences among cultures and time periods in the definition of a hero are found throughout the anthology. As the time periods progress, the type of hero changes as well: warriors in the ancient world, knights and samurai in the medieval period, and soldiers in works set in the Renaissance. Many of the works examine the role of women in society, and each time period contains numerous works of social commentary. There are epics across world literature to compare, belief systems from the Greek pantheon of gods to Native American origin stories, and philosophical questions about ethical and moral behavior.

It is by comparing similar topics and themes that students are most easily able to see the significant differences in the cultures. If I ask students to discuss a work such as the Analects of Confucius, they often do not know where to begin or what to say. If I ask students to suggest what would happen if Gilgamesh were dropped into the environment of the Analects, they immediately see the problems: Gilgamesh is not a “gentleman” by Confucian standards, nor does he have the temperament to attract gentlemen retainers, who would expect courteous and proper behavior from him.

While cultural expectations are not universal, many of the themes found in these works are. Human beings have always cared about friendship, love, and finding their place in the world; we still read and watch stories of heroic journeys, bravery in its many forms, family relationships (good and bad), and the triumphs and tragedies of people who are not so different from ourselves.

As an example, the following assignment is one possible way to compare the texts in the Ancient World section.

Culture Shock Essay: take a character such as Achilles and place him in a story with a culture that would be completely foreign to him (such as the Mahabharata). How would he react to the people around him, and what would they think about him/his behavior? This topic could be mixed and matched: Hector in Gilgamesh, Arjuna in the Aeneid, Aeneas in the Art of War, etc.

Again, by asking the students to compare cultures, it is easier for them to identify differences. Obviously, a similar type of essay would work in the medieval period and the Renaissance, and Ancient World texts could be compared to medieval or Renaissance texts as the term progresses.

A note about calendar systems: The anthology uses B.C.E. (Before Common Era) and C.E. (Common Era). As a world literature text, it seeks to be as inclusive as possible of belief systems around the world. Of course, the numbering system used comes from the Christian calendar’s B.C. (Before Christ) and A.D. (Anno Domini—in the year of our Lord); basically, Christianity is the determiner of what is Common Era and before. Since there needs to be a way of comparing time periods across these cultures, and today’s world uses the numbering system that stems from the Christian calendar, it is the system used throughout. It would be too unwieldy to use all of the relevant calendar systems, although it is worth noting to students that they exist. For instance, 2015 C.E. is the year 5776 in the Hebrew calendar, the year 4713 in the Chinese calendar, and 1436 in the Islamic calendar. For Hinduism, the current Epoch of this cycle of the universe (which is destroyed and remade numerous times) started in 3012 B.C.E., and the current Era in that Epoch started in 78 C.E. Obviously, it would be both difficult and confusing to employ more than one system.

PART TWO

The Middle Ages

The term “Middle Ages” is primarily a Western construct: It is the middle because it comes between the European Ancient World and the European Renaissance (also a Western construct, since it means the re-naissance, or rebirth, of ancient Greek and Roman ideals and literature). The European Renaissance was self-named by writers of that time (a fact that will be discussed in greater depth in the Renaissance section of this anthology), and they labeled everything that came between them and the Ancient Greeks and Romans as “the Middle Ages.” Renaissance writers in Europe had a vested interest in portraying that time period as somehow lesser than their own; as the readings in this section will demonstrate, there is nothing lesser about the works in this time period.

Some parts of the world have middle periods in their literature, but not with the same connotations as the European term. In China, for example, the Middle Period is considered the Golden Age of poetry, although the “middle” in this case means the middle of the dynastic period, which starts in 221 B.C.E. and ends in 1911 C.E. To the extent that the term itself means anything on a worldwide stage, it is used here to compare time periods in a chronological manner. Readers can see what is happening in literature in roughly the same times around the world.

In Japan, the Heian period (794-1185 C.E.) saw the flowering of Japanese literature. In the Japanese Imperial Court, men were expected to learn Chinese; aristocratic women, who were expected to write poetry and take part in the culture of the court, began writing in Japanese. The first novel in world literature dates to about 1000 C.E. and was written by Lady Murasaki Shikibu.

In China, Li Bo wrote some of the best poems of the Golden Age of poetry, while in the Middle East Jalal al-din Rumi wrote Persian poetry that is admired on a worldwide stage to this day. In Korea, sijo poetry flourished and continued to be a vibrant poetic form to the present.

Epics remained important in the medieval period, although in altered form. Dante wrote his Divine Comedy as Christian epic, playing on previous epic conventions. Ferdowsi’s Shahname includes an epic section, as well as mythological, heroic, and historical material. In many cases, epic literature was evolving into heroic literature. Previously, although scholars now believe that the Trojan War did happen, the events in the Iliad were the stuff of speculation, rather than history. In medieval times, both the Chinese Romance of the Three Kingdoms and the Spanish Song of the Cid were based on historical events in recorded history. The characters in the Romance and the Cid are based on historical figures; they are the strongest, the smartest, and the best that humans can be, but they are nonetheless humans, without the supernatural characteristics of ancient world epic heroes.

In Europe, social commentaries and the role of women took on particular prominence in this time period. Both Dante’s and Chaucer’s works showcase those themes dramatically and insightfully. Marie de France and Boccaccio examine the workings of courtly love, often to comic effect, as does Chrétien de Troyes in a more serious tone.

FOR STUDENTS:

The works in this section are meant to be compared and contrasted. Consider the following questions while reading:

- What is the definition of a hero for each society, and why? How do the heroes in The Romance of the Three Kingdoms compare to the heroes in the Shahname and the Song of the Cid? How are they similar to or different from earlier epic heroes?
- What is the definition of a leader for each society, and why? How is it/isn’t it different from the definition of a hero? How is leadership in the Golestan different from leadership in The Romance of the Three Kingdoms?
- What role does romantic love play in the medieval period? How are the romantic relationships in the works of Chaucer, Boccaccio, and Marie de France different from the romantic relationships in the Shahname and the Tale of Genji?

The texts also can be compared and contrasted with earlier time periods:

- In what ways have the depictions of women changed from the ancient world to the medieval period?
- How is an ancient world warrior different from and similar to a medieval knight?
- How has the role of religion in these societies changed, especially where pantheons of gods have been replaced by monotheism in its various forms?
- How do Li Bo’s poems continue and develop themes in earlier Chinese poetry? How are they similar to and different from the Korean sijo in this section?

Europe

As mentioned in the introduction to Part Two, both the terms “the Middle Ages” and “the Renaissance” are specifically European constructs. The European Renaissance was self-named, with writers in that time period identifying themselves as the “re-birth” (or re-naissance) of classical Greek and Roman ideals and literature. Everything between the classical world and their time period was referred to as the “middle”—or Middle Ages. The term, therefore, should be taken with a grain of salt; obviously, to promote themselves, Renaissance writers were often harsh in their criticism of their immediate predecessors, as most new literary periods are to the previous literary period. To this day, popular culture in the West still has traces of the negative Renaissance attitude towards anything “medieval.” European authors such as Dante would have been quite surprised (and indignant) to hear that he was part of a time period that supposedly was lesser than what followed. Since Dante’s Divine Comedy ranks among the best of world literature to this day, he would be justified in feeling that way.

In chronological terms, the Middle Ages in Europe traditionally are dated from the fall of Rome in 476 C.E. to the arrival of Columbus in North America in 1492 C.E. These dates are not exact, but they at least give us the general magnitude of the time period: roughly a thousand years. Within that stretch of time, scholars usually break the time into early, middle, and late periods of literature.

The selections in this chapter focus on the transformation of a hero and the role of courtly love in aristocratic culture. There are still epic heroes, but now they are often knights (with different sets of concerns from ancient world warriors); in Dante, he takes the previous epic form even further by creating a Christian epic, with a hero who does not need to be a knight (or even all that brave, as long as he has divine help). There is a debate about whether courtly love ever existed outside of literature (or whether it actually inspired knights and ladies to act the way that they did in the stories), but the concept of courtly love drives many medieval stories. Historically, in aristocratic circles, marriage was almost exclusively a business transaction between families; your average knight might not have much chance of marrying the woman he loved, but (courtly love suggests) he might try to get her attention by performing brave deeds. In the most proper scenarios, he would serve her from afar, never expecting a reward for his attentions. It is that kind of courtly love that Cervantes would satirize during the Renaissance in Don Quixote. In more risqué scenarios, the knight might try to convince the (often married) lady to return his affections. Stories in the works of Chrétien de Troyes and Boccaccio play with that theme to both comic and dramatic effect. In the selections found here from Chaucer’s works, Chaucer makes it clear that he finds the whole concept of courtly love questionable (especially from the woman’s point of view) and sometimes outright objectionable. Dante distances himself from his own background as a love poet, turning from earthly love to spiritual love in his writings; the lady he loves from afar (and with whom he never had a relationship) leads him to a love of God.

AS YOU READ, CONSIDER THE FOLLOWING QUESTIONS:

- How are medieval epic heroes (such as the Cid and Dante) different from and similar to the warriors of the ancient world?
- What kind of relationship do the heroes have to their societies, their leaders (rulers), their families, and their religion?
- How does the text approach courtly love, especially in terms of the behavior expected from knights and ladies? Does it support it or question it?
- What themes from the ancient world appear in the Middle Ages? In what ways are the stories a continuation of issues and concerns found in works from Part One?
- How has the role of religion changed in the stories, now that there are no pantheons of gods?

THE PARLIAMENT OF BIRDS

THE CANTERBURY TALES

Geoffrey Chaucer (ca. 1342-1400 C.E.)

England

Geoffrey Chaucer's influence on later British literature is difficult to overstate. The most important English writer before Shakespeare (who re-wrote Chaucer's version of the Troilus and Criseyde story), Chaucer introduced new words into English (such as "cosmos"), and his stories draw on a wealth of previous authors, especially Ovid and Boccaccio. Unlike Shakespeare, Chaucer's writing is often translated, since Middle English is substantially different from even the Early Modern English of Shakespeare. The selections in this anthology are focused on a single theme: Chaucer's revisionist, revolutionary approach to courtly love. Courtly love poetry often focuses on the male perspective exclusively; the female is the object to be obtained, and she usually is not given a voice (or, ultimately, a choice) in the matter. The Parliament of Birds (also called The Parliament of Fowles) gives the female a voice, if not necessarily a choice, while the General Prologue to The Canterbury Tales offers, among many other things, a satirical look at how courtly love can be misused: The Prioress and the Monk are only two examples. The Wife of Bath's Tale and The Franklin's Tale both offer fascinating alternatives to the regular courtly love scenario, while The Miller's Tale is a mocking revision of the genre by the Miller, who is responding to the story of courtly love that had just been told by the Knight.

[THE PARLIAMENT OF BIRDS]

Geoffrey Chaucer, Translated by Gerald NeCastro

The life so brief, the art so long in the learning, the attempt so hard, the conquest so sharp, the fearful joy that ever slips away so quickly—by all this I mean love, which so sorely astounds my feeling with its wondrous operation, that when I think upon it I scarce know whether I wake or sleep. For albeit I know not love myself; nor how he pays people their wage, yet I have very often chanced to read in books of his miracles and his cruel anger there, surely, I read he will ever be lord and sovereign, and his strokes will be so heavy I dare say nothing but, "God save such a lord!" I can say no more.

Somewhat for pleasure and somewhat for learning I am in the habit of reading books, as I have told you. But why speak I of all this? Not long ago I chanced to look at a book, written in antique letters, and there I read very diligently and eagerly through the long day, to learn a certain thing. For, as men say, out of old fields comes all this new corn from year to year; and, in good faith, out of old books comes all this new knowledge that men learn. But now to my theme in this matter: it so delighted me to read on, that the whole day seemed to me rather short. This book of which I speak was entitled Tully on the Dream of Scipio. It had seven chapters, on heaven and hell and earth, and the souls that live in those places; about which I will tell you the substance of Tully's opinion, as briefly as I can.

First the book tells how, when Scipio had come to Africa, he met Masinissa, who clasped him in his arms for joy. Then it tells their conversation and all the joy that was between them until the day began to end; and then how Scipio's beloved ancestor Africanus appeared to him that night in his sleep. Then it tells how Africanus showed him Carthage from a starry place, and disclosed to him all his good fortune to come, and said to him that any man, learned or unlettered, who loves the common profit and is virtuous shall go to a blessed place where is joy without end. Then Scipio asked whether people that die here have life and dwelling elsewhere; and Africanus said, "Yes, without doubt,” and added that our space of life in the present world, whatever way we follow, is just a kind of death, and righteous people, after they die, shall go to heaven.

And he showed him the Milky Way, and the earth here, so little in comparison with the hugeness of the heavens; and after that he showed him the nine spheres. And then he heard the melody that proceeds from those nine spheres, which is the fount of music and melody in this world, and the cause of harmony. Then Africanus instructed him not to take delight in this world, since earth is so little and so full of torment and ill favor. Then he told him how in a certain term of years every star should come into its own place, where it first was; and all that has been done by all mankind in this world shall pass out of memory.

Then he asked Africanus to tell him fully the way to come into that heavenly happiness; and he said, “First know yourself to be immortal; and always see that you labor diligently and teach for the common profit, and you shall not fail to come speedily to that dear place that is full of joy and of bright souls. But breakers of the law, in truth, and lecherous folk, after they die, shall ever be whirled about the earth in torment, until many an age be passed; and then, all their wicked deeds forgiven, they shall come to that blessed region, to which may God send you His grace to come.”

The day began to end, and dark night, which withdraws beasts from their activity, bereft me of my book for the lack of light; and I set forth to my bed, full of brooding and anxious heaviness. For I both had that which I wished not and what I wished that I had not. But at last, wearied with all the day’s labor, my spirit took rest and heavily slept; and as I lay in my sleep, I dreamed how Africanus, in the very same guise in which Scipio saw him that time before, had come and stood at the very side of my bed. When the weary hunter sleeps, quickly his mind returns to the wood; the judge dreams how his cases fare, and the carter how his carts go; the rich dream of gold, the knight fights his foes; the sick man dreams he drinks of the wine cask, the lover that he has his lady. I cannot say whether my reading of Africanus was the cause that I dreamed that he stood there; but thus he spoke, “You have done so well to look upon my old tattered book, of which Macrobius thought not a little, that I would requite you somewhat for your labor.”

Cytherea, you sweet, blessed lady, who with your fire-brand subdues whomsoever you wish, and sends me this dream, be my helper in this, for you are best able! As surely as I saw you in the north-northwest when I began to write my dream, so surely do you give me power to rhyme it and compose it!

This aforesaid Africanus took me from there and brought me out with him to a gate of a park walled with mossy stone; and over the gate on either side, carved in large letters, were verses of very diverse senses, of which I shall tell you the full meaning:

“Through me men go into that blessed place
 Where hearts find health and deadly wounds find cure,
 Through me men go unto the fount of Grace,
 Where green and lusty May shall ever endure.
 I lead men to blithe peace and joy secure.
 Reader, be glad; throw off your sorrows past.
 Open am I; press in and make haste fast.”

On the other side it said:

“Through me men go where all mischance betides,
 Where is the mortal striking of the spear,
 To which Disdain and Coldness are the guides,
 Where trees no fruit or leaf shall ever bear.

This stream shall lead you to the sorrowful weir
Where fish in baleful prison lie all dry.
To shun it is the only remedy.”

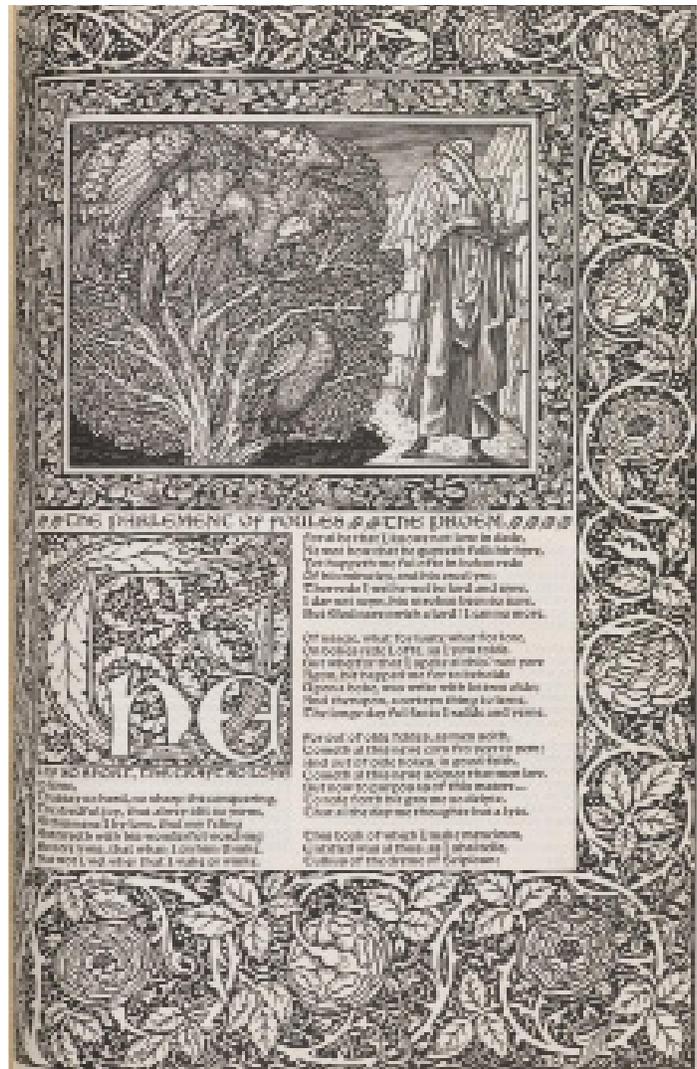

These inscriptions were written, the one in gold, the other in black, and I beheld them for a long while, for at the one my heart grew hardy, and the other ever increased my fear; the first warmed me, the other chilled me. For fear of error my wit could not make its choice, to enter or to flee, to lose myself or save myself. Just as a piece of iron set between two load-stones of equal force has no power to move one way or the other—for as much as one draws the other hinders.

So it fared with me, who knew not which would be better, to enter or not, until Africanus my guide caught and pushed me in at the wide gates, saying, “Your doubt stands written on your face, though you tell it not to me. But fear not to come in, for this writing is not meant for you or for any, unless he would be Love’s servant. For in love, I believe, you have lost your sense of taste, even as a sick man loses his taste of sweet and bitter. Nevertheless, dull though you may be, you can still look upon that which you cannot do; for many a man who cannot complete a bout is nevertheless pleased to be at a wrestling match, and judges whether one or another does better. And if you have skill to set it down, I will show you something to write about.”

With that he took my hand in his, from which I took comfort and quickly went in. But Lord, how glad and at ease I was! For everywhere I cast my eyes were trees clad, each according to its kind, with everlasting leaves in fresh color and green as emerald, a joy to behold: the builder oak, eke the hardy ash, the elm the pillar and the coffin for corpses, the boxwood for horns, the holly for whip-handles, the fir to bear sails, the cypress to mourn death, the yew the bowman, the aspen for smooth shafts, the olive of peace, the drunken vine, the victor palm, and the laurel for divination.

By a river in a green meadow, where there is at all points so much sweetness, I saw a garden, full of blossomy boughs, with white, blue, yellow and red flowers; and cold fountain-streams, not at all dead, full of small shining fish with red fins and silver-bright scales. On every bough I heard the birds sing with the voice of angels in their melody. Some busied themselves to lead forth their young. The little bunnies hastened to play. Further on I noticed all about the timid roe, the buck, harts and hinds and squirrels and small beasts of gentle nature. I heard stringed instruments playing harmonies of such ravishing sweetness that God, Maker and Lord of all, never heard better, I believe. At the same time a wind, scarce could it have been gentler, made in the green leaves a soft noise which accorded with the song of the birds above. The air of that place was so mild that never was there discomfort for heat or cold. Every wholesome spice and herb grew there, and no person could age or sicken. There was a thousand times more joy than man can tell. And it would never be night there, but ever bright day in every man’s eye.

I saw Cupid our lord forging and filing his arrows under a tree beside a spring, and his bow lay ready at his feet. And meanwhile his daughter well tempered the arrow-heads in the spring, and by her cunning she piled them after as they should serve, some to slay, some to wound and pierce. Just then I was aware of Pleasure and of Fair Array and Courtesy and Joy and of Deception who has wit and power to cause a being to do folly—she was disguised, I deny it not. And under an oak, I believe, I saw Delight, standing apart with Gentle Breeding. I saw Beauty without any raiment; and Youth, full of sportiveness and jollity, Foolhardiness, Flattery, Desire, Message-sending and Bribery; and three others—their names shall not be told by me.

And upon great high pillars of jasper I saw a temple of brass strongly stand. About the temple many women were dancing ceaselessly, of whom some were beautiful themselves and some gay in dress; only in their kirtles they went, with hair unbound—that was forever their business, year by year. And on the temple I saw many hundred pairs of doves sitting, white and beautiful. Before the temple-door sat Lady Peace full gravely, holding back the curtain, and beside her Lady Patience, with pale face and wondrous discretion, sitting upon a mound of sand. Next to her were Promise and Cunning and a crowd of their followers within the temple and without.

Inside I heard a gust of sighs blowing about, hot as fire, engendered of longing, which caused every altar to blaze ever anew. And well I saw then that all the cause of sorrows that lovers endure is through the bitter goddess Jealousy. As I walked about within the temple I saw the god Priapus standing in sovereign station, his scepter in hand, and in such attire as when the ass confounded him to confusion with its outcry by night. People were busily setting upon his head garlands full of fresh, new flowers of various colors.

In a private corner I found Venus, who was noble and stately in her bearing, sporting with her porter Riches. The place was dark, but in time I saw a little light—it could scarcely have been less. Venus reposed upon a golden bed until the hot sun should seek the west. Her golden hair was bound with a golden thread, but all untressed as she lay. And one could see her naked from the breast to the head; the remnant, in truth, was well covered to my pleasure with a filmy kerchief of Valence; there was no thicker cloth that could also be transparent. The place gave forth a thousand sweet odors. Bacchus, god of wine, sat beside her, and next was Ceres, who saves all from hunger, and, as I said, the Cyprian woman lay in the midst; on their knees two young people were crying to her to be their helper.

But thus I left her lying, and further in the temple I saw how, in scorn of Diana the chaste, there hung on the wall many a broken bow of such maidens as had first wasted their time in her service. And everywhere was painted many stories, of which I shall touch on a few, such as Callisto and Atalanta and many maidens whose name I do not know. There was also Semiramis, Candace, Hercules, Byblis, Dido, Thisbe and Pyramus, Tristram and Isolt, Paris, Achilles, Helen, Cleopatra, Troilus, and Scylla, and the mother of Romulus as well—all were portrayed on the other wall, and their love and by what plight they died.

When I had returned to the sweet and green garden that I spoke of, I walked forth to comfort myself. Then I noticed how there sat a queen who was exceeding in fairness over every other creature, as the brilliant summer sun passes the stars in brightness. This noble goddess Nature was set upon a flowery hill in a verdant glade. All her halls and bowers were wrought of branches according to the art and measure of Nature.

And there was not any bird that is created through procreation that was not ready in her presence to hear her and receive her judgment. For this was Saint Valentine's day, when every bird of every kind that men can imagine comes to this place to choose his mate. And they made an exceedingly great noise; and earth and sea and the trees and all the lakes were so full that there was scarcely room for me to stand, so full was the entire place. And just as Alan, in The Complaint of Nature, describes Nature in her features and attire, so might men find her in reality.

This noble empress, full of grace, bade every bird take his station, as they were accustomed to stand always on Saint Valentine's day from year to year. That is to say, the birds of prey were set highest, and then the little birds who eat, as nature inclines them, worms or other things of which I speak not; but water-fowls sat the lowest in the dale; and birds that live on seed sat upon the grass, so many that it was a marvel to see.

There one could find the royal eagle, that pierces the sun with his sharp glance; and other eagles of lower race, of which clerks can tell. There was that tyrant with dun gray feathers, I mean the goshawk, that harasses other birds with his fierce ravening. There was the noble falcon, that with his feet grasps the king's hand; also the bold sparrow-hawk, foe of quails; the merlin, that often greedily pursues the lark. The dove was there, with her meek eyes; the jealous swan, that sings at his death; and the owl also, that forebodes death; the giant crane, with his trumpet voice; thieving chough; the prating magpie; the scornful jay; the heron, foe to eels; the false lapwing, full of trickery; the starling, that can betray secrets; the tame redbreast; the coward kite; the cock, timekeeper of little thorps; the sparrow, son of Venus; the nightingale, which calls forth the fresh new leaves; the swallow, murderer of the little bees which make honey from the fresh-hued flowers; the wedded turtle-dove, with her faithful heart; the peacock, with his shining angel-feathers; the pheasant, that scorns the cock by night; the vigilant goose; the cuckoo, ever unnatural; the popinjay, full of wantonness; the drake, destroyer of his own kind; the stork, that avenges adultery; the greedy, gluttonous cormorant; the wise raven and the crow, with voice of ill-boding; the ancient thrush and the wintry fieldfare.

What more shall I say? One might find assembled in that place before the noble goddess Nature birds of every sort in this world that have feathers and stature. And each by her consent worked diligently to choose or take graciously his lady or his mate.

But to the point: Nature held on her hand a formel eagle, the noblest in shape that she ever found among her works, the gentlest and goodliest; in her every noble trait so had its seat that Nature herself rejoiced to look upon her and to kiss her beak many times. Nature, vicar of the Almighty Lord, who has knit in harmony hot, cold, heavy, light, moist, and dry in exact proportions, began to speak in a gentle voice: "Birds, take heed of what I say; and for your welfare and to further your needs I will hasten as fast as I can speak. You well know how on Saint Valentine's day, by my statute and through my ordinance, you come to choose your mates, as I prick you with sweet pain, and then fly on your way. But I may not, to win this entire world, depart from my just order, that he who is most worthy shall begin.

"The tercel eagle, the royal bird above you in degree, as you well know, the wise and worthy one, trusty, true as steel, which you may see I have formed in every part as pleased me best—there is no need to describe his shape to you—he shall choose first and speak as he will. And after him you shall choose in order, according to your nature, each as pleases you; and, as your chance is, you shall lose or win. But whichever of you love ensnares most, to him may God send her who sighs for him most sorely."

And at this she called the tercel and said, "My son, the choice is fallen to you. Nevertheless under this condition must be the choice of each one here, that his chosen mate will agree to his choice, whatsoever he be who would have her. From year to year this is always our custom. And whoever at this time can win grace has come here in blissful time!"

The royal tercel, with bowed head and humble appearance, delayed not and spoke: "As my sovereign lady, not as my spouse, I choose—and choose with will and heart and mind—the formel of so noble shape upon your hand. I am hers wholly and will serve her always. Let her do as she wishes, to let me live or die; I beseech her for mercy and grace, as my sovereign lady, or else let me die here presently. For surely I cannot live long in torment, for in my heart every vein is cut. Having regard only to my faithfulness, dear heart, have some pity upon my woe. And if I am found untrue to her, disobedient or willfully negligent, a boaster, or in time love elsewhere, I pray you this will be my doom: that I will be torn to pieces by these birds, upon that day when she should ever know me untrue to her or in my guilt unkind. And since no other loves her as well as I, though she never promised me love, she ought to be mine by her mercy; for I can fasten no other bond on her. Never for any woe shall I cease to serve her, however far she may roam. Say what you will, my words are done."

Even as the fresh red rose newly blown blushes in the summer sun, so grew the color of this woman when she heard all this; she answered no word good or bad, so sorely was she abashed; until Nature said, "Daughter, fear not, be of good courage."

Then spoke another tercel of a lower order: "That shall not be. I love her better than you, by Saint John, or at least I love her as well, and have served her longer, according to my station. If she should love for long being to me alone should be the reward; and I also dare to say, if she should find me false, unkind, a prater, or a rebel in any way, or jealous, let me be hanged by the neck. And unless I bear myself in her service as well as my wit allows me, to protect her honor in every point, let her take my life and all the wealth I have."

Then a third tercel eagle said, "Now, sirs, you see how little time we have here, for every bird clamors to be off with his mate or lady dear, and Nature herself as well, because of the delay, will not hear half of what I would speak. Yet unless I speak I must die of sorrow. I boast not at all of long service; but it is as likely that I shall die of woe today as he who has been languishing these twenty winters. And it may well happen that a man may serve better in half a year, even if it were no longer, than another man who has served many years. I do not say this about myself, for I can do no service to my lady's pleasure; but I dare say that I am her truest man, I believe, and would be most glad to please her. In short, until death may seize me I will be hers, whether I wake or sleep, and true in all that heart can think."

In all my life since the day I was born never have I heard any man so noble make a plea in love or any other thing—even if a man had time and wit to rehearse their expression and their words. And this discourse lasted from the morning until the sun drew downward so rapidly. The clamor released by the birds rung so loud—"Make an end of this and let us go!"—that I well thought the forest would be splintered. They cried, "Make haste! Alas, you will ruin us! When shall your cursed pleading come to an end? How should a judge believe either side for yea or nay, without any proof?"

The goose, cuckoo and duck so loudly cried, "Kek, kek!"; "Cuckoo!"; "Quack, quack!" that the noise reverberated in my ears. The goose said, "All this is not worth a fly! But from this I can devise a remedy, and I will speak my verdict fair and soon, on behalf of the waterfowl. Let who will smile or frown."

"And I for the worm-eating fowl," said the foolish cuckoo; "of my own authority, for the common welfare, I will take the responsibility now, for it would be great charity to release us." "By God, you may wait a while yet," said the turtle-dove. "If you are he to choose who shall speak, it would be as well for him to be silent. I am among the birds that eat seed, one of the most unworthy, and of little wit—that I know well. But a creature's tongue would be better quiet than meddling with such doings about which he knows neither rhyme nor reason. And whosoever does so, overburdens himself in foul fashion, for often one not entrusted to a duty commits offence."

Nature, who had always an ear to the murmuring of folly at the back, said with ready tongue, "Hold your peace there! And straightway, I hope, I shall find a counsel to let you go and release you from this noise. My judgment is that you shall choose one from each bird-folk to give the verdict for you all."

The birds all assented to this conclusion. And first the birds of prey by full election chose the tercel-falcon to define all their judgment, and decide as he wished. And they presented him to Nature and she accepted him gladly. The falcon then spoke in this fashion: "It would be hard to determine by reason which best loves this gentle woman; for each has such ready answers that none may be defeated by reasons. I cannot see of what avail are arguments; so it seems there must be battle."

"All ready!" then cried these tercel-eagles.

"Nay, sirs," said he, "if I dare say it, you do me wrong, my tale is not done. For, sirs, take it not amiss, I pray, it cannot go thus as you desire. Ours is the voice that has the charge over this, and you must stand by the judges' decision. Peace, therefore! I say that it would seem in my mind that the worthiest in knighthood, who has longest followed it, the highest in degree and of gentlest blood, would be most fitting for her, if she wish it. And of these three she knows which he is, I believe, for that is easily seen."

The waterfowl put their heads together, and after short considering, when each had spoken his tedious gabble, they said truly, by one assent, how "the goose, with her gentle eloquence, who so desires to speak for us, shall say our say," and prayed God would help her. Then the goose began to speak for these waterfowl, and said in her cackling, "Peace! Now every man take heed and hearken what argument I shall put forth. My wits are sharp, I love no delay; I counsel him, I say, even if he were my brother, leave him if she will not love him."

"Lo here," said the sparrow-hawk, "a perfect argument for a goose—bad luck to her! Lo, thus it is to have a wagging tongue! Now, fool, it would be better for you to have held your peace than have shown your folly, by God! But to do thus rests not in her wit or will; for it is truly said, 'a fool cannot be silent.'"

Laughter arose from all the birds of noble kind; and straightway the seed-eating fowl chose the faithful turtle-dove, and called her to them, and prayed her to speak the sober truth about this matter, and asked her counsel. And she answered that she would fully show her mind. "Nay, God forbid a lover should change!" said the turtle-dove, and grew all red with shame. "Though his lady may be cold for evermore, let him serve her ever until he die. In truth I praise not the goose's counsel, for even if my lady died I would have no other mate, I would be hers until death take me."

"By my hat, well jested!" said the duck. "That men should love forever, without cause! Who can find reason or wit there? Does one who is mirthless dance merrily? Who should care for him who is carefree? Yea, quack!" said the duck loud and long, "God knows there are more stars than a pair."

"Now fie, churl!" said the noble falcon. "That thought came straight from the dunghill. You can not see when a thing is proper. You fare with love as owls with light; the day blinds them, but they see very well in darkness. Your nature is so low and wretched that you can not see or guess what love is."

Then the cuckoo thrust himself forward in behalf of the worm-eating birds, and said quickly, "So that I may have my mate in peace, I care not how long you contend. Let each be single all his life; that is my counsel, since they cannot agree. This is my instruction, and there an end!"

"Yea," said the merlin, "as this glutton has well filled his paunch, this should suffice for us all! You murderer of the hedge-sparrow on the branch, the one who brought you up, you ruthless glutton! May you live unmated, you mangler of worms! It matters nothing to you, though your tribe may perish. Go, be a stupid fool, as long as the world lasts!"

"Peace now, I command here," said Nature, "For I have heard the opinions of all, and yet we are no nearer to our goal. But this is my final decision, that she herself shall have the choice of whom she wishes. Whosoever may be pleased or not, he whom she chooses shall have her straightway. For since it cannot here be debated who loves her best, as the falcon said, then will I grant her this favor, that she shall have him alone on whom her heart is set, and he her that has fixed his heart on her. This judgment I, Nature, make; and I cannot speak falsely, nor look with partial eye on any rank. But if it is reasonable to counsel you in choosing a mate, then surely I would counsel you to take the royal tercel, as the falcon said right wisely; for he is noblest and most worthy whom I created so well for my own pleasure; that ought to suffice you."

The formel answered with timid voice, "Goddess of nature, my righteous lady, true it is that I am ever under your rod, just as every other creature is, and I must be yours as long as my life may last. Therefore, grant me my first request, and straightway I will speak to you my mind."

"I grant it to you," said Nature; and this female eagle spoke immediately in this way: "Almighty queen, until this year comes to an end I ask respite, to take counsel with myself; and after that to have my choice free. This is all that I would say. I can say no more, even if you were to slay me. In truth, as yet I will in no manner serve Venus or Cupid"

"Now since it can happen no other way," Nature said then, "there is no more to be said here. Then I wish these birds to go their way each with his mate, so that they tarry here no longer." And she spoke to them thus as you shall hear. "To you I speak, you tercel's," said Nature. "Be of good heart, and continue in service, all three; a year is not so long to wait. And let each of you strive according to his degree to do well. For, God knows, she is departed from you this year; and whatsoever may happen afterwards, this interval is appointed to you all."

And when this work was all brought to an end, Nature gave every bird his mate by just accord, and they went their way. Ah, Lord! The bliss and joy that they made! For each of them took the other in his wings, and wound their necks about each other, ever thanking the noble goddess of nature. But first were chosen birds to sing, as was always their custom year by year to sing a roundel at their departure, to honor Nature and give her pleasure. The tune, I believe, was made in France. The words were such as you may here find in these verses, as I remember them.

Qui bien aime a tard oublie.

"Welcome, summer, with sunshine soft,
The winter's tempest you will break,
And drive away the long nights black!

Saint Valentine, throned aloft,
Thus little birds sing for your sake:
Welcome, summer, with sunshine soft,
The winter's tempest you will shake!

Good cause have they to glad them oft,
His own true-love each bird will take;
Blithe may they sing when they awake,
Welcome, summer, with sunshine soft,
The winter's tempest you will break,
And drive away the long nights black!"

And with the shouting that the birds raised, as they flew away when their song was done, I awoke; and I took up other books to read, and still I read always. In truth I hope so to read that some day I shall meet with something of which I shall fare the better. And so I will not cease to read: Explicit tractatus de Congregacione Volucrum die sancti Valentini tentum, secundum Galfridum Chaucers. Deo gracias.

The General Prologue

When the sweet showers of April have pierced to the root the dryness of March and bathed every vein in moisture by which strength are the flowers brought forth; when Zephyr also with his sweet breath has given spirit to the tender new shoots in the grove and field, and the young sun has run half his course through Aries the Ram, and little birds make melody and sleep all night with an open eye, so nature pricks them in their hearts; then people long to go on pilgrimages to renowned shrines in various distant lands, and palmers to seek foreign shores. And especially from every shire's end in England they make their way to Canterbury, to seek the holy blessed martyr who helped them when they were sick.

One day in that season, as I was waiting at the Tabard Inn at Southwark, about to make my pilgrimage with devout heart to Canterbury, it happened that there came at night to that inn a company of twenty-nine various people, who by chance had joined together in fellowship. All were pilgrims, riding to Canterbury. The chambers and the stables were spacious, and we were lodged well. But in brief, when the sun had gone to rest, I had spoken with every one of them and was soon a part of their company, and agreed to rise early to take our way to where I have told you.

Nevertheless, while I have time and space, before this tale goes further, I think it is reasonable to tell you all the qualities of each of them, as they appeared to me, what sort of people they were, of what station and how they were fashioned. I will begin with a knight.

There was a Knight and a worthy man, who, from the time when he first rode abroad, loved chivalry, faithfulness and honor, liberality and courtesy. He was valiant in his lord's war and had campaigned, no man farther, in both Christian and heathen lands, and ever was honored for his worth. He was at Alexandria when it was won; many times in Prussia he sat in the place of honor above knights from all nations; he had fought in Lithuania and in Russia, and no Christian man of his did so more often; he had been in Granada at the siege of Algeciras and in Belmaria; he was at Lyeyes and in Attalia when they were won, and had landed with many noble armies in the Levant. He had been in fifteen mortal battles, and had thrice fought for our faith in the lists at Tremessen and always slain his foe; he had been also, long before, with the lord of Palathia against another heathen host in Turkey; and ever he had great renown. And though he was valorous, he was prudent, and he was as meek as a maiden in his bearing. In all his life he never yet spoke any discourtesy to any living creature, but was truly a perfect gentle knight. To tell you of his equipment, his horses were good but he was not gaily clad. He wore a jerkin of coarse cloth all stained with rust by his coat of mail, for he had just returned from his travels and went to do his pilgrimage.

His son was with him, a young Squire, a lover and a lusty young soldier. His locks were curled as if laid in a press. He may have been twenty years of age, of average height, amazingly nimble and great of strength. He had been, at one time, in a campaign in Flanders, Artois, and Picardy, and had borne himself well, in so little time, in hope to stand in his lady's grace. His clothes were embroidered, red and white, like a meadow full of fresh flowers. All the day long he was singing or playing upon the flute; he was as fresh as the month of May. His coat was short, with long, wide sleeves. Well could he sit a horse and ride, make songs, joust and dance, draw and write. He loved so ardently that at night-time he slept no more than a night-ingle. He was courteous, modest and helpful, and carved before his father at table.

They had a Yeoman with them; on that journey they would have no other servants. He was clad in a coat and hood of green, and in his hand he bore a mighty bow and under his belt a neat sheaf of arrows, bright and sharp, with peacock feathers. He knew how to handle his gear like a good yeoman; his arrows did not fall short on account of any poorly adjusted feathers. His head was cropped and his face brown. He understood well all the practice of woodcraft. He wore a gay arm-guard of leather and at one side a sword and buckler; at the other a fine dagger, well fashioned and as sharp as a spear-point; on his breast an image of St. Christopher in bright silver, and over his shoulder a horn on a green baldric. He was a woodsman indeed, I believe.

There was also a nun, a Prioress, quiet and simple in her smiling; her greatest oath was "by Saint Loy." She was named Madame Eglantine. Well she sang the divine service, intoned in a seemly manner in her nose, and spoke French elegantly, after the manner of Stratford-atte-Bow, for of Parisian French she knew nothing. She had been well taught the art of eating, and let no morsel fall from her lips, and wet but her finger-tips in the sauce. She knew how to lift and how to hold a bit so that not a drop fell upon her breast. Her pleasure was all in courtesy. She wiped her upper lip so well that no spot of grease was to be seen in her cup after she had drunk; and very dainty she was in reaching for her food. And surely she was of fine behavior, pleasant and amiable of bearing. She took pains to imitate court manners, to be stately in her demeanor and to be held worthy of reverence. But to tell you of her character, she was so charitable and so tender-hearted she would weep if she saw a mouse caught in a trap if it were dead or bleeding. She had certain small dogs, which she fed upon roasted meat or milk and finest wheaten bread. She would weep sorely if one of them died or was struck at sharply with a stick. She was all warm feeling and tender heart. Her wimple was pleated neatly. Her nose was slender, her eyes gray as glass, her mouth small and soft and red. Certainly she had a fine forehead, almost a span high; truly she was not undersized. Her cloak was neatly made, I could tell.

About her arm was a coral rosary, the larger beads of green, upon which hung a brooch of shining gold; on it was engraved first an A with a crown, and after that Amor vincit omnia.

Another Nun, her chaplain, was with her, and three Priests.

There was a Monk, a very fine and handsome one, a great rider about the country-side and a lover of hunting, a manly man in all things, fit to be an abbot. He had many fine horses in his stable, and when he rode, men could hear his bridle jingling in a whistling wind as clear and loud as the chapel-bell where this lord was prior. Because the rule of St. Maurus or of St. Benedict was old and something austere, this same monk let such old things pass and followed the ways of the newer world. He gave not a plucked hen for the text that hunters are not holy, or that a careless monk (that is to say, one out of his cloister) is like a fish out of water; for that text he would not give a herring. And I said his opinion was right; why should he study and lose his wits ever poring over a book in the cloister, or toil with his hands and labor as St. Augustine bids? How shall the world be served? Let St. Augustine have his work to himself. Therefore he rode hard, followed greyhounds as swift as birds on the wing. All his pleasure was in riding and hunting the hare, and he spared no cost on those. I saw his sleeves edged at the wrist with fine dark fur, the finest in the country, and to fasten his hood under his chin he had a finely-wrought brooch of gold; in the larger end was a love-knot. His bald head shone like glass; so did his face, as if it had been anointed. He was a sleek, fat lord. His bright eyes rolled in his head, glowing like the fire under a cauldron. His boots were of rich soft leather, his horse in excellent condition. Now certainly he was a fine prelate. He was not pale, like a wasted spirit; best of any roast he loved a fat swan. His palfrey was as brown as a berry.

There was a begging Friar, lively and jolly, a very dignified fellow. In all the four orders there is not one so skilled in gay and flattering talk. He had, at his own expense, married off many young women; he was a noble pillar of his order! He was well beloved and familiar among franklins everywhere in his countryside, and also with worthy town women, for he had, as he said himself, more virtue as confessor than a parson, for he held a papal license. Very sweetly he heard confession, and his absolution was pleasant; he was an easy man to give penance, when he looked to have a good dinner. Gifts to a poor order are a sign that a man has been well confessed, he maintained; if a man gave, he knew he was contrite. For many people are so stern of heart that they cannot weep, though they suffer sorely; therefore, instead of weeping and praying, men may give silver to the poor friars. The tip of his hood was stuffed full of knives and pins as presents to fine women. And certainly he had a pleasant voice in singing, and well could play the fiddle; in singing ballads he bore off the prize. His neck was as white as the fleur-de-lis, and he was as strong as a champion. He knew all the town taverns, and every inn-keeper and bar-maid, better than the lepers and beggar-women. For it accorded not with a man of his importance to have acquaintance with sick lepers; it was not seemly, it profited not, to deal with any such poor trash, but all with rich folk and sellers of victual. But everywhere that advantage might follow he was courteous, lowly and serviceable. Nowhere was any so capable; he was the best beggar in his house, and gave a certain yearly payment so that none of his brethren might trespass on his routes. Though a widow might not have an old shoe to give, so pleasant was his "In principio," he would have his farthing before he went. He gained more from his begging than he ever needed, I believe! He would romp about like a puppy-dog. On days of reconciliation, or love-days, he was very helpful, for he was not like a cloister-monk or a poor scholar with a threadbare cope, but like a Master of Arts or a cardinal. His half-cope was of double worsted and came from the clothes-press rounding out like a bell. He pleased his whim by lisping a little, to make his English sound sweet upon his tongue, and in his harping and singing his eyes twinkled in his head like the stars on a frosty night. This worthy friar was named Hubert.

There was a Merchant with a forked beard, in parti-colored garb. High he sat upon his horse, a Flanders beaver-hat on his head, and boots fastened neatly with rich clasps. He uttered his opinions pompously, ever tending to the increase of his own profit; at any cost he wished the sea were safeguarded between Middleburg and Orwell. In selling crown-pieces he knew how to profit by the exchange. This worthy man employed his wit cunningly; no creature knew that he was in debt, so stately he was of demeanor in bargaining and borrowing. He was a worthy man indeed, but, to tell the truth, I know not his name.

There was also a Clerk from Oxford who had long gone to lectures on logic. His horse was as lean as a rake, and he was not at all fat, I think, but looked hollow-cheeked, and grave likewise. His little outer cloak was threadbare, for he had no worldly skill to beg for his needs, and as yet had gained himself no benefice. He would rather have had at his bed's head twenty volumes of Aristotle and his philosophy, bound in red or black, than rich robes or a fiddle or gay psalter. Even though he was a philosopher, he had little gold in his money-box! But all that he could get from his friends he spent on books and learning, and would pray diligently for the souls of who gave it to him to stay at the schools. Of study he took most heed and care. Not a word did he speak more than was needed, and the little he spoke was formal and modest, short and quick, and full of high matter. All that he said tended toward moral virtue. Gladly would he learn and gladly teach.

There was also a Sergeant of the Law, an excellent man, wary and wise, a frequenter of the porch of Paul's Church. He was discreet and of great distinction; or seemed such, his words were so sage. He had been judge at court, by patent and full commission; with his learning and great reputation he had earned many fees and robes.

Such a man as he for acquiring goods there never was; anything that he desired could be shown to be held in unrestricted possession, and none could find a flaw in his deeds. Nowhere was there so busy a man, and yet he seemed busier than he was. He knew in precise terms every case and judgment since King William the Conqueror, and every statute fully, word for word, and none could chide at his writing. He rode in simple style in a parti-colored coat and a belt of silk with small cross-bars. Of his appearance I will not make a longer story.

Traveling with him was a Franklin, with a beard as white as a daisy, a ruddy face and a sanguine temper. Well he loved a sop of wine of a morning. He was accustomed to live in pleasure, for he was a very son of Epicurus, who held the opinion that perfect felicity stands in pleasure alone. He ever kept an open house, like a true St. Julian in his own country-side. His bread and his wine both were always of the best; never were a man's wine-vaults better stored. His house was never without a huge supply of fish or meat; in his house it snowed meat and drink, and every fine pleasure that a man could dream of. According to the season of the year he varied his meats and his suppers. Many fat partridges were in his cage and many bream and pike in his fishpond. Woe to his cook unless his sauces were pungent and sharp, and his gear ever in order! All the long day stood a great table in his hall fully prepared. When the justices met at sessions of court, there he lorded it full grandly, and many times he sat as knight of the shire in parliament. A dagger hung at his girdle, and a pouch of taffeta, white as morning's milk. He had been sheriff and auditor; nowhere was so worthy a vassal.

A Haberdasher, a Carpenter, a Weaver, a Dyer, and an Upholsterer were with us also, all in the same dress of a great and splendid guild. All fresh and new was their gear. Their knives were not tipped with brass but all with fine-wrought silver, like their girdles and their pouches. Each of them seemed a fair burges to sit in a guildhall on a dais. Each for his discretion was fit to be alderman of his guild, and had goods and income sufficient for that. Their wives would have consented, I should think; otherwise, they would be at fault. It is a fair thing to be called madame, and to walk ahead of other folks to vigils, and to have a mantle carried royally before them.

They had a Cook with them for that journey, to boil chickens with the marrow-bones and tart powder-merchant and cyprus-root. Well he knew a draught of London ale! He could roast and fry and broil and stew, make dainty pottage and bake pies well. It was a great pity, it seemed to me, that he had a great ulcer on his shin, for he made capon-in-cream with the best of them.

There was a Shipman, from far in the West; for anything I know, he was from Dartmouth. He rode a nag, as well as he knew how, in a gown of coarse wool to the knee. He had a dagger hanging on a lace around his neck and under his arm. The hot summer had made his hue brown. In truth he was a good fellow: many draughts of wine had he drawn at Bordeaux while the merchant slept. He paid no heed to nice conscience; on the high seas, if he fought and had the upper hand, he made his victims walk the plank. But in skill to reckon his moon, his tides, his currents and dangers at hand, his harbors and navigation, there was none like him from Hull to Carthage. In his undertakings he was bold and shrewd. His beard had been shaken by many tempests. He knew the harbors well from Gothland to Cape Finisterre, and every creek in Spain and in Brittany. His ship was called the Maudelayne.

With us was a Doctor, a Physician; for skill in medicine and in surgery there was no peer in this entire world. He watched sharply for favorable hours and an auspicious ascendant for his patients' treatment, for he was well grounded in astrology. He knew the cause of each malady, if it was hot, cold, dry or moist, from where it had sprung and of what humor. He was a thorough and a perfect practitioner. Having found the cause and source of his trouble, quickly he had ready the sick man's cure. He had his apothecaries all prepared to send him electuaries and drugs, for each helped the other's gain; their friendship was not formed of late! He knew well the old Aesculapius, Dioscorides and Rufus, Hippocrates, Haly and Galen, Serapion, Rhasis and Avicenna, Averroes, Damascene and Constantine, Bernard, Gatisden and Gilbertine. His own diet was moderate, with no excess, but nourishing and simple to digest. His study was only a little on Scripture. He was clad in red and blue-gray cloth, lined with taffeta and sendal silk. Yet he was but moderate in spending, and kept what he gained during the pestilence. Gold is a medicine from the heart in physicians' terms; doubtless that was why he loved gold above all else.

There was a Good Wife from near Bath, but she was somewhat deaf, and that was pity. She was so skilled in making cloth that she surpassed those of Ypres and Ghent. In all the parish there was no wife who should march up to make an offering before her, and if any did, so angered she was that truly she was out of all charity. Her kerchiefs were very fine in texture; and I dare swear those that were on her head for Sunday weighed ten pounds. Her hose were of a fine scarlet and tightly fastened, and her shoes were soft and new. Her face was bold and fair and red. All her life she was a worthy woman; she had had five husbands at the church-door, besides other company in her youth, but of that there is no need to speak now. She had thrice been at Jerusalem; many distant streams had she crossed; she had been on pilgrimages to Boulogne and to Rome, to Santiago in Galicia and to Cologne. This wandering by the way had taught her various things. To tell the truth, she was gap-toothed; she sat easily on an ambling horse, wearing a fair wimple and on her head a hat as broad as a buckler or target. About her broad hips was a short riding skirt and on her feet a pair of sharp spurs. Well could she laugh and prattle in company. Love and its remedies she knew all about, I dare give my word, for she had been through the old dance.

There was a good man of religion, a poor Parson, but rich in holy thought and deed. He was also a learned man, a clerk, and would faithfully preach Christ's gospel and devoutly instruct his parishioners. He was benign, wonderfully diligent, and patient in adversity, as he was often tested. He was loath to excommunicate for unpaid tithes, but rather would give to his poor parishioners out of the church alms and also of his own substance; in little he found sufficiency. His parish was wide and the houses far apart, but not even for thunder or rain did he neglect to visit the farthest, great or small, in sickness or misfortune, going on foot, a staff in his hand. To his sheep did he give this noble example, which he first set into action and afterward taught; these words he took out of the gospel, and this similitude he added also, that if gold will rust, what shall iron do? For if a priest upon whom we trust were to be foul, it is no wonder that an ignorant layman would be corrupt; and it is a shame (if a priest will but pay attention to it) that a shepherd should be defiled and the sheep clean. A priest should give good example by his cleanness how his sheep should live. He would not farm out his benefice, nor leave his sheep stuck fast in the mire, while he ran to London to St. Paul's, to get an easy appointment as a chantry-priest, or to be retained by some guild, but dwelled at home and guarded his fold well, so that the wolf would not make it miscarry. He was no hireling, but a shepherd. And though he was holy and virtuous, he was not pitiless to sinful men, nor cold or haughty of speech, but both discreet and benign in his teaching; to draw folk up to heaven by his fair life and good example, this was his care. But when a man was stubborn, whether of high or low estate, he would scold him sharply. There was nowhere a better priest than he. He looked for no pomp and reverence, nor yet was his conscience too particular; but the teaching of Christ and his apostles he taught, and first he followed it himself.

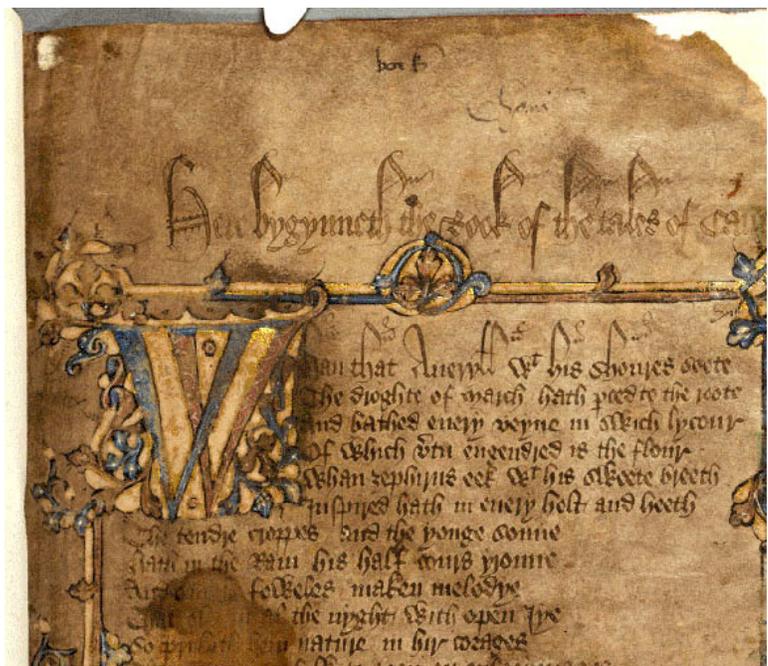

With him was his brother, a Ploughman, who had drawn many cartloads of dung. He was a faithful and good toiler, living in peace and perfect charity. He loved God best at all times with all his whole heart, in good and ill fortune, and then his neighbor even as himself. He would thresh and ditch and delve for every poor person without pay, but for Christ's sake, if he were able. He paid his tithes fairly and well on both his produce and his goods. He wore a ploughman's frock and rode upon a mare.

There was a Reeve also and a Miller, a Summoner and a Pardoner, a Manciple and myself. There were no more.

The Miller was a stout fellow, big of bones and brawn; and well he showed them, for everywhere he went to a wrestling match he would always carry off the prize ram. He was short-shouldered and broad, a thick, knotty fellow. There was no door that he could not heave off its hinges, or break with his head at a running. His beard was as red as any sow or fox, and broad like a spade as well. Upon the very tip of his nose he had a wart, and on it stood a tuft of red hair like the bristles on a sow's ears, and his nostrils were black and wide. At his thigh hung a sword and buckler. His mouth was as great as a great furnace. He was a teller of dirty stories and a buffoon, and it was mostly of sin and obscenity. He knew well how to steal corn and take his toll of meal three times over; and yet he had a golden thumb, by God! He wore a white coat and a blue hood. He could blow and play the bagpipe well, and with its noise he led us out of town.

There was a gentle Manciple of an Inn of Court, of whom other stewards might take example for craftiness in buying victuals. Whether he paid in cash or took on credit, he was so watchful in his buying that he was always ahead and in good standing. Now is it not a full fair gift of God that the wit of such an unlettered man shall surpass the wisdom of a great body of learned men? He had more than a score of masters, expert and diligent in law, of whom in that house there were a dozen worthy to be stewards of lands and revenues of any lord in England, to let him live upon his income, honorably, free from debt, unless he were mad, or live as plainly as he would; or able to help a whole shire in any case that might occur. And yet this Manciple hoodwinked all of them.

The Reeve was a slender, bilious man. His beard was shaven as close as could be, and his hair was cut short around his ears and docked in front like a priest's. His legs were full and lean like a stick; I could see no calf. He could well keep a bin and a garner and no inspector could get the best of him. In the drought or in the wet he could foretell the yield of his grain and seed. His lord's sheep, poultry and cattle, his dairy and swine and horses and all his stock, this Reeve had wholly under his governance, and submitted his accounts thereon ever since his lord was twenty years of age; and none could ever find him out in arrears. There was no bailiff nor herdsman nor other churl whose tricks and craftiness he didn't know. They were as afraid of him as of the plague. His dwelling-place was a pleasant one on a heath, all shaded with green trees. Better than his lord he knew how to pick up wealth, and had a rich private hoard; he knew how to please his master cunningly by giving and lending him out of what was his master's by right, and to win thanks for that, and a coat and hood as a reward too. In his youth he had learned a good trade and was a fine carpenter and workman. This Reeve sat upon a fine dapple gray cob named Scot. He wore a long surcoat of blue and at his side a rusty blade. He was from Norfolk, near a town they call Baldeswell. His coat was tucked up around him like a friar's, and he always rode last of us all.

A Summoner was with us there, a fire-red cherubim-faced fellow, salt-phlegmed and pimply, with slits for eyes, scabby black eyebrows and thin ragged beard, and as hot and lecherous as a sparrow. Children were terrified at his visage. No quicksilver, white-lead, brimstone, borax nor ceruse, no cream of tartar nor any ointment that would clean and burn, could help his white blotches or the knobs on his chaps. He loved garlic, onions and leeks too well, and to drink strong wine as red as blood, and then he would talk and cry out like mad. And after drinking deep of wine he would speak no word but Latin, in which he had a few terms, two or three, learned out of some canon. No wonder was that, for he heard it all day long, and you know well how a jay can call "Walter" after hearing it a long time, as well as the pope could. But if he were tested in any other point, his learning was found to be all spent. Questio quid juris, he was always crying. He was a kind and gentle rogue; a better fellow I never knew; for a quart of wine he would allow a good fellow to have his concubine for a year and completely excuse him. Secretly he knew how to swindle anyone. And if anywhere he found a good fellow, he would teach him in such case to have no fear of the archdeacon's excommunication, unless a man's soul is in his purse, for it was in his purse he should be punished. "The Archdeacon's hell is your purse," he said. (But well I know he lied in his teeth; every guilty man should fear the church's curse, for it will slay, just as absolution saves, and also let him beware of a significavit.) Within his jurisdiction on his own terms he held all the young people of the diocese, knew their guilty secrets, and was their chief adviser. He had a garland on his head large enough for an ale-house sign, and carried a round loaf of bread as big as a buckler.

With him rode a gentle Pardoner, of Roncesvalles, his friend and companion, who had come straight from the court of Rome. He sang loudly, "Come here, love, to me," while the Summoner joined him with a stiff bass; never was there a trumpet of half such a sound. This Pardoner had waxy-yellow hair, hanging smooth, like a hank of flax, spread over his shoulders in thin strands. For sport he wore no hood, which was trussed up in his wallet; riding with his hair disheveled, bareheaded except for his cap, he thought he was all in the latest fashion. His eyes were glaring like a hare's. He had a veronica sewed on his cap, and his wallet, brimful of pardons hot from Rome, lay before him on his saddle. His voice was as small as a goat's. He had no beard nor ever would have, his face was as smooth as if lately shaven; I believe he was a mare or a gelding. But as for his trade, from Berwick to Dover there was not such another pardoner. In his bag he had a pillow-case which he said was our Lady's kerchief, and a small piece of the sail which he said St. Peter had when he walked upon the sea and Jesus Christ caught him. He had a cross of latoun, set full of false gems, and pigs' bones in a glass. But with these relics, when he found a poor parson dwelling in the country, in one day he gained himself more money than the parson gained in two months. And thus, with flattering deceit and tricks, he made the parson and the people his dupes. But to give him his due, after all he was a noble ecclesiastic in church; he could read well a lesson or legend and best of all sing an offertory. For he knew well that when that was done he must preach and file his tongue smooth, to win silver as he well knew how. Therefore he sang merrily and loud.

Now I have told you in few words the station, the array, the number of this company and why they were assembled in Southwark as well, at this noble inn, the Tabard, close to the Bell tavern. But now it is time to say how we behaved that same evening, when we had arrived at that inn; and afterward I will tell you of our journey and the rest of our pilgrimage.

But first I pray that by your courtesy you ascribe it not to my ill manners if I speak plainly in this matter, telling you their words and cheer, and if I speak their very words as they were. For this you know as well as I, that whoever tells a tale that another has told, he must repeat every word, as nearly as he can, although he may speak ever so rudely and freely. Otherwise, he must tell his tale falsely, or pretend, or find new words. He may not spare any, even if it were his own brother; he is bound to say one word as well as the next. Christ himself spoke plainly in Holy Scriptures and you know well there is no baseness in that. And Plato, whoever can read him, says that the word must be cousin to the deed.

I also pray you to forgive me though I have not set folk here in this tale according to their station, as they should be. My wit is short, you can well understand.

Our host put us all in good spirits, and soon brought us to supper and served us with the best of provisions. The wine was strong and very glad we were to drink. Our Host was a seemly man, fit to be marshal in a banquet-hall, a large man with bright eyes, bold in speech, wise and discreet, lacking nothing of manhood: there is not a fairer burghess in Cheapside. He was in all things a very merry fellow, and after supper, when we had paid our bills, he began to jest and speak of mirth among other things.

“Now gentle people,” he said, “truly you are heartily welcome to me, for, by my word, if I shall tell the truth, I have not seen this year so merry a company at this inn at once. I would gladly make mirth if I only knew how. And I have just now thought of a mirthful thing to give you pleasure, which shall cost nothing. You go to Canterbury, God speed you, and may the blessed martyr duly reward you! I know full well, along the way you mean to tell tales and amuse yourselves, for in truth it is no comfort or mirth to ride along dumb as a stone.

“And therefore, as I said, I will make you a game. If it please you all by common consent to stand by my words and to do as I shall tell you, now, by my father’s soul (and he is in heaven), tomorrow as you ride along, if you are not merry, I will give you my head. Hold up your hands, without more words!”

Our mind was not long to decide. We thought it not worth debating, and agreed with him without more thought, and told him to say his verdict as he wished.

“Gentle people,” said he, “please listen now, but take it not, I pray you, disdainfully. To speak briefly and plainly, this is the point, that each of you for pastime shall tell two tales in this journey to Canterbury, and two others on the way home, of things that have happened in the past. And whichever of you bears himself best, that is to say, that tells now tales most instructive and delighting, shall have a supper at the expense of us all, sitting here in this place, beside this post, when we come back from Canterbury. And to add to your sport I will gladly go with you at my own cost, and be your guide. And whoever opposes my judgment shall pay all that we spend on the way. If you agree that this will be so, tell me now, without more words, and without delay I will plan for that.”

We agreed to this thing and pledged our word with glad hearts, and prayed him to do so, and to be our ruler and to remember and judge our tales, and to appoint a supper at a certain price. We would be ruled at his will in great and small, and thus with one voice we agreed to his judgment. At this the wine was fetched, and we drank and then each went to rest without a longer stay.

In the morning, when the day began to spring, our host arose and played rooster to us all, and gathered us in a flock. Forth we rode, a little faster than a walk, to St. Thomas-a-Watering. There our Host drew up his horse and said, “Listen, gentle people, if you will. You know your agreement; I remind you of it. If what you said at the hour of evensong last night is still what you agree to this morning at the time of matins, let us see who shall tell the first tale. So may I ever drink beer or wine, whoever rebels against my judgment shall pay all that is spent on the journey. Now draw cuts, before we depart further; he who has the shortest shall begin the tales. Sir Knight, my master and my lord,” said he, “now draw your lot, for this is my will, Come nearer, my lady Prioress, and you, sir Clerk, be not shy, study not; set your hands to them, every one of you.”

Without delay every one began to draw, and in short, whether it were by chance or not, the truth is, the lot fell to the Knight, at which every one was merry and glad. He was to tell his tale, as was reasonable, according to the agreement that you have heard. What need is there for more words?

When this good man saw it was so, as one discreet and obedient to his free promise he said, “Since I begin the game, what, in God’s name, welcome be the cut! Now let us ride on, and listen to what I say.” And at that word we rode forth on our journey. And he soon began his tale with a cheerful spirit, and spoke in this way.

Here ends the Prologue of this book.

The Miller’s Tale

Here follow the words between the Host and the Miller.

The Prologue of the Miller’s Tale

When the Knight had ended his tale, in the entire crowd was there nobody, young or old, who did not say it was a noble history and worthy to be called to mind; and especially each of the gentle people. Our Host laughed and swore, “So may I thrive, this goes well! The bag is unbuckled, let see now who shall tell another tale, for truly the sport has begun well. Now you, Sir Monk, if you can, tell something to repay the Knight’s story with.”

The Miller, who had drunk himself so completely pale that he could scarcely sit on his horse, would not take off his hood or hat, or wait and mind his manners for no one, but began to cry aloud in Pilate’s voice, and swore by arms and blood and head, “I know a noble tale for the occasion, to repay the Knight’s story with.”

Our Host saw that he was all drunk with ale and said, “Wait, Robin, dear brother, some better man shall speak first; wait, and let us work thriftily.”

“By God’s soul!” he said, “I will not do that! I will speak, or else go my way!”

“Tell on, in the Devil’s name!” answered our Host. “You are a fool; your wits have been overcome.”

“Now listen, one and all! But first,” said the Miller, “I make a protestation that I am drunk; I know it by my voice. And therefore if I speak as I should not, blame it on the ale of Southwark, I pray you; for I will tell a legend and a life of a carpenter and his wife, and how a clerk made a fool of the carpenter.”

“Shut your trap!” the Reeve answered and said, “Set aside your rude drunken ribaldry. It is a great folly and sin to injure or defame any man, and to bring woman into such bad reputation. You can say plenty about other matters.

This drunken Miller answered back immediately and said, “Oswald, dear brother, he is no cuckold who has no wife. But I do not say, therefore, that you are one. There are many good wives, and always a thousand good to one bad. That you know well yourself, if you have not gone mad. Why are you angry now with my tale? I have a wife as well as you, by God, yet for all the oxen in my plough I would not presume to be able to judge myself if I may be a cuckold; I will believe well I am not one. A husband should not be too inquisitive about God’s private matters, nor of his wife’s. He can find God’s plenty there; he need not inquire about the remainder.”

What more can I say, but this Miller would withhold his word for nobody, and told his churl’s tale in his own fashion. I think that I shall retell it here. And therefore I beg every gentle creature, for the love of God, not to judge that I tell it thus out of evil intent, but only because I must truly repeat all their tales, whether they are better or worse, or else tell some of my matter falsely. And therefore whoever wishes not to hear it, let them turn the leaf over and choose another tale; for they shall find plenty of historical matters, great and small, concerning noble deeds, and morality and holiness as well. Do not blame me if you choose incorrectly. The Miller is a churl, you know well, and so was the Reeve (and many others), and the two of them spoke of ribaldry. Think well, and do not blame me, and people should not take a game seriously as well.

A while ago there dwelt at Oxford a rich churl fellow, who took guests as boarders. He was a carpenter by trade. With him dwelt a poor scholar who had studied the liberal arts, but all his delight was turned to learning astrology. He knew how to work out certain problems; for instance, if men asked him at certain celestial hours when there should be drought or rain, or what should happen in any matter; I cannot count every one.

This clerk was named gentle Nicholas. He was well skilled in secret love and consolation; and he was also sly and secretive about it; and as meek as a maiden to look upon. He had a chamber to himself in that lodging-house, without any company, and handsomely decked with sweet herbs; and he himself was as sweet as the root of licorice or any setwall. His Almagest, and other books great and small, his astrolabe, which he used in his art, and his counting-stones for calculating, all lay neatly by themselves on shelves at the head of his bed.

His clothes-press was covered with a red woolen cloth, and above it was set a pleasant psaltery, on which he made melody at night so sweetly that the entire chamber was full of it. He would sing the hymn Angelus ad Virginem, and after that the King’s Note. Often was his merry throat blessed. And so this sweet clerk passed his time by help of what income he had and his friends provided.

This carpenter had newly wedded a wife, eighteen years of age, whom he loved more than his own soul. He was jealous, and held her closely caged, for she was young, and he was much older and judged himself likely to be made a cuckold.

His wit was rude, and he didn’t know Cato’s teaching that instructed that men should wed their equal. Men should wed according to their own station in life, for youth and age are often at odds. But since he had fallen into the snare, he must endure his pain, like other people.

This young wife was fair, and her body moreover was as graceful and slim as any weasel. She wore a striped silken belt, and over her loins an apron white as morning’s milk, all flounced out. Her smock was white and embroidered on the collar, inside and outside, in front and in back, with coal-black silk; and of the same black silk were the strings of her white hood, and she wore a broad band of silk, wrapped high about her hair.

And surely she had a lecherous eye; her eyebrows were arched and black as a sloe berry, and partly plucked out to make them narrow. She was more delicious to look on than the young pear-tree in bloom, and softer than a lamb’s wool. From her belt hung a leather purse, tasseled with silk and with beads of brass.

In all this world there is no man so wise who could imagine such a wench, or so lively a little doll. Her hue shone more brightly than the noble newly forged in the Tower. And as for her singing, it was as loud and lively as a swallow’s sitting on a barn. And she could skip and make merry as any kid or calf following its mother. Her mouth was sweet as honeyed ale or mead, or a hoard of apples laid in the hay or heather. She was skittish as a jolly colt, tall as a mast, and upright as a bolt. She wore a brooch on her low collar as broad as the embossed center of a shield, and her shoes were laced high on her legs. She was a primrose, a pig’s-eye, for a lord to lie in his bed or even a yeoman to wed.

Now sir, and again sir, it so chanced that this gentle Nicholas fell to play and romp with this young wife, as clerks are very artful and sly, on a day when her husband was at Osney. And secretly he caught hold of her genitalia and said: "Surely, unless you will love me, sweetheart, I shall die for my secret love of you. And he held her hard by the thighs and said, "Sweetheart, love me now, or I will die, may God save me!"

She sprang back like a colt in the halter, and wriggled away with her head. "I will not kiss you, in faith," she said. Why, let me be, let me be, Nicholas, or I will cry out, 'Alas! Help!' Take away your hands, by your courtesy!"

But this Nicholas began to beg for her grace, and spoke so fairly and made such offers that at last she granted him her love and swore by Saint Thomas of Kent that she would do his will when she should see her chance.

"My husband is so jealous that unless you are secretive and watch your time, I know very well I am no better than dead. You must be very sly in this thing."

"No, have no fear about that," said Nicholas. "A clerk has spent his time poorly if he can not beguile a carpenter!"

And thus they were agreed and pledged to watch for a time, as I have told. When Nicholas had done so, petted her well on her limbs, and kissed her sweetly, he took his psalter and made melody and played fervently.

Then it happened on a holy day that this wife went to the parish church to work Christ's own works. Her forehead shone as bright as day, since she had scrubbed it when she had finished her tasks.

Now at that church there was a parish clerk named Absalom. His hair was curly and shone like gold, and spread out like a large broad fan; its neat part ran straight and even. His complexion was rosy, and his eyes as gray as goose-quills. His leather shoes were carved in such a way that they resembled a window in Paul's Church. He went clad precisely and neatly all in red hose and a kirtle of a light watchet-blue; the laces were set in it fair and thick, and over it he had a lively surplice, as white as a blossom on a twig. God bless me, but he was a sweet lad!

He knew well how to clip and shave and let blood, and make a quittance or a charter for land. He could trip and dance in twenty ways in the manner of Oxford in that day, and cast with his legs back and forth, and play songs on a small fiddle. He could play on his cittern as well, and sometimes sang in a loud treble. In the whole town there was no brew-house or tavern where any tapster might be that he did not visit in his merrymaking. But to tell the truth he was some-what squeamish about farting and rough speech.

This Absalom, so pretty and fine, went on this holy day with a censer, diligently incensing the wives of the parish, and he cast many longing looks on them, and especially on this carpenter's wife. To look at her seemed to him a sweet employment, as she was so sweet and proper and lusty; I dare say, if she had been a mouse and he a cat, he would have pounced on her immediately. And this sweet parish-clerk had such a love-longing in his heart that at the offertory he would take nothing from any wife; for courtesy, he said, he would take none.

When at night the moon shone very beautifully and Absalom intended to remain awake all night for love's sake, he took his cittern and went forth, amorous and jolly, until he came to the carpenter's house a little after the cocks had crowed, and pulled himself up by a casement-window.

Dear lady, if your will so be,
I pray you that you pity me

He sang in his sweet small voice, in nice harmony with his cittern.

This carpenter woke, heard his song and said without hesitation to his wife, "What, Alison! Don't you hear Absalom chanting this way under our own bedroom-wall?"

"Yes, God knows, John," she answered him, "I hear every bit of it."

Thus it went on; what would you have better than well-enough? From day to day this jolly Absalom wooed her until he was all woe-begone. He remained awake all night and all day, he combed his spreading locks and preened himself, he wooed her by go-betweens and agents, and swore he would be her own page; he sang quavering like a nightingale; he sent her mead, and wines sweetened and spiced, and wafers piping hot from the coals, and because she was from the town he proffered her money. For some people will be won by rich gifts and some by blows and some by courtesy. Sometimes, to show his cheerfulness and skill, he would play Herod on a high scaffold.

But in such a case what could help him? She so loved gentle Nicholas that Absalom may as well go blow the buck's-horn. For all his labor he had nothing but scorn, and thus she made Absalom her ape and turned all his earnest to a joke. This proverb is true—it is no lie. Men say it is just so: "The sly nearby one makes the far dear one loathed." For though Absalom may go mad for it, because he was far from her eye, this nearby Nicholas stood in his light. Now bear yourself well, gentle Nicholas, for Absalom may wail and sing "Alack!"

And so it happened one Saturday that the carpenter had gone to Osney, and gentle Nicholas and Alison had agreed upon this, that Nicholas would create a ruse to beguile this poor jealous husband; and if the game went as planned, she should be his, for this was his desire and hers also. And immediately, without more words, Nicholas would delay no longer, but had food and drink for a day or two carried softly into his chamber, and instructed her say to her husband, if he asked about him, that she did not know where he was; that she had not set eyes upon him all that day and she believed he was in some malady, for not by any crying out could her maid rouse him; he would not answer at all, for nothing.

Thus passed forth all that Saturday; Nicholas lay still in his chamber, and ate and slept or did what he wished, until Sunday toward sundown. This simple carpenter had great wonder about Nicholas, what could ail him. "By Saint Thomas," he said, "I am afraid all is not well with Nicholas. God forbid that he has died suddenly! This world nowadays is so ticklish, surely; to-day I saw carried to church a corpse that I saw at work last Monday. Go up, call at his door," he said to his boy, "or knock with a stone; see how it is, and tell me straight."

This boy went up sturdily, stood at the chamber-door, and cried and knocked like mad: "What! How! What are you doing, master Nicholas? How can you sleep all day long?"

But all was for nothing; he heard not a word. Then he found a hole, low down in the wall, where the cat would usually creep in; and through that he looked far into it and at last caught sight of him.

Nicholas sat ever gaping upward as if he were peering at the new moon. Down went the boy, and told his master in what plight he saw this man.

The carpenter began to cross himself and said, "Help us, Saint Frideswide! People know little what shall happen to them. This man with his astronomy is fallen into some madness or some fit; I always thought how it would end this way. Men were not intended to know God's secrets. Yes, happy is an unlearned man that never had schooling and knows nothing but his beliefs!

"So fared another clerk with his astronomy; he walked in the fields to look upon the stars, to see what was to happen, until he fell into a clay-pit that he did not see! But yet, by Saint Thomas, I am very sorry about gentle Nicholas. By Jesus, King of Heaven, he shall be scolded for his studying if I may. Get me a staff, Robin, so that I can pry under the door while you heave it up. I believe we shall rouse him from his studying!"

And so he went to the chamber door. His boy was a strong lad, and quickly heaved the door up by the hinges, and it immediately fell flat upon the floor. Nicholas sat ever as still as a stone, ever gaping into the air. This carpenter believed he had fallen into despair, and seized him mightily by the shoulders and shook him hard and cried wildly, "What, Nicholas! What, ho! What, look down! Awake, think on Christ's passion; I cross thee from elves and un-earthly creatures!" And at that point he said the night-spell, toward the four corners of the house and on the outside of the threshold of the door:

Jesus Christ and sweet Saint Benedict
Bless this house from every wicked sprit.
For the night-hag, the white pater noster;
Where did you go, Saint Peter's sister?

At last this gentle Nicholas began to sigh sorely, and said, "Alack! Shall the entire world be destroyed again now?"

"What are you saying?" said the carpenter. "What now! Think on God, as we do, we men that work."

"Fetch me a drink," said Nicholas, "and after I will speak privately of a certain thing that concerns you and me both. I will tell it to no other man, you can be sure."

The carpenter went down and came again bringing a large quart of mighty ale; and when each of them had drunk his share, Nicholas shut his door fast and set the carpenter down beside him.

"John, my dear host," he said, "you shall swear to me here on your honor that you will reveal this secret to no creature; for it is Christ's own secret that I show you, and if you tell it to any you are a lost man. For this vengeance you will receive, therefore: if you betray me, you shall run mad!"

"No, may Christ and His holy blood forbid!" said this simple man. "I am no blabber, and though I say it myself, I am not wont to prate. Say what you will, I shall never utter it to man, woman or child, by Him That harrowed hell!"

"Now, John, I will not deceive you," said Nicholas; "I have found by my astrology, as I have been looking in the shining moon, that now a Monday next, about a quarter through the night, there shall fall a rain so wild and mad that never was Noah's flood half so great. This world shall all be drowned in less than an hour, so hideous shall be the downpour. Thus shall all mankind perish in the flood."

"Alas, my wife! And shall she drown?" this carpenter answered, and nearly fell over for sorrow. "Alas, my Alison! Is there no remedy?"

"Why yes, before God, if you will work according to wise advising," said gentle Nicholas; "but you may not work out of your own head. For thus says Solomon, and he was right trustworthy, "Work all by counsel, and you shall never repent." And if you will work after good advice, I undertake without mast or sail to save both her and you and me. Have you not heard how Noah was saved, when our Lord had warned him that the entire world should be destroyed with water?"

"Yes," said the carpenter, "I heard it long, long ago."

"Have you not heard also," said Nicholas, "the woe that Noah and his sons had before he could get his wife aboard? He had rather than all his black rams then, I dare be bound, that she had had a ship all to herself! Do you know then what is best to do? This thing calls for haste, and on an urgent matter one may not preach or delay. Go immediately and get us directly into this house a kneading-trough or else a brewing-tub for each of us (but make sure that they are large), in which we may swim as if in a barge and have in enough provisions for a day - we will need no more. The water shall slacken and run off about nine o'clock on the next day. But Robin your boy must not know of this, and I cannot save your maid Jill either. Do not ask why, for even if you ask me I will not tell God's secret. It ought to suffice you, if your wits are not turning, to have as great a grace as Noah had. I shall save your wife, I promise you. Go your way now, and make haste.

"But when you have obtained these three kneading-tubs for us three, then you shall hang them from the rafters high in the roof, so that no man notice our device. And when you have done this, and laid our provisions in them nicely, and an axe as well to strike the cord in two when the water comes, and when you have broken a hole on high in the gable toward the garden over the barn, so that we may freely go on our way when the great shower is past - then you will float as merrily, I will be bound, as the white duck after her drake. Then will I call out, 'How, Alison! How, John! Be merry; the flood will soon pass.' And you will answer, 'Hail, Master Nicholas! Good morning, I see you well, it is daylight now!' And then we shall be lords over the entire world until we die, just as Noah and his wife!

"But one thing I warn you of strictly. Be well advised on that night when we have entered aboard ship that none of us speaks a word, neither calls nor cries, but we must be in our prayers. For that is God's own precious command. And your wife and you must hang far apart, so that there will be no folly between you, any more in looking than in action. Now that all this plan is explained to you; go, and may God help you! Tomorrow at night, when people are all in bed, we will creep into our kneading-tubs and sit there, awaiting God's grace. Go your way now; I have no time to make a longer sermon of this. Men say thus: "Send the wise and say nothing." You are so wise that there is no need to teach you. Go, save our lives, I entreat you."

This simple carpenter went his way often crying "alack!" and "alas!"; and told the secret to his wife. And she was wary, and knew better than he what this quaint plan was about. But nevertheless she acted as if she would die, and said, "Alas! Go your way at once and help us to escape, or else we are all lost; I am your true, faithful wedded wife. Go, dear spouse, and help to save us!

Lo, how great a thing is feeling! Men may die of imagination, so deep may the impression be. This simple fellow began to quake; he thought he could truly hear Noah's flood come wallowing like the sea to drown his honey sweet Alison; he wept, wailed and made sorrowful expression, and he sighed with many a sorry gust. He went and got himself a kneading-trough, and after that a tub and a cask, sent them secretly to his house and hung them in the roof. With his own hand he made three ladders, to climb by the rungs and uprights into the tubs hanging among the beams; and supplied tub and trough and cask with bread and cheese as well as good ale in a large jug, sufficient for a day. But before he had made all this gear, he sent his serving boy and girl to London about his business. And as it drew toward night on the Monday, he lit no candle, but shut the door and ordered all things as they should be; and, in brief, up they all three climbed, and sat still while a man could walk a furlong.

"Now mum, and say a pater noster!" said Nicholas; and "Mum!" said John, and "Mum!" Alison. This carpenter sat still and said his prayers, ever listening for the rain, if he could hear it.

The dead sleep, for very weariness and apprehension, fell on this carpenter even about curfew-time or a little later, as I suppose; he groaned sorely in the travail of his spirit, and eke snored, for his head lay uneasily. Down the ladder stalked Nicholas, and Alison sped down very softly; and they were in mirth and glee, until the bells began to sound for lauds, and friars in the chancel began to sing.

This parish-clerk, amorous Absalom, always so woe-begone for love, was at Oseney on that Monday to amuse himself and make merry, with a party; and by chance he secretly asked a cloister-monk after John the carpenter. The monk drew him aside out of the church. "I know not," he said; "I have not seen him work here since Saturday. I believe he has gone where our abbot has sent him for timber, for he is accustomed to go for timber and remain at the grange a day or two. Or else he is at home, certainly. In truth I cannot say where he is."

This Absalom grew very merry of heart, and thought, "Now is the time to wake all night, for certainly since daybreak I have not seen him stirring about his door. On my soul, at cockcrow I shall knock secretly at his window which stands low upon his chamber-wall. To Alison now will I tell the whole of my love-longing, and now I shall not fail at the least to have a kiss from her. I shall have some sort of comfort, in faith. My mouth has itched all day long; that is a sign of kissing at least.

All night eke I dreamed I was at a festival. Therefore I will go sleep an hour or two, and then I will wake all night in mirth."

When the first cock had crowed, up rose this frisky lover, and arrayed him in his gayest with all nicety. But first he chewed cardamoms and licorice to smell sweetly, before he had combed his hair, and put a true-love charm under his tongue, for by this he hoped to find favor. He rambled to the carpenter's house, and stood still under the casement, which was so low it reached to his breast. He gave a soft half-cough,—"What do you, sweet Alison, honeycomb? My fair bird, my darling! Awake, sweet cinnamon, and speak to me. You think right little upon my sorrow, who sweat for your love wherever I go!

No wonder though I languish and sweat! I mourn like a lamb after the dug. In faith, darling, I have such love-longing that I mourn like the true turtle-dove. I cannot eat, no more than a maiden."

"Go from the window, Jack-fool," she said. "On my soul, there will be no singing "Come kiss me now." I love another better than you, by heaven, Absalom, and else I were at fault. Go your ways, or I will cast a stone at you, and let me sleep, in the Devil's name!"

"Alas!" he said. "Alackaday that true love was ever so ill bestowed! Then kiss me, since it may be no better, for Jesus' love, and for the love of me."

"Will you then go your way with that?" she said.

"Yes, surely, sweetheart," said this Absalom.

"Then make yourself ready," she said, "I am coming now."

And to Nicholas she said silently, "Now hush, and you shall laugh your fill."

This Absalom set himself down on his knees and said, "I am a lord of the highest degree; for after this I hope there will come more. Sweetheart, your grace, and sweet bird, your favor!"

She unlatches the window, and does so in haste. "Take this," she said, "come now, and move quickly, lest our neighbors see you."

This Absalom wiped his mouth dry. Dark as pitch, or as coal, was the night, and at the window she put out her hole, and Absalom, who knew no better or worse but with his mouth he kissed her naked ass so sweetly, before he was aware of this.

He started aback, and thought something was amiss, for well he knew a woman has no beard. He felt something all rough and long-haired, and said, "Fy! alas! What have I done?"

"Tee hee!" she said, and shut the window, and Absalom went forth with troubled steps.

"A beard! A beard!" said handy Nicholas, "By God's body, this goes fair and well."

This foolish Absalom heard every bit, and on his lips he began to bite angrily, and said to himself, "I shall pay you back."

Who rubs now, and who chafes now, his lips with dust, with sand, with straw, with cloth, with chips, but Absalom, who says over and over, "Alas! I commend my soul unto Satan"? But I would rather be revenged for this insult" he said, "than own this entire town. Alas," he said, "alas, that I did not turn aside!"

His hot love was now cold and entirely quenched; for from that moment that he had kissed her ass, he cared not a straw for things of love, for he was healed of his sickness. Often the things of love he defied, and wept as does a child that is beaten.

This Absalom walked slowly across the street to a smith called Master Gervase, who forged plough-instruments at his forge. He was busily sharpening coulter and share when Absalom knocked very gently and said, "Unlock the door, Gervase, and do it quickly."

"What! Who are you?"

"It is me, Absalom."

"What, Absalom! By the cross, why are you up so early? Eh, God bless! What ails you? Some pretty girl, God knows, has brought you to stir so early. By Saint Neot, you know well what I mean!"

This Absalom cared not a peascod for all his mocking, and returned not a word in kind. He had more wool on his distaff than Gervase knew, and said, "Dear friend, that hot coulter in the chimney—lend it to me. I have something to do with it; and I will bring it you again right away."

"Surely," answered Gervase, "even if it were gold or nobles in a bag all uncounted, you should have it, as I am a faithful smith! Eh, the Devil, what do you want to do with it?"

"That is as it may be," said Absalom. "I shall tell you tomorrow;" and he took up the coulter by the cool handle. Softly he went out the door and went to the wall of the carpenter's house. He coughed first, and knocked withal upon the window, as he did before.

"Who is there that knocks so?" Alison answered. "I warrant it a thief!"

"Why nay," he said, "God knows, my sweet, I am your Absalom, my sweetheart. I have brought you a ring of gold; my mother gave it me, on my life! It is very fine and nicely engraved. I will give you this, if you kiss me!"

This Nicholas had risen to take a piss, and he thought he would contribute to the joke; he should kiss him before he ran off! And he threw up the window in haste and quietly put his ass out—past the buttocks, all the way to the thigh-bone. Thereupon spoke this clerk Absalom, Speak, sweet bird, I know not where thou art. This Nicholas then let fly a fart as great as a thunder-clap, so much so that with the stroke Absalom was almost blinded; and he was ready with his hot iron and smote Nicholas on the ass.

Off went the skin, about a hands-breadth around, the hot coulter burned his rump so, and for the pain he thought he would die. "Help! Water, water! Help, help, for God's sake!" he cried like a madman.

The carpenter started out of his slumber; he heard one cry wildly “Water!”, and thought, “Alas! Noah’s flood is coming now!” He sat up without a word, and with his axe struck the cord in two, and down went tub and all; they stopped for nothing until they came to the floor, and there he lay in a swoon.

Up started Alison and Nicholas, and cried “Help!” and “Alack!” in the street. The neighbors young and old ran to stare upon him as he lay yet in a swoon, for with the fall he had broken his arm.

But he must even digest his own trouble, for when he spoke he was talked down by Alison and gentle Nicholas. They told every man he was mad, he was aghast so of “Noah’s flood” in his fantasy, that of his folly he had bought him three kneading-tubs and had hung them above in the roof; and had prayed them for God’s sake to sit with him in the roof, to keep him company.

People laughed at his odd quirk; into the roof they peered and gawked, and turned all his trouble into mirth. For whatever the carpenter answered, it was all for naught; no man heard his speeches, he was so sworn down by the great oaths of the others that in the entire city he was held as mad. Every clerk then agreed with every other clerk: “the man is mad, my dear brother!” And every creature laughed over this contention.

Thus the carpenter lost his wife, for all his watching and jealousy; and Nicholas was sore burned. This tale is done, and God save the entire company.

Here ends the Miller’s Tale.

The Wife of Bath’s Tale

The Prologue of the Wife of Bath’s Tale

“Experience, though it would be no authority in this world, would be quite sufficient for me, to speak of the woe that is in marriage; for, gentle people, since I was twelve years old—thank God, Who lives forever—I have had five husbands at the church-door (for I have been wedded so often); and all were worthy men in their ranks. But in truth I was told not long ago that since Christ went only once to a wedding, in Cana of Galilee, by that same example he taught me that I should be wedded only once. Lo! Hear what a sharp word Jesus, man and God, spoke on a certain occasion beside a well, in reproof of the Samaritan woman. He said, ‘You have had five husbands; and that man who has you now is not your husband.’ Thus he said, certainly. What he meant by it I cannot say; but I ask, why the fifth man was no husband to the Samaritan woman.

“How many could she have in marriage? At this point I have never in my life heard a designation of the number. Men may divine and interpret up and down, but well I know, surely, God expressly instructed us to increase and multiply. I can well understand that noble text. Likewise, I know well he said also that my husband should leave father and mother and take me. But he did not mention any number, not bigamy or of octogamy. Why should men speak villainously of them?

“Lo, Sir Solomon the wise king! I believe he had more than one wife, and I wish to God it were lawful for me to be refreshed half so often! What a gift of God he had in all his wives! No man who lives in this world now has so many. God knows this noble king, to my thinking, had a merry life with each of them, so joyous was his lot! Blessed be God that I wedded five! And they were the best that I could pick out, both in their bodies and of their coffers. A variety of schools make perfect scholars, and much practice in a variety of employments truly makes the perfect workman. I have the schooling of five husbands. I would welcome the sixth, whenever he shall come! In truth, I will not keep myself wholly chaste; when my husband has departed from the world, then some other Christian man shall wed me. For then, the apostle says, I am free, in God’s name, to wed where I wish.

“He says that it is no sin to be wedded; it is better to be wedded than to burn. What do I care if people speak badly of cursed Lamech and his bigamy? Well I know Abraham was a holy man, and Jacob as well, as far as I know, and each of them had more than two wives. And many other holy men did as well.

“When have you seen that in any time great God forbade marriage explicitly? Tell me, I pray you. Or where did he command virginity? You know as well as I, without a doubt, that the apostle, when he speaks of maidenhood, says that he had no instructions on it. Men may counsel a woman to be single, but counseling is not commanding; he left it to our own judgment. For if God had commanded maidenhood, then with that same word had he condemned marrying. And certainly, if no seed were sown, from where then should virgins spring? Paul dared not command a thing for which his master gave no order. The prize is set for virginity—win it who can. Let us see who runs best.

“But this command is not to be taken by every creature, but only where Almighty God wishes to give it through his might. The apostle was a virgin, I know well, but nevertheless, though he wrote that he wished every creature to be like him, all that is only advice to be a virgin; and he gave me leave and indulgence to be a wife. So likewise, if my spouse should die, there is no shame or charge of bigamy to marry me. It would be good, he said, to touch no woman, for it is a peril to bring together fire and hay. You know what this example may mean.

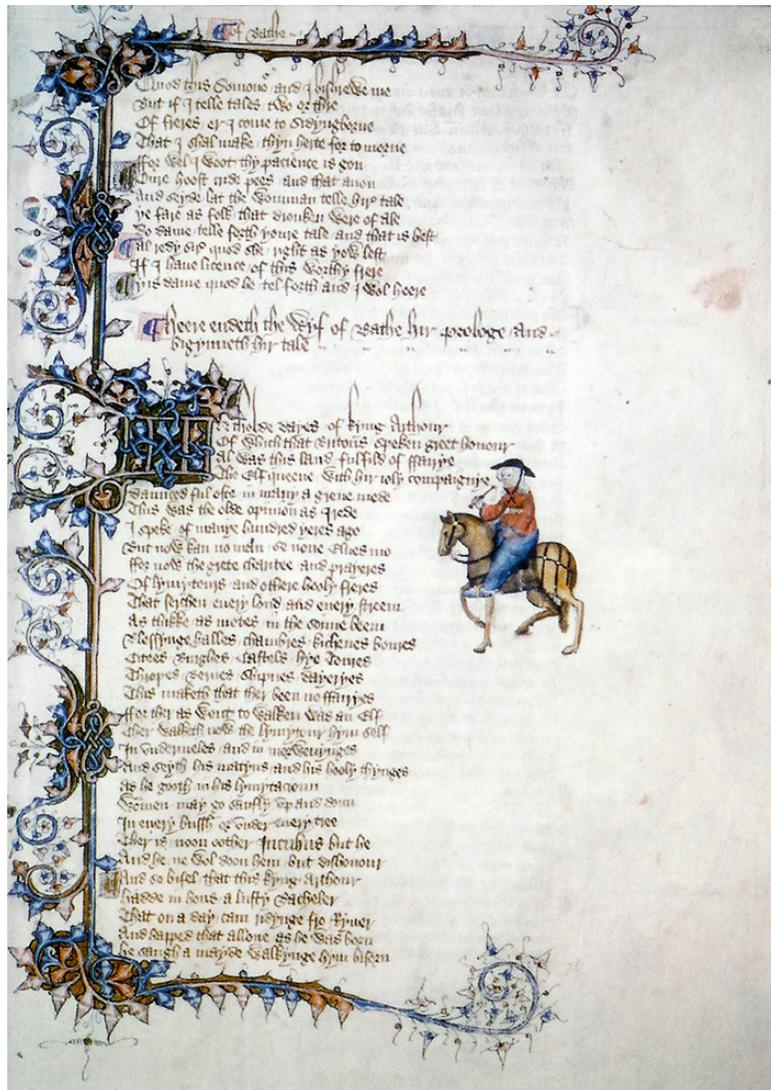

“This is the sum of it all: the apostle held virginity to be more perfect than marriage because of weakness. I call them weak unless man and wife would lead all their life in chastity. I grant it well, I have no malice even if maidenhood were set above remarriage. It pleases them to be clean, body and soul; of my own estate I will make no boast. For you well know that not every vessel in a lord's house is made of gold; some are of wood, and do their lord service. God calls people to him in various manners, and each one has his own gift from—one this, one that, as it pleases God to provide. Virginity is a great perfection, and devoted chastity as well.

But Christ, the fountain of perfection, did not instruct every person to go sell all that he had and give to the poor, and in such a fashion follow him and his footsteps. “He spoke this to those people who wished to be perfect; and by your leave, gentle people, I am not one of those. I will use the flower of my life in the acts and fruits of marriage.

Tell me also, for what purpose were members of procreation made, and made in such a perfect manner? Trust well, they were not made for nothing. Whosoever wishes to interpret may do so, and interpret things up and down that and say that they were made for purging urine and that both our small things were also to know a female from a male and for no other cause—did someone say no? Those with experience know well it is not so. So that scholars will not be angry with me, I say this: that they are made for both; that is to say, for duty and for ease of procreation, providing we do not displease God. Why should men otherwise set down in their books that man shall yield to his wife her debt? Now with what should he make his payment, if he did not use his blessed instrument? They were made then upon a creature to purge urine, and for procreation as well.

But I do not say that every person who has such equipment is bound to go and use it for procreation. For that reason people should men take no heed of chastity. Christ was a virgin and created as a man, as were many saints since the beginning of the world; yet they always lived in perfect chastity. I will not envy any virginity. Let virgins be called bread of purified wheat-seed, and let us wives be called barley-bread; and yet, as Mark can tell, our Lord Jesus refreshed many people with barley-bread. I will persevere in such a state as God has called us to; I am not particular. In wifehood I will use my instrument as freely as my Maker has sent it. If I am unaccommodating to my husband, may God give me sorrow. My husband shall have it both evening and morning, whenever it pleases him to come forth and pay his debt. I will not stop. I will have a husband who will be both my debtor and servant, and have his tribulation upon his flesh, while I am his wife. As long as I live I, and not he, have the power over his body. The apostle told it to me in this very way, and instructed our husbands to love us well. This entire subject pleases me well, every bit.

Up started the Pardoner, and without delay. “Now lady,” he said, “by God and St. John, you are a noble preacher in this matter! I was about to wed a wife; alas! Why should I pay for it so dearly upon my flesh? I would rather not wed any wife this year.”

“Wait! My tale is not yet begun,” she said. “No, before I go you shall drink out of another barrel that will taste worse than ale. And when I have told my story to you about the tribulation in marriage, in which I have been expert all my life (that is to say, I myself have been the scourge), then you may choose whether you will sip of that same barrel that I shall broach. Be mindful, before you come too close; for I shall tell half a score of examples. ‘Whosoever will not be warned by other men, by him shall other men be corrected’: these same words writes Ptolemy; read his Almagest.”

“Lady,” said this Pardoner, “I would pray you, if it were your pleasure, tell your tale as you began, hold back for no man, and teach us young men from your experience.”

“Gladly,” she said, “if it may please you. But I beg all of you in this company, if I speak according to my fancy, do not take it amiss. For my intent is but to make sport. Now, sirs, I will continue.

“May I never see another drop of ale or wine, if I did not tell the truth about my husbands, as three of them were good, and two of them were bad. The three men were good, rich and old, and they hardly could keep their obligation to me, by which they were bound to me. By God, you know well what I mean by this. May God help me, I laugh when I think how pitifully I made them work at night! And, by my faith, I found it useless. I did not need to make an effort or pay them any respect to win their love. They loved me so well, by God above, that I set no value on their love. A wise woman will always attempt to win love where she has none; but since I had them wholly in my hand and had all their land, why should I bother to please them, unless it were for my profit and pleasure? I ruled them so, by my faith, that many nights they sang ‘alas!’

“Not for them, I believe, was fetched the bacon that some men win at Dunmow in Essex. I governed them so well by my rules that each of them was blissful and glad to bring me beautiful things from the fair. They were glad when I spoke friendly to them, for God knows, I chided them without mercy. Now listen, you wise wives who can understand, hear how craftily I behaved myself.

“Thus shall you speak, and thus you shall put them in the wrong, for there is no man who can swear and lie half so boldly as a woman. I say this for the benefit of wise wives when they have made a little misstep. A wise wife, if she knows what is good for her, shall make a man believe that the jackdaw is mad, and shall use her own maid as a witness to confirm it.

“But now hear how I spoke: -’Old sir fogey, is this how you would have things? Why is my neighbor’s wife so fine? She is honored everywhere she goes, while I have no decent clothes and must sit at home. Are you in love? What are you doing at my neighbor’s house? Is she so fair? What do you whisper with our maid? God bless! Leave behind your tricks, old sir lecher! And if I have a friend or a gossip, completely innocent, and I walk to his house or amuse myself there, you chide me like a fiend. You come home as drunk as a mouse and sit on your bench preaching, with no good reason. You say to me, it is a great evil to wed a poor woman, for the cost; and if she were rich, of noble birth, then you say that it is a torment to suffer her pride and her melancholy. And if she were fair, you say that every lecher will have her, you very knave! She who is assailed on every side cannot remain in chastity for long.

“You say that some folk desire us for our wealth, some for our figure, some for our beauty, some because we can sing or dance, some for our manners and mirth, and some for our hands and slim arms. Thus all goes to the Devil, by your account.

“You say that a castle wall can not be defended when it is assailed so long from every side. And if a woman be foul, then you say that she covets every man she sees, and will leap on him like a spaniel, until she find some man to do business with her. You say no goose in the lake that is too grey to look for a mate. And you say that it is a hard matter to control a thing that no man would be willing to keep.

“Thus you say, old fool, when you are going to bed; that no wise man need marry, nor any man who hopes for heaven. With a wild thunder-clap and fiery lightning-bolt may your withered neck be snapped in two! You say that leaky houses, smoke, and chiding wives, make men flee from their own homes.

“Ah, God bless! What ails such an old man to scold like this? You say that we wives will cover our vices until we are safely married, and then we show them. That is a villain’s proverb! You say that oxen, asses, horses, and hounds are tested for some time before men buy them, and so are basins, wash-bowl, spoons, stools, pots, clothes, attire, and all such household stuff; but people make no test of wives until they are wedded. And then, you old rascally dotard, you say, we will show our vices.

“You say also it displeases me unless you praise my beauty and gaze ever upon my face and call me “fair lady” everywhere; and unless you make a feast on my birthday, and dress me gay and freshly; and unless you do honor to my nurse, and to my maid in my bower, and to my father’s family—all this you say, old barrel-full of lies.

“And yet you have gathered a false suspicion of our apprentice Jankin, for his crisp hair shining like fine gold, and because he escorts me back and forth. I would not have him, even if you should die tomorrow! But tell me this—and bad luck to you!—why do you hide the keys of your chest from me? By God, they are my goods as well as yours! Why do you intend to make a fool of the mistress of your house? Now by the lord who is called St. James, however you may rage, you shall not be master both of my body and of my goods; you must give up one of them, in spite of your eyes.

“What good does it do if you inquire after me or spy upon me? You want to lock me in your chest, I believe! You should say, “Wife, go where you wish, take your pleasure, I will believe no tales; I know you for a true wife,

Lady Alice.” We love no man who takes note or care where we go; we wish to have our freedom. May he be blessed of all men, that wise astrologer, Sir Ptolemy, who says this proverb in his book Almagest, “Of all men, he who never cares who has the world in hand has the greatest wisdom.” You are to understand by this proverb that you have enough: why do you need to care how well-off other people are? For in truth, old fogey, you shall have plenty of pleasing thing in the evening. He who will forbid a man to light a candle at his lantern is too great a miser; by God, he should have light, nevertheless. So you have enough; you need not complain.

“You say also that if we make ourselves amorous with clothing and with costly dress, it would be a peril to our chastity; and yet—may the plague take you!—you must confirm it with these words of the apostle: “Ye women shall apparel yourselves in garments made with chastity and shame,” he said, “and not with tressed hair and splendid gems and pearls, nor with gold, nor rich clothes.” I would not give a fly for your text or your rubric.

“You said also I was like a cat; for a cat, if someone were to singe the cat’s skin, will always dwell at home; but if she were sleek and elegant in her fur, she will not remain in the house an hour, but before any day would dawn, will go forth to show her skin and go a-caterwauling. This is to say, sir rogue, if I am finely dressed, I will run out to show my clothes.

“Sir old fool, what ails you to spy after me? Even if you were to ask Argus to be my sentry with his hundred eyes as best he can, in faith, he shall not keep watch over me unless it suits me. Still I could deceive him, as I hope to prosper!

“You say also that there are three things that trouble this entire world, and that no creature can endure the fourth. Oh, dear sir rascal, may Jesus shorten your life! Still you preach and say a hateful woman is considered one of these adversities. Are there no other things you can use for comparison without an innocent wife being one of them?

“You compare woman’s love to hell, or to barren land where no water can lie. You compare it also to wildfire; the more it burns, the more it desires to consume everything that can be burned. You say that just as worms destroy a tree, so too a wife destroys her husband; those who are tied to women know this.

“Gentle people, in this very way, as you can see, I would firmly swear to my old husbands, that they said this in their drunkenness; and all was false, except I got Jankin and my niece to be my witnesses. O Lord! The pain and woe I did them, though they were innocent, by God’s sweet suffering! For I could bite and whinny like a horse. I knew how to complain, even if I was guilty; or else I would have often been undone. He who first comes to the mill, grinds first; I complained first, and thus our war was ended. They were very glad to excuse themselves hurriedly of things that they never had done in all their lives. I would accuse my old husband of visiting prostitutes, even when they were so sick that they could scarcely stand.

“Yet I tickled his heart because he thought that I had such great fondness for him. I swore that all my walking about at night was to spot wenches whom he slept with. Under that pretext I had many privy jests at him; for all such wit is given to us when we are born. God has given deceit, weeping, and spinning to women by nature, so long as they live.

“And thus I boast of one thing for myself: in the end I had the better in every way, by cunning, or by force, or by some type of device, such as continual murmuring or grumbling. And most chiefly at night they had ill fortune; then I would scold and grant him no pleasure. I would not stay in bed any longer if I felt his arm over my side, until he had paid his ransom to me. And therefore I tell this to every man: let he who can, prosper, for everything has its price. Men may lure no hawks with an empty hand. For the sake of gain I would give them their way, and pretend to have an appetite; and yet I never had pleasure in bacon, from Dunmow or elsewhere. And so I would be chiding them all the time; even if the pope had sat beside them, by my word, I would not spare them at their own table. I repaid them word for word; so may the Almighty Lord help me, if I ere to make my testament right now, I would not owe them a word that has not been repaid. By my wits I made it so that they were glad to surrender, as their best option, or we would have never been at peace. For though my husband looked like a mad lion, he was nonetheless bound to fail in his purpose.

“Then would I say, ‘Good dear, take note how meekly Wilkin our sheep looks; come near, my spouse, let me kiss your cheek. You should be all patient and mild, and have a sweet tender conscience, since you thus preach of the patience of Job. Always endure, since you can preach so well; and unless you do, we must teach you for sure that it is pleasant to have a wife in peace. Truly, one of us two must bend to the other and since a man is more reasonable than a woman, you must be patient. What ails you to grumble and groan in this way? Is it because you want to have my body all to yourself? Why, take it all! Have every bit! By Peter, I curse you, but you love it well! If I would sell my beautiful thing, I could walk as fresh as a rose, but I will keep it for your own taste. You are to blame, by God! I tell you the truth.” We had this sort of words between us; but now I will speak about my fourth husband.

“My fourth husband was a reveller, that is to say, he had a paramour—and I was young and full of frolic, stubborn and strong, and jolly as a magpie. I could dance well to a little harp, and sing like any nightingale, when I had taken a draught of sweet wine. Metellius, the filthy churl, the swine, who with a staff bereft his spouse of her life, because she drank wine, would not have frightened me from drink, if I had been his wife! And when I think of wine I must think of Venus; for just as surely as cold engenders hail, a lecherous mouth leads to a lecherous body. There is no defense in a woman who is full of wine, as lechers know by experience.

“Lord Christ! But when I think about my youth and mirth, it tickles me at the root of my heart! To this very day it does my heart good that I have had my fling in my time. But alas! Age, which evenenoms all things, has bereft me of my beauty and energy. Let them go. Farewell! May the Devil go with them! The flour is gone, and there is no more to say; now I sell the bran as best as I can. But even now I will strive to be very merry.

“Now I will tell of my fourth husband. I say I had great resentment in my heart that he had pleasure in any other. But by the Lord and Saint Joce, he was paid back! I made a cross from the same wood for his back; not with my body, in any foul manner, but truly I offered people such generous hospitality that for anger and absolute jealousy I made him fry in his own grease. By God, I was his purgatory on earth, wherefore I hope that his soul is in glory now.

“For God knows, he sat often and sang, when his shoe pinched him bitterly: No creature knew, except God and he, how sorely I twisted him in so many ways. He died when I returned home from Jerusalem, and lies buried under the cross-beam, albeit his tomb is not quite as elaborately crafted as the sepulcher of Darius that Apelles so skilfully made. It would have been a waste to bury him at such an expense! Farewell to him; he is now in his grave and in his coffin—God rest his soul!

“Now will I speak of my fifth husband—may God never allow his soul to enter hell! And yet he was the most villainous to me, as I can still feel on my ribs all in a row, and ever shall to my ending day. But he was so fresh and merry, and could sweet-talk so well that, even if he had beaten me on every bone, he could soon win my beautiful thing again. I believe I loved him best, because he was sparing in his love.

“We women have, to tell the truth, an odd fantasy on this matter; whatever thing we can not easily win we will cry after continually and crave. “Forbid us something, and we desire that thing. Press on us hard, and then we will flee. With much reserve we offer our merchandise; a large crowd at the market makes our wares expensive; wares offered at too low a price will be thought to have little value. Every wise woman knows this.

“My fifth husband—may God bless his soul—which I took for love and not for riches, was sometime an Oxford scholar; and he had left school, and went to board with my good friend, who dwelt in our town. May God keep her soul! Her name was Alisoun. She knew my heart and my private thoughts better than our parish priest, by my soul! To her I revealed all my secrets.

“For had my husband peed on a wall, or done something that would have cost him his life, I would have told his every bit of his secret to her, and to another worthy wife, and to my niece, whom I loved well. And I did so often, God knows, which often made his face red and hot for true shame, and he would blame himself for telling me so great a secret.

“And so it happened that once, in Lent, (as I so often did, I visited my friend, for I still always loved to be merry, and to walk from house to house in March, April, and May, to hear various tales) that Jankin the clerk, my friend dame Alice, and I walked into the fields. All that spring my husband was in London; I had a better opportunity to play, and to see and to be seen by lusty folk. What did I know about how my fortune was to be shaped or in what place? Therefore, I made my visits to holy day vigils, to processions, to sermons, to these pilgrimages, to miracle-plays, and to weddings, and wore my gay scarlet gowns. These worms and moths and mites never ate a bit of them, upon my peril! And do you know why? Because they were well used.

“Now I will tell what happed to me. I say that we walked in the fields, until in truth we had such flirtation together, this clerk and I, that in my foresight I spoke to him, and told him how he should wed me, if I were widowed. For, I am not speaking in boast; I was certainly never to this point without provision for marriage—nor for other things as well. I think that a mouse’s heart is not worth a leek if the mouse has but one hole to run to; and if that one fails, then all is over.

“I persuaded him to think that he had enchanted me; my mother taught me that trick. And I said also I dreamed of him all night; he would have slain me as I lay on my back, and my whole bed was full of real blood; but yet I hoped that he should bring good fortune to me, for blood signifies gold, as I was taught. And all of it was false; I dreamed not a bit of it, but I followed my mother’s teaching all along, as well as in other things besides.

“But now, sir, let me see; what shall I say now? Aha! By God, I have it again. When my fourth husband lay on his bier, I wept ever and made a sorrowful expression, as wives must, for it is the custom; and I covered my face with my kerchief. But since I had been provided with a new mate, I wept rather little, I vow.

“In the morning my husband was borne to church by the neighbors, who mourned for him, and our scholar Jankin was one of them. So may God help me, when I saw him go after the bier, I thought he had so clean and fair a pair of legs and feet that I gave him all my heart to keep. He was twenty winters old, I believe, and if I am to tell the truth, I was forty. But I always had a colt’s tooth. I was gap-toothed; I bore the print of Saint Venus’ birthmark, and that became me well. I was a lusty one, and fair, and rich, and youthful, and merry of heart, may God help me.

“For certainly, I am dominated by the planet Venus in my senses, and my heart is dominated by the planet Mars. Venus gave me my love for pleasure and my wantonness, and Mars my sturdy hardihood. My ascendant was Mars in Taurus. Alas, alas! That ever love was thought a sin! I followed ever my inclination by virtue of my constellation. That made it that I could not withhold my chamber from any good fellow. Yet I have the mark of Mars upon my face and in another private place as well. May God be my salvation indeed, I never loved discreetly, but always followed my appetite, whether he was short or tall, black or white it did not matter to me, as long as he pleased me, how poor he was, nor of what station.

“What should I say but at the end of a month this jolly clerk Jankin, who was so debonair, wedded me with great splendor? And I gave him all the land and wealth that I had ever been given; but afterwards I repented myself sorely, for he would allow nothing that I desired. By God, he struck me once on the ear! That was because I tore a leaf out of his book and my ear grew entirely deaf because of the blow. I was as stubborn as a lioness, and a very chatterbox with my tongue, and I would walk as I had done before from house to house, though he had sworn I should not. For this reason he would often make homilies and teach me old Roman histories how Symplicius Gallus left his wife and forsook her for all his days, just because he saw her one day looking out of his door with her head uncovered.

“He told me the name of another Roman who forsook his wife also because without his knowledge she was to a summer game. And then he would seek in his Bible that proverb of the Ecclesiast where he commands and firmly forbids that a man should allow his wife to go wander about. Then indeed he would say just this,

“He who builds his house out of fallows,
And spurs his blind horse over fallows,
And allows his wife to seek hallows,
Then should be hanged upon the gallows.”

But all for nothing; I did not care one acorn for his proverbs or his old saying, and I would not be scolded by him. I hate anyone who tells me my faults; and, God knows, so too do more of us than I. This made him insanelly furious with me, but I would not tolerate him in any case.

“Now, by Saint Thomas, I will tell you the truly, why I tore a leaf out of his book, for which he struck me so that I became deaf. He had a book which he would be still reading, night and day, for his amusement. He called it Valerius and Theophrastus; he always laughed uproariously at this book. And there was also once a scholar at Rome, a cardinal, named Saint Jerome, who composed a book against Jovinian; and besides this in my husband’s book there were Tertullian, Chrysippus, Trotula, and Heloise, who was abbess not far from Paris, and also the Proverbs of Solomon, Ovid’s Art of Love and many other books; and all these were bound in one volume.

“And every night and day, when he had leisure and freedom from other outside occupation, it was his habit to read in this book about wicked women; of them he knew more lives and legends than there are of good women in the Bible. For, trust well, it is an impossibility that any scholar will speak well of women, unless it would be of the lives of holy saints; but never of any other woman. Who painted the Lion, tell me? By God, if women had written histories, as scholars have in their chapels, they would have written about men more evil than all the sons of Adam could redress.

“The children of Mercury and the children of Venus are contrary in their actions; Mercury loves wisdom and knowledge, and Venus revelry and extravagance. And, because of their contrary natures, each of these planets descends in sign of the zodiac in which the other is most powerful; thus Mercury is depressed in Pisces, where Venus is exalted, and Venus is depressed where Mercury is exalted. Therefore no woman is praised by any scholar. When the scholar is old and entirely unable to give Venus service that is even worth his old shoe, then he sits down and in his dotage writes that women cannot keep their marriage vow!

“But now to my tale—why I was beaten for a book, by God, as I told you. One night Jankin, our husband, sat by the fire and read in his book, first about Eve, for whose wickedness all mankind was brought to misery, for which Jesus Christ Himself was slain, Who redeemed us with His heart’s blood. Lo! Here you may read explicitly about woman, that she was the ruin of all mankind.

“Then he read to me how Samson lost his hair in his sleep; his sweetheart cut it with her shears, through which treason he lost both his eyes. Then I tell you he read me about Hercules and his Dejanira, who caused him to set fire to himself. Nor did he in any way forget the penance and woe which Socrates had with his two wives, how his wife Xantippe cast piss on his head; this blameless man sat still as a stone, wiped his head, and dared say no more than, “before thunder ceases, the rain comes.”

“Of his cursedness my husband found a relish in the tale of Pasiphae, queen of Crete. Fie! Speak no more of her horrible lust and desire—it is a grisly thing. He read with good devotion about Clytemnestra, who for her wantonness treacherously caused her husband’s death. He told me also for what cause Amphiarus perished at Thebes; my husband had a legend about his wife Eriphyle, who for a brooch of gold secretly informed the Greeks where her husband had hidden himself; for this reason he met a sorry fate at Thebes. He told me of Livia and Lucilia, who both caused their husbands to die, the one for hate, the other for love. Livia, late one evening, poisoned her husband, because she had become his foe; the wanton Lucilia so loved her husband that she gave him a love-drink, that she might always be in his mind, but of such power that he was dead before morning.

“And thus in one way or the other husbands came to sorrow. And then he told me how one Latumius lamented to Arrius, his fellow, how there grew in his garden such a tree on which, he said, his three wives had hanged themselves with desperate heart. ‘Oh dear brother, give me a slip from this same blessed tree,’ said this Arrius, ‘and it shall be planted in my garden!’

“He read about wives of later times, some of whom have murdered their husbands in their sleep, and had sex with their lovers while the corpse lay all night flat on the floor. And some have driven nails into their husband’s brains while they slept. And some have given them poison in their drink. He spoke more evil than a heart can devise.

“And in all this he knew more proverbs than blades of grass grow in this world. He said, ‘It is better to have your dwelling with a lion or a foul dragon, than with a woman accustomed to scorning.’ ‘It is better,’ he said, ‘to dwell high in the roof, than down in the house with an angry woman; they are so wicked and contrary that they forever hate what their husbands love.’

“He said, ‘A woman casts her shame away when she casts off her undergarments.’ And furthermore, ‘A beautiful woman, unless she is also chaste, is like a gold ring in a sow’s nose.’ Who would think or imagine the woe and pain in my heart.

“And when I saw that he would never leave reading all night in this cursed book, all of the sudden I plucked three leaves out of his book, even as he was reading, and I also struck him on the cheek with my fist so that he fell down backward into our fire. And he started up like a mad lion, and struck me on the head with his fist so that I lay as dead on the floor.

“And he was aghast when he saw how still I was, and would have fled on his way, until at last I came out of my swoon. ‘Oh, have you slain me, false thief,’ I said, ‘and have you murdered me thus for my land? Before I die, I will still kiss you.’ And he came nearer and kneeled down gently and said, ‘Dear sister Alisoun, so God help me, I shall never strike you again! You yourself are to blame for what I have done. Forgive me for it; and I beg you for that.’ - And yet again I hit him on the cheek, and said, ‘Thief, I am revenged this much. Now I will die; I can speak no more.’

“But at last with great pain and grief, we fell into agreement between ourselves. He put the full bridle into my hand, to have the governance of house and estate, and over his tongue and hands as well. And I made him burn his book then and there.

“And when I had got for myself all the sovereignty, through a master-stroke, and when he said, ‘My own faithful wife, do as you will the rest of your days; be the guard of your honor, and of my dignity also,’ we had never a dispute after that day. God help me so, I was as loving to him as any wife between Denmark and India, and as true also; and so was he to me. And I pray to God, Who sits in glory, so bless his soul for His sweet compassion! Now I will relate my story, if you will listen.”

The Friar, when he had heard all this, laughed and said, “Now, Madame, so may I have joy, this is a long preamble of a tale!”

When the Summoner heard the Friar make an outcry, he said, “Lo! By God’s two arms! A friar will evermore be meddling. Lo, good men! A fly and a friar will fall into every dish and every affair. Why do you speak of preambling? What! Amble or trot, or hold your peace and go sit down! You hinder our sport in this way.”

“Yes, is that what you want, sir Summoner? Now by my faith,” said the Friar, “I shall tell, before I go, such a tale or two of a summoner that all the people here shall laugh.”

“Now, Friar, I curse your face,” said this Summoner, “and I curse myself, unless I tell stories, two or three, of friars, before I get to Sittingborne, that shall make your heart grieve, for I know well your patience has already left you.”

“Peace, and now!” cried our Host; and said, “Let the woman tell her tale. You act like people who are drunk with ale. Please, Madame, tell your tale; and that is best.”

“All ready, sir, just as you wish,” she said, “if I have the permission of this worthy Friar.”

“Yes, Madame,” he said, “tell your tale now, and I will listen.”

Here ends the Prologue of the Wife of Bath.

Here begins the Tale of the Wife of Bath.

In the old days of King Arthur, of whom Britons speak great glory, this land was entirely filled with fairy power. The elf-queen danced often with her merry company in many green meadows. This long ago was the belief, as I find in books. I speak of many hundred years ago; but in our times no man can see elves any more.

For now the great charity and the prayers of begging friars and other holy friars, who, as thick as motes in a sunbeam, reach every land and every stream, blessing halls, chambers, kitchens, bowers, cities, towns, castles, villages, barns, stables, dairies—all this causes there to be no elves. For where a fairy was accustomed to walk, there the begging friar himself walks now, in the mornings or the afternoons, and says his matins and his holy things as he goes along in his begging. Women may go up and down safely; in every bush or under every tree, there is no incubus, except him, and he will do nothing but dishonor them.

And so it happened that this King Arthur had in his court a lusty young knight, who one day came riding from the river; and it happened that he saw walking ahead of him a maiden, whom he ravished, in spite of all her resistance. For this violation there was such clamor and such appeal to King Arthur, that the knight was condemned by course of law to die; and perhaps the statute in place then was so severe that he would have lost his head, if the queen and other ladies had not so long begged the king for mercy, until he granted him his life at that point, and placed him entirely at the queen's will, to choose whether she would save him or let him die.

The queen thanked the king very heartily; and after this, upon a day when she saw the opportunity, she spoke in this way to the knight: "You stand now," she said, "in such a plight that you have even now no assurance of your life. I grant you life, if you can tell me what thing it is that women desire most. Beware, and guard your neck-bone from iron! And if you cannot tell it right now, I will still give you leave to go for twelve months and a day, to search out and learn an answer sufficient for this point. And before you depart, I will have security that you will yield up your body in this place."

This knight was woeful, and he sighed sorrowfully. But what! He could not do just as he pleased. And, with such a reply that God would provide for him, at last he chose to depart and come at the very end of the year; and he took his leave and went forth along his way.

He sought every house and place where he hoped to find such luck as to learn what women love most. But he could arrive at no coast where he could find two creatures agreeing together on this matter. Some said that women best love riches; some said honor; some said mirth; some, fancy clothes; some, pleasure in bed, and to be widowed often and re-wed. Some said that our hearts are most eased when we be flattered and gratified.

They came very near the truth; a man shall best win us by flattery, I will not deny it, and we are caught by attentiveness and diligence, both great and small. And some said how we love best to be free and to do just as we wish, and that no man should reprove us for our faults, but say that we are wise and never foolish at all. For in truth there is nobody among us who will not kick if someone would claw us on a sore place, just because he tells us the truth. Try this, and he shall find it out that it is true. For though we may be full of vice within, we wish to be considered wise and clean of sin.

And some said that we have great delight to be accounted stable and trustworthy and steadfast in one purpose, and never reveal what men tell us. But that sort of talk is not worth a rake-handle, by God! We women can conceal nothing. Take witness of Midas. Would you like to hear the tale?

Ovid, among other little things, says that Midas had two ass's ears growing upon his head under his long hair, which deformity he hid artfully from every man's sight, as best he could, so that nobody knew of it, except his wife. He loved her most and trusted her; and he asked her to tell of his disfigurement to no creature. She swore to him, "No," not even to gain all the world would she do that villainy and sin, to bring her husband so foul a name; for her own honor she would not do it.

But nevertheless she felt she should die, to hide a secret so long; it swelled so sorely about her heart, it seemed to her, that some word needed to burst from her. And since she dared tell it to no human creature, she ran down to a nearby marsh; her heart was ablaze until she arrived there.

And as a bittern bumbles in the mire, she laid her mouth down unto the water: "Betray me not, you water, with your sound," she said; "I tell it to you, and to nobody else. My husband has two long ass's ears. Now my heart is whole and well again; now it is out. In very truth I could keep it in no longer."

By this you may see that though we wait a time, we can conceal no secret forever; it must come out. If you wish to hear the remainder of the tale, read Ovid; you can find it out there.

This knight, about whom my tale chiefly is, when he saw he could not come by it, that is to say, what women love most—the spirit in his breast was so sorrowful. But home he went, as he could not remain. The day had come when he had to turn homeward. And as he went, deep in care, it happened that he rode under the edge of a forest, where he saw twenty-four ladies and more in a dance. Eagerly he drew toward this dance, in hope of learning some piece of wisdom. But in truth, before he arrived there entirely, the dance vanished—he did not know where it went. He saw no living creature there, except a woman sitting on the grass—no one could imagine a fouler creature.

At the approach of the knight this old woman arose and said, "Sir knight, there is no path that lies this way. Tell me, by your faith, what do you seek? Peradventure it may be better for you; these old people know many things."

"My dear mother," said this knight, "in truth I am just a dead man, unless I can say what thing it is that women desire most. If you could instruct me, I would repay you well for your work."

"Pledge me your word here on my hand," she said, "that you will do the first thing that I require of you, if it should lie in your power; and before it is night I will tell it you."

“Take my pledge here,” said the knight, “I agree.”

“Then,” she said, “I dare to boast that your life is safe; for upon my soul I will guarantee that the queen will say as I do. Show me the proudest of the whole court, who wears a kerchief or other head-dress and who dares say no to what I shall teach you. Let us go on, without further words.” Then she whispered a word in his ear, and told him to be glad and have no fear.

When they had arrived at the court, this knight said he had kept his day, as he had promised, and his answer was ready. At that time many noble wives were assembled to hear his answer, and many maidens, and many widows (because they be wise); and the queen herself sat as judge. And then this knight was summoned.

Silence was commanded to every creature, and the knight was ordered to tell in public what thing mortal women most love. This knight stood not like a dumb beast, but without delay answered the question with manly voice, so that all the court heard it.

“My liege lady, over all this world” he said, “women wish to have sovereignty as well over her husband as her love, and to have mastery over him. This is your greatest desire, though you may slay me for this. Do as you wish; I am here at your will.”

In all the court there was neither wife nor maiden nor widow to contradict what he replied, but all declared he was worthy to have his freedom. And at that word, the old woman, whom the knight had seen sitting on the grass, started up.

“Mercy, my sovereign lady!” she said. “Do me justice, before your court departs. I taught the knight this answer, for which he pledged me his word that he would do the first thing I should require of him, if it lay in his power. Before the court, then, I pray you, sir knight,” she said, “that you take me as your wife; for you well know that I have saved your life. If I speak falsely, say no to me, upon your faith!”

This knight answered, “Alas and alack! I know full well that this was my promise. But for the love of God, please choose another request! Take all my goods, and let my body go.”

“No, then,” she answered, “I curse us both. For though I may be ugly, poor, and old, I would like none of all the metal or ore that is buried under the earth or lies upon it, only that I would be your wife, and your love also.”

“My love!” he said, “No, my damnation! Alas that any of my kindred should be so foully disgraced by such a match!”

But all this was for nothing. This is the conclusion, that he was constrained, and had to wed her. And he took his old wife and went to bed.

Now perhaps some men would say that through my negligence I take no care to tell you all the joy and all the preparations that there were at the celebration that day. To this point I shall briefly answer, and say there was no joy nor celebration at all; but only heaviness and much sorrow. For he wedded her secretly the next morning. And he was so miserable that he hid himself the rest of the day like an owl, as his wife looked so ugly.

Great was his misery when he was alone with his wife; he tossed about and turned back and forth. His old wife lay always smiling, and said, “Ah, God bless, dear husband! Does every knight act this way with his wife? Is this the way of King Arthur’s household? Is every knight of his so hard to please? I am your own love and your wife also, and I have saved your life, and surely, I have never yet done you any wrong. Why do act this way on this first night? You act like a man who has lost his wit. What is my guilt? Tell me, for the love of God, and if I have the power, it shall be amended.”

“Amended!” said this knight. “Alas! No, no! It can not be amended forevermore! You are so loathly and so old, and come of so low a lineage as well, that it is small wonder that I toss and turn. I wish to God my heart would burst!”

‘Is this,’ she said, ‘the cause of your unrest?’

‘Yes, certainly, and no wonder,’ he said.

“Now, sir,” she replied, “I could amend all this before three days had passed, if I wish, so that you might bear yourself toward me well.

“But when you speak of such gentility as is descended from ancient wealth—so that you knights should therefore would be gentlemen of breeding—such arrogance is not worth a hen. Look who is always most virtuous, openly and secretly, and most inclines to do what gentle deeds he can; take him for the gentlest man. Christ wishes that we claim our gentility from Him, not from our ancestors’ ancient wealth. For though all their heritage of our ancestors, by reason of which we claim high rank, may descend to us, yet they cannot at all bequeath to any of us their virtuous living, which made them to be called gentle men and to bid us follow to them and do in like manner.

The wise poet of Florence, who is named Dante, speaks well on this matter. Lo, this is what Dante’s says in his poetry: “Seldom does a man climb to excellence on his own slim branches, for God, from his goodness, wills that we claim or gentility from Him.” For we may claim nothing from our ancestors, except for temporal things that can be injured and impaired.

“Every creature also knows this as well as I, that if gentility were planted by nature in a certain family all down the line, openly and privately, then they would never cease to do the fair duties of gentility; they could never do any base or vicious deed. Take fire and bear it into the darkest house between here and the mount of Caucasus, and let the doors be shut and leave that place. Nevertheless the fire will burn and blaze as fairly as though twenty thousand men witnessed it; on peril of my life, it will keep to its natural duty until it dies.

“Here you may well see how nobility hangs not from ancient possessions, since people do not always perform its works, as does the fire, according to its nature. For, God knows, one may often see a lord’s son do vicious and shameful deeds; and he who wishes to be esteemed for his gentility because he was born of a noble house and had virtuous and noble ancestors, and yet himself will not perform the deeds of gentility nor follow after his gentle ancestor who is dead, he is not gentle, even if he is a duke or an earl; for base and sinful deeds make a commoner. For gentility then would be nothing but renown of your ancestors for their high worthiness, which is something that has nothing to do with you. Your gentility comes only from God. Then our true gentility comes from divine grace, and was in no fashion bequeathed to us with our earthly station.

“Think how noble was that Tullius Hostilius, as Valerius tells, who rose out of poverty to high nobility. Read Seneca, and Boethius as well; there you shall see expressly that he who does noble deeds is noble. And therefore, dear husband, I conclude in this way: albeit my ancestors were untutored, yet may the high God—and so I hope—grant me grace to live virtuously. Then I am noble, when I begin to live virtuously and to abandon evil.

“And you reproach me for poverty; but the high God on whom we believe chose freely to live in poverty. And surely every man, maiden, or wife, may well know that Jesus, King of Heaven, would not choose a wicked manner of living. Truly cheerful poverty is an honorable thing, so will Seneca say, and other clerks. Whoever keeps himself content with his poverty, I count as rich, even if he does not have not a shirt! He who covets is a poor creature, for he wishes to have that which is not within his power. But he who has nothing, nor covets things, is rich, albeit you count him as only a serving-lad.

“True poverty sings a song of its own. Concerning poverty, Juvenal says merrily:

“The poor man, when he goes along the way,
Before the thieves, he can still sing and play.”

Poverty is a hateful good, I suppose, a great remover from the busyness of the world, and a great teacher of wisdom to one who takes it in patience. All this is poverty, though it may seem wretched; and a possession that no creature will challenge. When a man is humbled, often poverty allows him to know his God and himself as well. It seems to me that poverty is a magnifying glass through which he may see who his true friends are. And therefore, sir, I pray, so that I will not grieve you, scorn me no more for my poverty.

“Now, sir, you reproach me for my old age. And surely, sir, though there may be no authority in any book to tell you so, yet you honorable gentlefolk say that men should do courtesy to an old creature, and for your gentle manners call him Father. And I could find authorities to show this, I believe.

“Now you say I am old and foul: then have no fear that you will be a cuckold. For ugliness and age, upon my life, are great wardens over chastity. But nevertheless, since I know your delight, I shall fulfill your appetite.

“Choose,” she said, “one of these two things: to have me foul and old until I die, and to you a true, humble wife, never in all my days displeasing you; or else to have me young and beautiful, and take your chance on how many visits there will be to your house—or perhaps to some other place—which will be for my sake. Now choose yourself which one you will have.”

This knight thought hard about it and sighed deeply; but at last he spoke in this manner: “My lady and love, and my dear wife, I put myself into your wise governance. Please choose which may be the greatest pleasure and greatest honor to you and me also; I care not which of the two, for it is sufficient to me to please you.”

“Then I have the mastery over you,” she said, “since I may choose and govern as I wish”

“Yes, surely, wife,” he said; “I believe that is for the best.”

“Kiss me,” she said, “we will be angered no longer. For by my faith I will be both unto you—that is to say, both beautiful, yes, and good. I pray to God that I may die mad, but I would be as good and faithful as ever a wife was since the world was new. And if I am not as beautiful to see in the morning as any lady, queen or empress, between the east and the west, do with my life and death as you will. Lift up the curtain, and look how it is.”

And when the knight saw truly that she was so fair and so young, he clasped her in his two arms for joy, his heart bathed in a bath of bliss. A thousand times in a row he kissed her. And she obeyed him in all that might cause him delight or pleasure.

And thus they lived in perfect joy to the end of their lives. And may Jesus Christ send us husbands meek, young, and lusty, and grace to outlive them that we wed.

And I pray Jesus also to shorten their days that will not be ruled by their wives. And old, angry misers—may God send them a true pestilence soon!

Here ends the Wife of Bath’s Tale.

The Franklin's Tale

Here follow the Words of the Franklin to the Squire, and the Words of the Host to the Franklin.

“In faith, Squire, you have conducted yourself well and nobly. I praise your wit highly,” said the Franklin, with such delicate understanding. In my judgment there is nobody in this company who shall be your peer in eloquence as long as you live. May God give you good fortune, and send you perseverance in virtue, for I have great delight in your speaking. I have a son, and by the Trinity I had rather he would be a man of such discretion as you, than have twenty pounds worth of land, even if it were put in my hand right now.

“Fie on possessions, unless a man is virtuous as well! I have scolded my son, and shall still scold him, because he will not wish to pursue virtue; but his habit is to play at dice and to spend and to lose all that he has. And he had rather talk with a page than converse with any noble person from whom he might properly learn nobility.

“A straw for your gentle manners!” said our Host. “What, Franklin, well you know, by God, that each of you must tell at least a tale or two, or break your word.”

“That I well know, sir,” said the Franklin. “I pray you not to hold me in scorn if I speak a word or two to this man.

“Tell your tale now, without more words.

“Gladly, sir Host,” he said, “I will obey your will; now listen to what I say. I will not contradict you in any way as far, to the extent that my wits will suffice. I pray to God that it may please you; then I will know well that it is good enough.”

The Prologue of the Franklin's Tale

“These old gentle Bretons in their time made lays about various adventures, rhymed in their early British tongue; which lays they sang to their instruments of music, or else read them, for their pleasure. And one of them I have in mind, which I will relate with good will as best I can. But, sirs, because I am an unlearned man, at my beginning I pray you to excuse me for my homely speech. In truth, I never learned rhetoric; anything I speak must be bare and plain. I never slept on the Mount of Parnassus, nor learned Marcus Tullius Cicero. I know no colors of speech, surely; only such colors as grow in the meadow, or else such as people dye or paint. Colors of rhetoric are too strange for me; my spirit has no feeling in such matters. But if you wish, you shall hear my tale.”

Here begins the Franklin's Tale.

In Armorica, which is called Brittany, there was a knight who loved and served a lady in the best manner he could. And he underwent many labors and many great enterprises, before he gained her. For she was one of the fairest women under the sun, and had come from such a noble family that this knight scarcely dared for fear to tell her his woe and his pain and distress. But at last she took such pity upon his pains, because of his worthiness and primarily for his humble attentiveness, so that secretly she agreed to take him as husband and lord, in such lordship as men may have over their wives. And in order that they might live more in bliss, he swore to her as a knight, by his own free will, that never at any time in all his life would he take any authority upon himself against her will, nor show jealousy toward her, but obey her and follow her will in all things, as any lover shall do toward his lady; except that he wanted only the sovereignty in name, lest he should shame his rank as husband.

She thanked him, and said with great humility, “Sir, since through your noble mind you offer me so free a rein, God forbid that through my guilt there would ever be war or contention between us two. Sir, I will be your true humble wife until my heart break; take here my pledge.” Thus they were both in quiet and peace.

For one thing, sirs, I dare safely say, friends must comply with one another, if they wish to keep company long. Love will not be constrained by mastery; when mastery comes, the god of love soon beats his wings, and, farewell, he is gone! Love is as free as any spirit. Women by their nature desire liberty and not to be under constraint like a servant; and so do men, if I shall tell the truth. Look who is most patient in love, he has the advantage over all. Patience is a high virtue, certainly; for, as these scholars say, it conquers things that force could never reach.

Men should not scold or complain at every word. Learn to endure, or else, on my life, you shall learn this, whether you wish to or not. For certainly there is nobody in this world who sometimes does not act or speak amiss. Wrath, sickness, the constellation, wine, woe, changing humors, very often cause a man to act or speak amiss.

A man may not be avenged of every wrong; in every creature who knows how to rule his life, there must be moderation, according to the occasion. And therefore, so that he might live at ease, this wise worthy knight promised patience toward her, and she seriously swore to him that there never should be a fault in her. Here one may see a humble and wise agreement; thus she took her servant and her lord: servant in love, and lord in marriage. Then he was in both lordship and servitude. Servitude? No, but superior in lordship, since he has both his lady and love; surely, his lady, and his wife as well, who accepted that law of love. And in this happy state he went home with his wife to his country, not far from Penmark, where his dwelling was, and where he lived in happiness and comfort.

often she said to herself, "Alas! Is there no ship of so many that I see that will bring home my lord? Then my heart would be fully cured of its bitter, bitter pains."

Another time she would sit there and ponder, and from the shore cast her eyes down. But when she saw the grisly black rocks, her heart would so quake for true fear that she could not hold herself on her feet. Then she would sit down on the grass and piteously look into the sea, and with sorrowful, cold sighs say just so: "Eternal God, who through Your providence guides the world by sure government, You make nothing in vain, as they say. But, Lord, these grisly, fiendish, black rocks, which seem more like a foul chaos of work than any fair creation by such a perfect, wise, and unchanging God: why have You created this irrational work? For by this work neither man nor bird nor brute is benefited, south or north, east or west.

"It does no good, in my mind, but harm. Do You not see, Lord, how it destroys mankind? Although they may not be remembered, rocks have slain a hundred thousand bodies of mankind, which is such a fair a part of Your work that You made it in Your own image. Then it should seem You had a great fondness toward men; but how then may it be that You created to destroy them in such a way that do no good, but always harm? I know well that scholars will say as they please by arguments that all is for the best, though I cannot understand their reasons. But may the same God that made the wind blow protect my lord! This is my conclusion; I leave all disputation to schol-

Who, unless he had been wedded, could tell the joy, the comfort, and wellbeing between husband and wife?

This blessed condition lasted a year and more, until the knight of whom I speak, who was called Arveragus of Kayrrud, laid his plans to go and dwell a year or two in England, which also was called Britain, to seek worship and honor in arms, for he set all his pleasure on such toils. And he dwelt there two years, as the book says.

Now I will leave Arveragus, and will speak of Dorigen his wife, who loved her husband as her heart's blood. For in his absence she wept and sighed, as these noble wives do (when they will). She mourned, watched, wailed, fasted, lamented; desire for his presence so distracted her that she cared nothing for the whole wide world. Her friends, who knew her heavy thoughts, comforted her in all they could. They preached to her; day and night they told her that she was slaying herself for no good reason, alas! And they comforted her all they could, to make her leave her heaviness.

Through the process of time, as you all know, one may engrave in a stone so long that some figure will be imprinted on it. They comforted her so long that, with the aid of hope and reason, she received the imprint of their consolation. Through this her great sorrow began to assuage; she could not continue forever in such frenzy.

And while she was in all this sorrow, Arveragus had sent home to her letters telling of his welfare, and that he would soon return; otherwise, this sorrow would have slain her heart. Her friends saw her sorrow began to slacken, and on their knees begged her for God's love to come and roam about with them, to drive away her dark imaginings. And finally she agreed, for well she saw that it was best.

Now her castle stood near to the sea, and for a diversion she often walked with her friends high upon the bank, from which she saw many ships and barges sailing on their course, wherever they would go. But then that became a part of her grief. For ars. But I wish to God that all these black rocks were sunk into hell, for his sake! These rocks slay my heart for fear." Thus she would speak to herself, with many piteous tears.

Her friends saw that it was no diversion for her, but only a discomfort, to walk by the sea, and devised for her amusements in other places. They led her by rivers and springs and in other delightful places; they danced and they played at chess and backgammon.

So one day in the morning, they went to amuse themselves for the entire day in a nearby garden, in which they had made their provision of food and other things. This was on the sixth morning of May, and May with his soft rains had painted this garden full of leaves and flowers. And truly the craft of man's hand had so curiously arrayed this garden that never was a garden of such beauty, unless it would be paradise itself.

The scent and the fresh sight of flowers would have gladdened any heart that was ever born, unless too great a sickness or too great a sorrow distressed it; so full was it of delight and beauty.

After dinner they began to dance and sing, except Dorigen, who always made complaint or moan, because she saw not her husband and also her love enter into the dance. But nevertheless she must wait for a time and with good hope let her sorrow pass.

Upon this dance, among other men, there danced before Dorigen a squire who was fresher and more joyful in apparel than is the month of May, I believe. He sang and danced to surpass any man who is or was since the world was made. He was, if one would describe him, one of the most handsome men alive: young, strong, virtuous, rich, and wise; and well beloved and held in great honor. And in short, if I am to tell the truth, this servant to Venus, this lively squire, who was called Aurelius, had loved Dorigen, entirely without her knowledge, more than any creature for two years and more, as it happened, but never dared he tell her his woe. He drank all his penance without a cup.

He was in despair, he dared say nothing except that in his songs he would reveal his woe to some degree, as in a general complaining; he said he loved, and was in no way beloved. Of such matter he made many lays, songs, complaints, roundels, and virelays, about how he would dare not utter his sorrow, but languishes like a fury in hell; and die he must, he said, as did Echo for Narcissus, who dared not tell her woe. In other manner than this that I speak of he dared not reveal his passion to her; except that, by chance, sometimes at dances, where young people perform their customs of courtship, it may well be that he looked upon her face in such a way as a man who asks for grace; but she knew nothing of his intent.

Nevertheless it happened, before they went from that garden, that because he was her neighbor and a man of good reputation, and she had known him for a long time, they began to speak. And Aurelius drew more and more toward his matter and when he saw his time, he said thus: "Madame, by God That made this world, If I had known it would gladden your heart, I wish that the day when your Arveragus went over the sea, I, Aurelius, had gone to a place from which I never should have returned. For I well know that my service is in vain; my reward is but the breaking of my heart. Have pity upon my bitter pains, Madame, for with a word you may slay me or save me. I wish to God that I were buried here at your feet! I have now no time to say more; have mercy, sweet, or you will cause me to die!"

She looked at Aurelius: "Is this your desire?" she said. "Is this what you wish to say? Never before did I know what was in your mind. But now, Aurelius, I know it. By that God that gave me breath and soul, never in word or deed shall I be an untrue wife. As long as I have any senses, I will be his to whom I am bound. Take this for my final answer."

But in sport after that she said, "Aurelius, by the high God in heaven, yet would I consent to be your love, since I see you so piteously lamenting. Whenever that day comes that all along the coast of Brittany you remove all the rocks, stone by stone, so that they no longer obstruct the passage of ship or boat—I say, when you have made the coast so clear of rocks that there is no stone to be seen, then I will love you best of all men. Take here my pledge, in all that I can ever do."

"Is there no other mercy in you?" he said.

"No," she said, "by that Lord that made me! For I well know that shall never happen. Let such follies pass out of your heart. What delight should a man ever have to go about loving the wife of another man, who has her body whenever he wishes?"

Aurelius gave many sore sighs. He was woeful when he heard this; and with a sorrowful heart he answered, "Madame, this would be impossible! Then I must die of a sudden and horrible death." And with that word he turned back.

Then many of her other friends came roaming up and down in the paths, and knew nothing of this affair, but speedily began new revel; until the bright sun lost his hue, and the horizon had taken away from him his light (this is as much as to say, it was evening). And they went home in joy and contentment, except, alas, wretched Aurelius alone! He went to his house with sorrowful heart; he saw that he could never escape death, and felt his heart grow cold. Up to the heaven he held his hands and set himself down on his bare knees, and raving said his prayer; for true woe he was out of his wits and knew not what he spoke.

With piteous heart he began his complaint to the gods, and first to the sun: "Apollo," he said, "lord and ruler of every plant, herb, tree, and flower, who gives to each of them his times and seasons, according to your height in the sky, as your lodging changes toward north or south; lord Phoebus, cast your merciful eye upon wretched Aurelius, who is so lost. Behold, lord, my lady has decreed my guiltless death, unless your kindness should have some pity upon my dying heart. For well I know, lord Phoebus, that you may help me best of all except my lady, if you wish. Now promise to hear me tell you in what way I may be helped.

"Your blessed sister, Lucina the bright, chief goddess and queen of the sea (though Neptune has his godhead in the sea, yet is she empress over him), you well know, lord, that just as it is her desire to be kindled and lightened by your orb, for which reason she follows you eagerly, so too the sea desires by its nature to follow her, being goddess both in the sea and in rivers great and small.

"Therefore, Lord Phoebus, this is my prayer: perform this miracle or break my heart; that now at this next opposition, which shall be in the sign of the Lion, pray Lucina to bring a flood so great that it shall rise above the highest rock in Armorican Brittany by at least five fathoms, and let this flood last two years.

"Then, certainly, I may say to my lady, 'Keep your promise, the rocks are gone.' Lord Phoebus, do this miracle; ask her to go the same speed as you; I say, ask your sister that these two years she will go no faster in her course than you. Then shall she always be exactly at full, and the spring flood-tide will last day and night. And if she will not promise to grant me my dear sovereign lady in such a manner, pray her to sink every rock into her own dark region under the ground where Pluto dwells, or nevermore shall I gain my lady. Barefoot I will go a pilgrimage to your temple at Delphi. Lord Phoebus; see the tears on my cheeks, and have some pity on my pains."

And with that he fell down in a swoon and for a long time lay in a trance. His brother, who knew his trouble, caught him up and brought him to his bed. In this woe and torment I let this woeful creature lie in despair. He may choose, as far as I am concerned, whether he will live or die.

Arveragus was come home, with other valiant knights, in health and great honor as the flower of chivalry. Oh, now you are happy, Dorigen, who has in your arms your lively husband, the vigorous knight, the valiant warrior, who loves you as his own heart's life. He never thought to be suspicious whether any creature had spoken to her of love while he was gone; he had no fear of that. He gave no heed to any such matter, but danced, jostled, and showed her great enjoyment. Thus I leave them in happiness and bliss, and will tell of the sick Aurelius.

Two years and more the wretched Aurelius lay in languor and mad torment, before he could walk a step on earth; and he had no comfort in this time, except from his brother, a scholar, who knew of all this woeful matter. For in truth he dared say no word about it to any other creature. He carried it under his breast more secretly than Pamphilus carried his love for Galatea. His breast was whole, to outward view, but ever in his heart was the keen arrow. And you well know that in surgery the cure of a wound healed only on the surface is perilous, unless men could touch the arrow or get at it.

His brother wept and wailed privately, until at last it came to his mind that while he was at Orleans, in France, as young scholars who are desirous of studying curious arts seek in every nook and corner to learn this special knowledge, it came to his mind that, one day while he studied at Orleans, he saw a book of natural magic, which his friend, who was then a bachelor of law, had secretly left upon his desk, though he was there for a different field of study. This book spoke much of the celestial influences concerning the twenty-eight mansions which belong to the moon, and such folly as is not worth a fly in our day. For the faith of the Holy Church that is in our doctrine will not allow any illusion to harm us.

And as soon as he remembered this book his heart began to dance for joy, and he said quietly to himself, "My brother shall be cured speedily; for I am sure there are arts by which men create various apparitions, such as these deceiving magicians conjure up. For often at feasts, I have heard tell, within a large hall these magicians have made water and a barge come in and row up and down in the hall. Sometimes a grim lion has seemed to come, and sometimes flowers spring as in a meadow, sometimes a vine, with grapes white and red, sometimes a castle of mortar and stone. And when they wished, they caused it all to disappear immediately; so it seemed to every man's sight.

"Now then, I conclude thus, that if I could find some old comrade at Orleans who is acquainted with these mansions of the moon, or other natural magic besides, he should well cause my brother to possess his love. For by means of an illusion a clerk may make it appear to a man's sight that every one of the black rocks of Brittany be removed, and that ships come and go along the shore, and that this continue a day or two in such form. Then my brother would be entirely cured. Then she must keep her promise, or else at least he shall shame her."

Why should I make this a longer story? He came to his brother's bed and gave him such encouragement to go to Orleans that he started up at once and went ahead on his way in hopes to be relieved of his care. When they had almost arrived at that city, about two or three furlongs away, they met a young clerk roaming by himself who greeted them politely in Latin, and then said a marvelous thing. "I know the cause of your coming," he said. And before they went a foot further, he told them all that was in their minds. This scholar of Brittany asked him about the companions whom he had known in old days, and he answered him that they were dead; for which he wept many tears.

Aurelius alighted quickly from his horse and went forth home to his house with this magician, who made them well at ease; no provision that might give pleasure. Aurelius had never seen in his life a house so well appointed.

Before he went to supper, the magician showed him forests and parks full of wild beasts; there he saw harts with their lofty horns, the largest that eye ever saw. He beheld a hundred of them slain by dogs, and some bleeding from bitter arrow-wounds. When these wild deer vanished, he saw falconers upon a fair river, slaying the heron with their hawks. Then he saw knights jousting on a plain. And after this, the magician did him the pleasure to show him his lady in a dance, in which he himself was dancing, as it seemed to him. And when this master who created the magic saw that it was time, he clapped his hands, and, farewell, all our revel was gone.

And yet while they saw all this marvelous sight, they never stirred out of the house, but sat still in his study, where his books were, and no other creature but the three of them.

This master called his squire to him, and said thus: "Is our supper ready? It is almost an hour, I will swear, since I told you make our supper, when these honorable men went with me into my study, where my books are."

"Sir," said this squire, "when it pleases you it will be entirely ready, even if you wish to have it right now."

"Let us go to supper, then," he said, "that is best. These people in love must take repose sometime."

After supper they fell into talk over the sum which should be this master's reward for removing all the rocks of Brittany, and from the Gironde to the mouth of Seine. He raised difficulties and swore that he would not have less than a thousand pounds, and he would not be glad to do it for that sum, so God save him!

Aurelius answered directly, with a joyous heart, "Fie on a thousand pound! I would give this wide world, which men say is a ball, if I were lord of it. This bargain is done, for we are agreed. You shall be paid faithfully, by my word. But take care now that you delay us here no longer than tomorrow, for any negligence or sloth."

"No," this clerk said, "take here my faith in pledge to you."

Aurelius went to bed when he wished, and rested nearly all that night. Despite all his labor and his hope of bliss, his woeful heart had relief from suffering. In the morning, when it was day, they took the shortest road to Brittany, Aurelius and this magician, and dismounted at the place where they wished to be. And, as books remind me, this was the cold, frosty season of December. Phoebus grew old and of hue like latten, who in his hot declination shone with his bright beams like burnished gold; but now he had descended into Capricorn, where he shone fully pale, I dare well say. The bitter frosts, with sleet and rain, have destroyed the green in every garden. Janus with his double beard sits by the fire and drinks the wine out of his ox-horn; before him stands brawn of the tusked boar, and every lusty man cries, "Noel!"

Aurelius offered his master all the hospitality and reverence he could, and asked him to do his duty to bring him out of his bitter pains, or with a sword he would slit his own heart. This cunning scholar so pitied this man that he made as much haste as he could, day and night, to look for the most beneficial time for his experiment; that is to say, to create an appearance, by such an illusion or crafty trick—I do not have vocabulary of astrology—that she and every person should think and say that the rocks of Brittany were gone, or else sunk under the earth.

So at last he found his time to work his tricks and stage his miserable performance of wicked superstition. He brought forth his Toledo tables, well corrected; there lacked nothing, neither his tables of collected or expanded years, nor his roots, nor his other gear, such as his centres and his arguments, and his tables of proportional parts for his equations. And for his calculations he knew full well how far Alnath in the eighth sphere was pushed from the head of that fixed Aries above, which is calculated to be in the ninth sphere; cunningly he calculated by means of all this. When he had found his first mansion, by proportion he knew the rest, and he well knew the rising of his moon, in which was the planet's face and term, and all the rest. And he knew well the moon to be in a mansion favorable to his enterprise, and knew also the other matters to be observed for working such illusions and such misdoings as heathen people used in those days.

For this reason he no longer delayed, but through his magic it seemed for a week or two that all the rocks were gone. Aurelius, who was still despairing whether he should have his love or fare badly, waited night and day for this miracle. And when he knew that there was no hindrance, but that every rock was gone, he fell down at his master's feet immediately and said, "I, Aurelius, woeful wretch, thank you, lord, and Venus my lady, who have helped me from my cold misery." And he made his way forth to the temple where he knew he should see his lady. And when he saw his time, he then saluted his dear sovereign lady with a timid heart and humble face.

This woeful man said, "My own lady, whom I most fear and love as best I know how, and whom of all this world I would be most loathe to displease, if I did not suffer so much distress for the love of you that soon I must die here at your feet, I should never tell you how woebegone I am. But surely I must either die or make my complaint, as you slay me, an innocent man, with true pain. But though you have no pity for my death, consider this carefully before you break your pledge.

"For the sake of God in heaven, please repent before you murder me because I love you. For well you know what you promised, Madame; not that I claim anything of you as a right, my sovereign lady, but only ask it as a favor. Nevertheless, in a garden yonder, at such a spot, you know very well what you promised me, and you pledged your word in my hand, to love me best; God knows, you said so, though I may be unworthy of it. Madame, I say it for your honor, more than to save my heart's life; I have done as you said, and if you wish, you may go and see. Do as you wish; remember your promise, for, alive or dead, you shall find me right in that garden. It all depends on you, to make me live or die. But well I know the rocks are gone.

He takes his leave, and she stood astonished; not a drop of blood was in all her face. She thought never to have come into such a trap. She said, "Alas that ever this should happen! For I never deemed that such a monstrosity or marvel could happen, by any possibility. It is against the course of nature. And home she went, a sorrowful creature; scarcely could she walk for utter fear, and for a whole day or two she wept and wailed and swooned, so that it was pitiful to behold. But why she was so she told no creature, for Arveragus was gone out of town.

But with a pale face and sorrowful expression she spoke to herself, and said thus in her complaint as I shall tell you. She said, "Alas! I complain about you, Fortune, who has bound me unawares in your chain, from which to escape I know no help, except only death or dishonor; one of these two it is necessary for me to choose. But nevertheless I had rather forfeit my life than have shame on my body, or lose my fair reputation, or know myself false. And by my death, surely, I may escape.

"Alas, have not many noble wives and many maidens slain themselves before this, rather than do wrong with her body? Yes, surely; lo! These histories testify it. When the thirty tyrants, full of cursedness, had slain Phidon at a feast in Athens, by their malice they commanded men to arrest his daughters and bring them before them entirely naked, to fulfill their foul pleasure, and they made them dance in their father's blood upon the pavement. May God give them damnation! For this reason these woeful maidens, in fear of this, secretly leaped into a well and drowned themselves, rather than lose their maidenhood; so the books relate.

"The people of Messene had fifty Lacedaemon maidens sought out, with whom they wished to satisfy their lust; but of that entire band there was none who was not slain, and with good will chose to die rather than consent to be robbed of her maidenhood. Why should I, then, fear to die?

"Lo also, the tyrant Aristoclides. He loved a maiden named Stymphalides, who, when her father was slain one night, went directly to Diana's temple, and laid hold of the image of Diana with her two hands, and would never let go. No creature could tear her hands from it, until she was slain in that very place. Now since maidens have had such scorn to be defiled with man's base pleasure, it seems to me that a wife ought indeed rather to slay herself than be defiled.

"What shall I say of Hasdrubal's wife, who slew herself at Carthage? For when she saw that the Romans had won the city, she took all her children and skipped down into the fire, and chose rather to die than that any Roman dishonored her.

"Did not Lucrece slay herself at Rome, alas, when she was violated by Tarquin, because she deemed it a shame to live when she had lost her honor?

The seven maidens of Miletus also for true fear and woe slew themselves rather than the people of Gaul should violate them.

I could tell now more than a thousand stories, I believe, concerning this matter. When Abradates was slain, his dear wife slew herself and let her blood flow into Abradates' deep, wide wounds, saying, "My body, at least, no creature shall defile, if I can hinder it."

"Why should I cite more examples of this, since so many have slain themselves rather than be defiled? I will end thus, for it is better for me to slay myself than so to be defiled. I will be true to Arveragus, or slay myself in some way, as did the dear daughter of Democion, because she would not be defiled. O Scedasus, it is a great pity to read how your daughters died, who slew themselves for the same cause, alas! It was as great pity, or indeed greater, for the Theban maiden that slew herself even for the same grief, to escape Nicanor. Another Theban maiden did likewise; because one of Macedonia had violated her, she redressed her maidenhood by her death. What shall I say of the wife of Niceratus, who for a like cause took her life? How true also was his love to Alcibiades, and chose rather to die than to suffer his body to be unburied! Lo, what a wife was Alcestis! What says Homer of Penelope the good? All Greece knows of her chastity. It is written thus of Laodamia, in truth, that when Protesilaus was slain at Troy, she would live no longer after his days. I may tell the same of noble Portia; she could not live without Brutus, to whom she had fully given her whole heart. The perfect wifeness of Artemisia is honored through all barbarian lands. O queen Teuta, your wifely chastity may be a mirror to all wives. The same thing I say of Bilia, of Rhodogune and of Valeria."

Thus Dorigen made her complaint a day or two, at all times intending to die. But nevertheless Arveragus, this worthy knight, came home the third evening, and asked her why she wept so sorely. And she began to weep ever more bitterly.

"Alas that ever I was born! Thus I said," she said, "this was my oath," and she told him what you have already heard; there is no need to tell more.

This husband, with cheerful countenance and in friendly fashion, answered and said as I shall tell you; "Is there anything else but this, Dorigen?"

"Nay, nay," she said, "so may God help me; God forbid there would be more; this is too much."

"Yes, wife," he replied; "leave sleeping that which is quiet. It may yet be well today, by chance. You shall keep your pledge, by my faith! For may God so surely have mercy on me, for the true love I have for you I had far rather be stabbed to the heart, than you should not hold your pledge. A promise is the highest thing that a man may keep." But with that word he burst out weeping immediately, and said, "I forbid you, on pain of death, as long as your life lasts, to tell this matter to any creature. I will endure all my woe as best I can, and make no such sign of grief that people might judge or guess harm of you."

And he called forth a squire and maid, and said, "Go forth directly with Dorigen and bring her to such a place." They took their leave and went their way, but they knew not why she went there. He would tell his intention to no creature. Perhaps in truth many of you will think him a foolish man in this, that he would put his wife in jeopardy; listen to the tale, before you exclaim against her. She may have better fortune than you might suppose; and when you have heard the tale, you may judge.

This squire Aurelius, who was so amorous of Dorigen, happened by chance to meet her amidst the town, right in the busiest street, as she was bound straight for the garden where she had promised to go. And he also was bound for the garden; for he always noted well when she would go out of her house to any place. But thus they met, by chance or good fortune; and he saluted her with joyous mood, and asked where she was going.

And she answered, as if she were mad, "To the garden, as my husband ordered, to keep my promise, Alas! Alas!" Aurelius wondered about what had happened, and in his heart he had great compassion about her and her lament, and about Arveragus, the worthy knight who had told her to maintain everything she had promised, so loath was he that his wife should break her pledge. And Aurelius' heart was moved to great pity, and this made him consider carefully what would be best, so that he felt he would rather refrain from his desire rather than to be guilty of such a wretched and dishonorable act against nobility and all gentility.

For this reason he said thus in few words: "Madame, say to Arveragus, your lord, that since I see his great nobility to you (and I well see your distress), that it seemed better to him to suffer shame (and that would be a pity) than you should break your pledge to me, I would rather suffer perpetual woe than part the love between you. Into your hand, Madame, I release, cancelled, every assurance and every bond that you have made to me to this day from the time when you were born. I pledge my word that I shall never reproach you on the score of any promise. And here I take my leave of the best and truest wife that in all my days I have ever known. But let every woman beware what she promises; let her at least think of Dorigen." Thus surely a squire can do a gentle deed, as well as can a knight.

She thanked him upon her bare knees, and went home to her husband and told him everything, even as you have heard me tell it. And be assured, he was so well pleased that I could not tell how much; why should I explain this matter any further? Arveragus and his wife Dorigen led forth their days in sovereign bliss.

Never again was there trouble between them. Evermore he cherished her as though she were a queen, and she was true to him. Concerning these two people you will get no more from me.

Aurelius, who had forfeited all the expense, cursed the time when he was born. "Alas! alas!" he said, "that I promised a thousand pounds' weight of refined gold to this philosopher! What shall I do? I see nothing more but that I am undone. I must sell my heritage and be a beggar. I cannot remain here and shame all my family here, unless I can gain his mercy. But nevertheless I will seek of him to let me pay on certain days each year, and will thank him for his great courtesy. I will keep my word, I will not be false."

With sore heart he went to his coffer and brought to this clerk gold of the value of five hundred pounds, I believe, and asked him through his noble courtesy to grant him certain days to pay the remnant, and said, "Master, I dare well boast that I never failed of my word as yet. For truly my debt shall be paid to you, whatever may happen to me, even if I must go begging in my undergarments alone. But would you promise, upon security, to give me a respite for two or three years; then it will be well with me. For otherwise I must sell my heritage. There is no more to say."

This philosopher answered gravely and said thus, when he heard these words, "Have I not kept my covenant with you?"

"Yes, surely, well and truly," he said. "Have you not had your lady just as you desired?"

"No, no," he said and sighed sorrowfully.

"What was the cause? Tell me, if you can."

Aurelius began his tale immediately, and told him everything, as you have heard. There is no need to rehearse it again. He said, "Arveragus on account of his nobility would rather have died in sorrow and woe than that his wife would be false to her pledge." He told him also the sorrow of Dorigen, how loath she was to be a wicked wife, and that she had rather have died that day, and that it was through innocence she had sworn her oath. "She never heard tell before of magic illusion; that made me have pity upon her. And just as he sent her freely to me, so freely I sent her back to him. This is everything; there is no more to say."

This philosopher answered: "Dear friend, each of you did a gentle deed toward the other. You are a squire, he is a knight. But may God in his blessed power forbid, but a clerk may truly do a gentle deed as well as any of you.

Sir, I release you from your debt of a thousand pounds, as freely as if you had only now crept out of the earth and had never known me before now. For, sir, I will not take a penny from you for all my skill and all my labor. You have paid well for my subsistence. It is enough. And farewell, and have a good day." And he took his horse and went forth on his journey.

Gentle people, I would ask you this question now: Which do you think was the most noble? Now tell me, before you go farther. I know no more; my tale is finished.

Here is ended the Franklin's Tale.

THE DECAMERON

Giovanni Boccaccio ( 1313- 1375 C.E.)

Begun ca. 1349 and finished by 1353 C.E.

Italy

Boccaccio began writing his Decameron shortly after an outbreak of the plague in Florence, Italy, in 1348 that killed about three quarters of the population. The introduction to this frame tale depicts the horrors of the plague, with vivid descriptions of the dying and laments about the lack of a cure. In his story, seven women and three men leave Florence to take refuge in the countryside. They justify their decision in several ways: the right to self-preservation; the bad morals and lewd behavior of many of their neighbors (who are convinced that they are going to die anyway); and their own feelings of abandonment by their families. They decide to tell stories to pass the time: one story each for ten days (the Greek for "ten" is "deka" and for "day" is "hemera," from which Boccaccio derives his title). Each day, one of them chooses a theme for the stories. As entertaining as the stories are, the discussions between the stories are what make the collection special; the speakers carry on a battle of the sexes as they debate the meaning and relative value of each story. The same dynamic can be found in two other frame tales in this anthology, one of which was influenced by the Decameron: the Thousand and One Nights (written before the Decameron) with its gripping frame story of Shahrazad; and Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, with the conversations (and arguments) among the pilgrims who are telling the tales.

Giovanni Boccaccio, Translated by Léopold Flameng

When I reflect how disposed you are by nature to compassion, I cannot help being apprehensive lest what I now offer to your acceptance should seem to have but a harsh and offensive beginning; for it presents at the very outset the mournful remembrance of that most fatal plague, so terrible yet in the memories of us all. But let not this dismay you from reading further, as though every page were to cost you sighs and tears. Rather let this beginning, disagreeable as it is, seem to you but as a rugged and steep mountain placed before a delightful valley, which appears more beautiful and pleasant, as the way to it was more difficult: for as joy usually ends in sorrow, so again the end of sorrow is joy. To this short fatigue (I call it short, because contained in few words,) immediately succeeds the mirth and pleasure I had before promised you; and which, but for that promise, you would scarcely expect to find. And in truth could I have brought you by any other way than this, I would gladly have done it: but as the occasion of the occurrences, of which I am going to treat, could not well be made out without such a relation, I am forced to use this Introduction.

In the year then of our Lord 1348, there happened at Florence, the finest city in all Italy, a most terrible plague; which, whether owing to the influence of the planets, or that it was sent from God as a just punishment for our sins, had broken out some years before in the Levant, and after passing from place to place, and making incredible havoc all the way, had now reached the west. There, spite of all the means that art and human foresight could suggest, such as keeping the city clear from filth, the exclusion of all suspected persons, and the publication of copious instructions for the preservation of health; and notwithstanding manifold humble supplications offered to God in processions and otherwise; it began to show itself in the spring of the aforesaid year, in a sad and wonderful manner. Unlike what had been seen in the east, where bleeding from the nose is the fatal prognostic, here there appeared certain tumours in the groin or under the arm-pits, some as big as a small apple, others as an egg; and afterwards purple spots in most parts of the body; in some cases large and but few in number, in others smaller and more numerous—both sorts the usual messengers of death. To the cure of this malady, neither medical knowledge nor the power of drugs was of any effect; whether because the disease was in its own nature mortal, or that the physicians (the number of whom, taking quacks and women pretenders into the account, was grown very great,) could form no just idea of the cause, nor consequently devise a true method of cure; whichever was the reason, few escaped; but nearly all died the third day from the first appearance of the symptoms, some sooner, some later, without any fever or other accessory symptoms. What gave the more virulence to this plague, was that, by being communicated from the sick to the hale, it spread daily, like fire when it comes in contact with large masses of combustibles. Nor was it caught only by conversing with, or coming near the sick, but even by touching their clothes, or anything that they had before touched. It is wonderful, what I am going to mention; and had I not seen it with my own eyes, and were there not many witnesses to attest it besides myself, I should never venture to relate it, however worthy it were of belief. Such, I say, was the quality of the pestilential matter, as to pass not only from man to man, but, what is more strange, it has been often known, that anything belonging to the infected, if touched by any other creature, would certainly infect, and even kill that creature in a short space of time. One instance of this kind I took particular notice of: the rags of a poor man just dead had been thrown into the street; two hogs came up, and after rooting amongst the rags, and shaking them about in their mouths, in less than an hour they both turned round, and died on the spot.

These facts, and others of the like sort, occasioned various fears and devices amongst those who survived, all tending to the same uncharitable and cruel end; which was, to avoid the sick, and everything that had been near them, expecting by that means to save themselves. And some holding it best to live temperately, and to avoid excesses of all kinds, made parties, and shut themselves up from the rest of the world; eating and drinking moderately of the best, and diverting themselves with music, and such other entertainments as they might have within door; never listening to anything from without, to make them uneasy. Others maintained free living to be a better preservative, and would baulk no passion or appetite they wished to gratify, drinking and reveling incessantly from tavern to tavern, or in private houses (which were frequently found deserted by the owners, and therefore common to every one), yet strenuously avoiding, with all this brutal indulgence, to come near the infected. And such, at that time, was the public distress, that the laws, human and divine, were no more regarded; for the officers, to put them in force, being either dead, sick, or in want of persons to assist them, every one did just as he pleased. A third sort of people chose a method between these two: not confining themselves to rules of diet like the former, and yet avoiding the intemperance of the latter; but eating and drinking what their appetites required, they walked everywhere with odours and nose gays to smell to; as holding it best to corroborate the brain: for the whole atmosphere seemed to them tainted with the stench of dead bodies, arising partly from the distemper itself, and partly from the fermenting of the medicines within them. Others with less humanity, but perchance, as they supposed, with more security from danger, decided that the only remedy for the pestilence was to avoid it: persuaded, therefore, of this, and taking care for themselves only, men and women in great numbers left the city, their houses, relations, and effects, and fled into the country: as if the wrath of God had been restrained to visit those only within the walls of the city; or else concluding, that none ought to stay in a place thus doomed to destruction.

Thus divided as they were in their views, neither did all die, nor all escape; but falling sick indifferently, as well those of one as of another opinion; they who first set the example by forsaking others, now languished themselves without pity. I pass over the little regard that citizens and relations showed to each other; for their terror was such, that a brother even fled from his brother, a wife from her husband, and, what is more uncommon, a parent from his own child. Hence numbers that fell sick could have no help but what the charity of friends, who were very few, or the avarice of servants supplied; and even these were scarce and at extravagant wages, and so little used to the business that they were fit only to reach what was called for, and observe when their employer died; and this desire of getting money often cost them their lives. From this desertion of friends, and scarcity of servants, an unheard-of custom prevailed; no lady, however young or handsome, would scruple to be attended by a man-servant, whether young or old it mattered not, and to expose herself naked to him, the necessity of the distemper requiring it, as though it was to a woman; which might make those who recovered, less modest for the time to come. And many lost their lives, who might have escaped, had they been looked after at all. So that, between the scarcity of servants, and the violence of the distemper, such numbers were continually dying, as made it terrible to hear as well as to behold. Whence, from mere necessity, many customs were introduced different from what had been before known in the city.

It had been usual, as it now is, for the women who were friends and neighbours to the deceased, to meet together at his house, and to lament with his relations; at the same time the men would get together at the door, with a number of clergy, according to the person's circumstances; and the corpse was carried by people of his own rank, with the solemnity of tapers and singing, to that church where the deceased had desired to be buried. This custom was now laid aside, and, so far from having a crowd of women to lament over them, great numbers passed out of the world without a witness. Few were they who had the tears of their friends at their departure; those friends were laughing and making themselves merry the while; for even the women had learned to postpone every other concern to that of their own lives. Nor was a corpse attended by more than ten or a dozen, nor those citizens of credit, but fellows hired for the purpose; who would put themselves under the bier, and carry it with all possible haste to the nearest church; and the corpse was interred, without any great ceremony, where they could find room. With regard to the lower sort, and many of a middling rank, the scene was still more affecting; for they staying at home either through poverty or hopes of succour in distress, fell sick daily by thousands, and, having nobody to attend them, generally died: some breathed their last in the streets, and others shut up in their own houses, where the stench that came from them made the first discovery of their deaths to the neighbourhood. And, indeed, every place was filled with the dead. Hence it became a general practice, as well out of regard for the living as pity for the dead, for the neighbours, assisted by what porters they could meet with, to clear all the houses, and lay the bodies at the doors; and every morning great numbers might be seen brought out in this manner, to be carried away on biers, or tables, two or three at a time; and sometimes it has happened that a wife and her husband, two or three brothers, and a father and son, have been laid on together. It has been observed also, whilst two or three priests have walked before a corpse with their crucifix, that two or three sets of porters have fallen in with them; and where they knew but of one dead body, they have buried six, eight, or more: nor was there any to follow, and shed a few tears over them; for things were come to that pass, that men's lives were no more regarded than the lives of so many beasts. Thus it plainly appeared, that what the wisest in the ordinary course of things, and by a common train of calamities, could never be taught, namely, to bear them patiently, this, by the excess of calamity, was now grown a familiar lesson to the most simple and unthinking. The consecrated ground no longer containing the numbers which were continually brought thither, especially as they were desirous of laying every one in the parts allotted to their families, they were forced to dig trenches, and to put them in by hundreds, piling them up in rows, as goods are stowed in a ship, and throwing in a little earth till they were filled to the top.

Not to dwell upon every particular of our misery, I shall observe, that it fared no better with the adjacent country; for, to omit the different boroughs about us, which presented the same view in miniature with the city, you might see the poor distressed labourers, with their families, without either the aid of physicians, or help of servants, languishing on the highways, in the fields, and in their own houses, and dying rather like cattle than human creatures. The consequence was that, growing dissolute in their manners like the citizens, and careless of everything, as supposing every day to be their last, their thoughts were not so much employed how to improve, as how to use their substance for their present support. The oxen, asses, sheep, goats, swine, and the dogs themselves, ever faithful to their masters, being driven from their own homes, were left to roam at will about the fields, and among the standing corn, which no one cared to gather, or even to reap; and many times, after they had filled themselves in the day, the animals would return of their own accord like rational creatures at night.

What can I say more, if I return to the city? Unless that such was the cruelty of Heaven, and perhaps of men, that between March and July following, according to authentic reckonings, upwards of a hundred thousand souls perished in the city only; whereas, before that calamity, it was not supposed to have contained so many inhabitants. What magnificent dwellings, what noble palaces were then depopulated to the last inhabitant! What families became extinct! What riches and vast possessions were left, and no known heir to inherit them! What numbers of both sexes, in the prime and vigour of youth, whom in the morning neither Galen, Hippocrates, nor Æsculapius himself, would have denied to be in perfect health, breakfasted in the morning with their living friends, and supped at night with their departed friends in the other world or else to show by our habits the greatness of our distress. And if we go hence, it is either to see multitudes of the dead and sick carried along the streets; or persons who had been outlawed for their villanies, now facing it out publicly, in safe defiance of the laws; or the scum of the city, enriched with the public calamity, and insulting us with ribald ballads. Nor is anything now talked of, but that such a one is dead, or dying; and, were any left to mourn, we should hear nothing but lamentations. Or if we go home — I know not whether it fares with you as with myself — when I find out of a numerous family not one left besides a maidservant, I am frightened out of my senses; and go where I will, the ghosts of the departed seem always before me; not like the persons whilst they were living, but assuming a ghastly and dreadful aspect. Therefore the case is the same, whether we stay here, depart hence, or go home; especially as there are few left but ourselves who are able to go, and have a place to go to. Those few too, I am told, fall into all sorts of debauchery; and even cloistered ladies, supposing themselves entitled to equal liberties with others, are as bad as the worst. Now if this be so (as you see plainly it is), what do we here? What are we dreaming of? Why are we less regardful of our lives than other people of theirs? Are we of less value to ourselves, or are our souls and bodies more firmly united, and so in less danger of dissolution? It is monstrous to think in such a manner; so many of both sexes dying of this distemper in the very prime of their youth afford us an undeniable argument to the contrary. Wherefore, lest through our own willfulness or neglect, this calamity, which might have been prevented, should befall us, I should think it best (and I hope you will join with me,) for us to quit the town, and avoiding, as we would death itself, the bad example of others, to choose some place of retirement, of which every one of us has more than one, where we may make ourselves innocently merry, without offering the least violence to the dictates of reason and our own consciences. There will our ears be entertained with the warbling of the birds, and our eyes with the verdure of the hills and valleys; with the waving of cornfields like the sea itself; with trees of a thousand different kinds, and a more open and serene sky; which, however overcast, yet affords a far more agreeable prospect than these desolate walls. The air also is pleasanter, and there is greater plenty of everything, attended with few inconveniences: for, though people die there as well as here, yet we shall have fewer such objects before us, as the inhabitants are less in number; and on the other part, if I judge right, we desert nobody, but are rather ourselves forsaken. For all our friends, either by death, or endeavouring to avoid it, have left us, as if we in no way belonged to them. As no blame then can ensue from following this advice, and perhaps sickness and death from not doing so, I would have us take our maids, and everything we may be supposed to want, and enjoy all the diversions which the season will permit, to-day in one place, to-morrow in another; and so continue to do, unless death should interpose, until we see what end Providence designs for these things. And of this too let me remind you, that our characters will stand as fair by our going away reputably, as those of others will do who stay at home with discredit."

The ladies having heard what Pampinea had to offer, not only approved of it, but had actually began to concert measures for their instant departure, when Filomena, who was a most discreet person, remarked: "Though Pampinea has spoken well, yet there is no occasion to run headlong into the affair, as you are about to do. We are but women, nor is any of us so ignorant as not to know how little able we shall be to conduct such an affair, without some man to help us. We are naturally fickle, obstinate, suspicious, and fearful; and I doubt much, unless we take somebody into our scheme to manage it for us, lest it soon be at an end; and perhaps, little to our reputation. Let us provide against this, therefore, before we begin."

Eliza then replied: "It is true, man is our sex's chief or head, and without his management, it seldom happens that any undertaking of ours succeeds well. But how are these men to be come at? We all know that the greater part of our male acquaintance are dead, and the rest all dispersed abroad, avoiding what we seek to avoid, and without our knowing where to find them. To take strangers with us, would not be altogether so proper: for, whilst we have regard to our health, we should so contrive matters, that, wherever we go to repose and divert ourselves, no scandal may ensue from it."

Whilst this matter was in debate, behold, three gentlemen came into the church, the youngest not less than twenty-five years of age, and in whom neither the adversity of the times, the loss of relations and friends, nor even fear for themselves, could stifle, or indeed cool, the passion of love. One was called Pamfilo, the second Filostrato, and the third Dioneo, all of them well bred, and pleasant companions; and who, to divert themselves in this time of affliction, were then in pursuit of their mistresses, who as it chanced were three of these seven ladies, the other four being all related to one or other of them. These gentlemen were no sooner within view, than the ladies had immediately their eyes upon them, and Pampinea said, with a smile, "See, fortune is with us, and has thrown in our way three prudent and worthy gentlemen, who will conduct and wait upon us, if we think fit to accept of their service." Neifile, with a blush, because she was one that had an admirer, answered: "Take care what you say, I know them all indeed to be persons of character, and fit to be trusted, even in affairs of more consequence, and in better company; but, as some of them are enamoured of certain ladies here, I am only concerned lest we be drawn into some scrape or scandal, without either our fault or theirs." Filomena replied: "Never tell me what other people may think, so long as I know myself to be virtuous; God and the truth will be my defence; and if they be willing to go, we will say with Pampinea, that fortune is with us."

The rest hearing her speak in this manner, gave consent that the gentlemen should be invited to partake in this expedition. Without more words, Pampinea, who was related to one of the three rose up, and made towards them, as they stood watching at a distance. Then, after a cheerful salutation, she acquainted them with the design in hand, and entreated that they would, out of pure friendship, oblige them with their company. The gentlemen at first took it all for a jest, but, being assured to the contrary, immediately answered that they were ready; and, to lose no time, gave the necessary orders for what they wished to have done. Every thing being thus prepared, and a messenger dispatched before, whither they intended to go, the next morning, which was Wednesday, by break of day, the ladies, with some of their women, and the gentlemen, with every one his servant, set out from the city, and, after they had travelled two short miles, came to the place appointed.

It was a little eminence, remote from any great road, covered with trees and shrubs of an agreeable verdure; and on the top was a stately palace, with a grand and beautiful court in the middle: within were galleries, and fine apartments elegantly fitted up, and adorned with most curious paintings; around it were fine meadows, and most delightful gardens, with fountains of the purest and best water. The vaults also were stored with the richest wines, suited rather to the taste of copious toppers, than of modest and virtuous ladies. This palace they found cleared out, and everything set in order for their reception, with the rooms all graced with the flowers of the season, to their great satisfaction. The party being seated, Dioneo, who was the pleasantest of them all, and full of words, began "Your wisdom it is, ladies, rather than any foresight of ours, which has brought us hither. I know not how you have disposed of your cares; as for mine, I left them all behind me when I came from home. Either prepare, then, to be as merry as myself (I mean with decency), or give me leave to go back again, and resume my cares where I left them." Pampinea made answer, as if she had disposed of hers in like manner: "You say right, sir, we will be merry; we fled from our troubles for no other reason. But, as extremes are never likely to last, I, who first proposed the means by which such an agreeable company is now met together, being desirous to make our mirth of some continuance, do find there is a necessity for our appointing a principal, whom we shall honour and obey in all things as our head; and whose province it shall be to regulate our diversions. And that every one may make trial of the burthen which attends care, as well as the pleasure which there is in superiority, nor therefore envy what he has not yet tried, I hold it best that every one should experience both the trouble and the honour for one day. The first, I propose, shall be elected by us all, and, on the approach of evening, shall name a person to succeed for the following day: and each one, during the time of his or her government, shall give orders concerning the place where, and the manner how, we are to live."

These words were received with the highest satisfaction, and the speaker was, with one consent, appointed president for the first day: whilst Filomena, running to a laurel-tree, (for she had often heard how much that tree has always been esteemed, and what honour was conferred on those who were deservedly crowned with it,) made a garland, and put it upon Pampinea's head. That garland, whilst the company continued together, was ever after to be the ensign of sovereignty.

Pampinea, being thus elected queen, enjoined silence, and having summoned to her presence the gentlemen's servants, and their own women, who were four in number: "To give you the first example," said she, "how, by proceeding from good to better, we may live orderly and pleasantly, and continue together, without the least reproach, as long as we please, in the first place I declare Parmeno, Dioneo's servant, master of my household, and to him I commit the care of my family, and everything relating to my hall. Sirisco, Pamfilo's servant, I appoint my treasurer, and to be under the direction of Parmeno; and Tindaro I command to wait on Filostrato and the other two gentlemen, whilst their servants are thus employed. Mysia, my woman, and Licisca, Filomena's, I order into the kitchen, there to get ready what shall be provided by Parmeno. To Lauretta's Chimera, and Fiammetta's Stratilia, I give the care of the ladies' chambers, and to keep the room clean where we sit. And I will and command you all, on pain of my displeasure, that wherever you go, or whatever you hear and see, you bring no news here but what is good." These orders were approved by all; and the queen, rising from her seat, with a good deal of gaiety, added: "Here are gardens and meadows, where you may divert yourselves till nine o'clock, when I shall expect you back, that we may dine in the cool of the day."

The company were now at liberty, and the gentlemen and ladies took a pleasant walk in the garden, talking over a thousand merry things by the way, and diverting themselves by singing love songs, and weaving garlands of flowers. Returning at the time appointed, they found Parmeno busy in the execution of his office: for in a saloon below was the table set forth, covered with the neatest linen, with glasses reflecting a lustre like silver: and water having been presented to them to wash their hands, by the queen's order, Parmeno desired them to sit down. The dishes were now served up in the most elegant manner, and the best wines brought in, the servants waiting all the time with the most profound silence; and being well pleased with their entertainment, they dined with all the facetiousness and mirth imaginable. When dinner was over, as they could all dance, and some both play and sing well, the queen ordered in the musical instruments. Dioneo took a lute, and Fiammetta a viol, in obedience to the royal command; a dance was struck up, and the queen, with the rest of the company, took an agreeable turn or two, whilst the servants were sent to dinner; and when the dance was ended, they began to sing, and continued till the queen thought it time to break up. Her permission being given, the gentlemen retired to their chambers, remote from the ladies' lodging rooms, and the ladies did the same, and undressed themselves for bed.

It was little more than three, when the queen rose, and ordered all to be called, alleging that much sleep in the daytime was unwholesome. Then they went into a meadow of deep grass, where the sun had little power; and having the benefit of a pleasant breeze, they sat down in a circle, as the queen had commanded, and she addressed them in this manner:—"As the sun is high, and the heat excessive, and nothing is to be heard but the chirping of the cicadas among the olives, it would be madness for us to think of moving yet: this is an airy place, and here are chess-boards and backgammon tables to divert yourselves with; but if you will be ruled by me, you will not play at all, since it often makes the one party uneasy, without any great pleasure to the other, or to the lookers-on; but let us begin and tell stories, and in this manner one person will entertain the whole company; and by the time it has gone round, the worst part of the day will be over, and then we can divert ourselves as we like best. If this be agreeable to you, then (for I wait to know your pleasure) let us begin; if not, you are at your own disposal till the evening." This motion being approved by all, the queen continued, "Let every one for this first day take what subject he fancies most:" and turning to Pamfilo, who sat on her right hand, she bade him begin. He readily obeyed, and spoke to this effect, so as to be distinctly heard by the whole company.

Day the Third

The Ninth Story

Gillette de narbonne recovereth the king of france of a fistula and demandeth for her husband bertrand de roussillon, who marrieth her against his will and betaketh him for despite to florence, where, he paying court to a young lady, gillette, in the person of the latter, lieth with him and hath by him two sons; wherefore after, holding her dear, he entertaineth her for his wife.

Lauretta's story being now ended, it rested but with the queen to tell, and she would not infringe upon Dioneo's privilege; wherefore, without waiting to be solicited by her companions, she began all blithesomely to speak thus: "Who shall tell a story that may appear goodly, now we have heard that of Lauretta? Certes, it was well for us that hers was not the first, for that few of the others would have pleased after it, as I misdoubt me will betide of those which are yet to tell this day. Natheless, be that as it may, I will e'en recount to you that which occurreth to me upon the proposed theme.

There was in the kingdom of France a gentleman called Isnard, Count of Roussillon, who, for that he was scant of health, still entertained about his person a physician, by name Master Gerard de Narbonne. The said count had one little son, and no more, hight Bertrand, who was exceeding handsome and agreeable, and with him other children of his own age were brought up. Among these latter was a daughter of the aforesaid physician, by name Gillette, who vowed to the said Bertrand an infinite love and fervent more than pertained unto her tender years. The count dying and leaving his son in the hands of the king, it behoved him betake himself to Paris, whereof the damsel abode sore disconsolate, and her own father dying no great while after, she would fain, and she might have had a seemly occasion, have gone to Paris to see Bertrand: but, being straitly guarded, for that she was left rich and alone, she saw no honourable way thereto; and being now of age for a husband and having never been able to forget Bertrand, she had, without reason assigned, refused many to whom her kinsfolk would have married her.

Now it befell that, what while she burned more than ever for love of Bertrand, for that she heard he was grown a very goodly gentleman, news came to her how the King of France, by an imposthume which he had had in his breast and which had been ill tended, had gotten a fistula, which occasioned him the utmost anguish and annoy, nor had he yet been able to find a physician who might avail to recover him thereof, albeit many had essayed it, but all had aggravated the ill; wherefore the king, despairing of cure, would have no more counsel nor aid of any. Hereof the young lady was beyond measure content and bethought herself that not only would this furnish her with a legitimate occasion of going to Paris, but that, should the king's ailment be such as she believed, she might lightly avail to have Bertrand to husband. Accordingly, having aforesaid learned many things of her father, she made a powder of certain simples useful for such an infirmity as she conceived the king's to be and taking horse, repaired to Paris.

Before aught else she studied to see Bertrand and next, presenting herself before the king, she prayed him of his favour to show her his ailment. The king, seeing her a fair and engaging damsel, knew not how to deny her and showed her that which ailed him. Whenas she saw it, she was certified incontinent that she could heal it and accordingly said, 'My lord, an it please you, I hope in God to make you whole of this your infirmity in eight days' time, without annoy or fatigue on your part.' The king scoffed in himself at her words, saying, 'That which the best physicians in the world have availed not neither known to do, how shall a young woman know?' Accordingly, he thanked her for her good will and answered that he was resolved no more to follow the counsel of physicians. Whereupon quoth the damsel, 'My lord, you make light of my skill, for that I am young and a woman; but I would have you bear in mind that I medicine not of mine own science, but with the aid of God and the science of Master Gerard de Narbonne, who was my father and a famous physician whilst he lived.'

The king, hearing this, said in himself, 'It may be this woman is sent me of God; why should I not make proof of her knowledge, since she saith she will, without annoy of mine, cure me in little time?' Accordingly, being resolved to essay her, he said, 'Damsel, and if you cure us not, after causing us break our resolution, what will you have ensue to you therefor?' 'My lord,' answered she, 'set a guard upon me and if I cure you not within eight days, let burn me alive; but, if I cure you, what reward shall I have?' Quoth the king, 'You seem as yet unhusbanded; if you do this, we will marry you well and worshipfully.' 'My lord,' replied the young lady, 'I am well pleased that you should marry me, but I will have a husband such as I shall ask of you, excepting always any one of your sons or of the royal house.' He readily promised her that which she sought, whereupon she began her cure and in brief, before the term limited, she brought him back to health.

The king, feeling himself healed, said, 'Damsel, you have well earned your husband'; whereto she answered, 'Then, my lord, I have earned Bertrand de Roussillon, whom I began to love even in the days of my childhood and have ever since loved over all.' The king deemed it a grave matter to give him to her; nevertheless, having promised her and unwilling to fail of his faith, he let call the count to himself and bespoke him thus: 'Bertrand, you are now of age and accomplished [in all that behoveth unto man's estate]; wherefore it is our pleasure that you return to govern your county and carry with you a damsel, whom we have given you to wife.' 'And who is the damsel, my lord?' asked Bertrand; to which the king answered, 'It is she who hath with her medicines restored to us our health.'

Bertrand, who had seen and recognized Gillette, knowing her (albeit she seemed to him very fair) to be of no such lineage as sorted with his quality, said all disdainfully, 'My lord, will you then marry me to a she-leach? Now God forbid I should ever take such an one to wife!' 'Then,' said the king, 'will you have us fail of our faith, the which, to have our health again, we pledged to the damsel, who in guerdon thereof demanded you to husband?' 'My lord,' answered Bertrand, 'you may, an you will, take from me whatsoever I possess or, as your liegeman, bestow me upon whoso pleaseth you; but of this I certify you, that I will never be a consenting party unto such a marriage.' 'Nay,' rejoined the king, 'but you shall, for that the damsel is fair and wise and loveth you dear; wherefore we doubt not but you will have a far happier life with her than with a lady of higher lineage.' Bertrand held his peace and the king let make great preparations for the celebration of the marriage.

The appointed day being come, Bertrand, sore against his will, in the presence of the king, espoused the damsel, who loved him more than herself. This done, having already determined in himself what he should do, he sought leave of the king to depart, saying he would fain return to his county and there consummate the marriage; then, taking horse, he repaired not thither, but betook himself into Tuscany, where, hearing that the Florentines were at war with those of Sienna, he determined to join himself to the former, by whom he was joyfully received and made captain over a certain number of men-at-arms; and there, being well provided of them, he abode a pretty while in their service.

The newly-made wife, ill content with such a lot, but hoping by her fair dealing to recall him to his county, betook herself to Roussillon, where she was received of all as their liege lady. There, finding everything waste and disordered for the long time that the land had been without a lord, with great diligence and solicitude, like a discreet lady as she was, she set all in order again, whereof the count's vassals were mightily content and held her exceeding dear, vowing her a great love and blaming the count sore for that he accepted not of her. The lady, having thoroughly ordered the county, notified the count thereof by two knights, whom she despatched to him, praying him that, an it were on her account he forbore to come to his county, he should signify it to her and she, to pleasure him, would depart thence; but he answered them very harshly, saying, 'For that, let her do her pleasure; I, for my part, will return thither to abide with her, whenas she shall have this my ring on her finger and in her arms a son by me begotten.' Now the ring in question he held very dear and never parted with it, by reason of a certain virtue which it had been given him to understand that it had.

The knights understood the hardship of the condition implied in these two well nigh impossible requirements, but, seeing that they might not by their words avail to move him from his purpose, they returned to the lady and reported to her his reply; whereat she was sore afflicted and determined, after long consideration, to seek to learn if and where the two things aforesaid might be compassed, to the intent that she might, in consequence, have her husband again. Accordingly, having bethought herself what she should do, she assembled certain of the best and chiefest men of the county and with plaintive speech very orderly recounted to them that which she had already done for love of the count and showed them what had ensued thereof, adding that it was not her intent that, through her sojourn there, the count should abide in perpetual exile; nay, rather she purposed to spend the rest of her life in pilgrimages and works of mercy and charity for her soul's health; wherefore she prayed them take the ward and governance of the county and notify the count that she had left him free and vacant possession and had departed the country, intending nevermore to return to Roussillon. Many were the tears shed by the good folk, whilst she spoke, and many the prayers addressed to her that it would please her change counsel and abide there; but they availed nought. Then, commending them to God, she set out upon her way, without telling any whither she was bound, well furnished with monies and jewels of price and accompanied by a cousin of hers and a chamberwoman, all in pilgrims' habits, and stayed not till she came to Florence, where, chancing upon a little inn, kept by a decent widow woman, she there took up her abode and lived quietly, after the fashion of a poor pilgrim, impatient to hear news of her lord.

It befell, then, that on the morrow of her arrival she saw Bertrand pass before her lodging, a-horseback with his company, and albeit she knew him full well, natheless she asked the good woman of the inn who he was. The hostess answered, 'That is a stranger gentleman, who calleth himself Count Bertrand, a pleasant man and a courteous and much loved in this city; and he is the most enamoured man in the world of a she-neighbour of ours, who is a gentlewoman, but poor. Sooth to say, she is a very virtuous damsel and abideth, being yet unmarried for poverty, with her mother, a very good and discreet lady, but for whom, maybe, she had already done the count's pleasure.' The countess took good note of what she heard and having more closely enquired into every particular and apprehended all aright, determined in herself how she should do.

Accordingly, having learned the house and name of the lady whose daughter the count loved, she one day repaired privily thither in her pilgrim's habit and finding the mother and daughter in very poor case, saluted them and told the former that, an it pleased her, she would fain speak with her alone. The gentlewoman, rising, replied that she was ready to hearken to her and accordingly carried her into a chamber of hers, where they seated themselves and the countess began thus, 'Madam, meseemeth you are of the enemies of Fortune, even as I am; but, an you will, belike you may be able to relieve both yourself and me.' The lady answered that she desired nothing better than to relieve herself by any honest means; and the countess went on, 'Needs must you pledge me your faith, whereto an I commit myself and you deceive me, you will mar your own affairs and mine.' 'Tell me anything you will in all assurance,' replied the gentlewoman; 'for never shall you find yourself deceived of me.'

Thereupon the countess, beginning with her first enamourment, recounted to her who she was and all that had betided her to that day after such a fashion that the gentlewoman, putting faith in her words and having, indeed, already in part heard her story from others, began to have compassion of her. The countess, having related her adventures, went on to say, 'You have now, amongst my other troubles, heard what are the two things which it behoveth me have, an I would have my husband, and to which I know none who can help me, save only yourself, if that be true which I hear, to wit, that the count my husband is passionately enamoured of your daughter.' 'Madam,' answered the gentlewoman, 'if the count love my daughter I know not; indeed he maketh a great show thereof. But, an it be so, what can I do in this that you desire?' 'Madam,' rejoined the countess, 'I will tell you; but first I will e'en show you what I purpose shall ensue thereof to you, an you serve me. I see your daughter fair and of age for a husband and according to what I have heard, meseemeth I understand the lack of good to marry her withal it is that causeth you keep her at home. Now I purpose, in requital of the service you shall do me, to give her forthright of mine own monies such a dowry as you yourself shall deem necessary to marry her honorably.'

The mother, being needy, was pleased with the offer; algates, having the spirit of a gentlewoman, she said, 'Madam, tell me what I can do for you; if it consist with my honour, I will willingly do it, and you shall after do that which shall please you.' Then said the countess, 'It behoveth me that you let tell the count my husband by some one in whom you trust, that your daughter is ready to do his every pleasure, so she may but be certified that he loveth her as he pretendeth, the which she will never believe, except he send her the ring which he carrieth on his finger and by which she hath heard he setteth such store. An he send you the ring, you must give it to me and after send to him to say that your daughter is ready do his pleasure; then bring him hither in secret and privily put me to bed to him in the stead of your daughter. It may be God will vouchsafe me to conceive and on this wise, having his ring on my finger and a child in mine arms of him begotten, I shall presently regain him and abide with him, as a wife should abide with her husband, and you will have been the cause thereof.'

This seemed a grave matter to the gentlewoman, who feared lest blame should haply ensue thereof to her daughter; nevertheless, bethinking her it were honourably done to help the poor lady recover her husband and that she went about to do this to a worthy end and trusting in the good and honest intention of the countess, she not only promised her to do it, but, before many days, dealing with prudence and secrecy, in accordance with the latter's instructions, she both got the ring (albeit this seemed somewhat grievous to the count) and adroitly put her to bed with her husband, in the place of her own daughter. In these first embracements, most ardently sought of the count, the lady, by God's pleasure, became with child of two sons, as her delivery in due time made manifest. Nor once only, but many times, did the gentlewoman gratify the countess with her husband's embraces, contriving so secretly that never was a word known of the matter, whilst the count still believed himself to have been, not with his wife, but with her whom he loved; and whenas he came to take leave of a morning, he gave her, at one time and another, divers goodly and precious jewels, which the countess laid up with all diligence.

Then, feeling herself with child and unwilling to burden the gentlewoman farther with such an office, she said to her, 'Madam, thanks to God and you, I have gotten that which I desired, wherefore it is time that I do that which shall content you and after get me gone hence.' The gentlewoman answered that, if she had gotten that which contented her, she was well pleased, but that she had not done this of any hope of reward, nay, for that herseemed it behoved her to do it, an she would do well. 'Madam,' rejoined the countess, 'that which you say liketh me well and so on my part I purpose not to give you that which you shall ask of me by way of reward, but to do well, for that meseemeth behoveful so to do.' The gentlewoman, then, constrained by necessity, with the utmost shamefastness, asked her an hundred pounds to marry her daughter withal; but the countess, seeing her confusion and hearing her modest demand, gave her five hundred and so many rare and precious jewels as were worth maybe as much more. With this the gentlewoman was far more than satisfied and rendered the countess the best thanks in her power; whereupon the latter, taking leave of her, returned to the inn, whilst the other, to deprive Bertrand of all farther occasion of coming or sending to her house, removed with her daughter into the country to the house of one of her kinsfolk, and he, being a little after recalled by his vassals and hearing that the countess had departed the country, returned to his own house.

The countess, hearing that he had departed Florence and returned to his county, was mightily rejoiced and abode at Florence till her time came to be delivered, when she gave birth to two male children, most like their father, and let rear them with all diligence. Whenas it seemed to her time, she set out and came, without being known of any, to Montpellier, where having rested some days and made enquiry of the count and where he was, she learned that he was to hold a great entertainment of knights and ladies at Roussillon on All Saints' Day and betook herself thither, still in her pilgrim's habit that she was wont to wear. Finding the knights and ladies assembled in the count's palace and about to sit down to table, she went up, with her children in her arms and without changing her dress, into the banqueting hall and making her way between man and man whereas she saw the count, cast herself at his feet and said, weeping, 'I am thine unhappy wife, who, to let thee return and abide in thy house, have long gone wandering miserably about the world. I conjure thee, in the name of God, to accomplish unto me thy promise upon the condition appointed me by the two knights I sent thee; for, behold, here in mine arms is not only one son of thine, but two, and here is thy ring. It is time, then, that I be received of thee as a wife, according to thy promise.'

The count, hearing this, was all confounded and recognized the ring and the children also, so like were they to him; but yet he said, 'How can this have come to pass?' The countess, then, to his exceeding wonderment and that of all others who were present, orderly recounted that which had passed and how it had happened; whereupon the count, feeling that she spoke sooth and seeing her constancy and wit and moreover two such goodly children, as well for the observance of his promise as to pleasure all his liegemen and the ladies, who all besought him thenceforth to receive and honour her as his lawful wife, put off his obstinate despite and raising the countess to her feet, embraced her and kissing her, acknowledged her for his lawful wife and those for his children. Then, letting clothe her in apparel such as beseemed her quality, to the exceeding joyance of as many as were there and of all other his vassals who heard the news, he held high festival, not only all that day, but sundry others, and from that day forth still honoured her as his bride and his wife and loved and tendered her over all."

in the house of a poor man, who on the morrow carrieth him, in the guise of a wild man of the woods, to the piazza, where, being recognized, he is taken by his brethren and put in prison.

The story told by Fiammetta had more than once brought the tears to the eyes of the ladies her companions; but, it being now finished, the king with a stern countenance said, "My life would seem to me a little price to give for half the delight that Guiscardo had with Ghismonda, nor should any of you ladies marvel thereat, seeing that every hour of my life I suffer a thousand deaths, nor for all that is a single particle of delight vouchsafed me. But, leaving be my affairs for the present, it is my pleasure that Pampinea follow on the order of the discourse with some story of woe-ful chances and fortunes in part like to mine own; which if she ensue like as Fiammetta hath begun, I shall doubtless begin to feel some dew fallen upon my fire." Pampinea, hearing the order laid upon her, more by her affection apprehended the mind of the ladies her companions than that of Filostrato by his words, wherefore, being more disposed to give them some diversion than to content the king, farther than in the mere letter of his commandment, she bethought herself to tell a story, that should, without departing from the proposed theme, give occasion for laughter, and accordingly began as follows:

"The vulgar have a proverb to the effect that he who is naught and is held good may do ill and it is not believed of him; the which affordeth me ample matter for discourse upon that which hath been proposed to me and at the same time to show what and how great is the hypocrisy of the clergy, who, with garments long and wide and faces pale by art and voices humble and meek to solicit the folk, but exceeding loud and fierce to rebuke in others their own vices, pretend that themselves by taking and others by giving to them come to salvation, and to boot, not as men who have, like ourselves, to purchase paradise, but as in a manner they were possessors and lords thereof, assign unto each who dieth, according to the sum of the monies left them by him, a more or less excellent place there, studying thus to deceive first themselves, an they believe as they say, and after those who put faith for that matter in their words. Anent whom, were it permitted me to discover as much as it behoved, I would quickly make clear to many simple folk that which they keep hidden under those huge wide gowns of theirs. But would God it might betide them all of their cozening tricks, as it betided a certain minor friar, and he no youngling, but held one of the first casuists in Venice; of whom it especially pleaseth me to tell you, so as peradventure somewhat to cheer your hearts, that are full of compassion for the death of Ghismonda, with laughter and pleasance.

There was, then, noble ladies, in Imola, a man of wicked and corrupt life, who was called Berto della Massa and whose lewd fashions, being well known of the Imolese, had brought him into such ill savour with them that there was none in the town who would credit him, even when he said sooth; wherefore, seeing that his shifts might no longer stand him in stead there, he removed in desperation to Venice, the receptacle of every kind of trash, thinking to find there new means of carrying on his wicked practices. There, as if conscience-stricken for the evil deeds done by him in the past, feigning himself overcome with the utmost humility and waxing devouter than any man alive, he went and turned Minor Friar and styled himself Fra Alberta da Imola; in which habit he proceeded to lead, to all appearance, a very austere life, greatly commending abstinence and mortification and never eating flesh nor drinking wine, whenas he had not thereof that which was to his liking. In short, scarce was any ware of him when from a thief, a pimp, a forger, a manslayer, he suddenly became a great preacher, without having for all that forsworn the vices aforesaid, whenas he might secretly put them in practice. Moreover, becoming a priest, he would still, whenas he celebrated mass at the altar, an he were seen of many, bewep our Saviour's passion, as one whom tears cost little, whenas he willed it. Brief, what with his preachings and his tears, he contrived on such wise to inveigle the Venetians that he was trustee and depository of well nigh every will made in the town and guardian of folk's monies, besides being confessor and counsellor of the most part of the men and women of the place; and doing thus, from wolf he was become shepherd and the fame of his sanctity was far greater in those parts than ever was that of St. Francis at Assisi.

It chanced one day that a vain simple young lady, by name Madam Lisetta da Ca Quirino, wife of a great merchant who was gone with the galleys into Flanders, came with other ladies to confess to this same holy friar, at whose feet kneeling and having, like a true daughter of Venice as she was (where the women are all feather-brained), told him part of her affairs, she was asked of him if she had a lover. Whereunto she answered, with an offended air, 'Good lack, sir friar, have you no eyes in your head? Seem my charms to you such as those of yonder others? I might have lovers and to spare, an I would; but my beauties are not for this one nor that. How many women do you see whose charms are such as mine, who would be fair in Paradise?' Brief, she said so many things of this beauty of hers that it was a weariness to hear. Fra Alberto incontinent perceived that she savoured of folly and himseeming she was a fit soil for his tools, he fell suddenly and beyond measure in love with her; but, reserving blandishments for a more convenient season, he proceeded, for the nonce, so he might show himself a holy man, to rebuke her and tell her that this was vainglory and so forth. The lady told him he was an ass and knew not what one beauty was more than another, whereupon he, unwilling to vex her overmuch, took her confession and let her go away with the others.

He let some days pass, then, taking with him a trusty companion of his, he repaired to Madam Lisetta's house and withdrawing with her into a room apart, where none might see him, he fell on his knees before her and said, 'Madam, I pray you for God's sake pardon me that which I said to you last Sunday, whenas you bespoke me of your beauty, for that the following night I was so cruelly chastised there that I have not since been able to rise from my bed till to-day.' Quoth Mistress Featherbrain, 'And who chastised you thus?' 'I will tell you,' replied the monk. 'Being that night at my orisons, as I still use to be, I saw of a sudden a great light in my cell and ere I could turn me to see what it might be, I beheld over against me a very fair youth with a stout cudgel in his hand, who took me by the gown and dragging me to my feet, gave me such a drubbing that he broke every bone in my body. I asked him why he used me thus and he answered, "For that thou presumedst to-day, to disparage the celestial charms of Madam Lisetta, whom I love over all things, save only God." "Who, then, are you?" asked I; and he replied that he was the angel Gabriel. "O my lord," said I, "I pray you pardon me"; and he, "So be it; I pardon thee on condition that thou go to her, as first thou mayst, and get her pardon; but if she pardons thee not, I will return to thee and give thee such a bout of it that I will make thee a woeful man for all the time thou shalt live here below." That which he said to me after I dare not tell you, except you first pardon me.'

My Lady Addlepate, who was somewhat scant of wit, was overjoyed to hear this, taking it all for gospel, and said, after a little, 'I told you, Fra Alberto, that my charms were celestial, but, so God be mine aid, it irketh me for you and I will pardon you forthright, so you may come to no more harm, provided you tell me truly that which the angel said to you after.' 'Madam,' replied Fra Alberto, 'since you pardon me, I will gladly tell it you; but I must warn you of one thing, to wit, that whatever I tell you, you must have a care not to repeat it to any one alive, an you would not mar your affairs, for that you are the luckiest lady in the world. The angel Gabriel bade me tell you that you pleased him so much that he had many a time come to pass the night with you, but that he feared to affright you. Now he sendeth to tell you by me that he hath a mind to come to you one night and abide awhile with you and (for that he is an angel and that, if he came in angel-form, you might not avail to touch him,) he purposeth, for your delectation, to come in guise of a man, wherefore he biddeth you send to tell him when you would have him come and in whose form, and he will come hither; whereof you may hold yourself blest over any other lady alive.'

My Lady Conceit answered that it liked her well that the angel Gabriel loved her, seeing she loved him well nor ever failed to light a candle of a groat before him, whereas she saw him depicted, and that what time soever he chose to come to her, he should be dearly welcome and would find her all alone in her chamber, but on this condition, that he should not leave her for the Virgin Mary, whose great well-wisher it was said he was, as indeed appeared, inasmuch as in every place where she saw him [limned], he was on his knees before her. Moreover, she said it must rest with him to come in whatsoever form he pleased, so but she was not affrighted.

Then said Fra Alberto, 'Madam, you speak sagely and I will without fail take order with him of that which you tell me. But you may do me a great favour, which will cost you nothing; it is this, that you will him come with this my body. And I will tell you in what you will do me a favour; you must know that he will take my soul forth of my body and put it in Paradise, whilst he himself will enter into me; and what while he abideth with you, so long will my soul abide in Paradise.' 'With all my heart,' answered Dame Littlewit. 'I will well that you have this consolation, in requital of the buffets he gave you on my account.' Then said Fra Alberto, 'Look that he find the door of your house open to-night, so he may come in thereat, for that, coming in human form, as he will, he might not enter save by the door.' The lady replied that it should be done, whereupon the monk took his leave and she abode in such a transport of exultation that her breech touched not her shift and herseemed a thousand years till the angel Gabriel should come to her.

Meanwhile, Fra Alberto, bethinking him that it behoved him play the cavalier, not the angel, that night proceeded to fortify himself with confections and other good things, so he might not lightly be unhorsed; then, getting leave, as soon as it was night, he repaired with one of his comrades to the house of a woman, a friend of his, whence he was used whiles to take his start what time he went to course the fillies; and thence, whenas it seemed to him time, having disguised himself, he betook him to the lady's house. There he tricked himself out as an angel with the trappings he had brought with him and going up, entered the chamber of the lady, who, seeing this creature all in white, fell on her knees before him. The angel blessed her and raising her to her feet, signed to her to go to bed, which she, studious to obey, promptly did, and the angel after lay down with his devotee. Now Fra Alberto was a personable man of his body and a lusty and excellent well set up on his legs; wherefore, finding himself in bed with Madam Lisetta, who was young and dainty, he showed himself another guess bedfellow than her husband and many a time that night took flight without wings, whereof she avowed herself exceeding content; and eke he told her many things of the glories of heaven. Then, the day drawing near, after taking order for his return, he made off with his trappings and returned to his comrade, whom the good woman of the house had meanwhile borne amicable company, lest he should get a fright, lying alone.

As for the lady, no sooner had she dined than, taking her waiting-woman with her, she betook herself to Fra Alberto and gave him news of the angel Gabriel, telling him that which she had heard from him of the glories of life eternal and how he was made and adding to boot, marvellous stories of her own invention. 'Madam,' said he, 'I know not how you fared with him; I only know that yesternight, whenas he came to me and I did your message to him, he suddenly transported my soul amongst such a multitude of roses and other flowers that never was the like thereof seen here below, and I abode in one of the most delightsome places that was aye until the morning; but what became of my body meanwhile I know not.' 'Do I not tell you?' answered the lady. 'Your body lay all night in mine arms with the angel Gabriel. If you believe me not, look under your left pap, whereas I gave the angel such a kiss that the marks of it will stay by you for some days to come.' Quoth the friar, 'Say you so? Then will I do to-day a thing I have not done this great while; I will strip myself, to see if you tell truth.' Then, after much prating, the lady returned home and Fra Alberto paid her many visits in angel-form, without suffering any hindrance.

However, it chanced one day that Madam Lisetta, being in dispute with a gossip of hers upon the question of female charms, to set her own above all others, said, like a woman who had little wit in her noddle, 'An you but knew whom my beauty pleaseth, in truth you would hold your peace of other women.' The other, longing to hear, said, as one who knew her well, 'Madam, maybe you say sooth; but knowing not who this may be, one cannot turn about so lightly.' Thereupon quoth Lisetta, who was eath enough to draw, 'Gossip, it must go no farther; but he I mean is the angel Gabriel, who loveth me more than himself, as the fairest lady (for that which he telleth me) who is in the world or the Maremma.' The other had a mind to laugh, but contained herself, so she might make Lisetta speak farther, and said, 'Faith, madam, an the angel Gabriel be your lover and tell you this, needs must it be so; but methought not the angels did these things.' 'Gossip,' answered the lady, 'you are mistaken; zounds, he doth what you wot of better than my husband and telleth me they do it also up yonder; but, for that I seem to him fairer than any she in heaven, he hath fallen in love with me and cometh full oft to lie with me; seestow now?'

The gossip, to whom it seemed a thousand years till she should be whereas she might repeat these things, took her leave of Madam Lisetta and foregathering at an entertainment with a great company of ladies, orderly recounted to them the whole story. They told it again to their husbands and other ladies, and these to yet others, and so in less than two days Venice was all full of it. Among others to whose ears the thing came were Lisetta's brothers-in-law, who, without saying aught to her, bethought themselves to find the angel in question and see if he knew how to fly, and to this end they lay several nights in wait for him. As chance would have it, some inkling of the matter came to the ears of Fra Alberto, who accordingly repaired one night to the lady's house, to reprove her, but hardly had he put off his clothes ere her brothers-in-law, who had seen him come, were at the door of her chamber to open it.

Fra Alberto, hearing this and guessing what was to do, started up and having no other resource, opened a window, which gave upon the Grand Canal, and cast himself thence into the water. The canal was deep there and he could swim well, so that he did himself no hurt, but made his way to the opposite bank and hastily entering a house that stood open there, besought a poor man, whom he found within, to save his life for the love of God, telling him a tale of his own fashion, to explain how he came there at that hour and naked. The good man was moved to pity and it behoving him to go do his occasions, he put him in his own bed and bade him abide there against his return; then, locking him in, he went about his affairs. Meanwhile, the lady's brothers-in-law entered her chamber and found that the angel Gabriel had flown, leaving his wings there; whereupon, seeing themselves baffled, they gave her all manner hard words and ultimately made off to their own house with the angel's trappings, leaving her disconsolate.

Broad day come, the good man with whom Fra Alberto had taken refuge, being on the Rialto, heard how the angel Gabriel had gone that night to lie with Madam Lisetta and being surprised by her kinsmen, had cast himself for fear into the canal, nor was it known what was come of him, and concluded forthright that this was he whom he had at home. Accordingly, he returned thither and recognizing the monk, found means after much parley, to make him fetch him fifty ducats, an he would not have him give him up to the lady's kinsmen. Having gotten the money and Fra Alberto offering to depart thence, the good man said to him, 'There is no way of escape for you, an it be not one that I will tell you. We hold to-day a festival, wherein one bringeth a man clad bear-fashion and another one accoutred as a wild man of the woods and what not else, some one thing and some another, and there is a hunt held in St. Mark's Place, which finished, the festival is at an end and after each goeth whither it pleaseth him with him whom he hath brought. An you will have me lead you thither, after one or other of these fashions, I can after carry you whither you please, ere it be spied out that you are here; else I know not how you are to get away, without being recognized, for the lady's kinsmen, concluding that you must be somewhere hereabout, have set a watch for you on all sides.'

Hard as it seemed to Fra Alberto to go on such wise, nevertheless, of the fear he had of the lady's kinsmen, he resigned himself thereto and told his host whither he would be carried, leaving the manner to him. Accordingly, the other, having smeared him all over with honey and covered him with down, clapped a chain about his neck and a mask on his face; then giving him a great staff in on hand and in the other two great dogs which he had fetched from the shambles he despatched one to the Rialto to make public proclamation that whoso would see the angel Gabriel should repair to St. Mark's Place; and this was Venetian loyalty! This done, after a while, he brought him forth and setting him before himself, went holding him by the chain behind, to the no small clamour of the folk, who said all, 'What be this? What be this?' till he came to the place, where, what with those who had followed after them and those who, hearing the proclamation, were come thither from the Rialto, were folk without end. There he tied his wild man to a column in a raised and high place, making a show of awaiting the hunt, whilst the flies and gads gave the monk exceeding annoy, for that he was besmeared with honey. But, when he saw the place well filled, making as he would unchain his wild man, he pulled off Fra Alberto's mask and said, 'Gentlemen, since the bear cometh not and there is no hunt toward, I purpose, so you may not be come in vain, that you shall see the angel Gabriel, who cometh down from heaven to earth anights, to comfort the Venetian ladies.'

No sooner was the mask off than Fra Alberto was incontinent recognized of all, who raised a general outcry against him, giving him the scurviest words and the soundest rating was ever given a canting knave; moreover, they cast in his face, one this kind of filth and another that, and so they baited him a great while, till the news came by chance to his brethren, whereupon half a dozen of them sallied forth and coming thither, unchained him and threw a gown over him; then, with a general hue and cry behind them, they carried him off to the convent, where it is believed he died in prison, after a wretched life. Thus then did this fellow, held good and doing ill, without it being believed, dare to feign himself the angel Gabriel, and after being turned into a wild man of the woods and put to shame, as he deserved, bewailed, when too late, the sins he had committed. God grant it happen thus to all other knaves of his fashion!"

Day the Fifth

The Ninth Story

Federigo degli alberighi loveth and is not loved. He wasteth his substance in prodigal hospitality till there is left him but one sole falcon, which, having nought else, he giveth his mistress to eat, on her coming to his house; and she, learning this, changeth her mind and taking him to husband, maketh him rich again.

Filomena having ceased speaking, the queen, seeing that none remained to tell save only herself and Dioneo, whose privilege entitled him to speak last, said, with blithe aspect, "It pertaineth now to me to tell and I, dearest ladies, will willingly do it, relating a story like in part to the foregoing, to the intent that not only may you know how much the love of you can avail in gentle hearts, but that you may learn to be yourselves, whenas it behoveth, bestowers of your guerdons, without always suffering fortune to be your guide, which most times, as it chanceth, giveth not discreetly, but out of all measure.

You must know, then, that Coppo di Borghese Domenichi, who was of our days and maybe is yet a man of great worship and authority in our city and illustrious and worthy of eternal renown, much more for his fashions and his merit than for the nobility of his blood, being grown full of years, delighted oftentimes to discourse with his neighbours and others of things past, the which he knew how to do better and more orderly and with more memory and elegance of speech than any other man. Amongst other fine things of his, he was used to tell that there was once in Florence a young man called Federigo, son of Messer Filippo Alberighi and renowned for deeds of arms and courtesy over every other bachelor in Tuscany, who, as betideth most gentlemen, became enamoured of a gentlewoman named Madam Giovanna, in her day held one of the fairest and sprightliest ladies that were in Florence; and to win her love, he held jousts and tourneyings and made entertainments and gave gifts and spent his substance without any stint; but she, being no less virtuous than fair, recked nought of these things done for her nor of him who did them. Federigo spending thus far beyond his means and gaining nought, his wealth, as lightly happeneth, in course of time came to an end and he abode poor, nor was aught left him but a poor little farm, on whose returns he lived very meagrely, and to boot a falcon he had, one of the best in the world. Wherefore, being more in love than ever and him-seeming he might no longer make such a figure in the city as he would fain do, he took up his abode at Campi, where his farm was, and there bore his poverty with patience, hawking whenas he might and asking of no one.

Federigo being thus come to extremity, it befell one day that Madam Giovanna's husband fell sick and seeing himself nigh upon death, made his will, wherein, being very rich, he left a son of his, now well grown, his heir, after which, having much loved Madam Giovanna, he substituted her to his heir, in case his son should die without lawful issue, and died. Madam Giovanna, being thus left a widow, betook herself that summer, as is the usage of our ladies, into the country with her son to an estate of hers very near that of Federigo; wherefore it befell that the lad made acquaintance with the latter and began to take delight in hawks and hounds, and having many a time seen his falcon flown and being strangely taken therewith, longed sore to have it, but dared not ask it of him, seeing it so dear to him. The thing standing thus, it came to pass that the lad fell sick, whereat his mother was sore concerned, as one who had none but him and loved him with all her might, and abode about him all day, comforting him without cease; and many a time she asked him if there were aught he desired, beseeching him tell it her, for an it might be gotten, she would contrive that he should have it. The lad, having heard these offers many times repeated, said, 'Mother mine, an you could procure me to have Federigo's falcon, methinketh I should soon be whole.'

The lady hearing this, bethought herself awhile and began to consider how she should do. She knew that Federigo had long loved her and had never gotten of her so much as a glance of the eye; wherefore quoth she in herself, 'How shall I send or go to him to seek of him this falcon, which is, by all I hear, the best that ever flew and which, to boot, maintaineth him in the world? And how can I be so graceless as to offer to take this from a gentleman who hath none other pleasure left?' Perplexed with this thought and knowing not what to say, for all she was very certain of getting the bird, if she asked for it, she made no reply to her son, but abode silent. However, at last, the love of her son so got the better of her that she resolved in herself to satisfy him, come what might, and not to send, but to go herself for the falcon and fetch it to him. Accordingly she said to him, 'My son, take comfort and bethink thyself to grow well again, for I promise thee that the first thing I do to-morrow morning I will go for it and fetch it to thee.' The boy was rejoiced at this and showed some amendment that same day.

Next morning, the lady, taking another lady to bear her company, repaired, by way of diversion, to Federigo's little house and enquired for the latter, who, for that it was no weather for hawking nor had been for some days past, was then in a garden he had, overlooking the doing of certain little matters of his, and hearing that Madam Giovanna asked for him at the door, ran thither, rejoicing and marvelling exceedingly. She, seeing him come, rose and going with womanly graciousness to meet him, answered his respectful salutation with 'Give you good day, Federigo!' then went on to say, 'I am come to make thee amends for that which thou hast suffered through me, in loving me more than should have behooved thee; and the amends in question is this that I purpose to dine with thee this morning familiarly, I and this lady my companion.' 'Madam,' answered Federigo humbly, 'I remember me not to have ever received any ill at your hands, but on the contrary so much good that, if ever I was worth aught, it came about through your worth and the love I bore you; and assuredly, albeit you have come to a poor host, this your gracious visit is far more precious to me than it would be an it were given me to spend over again as much as that which I have spent aforetime.' So saying, he shamefastly received her into his house and thence brought her into his garden, where, having none else to bear her company, he said to her, 'Madam, since there is none else here, this good woman, wife of yonder husbandman, will bear you company, whilst I go see the table laid.'

Never till that moment, extreme as was his poverty, had he been so dolorously sensible of the straits to which he had brought himself for the lack of those riches he had spent on such disorderly wise. But that morning, finding he had nothing wherewithal he might honourably entertain the lady, for love of whom he had aforetime entertained folk without number, he was made perforce aware of his default and ran hither and thither, perplexed beyond measure, like a man beside himself, inwardly cursing his ill fortune, but found neither money nor aught he might pawn. It was now growing late and he having a great desire to entertain the gentle lady with somewhat, yet choosing not to have recourse to his own labourer, much less any one else, his eye fell on his good falcon, which he saw on his perch in his little saloon; whereupon, having no other resource, he took the bird and finding him fat, deemed him a dish worthy of such a lady. Accordingly, without more ado, he wrung the hawk's neck and hastily caused a little maid of his pluck it and truss it and after put it on the spit and roast it diligently. Then, the table laid and covered with very white cloths, whereof he had yet some store, he returned with a blithe countenance to the lady in the garden and told her that dinner was ready, such as it was in his power to provide. Accordingly, the lady and her friend, arising, betook themselves to table and in company with Federigo, who served them with the utmost diligence, ate the good falcon, unknowing what they did.

Presently, after they had risen from table and had abidden with him awhile in cheerful discourse, the lady, thinking it time to tell that wherefor she was come, turned to Federigo and courteously bespoke him, saying, 'Federigo, I doubt not a jot but that, when thou hearest that which is the especial occasion of my coming hither, thou wilt marvel at my presumption, remembering thee of thy past life and of my virtue, which latter belike thou reputedst cruelty and hardness of heart; but, if thou hadst or hadst had children, by whom thou mightest know how potent is the love one beareth them, meseemeth certain that thou wouldst in part hold me excused. But, although thou hast none, I, who have one child, cannot therefore escape the common laws to which other mothers are subject and whose enforcements it behoveth me ensue, need must I, against my will and contrary to all right and seemliness, ask of thee a boon, which I know is supremely dear to thee (and that with good reason, for that thy sorry fortune hath left thee none other delight, none other diversion, none other solace), to wit, thy falcon, whereof my boy is so sore enamoured that, an I carry it not to him, I fear me his present disorder will be so aggravated that there may presently ensue thereof somewhat whereby I shall lose him. Wherefore I conjure thee,—not by the love thou bearest me and whereto thou art nowise beholden, but by thine own nobility, which in doing courtesy hath approved itself greater than in any other,—that it please thee give it to me, so by the gift I may say I have kept my son alive and thus made him for ever thy debtor.'

Federigo, hearing what the lady asked and knowing that he could not oblige her, for that he had given her the falcon to eat, fell a-weeping in her presence, ere he could answer a word. The lady at first believed that his tears arose from grief at having to part from his good falcon and was like to say that she would not have it. However, she contained herself and awaited what Federigo should reply, who, after weeping awhile, made answer thus: ‘Madam, since it pleased God that I should set my love on you, I have in many things reputed fortune contrary to me and have complained of her; but all the ill turns she hath done me have been a light matter in comparison with that which she doth me at this present and for which I can never more be reconciled to her, considering that you are come hither to my poor house, whereas you deigned not to come what while I was rich, and seek of me a little boon, the which she hath so wrought that I cannot grant you; and why this cannot be I will tell you briefly. When I heard that you, of your favour, were minded to dine with me, I deemed it a light thing and a seemly, having regard to your worth and the nobility of your station, to honour you, as far as in me lay, with some choicer victual than that which is commonly set before other folk; wherefore, remembering me of the falcon which you ask of me and of his excellence, I judged him a dish worthy of you. This very morning, then, you have had him roasted upon the trencher, and indeed I had accounted him excellently well bestowed; but now, seeing that you would fain have had him on other wise, it is so great a grief to me that I cannot oblige you therein that methinketh I shall never forgive myself therefor.’ So saying, in witness of this, he let cast before her the falcon’s feathers and feet and beak.

The lady, seeing and hearing this, first blamed him for having, to give a woman to eat, slain such a falcon, and after inwardly much commended the greatness of his soul, which poverty had not availed nor might anyway avail to abate. Then, being put out of all hope of having the falcon and fallen therefore in doubt of her son’s recovery, she took her leave and returned, all disconsolate, to the latter, who, before many days had passed, whether for chagrin that he could not have the bird or for that his disorder was e’en fated to bring him to that pass, departed this life, to the inexpressible grief of his mother. After she had abidden awhile full of tears and affliction, being left very rich and yet young, she was more than once urged by her brothers to marry again, and albeit she would fain not have done so, yet, finding herself importuned and calling to mind Federigo’s worth and his last magnificence, to wit, the having slain such a falcon for her entertainment, she said to them, ‘I would gladly, an it liked you, abide as I am; but, since it is your pleasure that I take a [second] husband, certes I will never take any other, an I have not Federigo degli Alberighi.’ Whereupon her brothers, making mock of her, said ‘Silly woman that thou art, what is this thou sayest? How canst thou choose him, seeing he hath nothing in the world?’ ‘Brothers mine,’ answered she, ‘I know very well that it is as you say; but I would liefer have a man that lacketh of riches than riches that lack of a man.’ Her brethren, hearing her mind and knowing Federigo for a man of great merit, poor though he was, gave her, with all her wealth, to him, even as she would; and he, seeing himself married to a lady of such worth and one whom he had loved so dear and exceeding rich, to boot, became a better husband of his substance and ended his days with her in joy and solace.”

THE DIVINE COMEDY

Dante Alighieri (1265-1321 C.E.)

Composed between 1308- 1321 C.E.

Italy

Durante degli Alighieri, known to us as Dante, called his masterpiece simply La Commedia (The Comedy), not because it is funny, but because it begins sadly and ends happily. It is a deceptively simple title for such a complex and detailed work; as an example, Dante intended the first three lines to be read with four levels of meaning (literal, allegorical, moral, and anagogical/mystical). Boccaccio, author of The Decameron, added the word “Divine” to the title, both for the subject matter and the quality of the work. In the story, Dante appears as the main character, although this “pilgrim” should not be confused with the author himself: The character has no clue about what is happening, while the author controls all. The Divine Comedy exists because Dante made the switch from writing love lyrics (with the focus on earthly love) to writing about spiritual love after his muse, Beatrice, died during one of the plagues in Florence. Just as Beatrice inspired Dante from afar during life (the two never had a romantic relationship), she becomes after death the angelic inspiration to turn his attention to God. Dante plays with several traditions in his work: It is a Christian epic, where the epic hero does not need to be brave (in fact, he faints several times) as long as he has divine intervention; it is a pro-Trojan work, following Virgil’s lead in the Aeneid; and it uses classical imagery and mythology to represent ideas (literally, Cerberus is a three-headed dog from Greek mythology, but he appears on the level of the Gluttonous to represent the concept of gulping down food). Virgil’s influence manifests itself in several other ways: not only as the epic poet who was, according to Dante, his great master, but also as the poet who wrote of the foundation of the Roman Empire. Dante believed that a strong Holy Roman Empire (based in what is now Germany) would lead to the Second Coming of Christ, whose birth came during the original pax Romana (peace of Rome). It makes perfect sense, therefore, that Beatrice would task Virgil with being Dante's guide until she assumes that duty before the ascent through Heaven. It also would explain the urgency of Dante's prose; Dante believes that little time is left before the end of the world, so his work attempts to persuade its audience to change their ways now. In the first book, Inferno (Hell), Dante finds ways to represent how the punishment is the crime, often with astonishing creativity; in Purgatorio (Purgatory), Dante describes the way that sins are purged; and in Paradiso (Heaven), Dante displays his knowledge of the arts and sciences of his day. Geographically, Hell is described as a downward funnel, while the island of Purgatory is a funnel leading upward. Earth exists (for Dante) as a globe around which all other heavenly bodies move; Heaven exists in those circles that form around the Earth, with God in the space beyond. Heaven is therefore described both as a rose (with the petals forming the circles) and as a type of stadium, where everyone sits facing out, rather than in. Dante's goal at the end of the epic is to be granted a vision of God as he looks out into the empyrean.

Inferno I

Introduction to the Divine Comedy

The Wood and the Mountain

When half way through the journey of our life
 I found that I was in a gloomy wood, because the path which led aright was lost.
 And ah, how hard it is to say just what this wild and rough and stubborn woodland was,                     5
 the very thought of which renews my fear!
 So bitter 't is, that death is little worse;
 but of the good to treat which there I found,
 I'll speak of what I else discovered there.

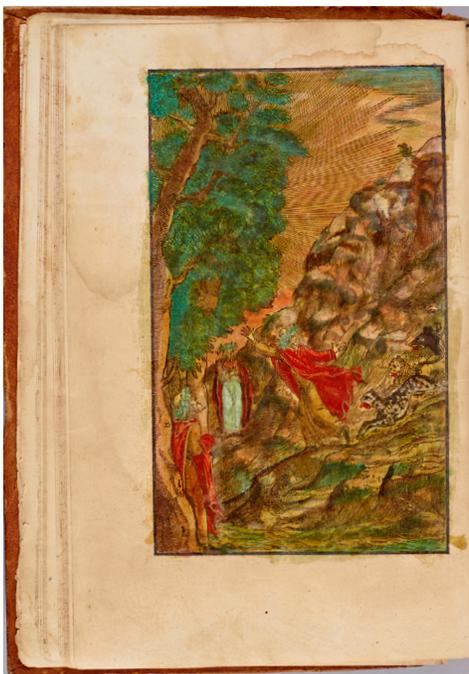

I cannot well say how I entered it,                                     10
 so full of slumber was I at the moment when I forsook the pathway of the truth;
 but after I had reached a mountain's foot,
 where that vale ended which had pierced my heart with fear, I looked on high,   15 and saw its shoulders
 mantled already with that planet's rays which leadeth one aright o'er every path.

Then quieted a little was the fear, which in the lake-depths of my heart had lasted                     20
 throughout the night I passed so piteously.

And even as he who, from the deep emerged with sorely troubled breath upon the shore,

turns round, and gazes at the dangerous water;
 even so my mind, which still was fleeing on,                     25 turned back to look again upon the pass which ne'er permitted any one to live.

When I had somewhat eased my weary body,

o'er the lone slope I so resumed my way,
 that e'er the lower was my steady foot. 30
 Then lo, not far from where the ascent began,
 a Leopard which, exceeding light and swift,
 was covered over with a spotted hide,
 and from my presence did not move away;
 nay, rather, she so hindered my advance, 35
 that more than once I turned me to go back.

Some time had now from early morn elapsed, and with those very stars the sun was rising that in his escort were, when Love Divine 40
 in the beginning moved those beauteous things;
 I therefore had as cause for hoping well
 of that wild beast with gaily mottled skin,
 the hour of daytime and the year's sweet season;
 but not so, that I should not fear the sight,
 which next appeared before me, of a Lion, 45
 —against me this one seemed to be advancing with head erect and with such raging hunger, that even the air seemed terrified thereby—and of a she-Wolf, which with every lust seemed in her leanness laden, and had caused 50
 many ere now to lead unhappy lives.
 The latter so oppressed me with the fear that issued from her aspect, that I lost
 the hope I had of winning to the top.

And such as he is, who is glad to gain, 55
 and who, when times arrive that make him lose, weeps and is saddened in his every thought;
 such did that peaceless animal make me,
 which, 'gainst me coming, pushed me, step by step,
 back to the place where silent is the sun. 60

While toward the lowland I was falling fast,
 the sight of one was offered to mine eyes,
 who seemed, through long continued silence, weak.
 When him in that vast wilderness I saw,
 "Have pity on me," I cried out to him, 65
 "whate'er thou be, or shade, or very man!"

"Not man," he answered, "I was once a man;
 and both my parents were of Lombardy,
 and Mantuans with respect to fatherland. 70
 'Neath Julius was I born, though somewhat late, and under good Augustus' rule I lived in Rome, in days of false and lying gods.
 I was a poet, and of that just man,
 Anchises' son, I sang, who came from Troy 75
 after proud Ilion had been consumed.
 But thou, to such sore trouble why return?
 Why climbst thou not the Mountain of Delight, which is of every joy the source and cause?"

"Art thou that Virgil, then, that fountain-head which poureth forth so broad a stream of speech?" 80
 I answered him with shame upon my brow.

“O light and glory of the other poets,
 let the long study, and the ardent love which made me con thy book, avail me now. 85
 Thou art my teacher and authority; thou only art the one from whom I took the lovely manner which hath done me honor.
 Behold the beast on whose account I turned;
 from her protect me, O thou famous Sage,
 for she makes both my veins and pulses tremble!” 90

“A different course from this must thou pursue,”
 he answered, when he saw me shedding tears,
 “if from this wilderness thou wouldst escape;
 for this wild beast, on whose account thou criest,
 alloweth none to pass along her way, 95
 but hinders him so greatly, that she kills;
 and is by nature so malign and guilty,
 that never doth she sate her greedy lust,
 but after food is hungrier than before. 100
 Many are the animals with which she mates, and still more will there be, until the Hound shall come, and bring her to a painful death.
 He shall not feed on either land or wealth,
 but wisdom, love and power shall be his food, 105
 and ’tween two Feltros shall his birth take place.
 Of that low Italy he’ll be the savior,
 for which the maid Camilla died of wounds,
 with Turnus, Nisus and Eurýalus.
 And he shall drive her out of every town,
 till he have put her back again in Hell, 110
 from which the earliest envy sent her forth.

I therefore think and judge it best for thee to follow me; and I shall be thy guide, and lead thee hence through an eternal place,
 where thou shalt hear the shrieks of hopelessness 115
 of those tormented spirits of old times, each one of whom bewails the second death;
 then those shalt thou behold who, though in fire,
 contented are, because they hope to come,
 whene’er it be, unto the blessèd folk; 120
 to whom, thereafter, if thou wouldst ascend, there’ll be for that a worthier soul than I.
 With her at my departure I shall leave thee,
 because the Emperor who rules up there,
 since I was not obedient to His law, 125
 wills none shall come into His town through me.
 He rules as emperor everywhere, and there as king; there is His town and lofty throne.
 O happy he whom He thereto elects!”

And I to him: “O Poet, I beseech thee, 130 even by the God it was not thine to know,
 so may I from this ill and worse escape,
 conduct me thither where thou saidst just now, that I may see Saint Peter’s Gate, and those whom thou describest as so whelmed with woe.” 135

He then moved on, and I behind him kept.

Inferno II

Introduction to the Inferno

The Mission of Virgil

Daylight was going, and the dusky air was now releasing from their weary toil
 all living things on earth; and I alone was making ready to sustain the war both of the road and of the sympathy, which my unerring memory will relate. 5

O Muses, O high Genius, help me now!
 O Memory, that wrotest what I saw,
 herewith shall thy nobility appear!

I then began: "Consider, Poet, thou 10 that guidest me, if strong my virtue be,
 or e'er thou trust me to the arduous course.
 Thou sayest that the sire of Silvio entered,
 when still corruptible, the immortal world,
 and that while in his body he was there. 15

Hence, that to him the Opponent of all ill was courteous, considering the great result that was to come from him, both who, and what, seems not unfitting to a thoughtful man;
 for he of fostering Rome and of her sway 20
 in the Empyrean Heaven was chosen as sire;
 and both of these, if one would tell the truth,
 were foreordained unto the holy place,
 where greatest Peter's follower hath his seat.

While on this quest, for which thou giv'st him praise, 25
 he heard the things which of his victory
 the causes were, and of the Papal Robe.
 The Chosen Vessel went there afterward,
 to bring thence confirmation in the faith,
 through which one enters on salvation's path. 30

But why should I go there, or who concedes it?
 I'm not Aeneas, nor yet Paul am I;
 me worthy of this, nor I nor others deem.
 If, therefore, I consent to come, I fear 35
 lest foolish be my coming; thou art wise, and canst much better judge than I can talk."

And such as he who unwill's what he willed,
 and changes so his purpose through new thoughts,
 that what he had begun he wholly leaves;
 such on that gloomy slope did I become; 40
 for, as I thought it over, I gave up the enterprise so hastily commenced.

"If I have rightly understood thy words," replied the shade of that Great-hearted man,
 "thy soul is hurt by shameful cowardice, 45

which many times so sorely hinders one,
 that from an honored enterprise it turns him,
 as seeing falsely doth a shying beast.
 In order that thou rid thee of this fear,
 I'll tell thee why I came, and what I heard 50
 the first time I was grieved on thy account.
 Among the intermediate souls I was,
 when me a Lady called, so beautiful and happy, that I begged her to command.
 Her eyes were shining brighter than a star, 55
 when sweetly and softly she began to say,
 as with an angel's voice she spoke to me:

'O courteous Mantuan spirit, thou whose fame is still enduring in the world above, and will endure as long as lasts the world, 60
 a friend of mine, but not a friend of Fortune, is on his journey o'er the lonely slope obstructed so, that he hath turned through fear;
 and, from what I have heard of him in Heaven,
 I fear lest he may now have strayed so far, 65
 that I have risen too late to give him help.
 Bestir thee, then, and with thy finished speech,
 and with whatever his escape may need,
 assist him so that I may be consoled.
 I, who now have thee go, am Beatrice; 70 thence come I, whither I would fain return;
 't was love that moved me, love that makes me speak.
 When in the presence of my Lord again,

often shall I commend thee unto Him.'
 Thereat she ceased to speak, and I began: 75

'O Lady of virtue, thou through whom alone
 the human race excels all things contained within the heaven that hath the smallest circles, thy bidding pleases me so much, that late
 I'd be, hadst thou already been obeyed; 80 thou needst but to disclose to me thy will.
 But tell me why thou dost not mind descending into this center from that ample place, whither thou art so eager to return.'

'Since thou wouldst know thereof so inwardly,
 I'll tell thee briefly,' she replied to me,
 'why I am not afraid to enter here.
 Of those things only should one be afraid,
 that have the power of doing injury;
 not of the rest, for they should not be feared. 90
 I, of His mercy, am so made by God, that me your wretchedness doth not affect,
 nor any flame of yonder fire molest.
 There is a Gentle Lady up in Heaven, who grieves so at this check, whereto I send thee, 95
 that broken is stern judgment there above.
 She called Lucia in her prayer, and said:
 'Now hath thy faithful servant need of thee,
 and I, too, recommend him to thy care.'

- Lucia, hostile to all cruelty, 100
 set forth thereat, and came unto the place, where I with ancient Rachel had my seat.
 'Why, Beatrice,' she said, 'true Praise of God,
 dost thou not succour him who loved thee so,
 that for thy sake he left the common herd? 105
 Dost thou not hear the anguish of his cry?
 see'st not the death that fights him on the flood,
 o'er which the sea availeth not to boast?
 Ne'er were there any in the world so swift to seek their profit and avoid their loss, 110
 as I, after such words as these were uttered, descended hither from my blessèd seat,
 confiding in that noble speech of thine,
 which honors thee and whoso'er has heard it.'
- Then, after she had spoken to me thus, 115
 weeping she turned her shining eyes away;
 which made me hasten all the more to come;
 and, even as she wished, I came to thee,
 and led thee from the presence of the beast,
 which robbed thee of the fair Mount's short approach. 120
 What is it, then? Why, why dost thou hold back?
 Why dost thou lodge such baseness in thy heart,
 and wherefore free and daring art thou not,
 since three so blessèd Ladies care for thee within the court of Heaven, and my words, too, 125 give thee the promise of so much that's good?"
- As little flowers by the chill of night bowed down and closed, when brightened by the sun, stand all erect and open on their stems;
 so likewise with my wearied strength did I; 130
 and such good daring coursed into my heart,
 that I began as one who had been freed:
- "O piteous she who hastened to my help,
 and courteous thou, that didst at once obey
 the words of truth that she addressed to thee! 135
 Thou hast with such desire disposed my heart toward going on, by reason of thy words, that to my first intention I've returned.
 Go on now, since we two have but one will;
 thou Leader, and thou Lord, and Teacher thou!" 140
- I thus addressed him; then, when he had moved,
 I entered on the wild and arduous course.

Inferno III

The Gate and Vestibule of Hell

Cowards and Neutrals. Acheron

Through me one goes into the town of woe, through me one goes into eternal pain,
 through me among the people that are lost.

Justice inspired my high exalted Maker;

I was created by the Might divine,
the highest Wisdom and the primal Love. 5

Before me there was naught created, save eternal things, and I eternal last;
all hope abandon, ye that enter here!

These words of gloomy color I beheld inscribed upon the summit of a gate;
whence I: "Their meaning, Teacher, troubles me." 10

And he to me, like one aware, replied:
"All fearfulness must here be left behind;
all forms of cowardice must here be dead. 15
We've reached the place where, as I said to thee, thou'lt see the sad folk who have lost the Good which is the object of the intellect."
Then, after he had placed his hand in mine with cheerful face, whence I was comforted, 20
he led me in among the hidden things.

There sighs and wails and piercing cries of woe reverberated through the starless air;
hence I, at first, shed tears of sympathy.
Strange languages, and frightful forms of speech, 25 words caused by pain, accents of anger, voices both loud and faint, and smiting hands withal, a mighty tumult made, which sweeps around forever in that timelessly dark air, as sand is wont, when'er a whirlwind blows. 30

And I, whose head was girt about with horror, said: "Teacher, what is this I hear? What folk is this, that seems so overwhelmed with woe?"

And he to me: "This wretched kind of life the miserable spirits lead of those 35 who lived with neither infamy nor praise.
Commingled are they with that worthless choir of Angels who did not rebel, nor yet were true to God, but sided with themselves.
The heavens, in order not to be less fair, 40
expelled them; nor doth nether Hell receive them, because the bad would get some glory thence."

And I: "What is it, Teacher, grieves them so,
it causes them so loudly to lament?"

"I'll tell thee very briefly," he replied. 45
"These have no hope of death, and so low down is this unseeing life of theirs, that envious
they are of every other destiny.
The world allows no fame of them to live;
Mercy and Justice hold them in contempt. 50
Let us not talk of them; but look, and pass!"

And I, who gazed intently, saw a flag, which, whirling, moved so swiftly that to me contemptuous it appeared of all repose;

 and after it there came so long a line 55
 of people, that I never would have thought that death so great a number had undone.

When some I'd recognized, I saw and knew the shade of him who through his cowardice the great Refusal made. I understood 60 immediately, and was assured that this the band of cowards was, who both to God displeasing are, and to His enemies.

These wretched souls, who never were alive,
 were naked, and were sorely spurred to action 65
 by means of wasps and hornets that were there.
 The latter streaked their faces with their blood,
 which, after it had mingled with their tears,
 was at their feet sucked up by loathsome worms.

When I had given myself to peering further, 70 people I saw upon a great stream's bank;
 I therefore said: "Now, Teacher, grant to me that I may know who these are, and what law makes them appear so eager to cross over,
 as in this dim light I perceive they are." 75

And he to me: "These things will be made clear to thee, as soon as on the dismal strand of Acheron we shall have stayed our steps."
 Thereat, with shame-suffused and downcast eyes, and fearing lest my talking might annoy him, 80
 up to the river I abstained from speech.

Behold then, coming toward us in a boat,
 an aged man, all white with ancient hair,
 who shouted: "Woe to you, ye souls depraved!
 Give up all hope of ever seeing Heaven! 85
 I come to take you to the other shore, into eternal darkness, heat and cold.

And thou that yonder art, a living soul,
 withdraw thee from those fellows that are dead."
 But when he saw that I did not withdraw, 90
 he said: "By other roads and other ferries shalt thou attain a shore to pass across,
 not here; a lighter boat must carry thee."

To him my Leader: "Charon, be not vexed;
 thus is it yonder willed, where there is power 95
 to do what'er is willed; so ask no more!"

Thereat were quieted the woolly cheeks of that old boatman of the murky swamp, who round about his eyes had wheels of flame.
 Those spirits, though, who nude and weary were, 100 their color changed, and gnashed their teeth together, as soon as they had heard the cruel words.
 They kept blaspheming God, and their own parents,

the human species, and the place, and time,
and seed of their conception and their birth. 105
Then each and all of them drew on together, weeping aloud, to that accursèd shore which waits for every man that fears not God.

Charon, the demon, with his ember eyes makes beckoning signs to them, collects them all, 110 and with his oar beats whoso takes his ease.

Even as in autumn leaves detach themselves,
now one and now another, till their branch sees all its stripped off clothing on the ground;
so, one by one, the evil seed of Adam 115 cast themselves down that river-bank at signals, as doth a bird to its recalling lure.
Thus o'er the dusky waves they wend their way;
and ere they land upon the other side,
another crowd collects again on this. 120

“My son,” the courteous Teacher said to me,
“all those that perish in the wrath of God
from every country come together here;
and eager are to pass across the stream,
because Justice Divine so spurs them on, 125
that what was fear is turned into desire.
A good soul never goes across from hence;
if Charon, therefore, findeth fault with thee,
well canst thou now know what his words imply.”

The darkling plain, when this was ended, quaked
so greatly, that the memory of my terror bathes me even now with sweat. 130

The tear-stained ground gave forth a wind, whence flashed vermilion light which in me overcame all consciousness; 135 and down I fell like one whom sleep oërtakes.

Inferno IV

The First Circle. The Borderland

Unbaptized Worthies. Illustrious Pagans

A heavy thunder-clap broke the deep sleep within my head, so that I roused myself, as would a person who is waked by force;
and standing up erect, my rested eyes
I moved around, and with a steady gaze 5
I looked about to know where I might be.

Truth is I found myself upon the verge of pain's abysmal valley, which collects the thunder-roll of everlasting woes.
So dark it was, so deep and full of mist, 10
that, howsoëer I gazed into its depths, nothing at all did I discern therein.

“Into this blind world let us now descend!”

the Poet, who was death-like pale, began,
 "I will be first, and thou shalt second be." 15

And I, who of his color was aware, said: "How am I to come, if thou take fright, who 'rt wont to be my comfort when afraid?"

"The anguish of the people here below," he said to me, "brings out upon my face 20
 the sympathy which thou dost take for fear.
 Since our long journey drives us, let us go!"
 Thus he set forth, and thus he had me enter the first of circles girding the abyss.

Therein, as far as one could judge by list'ning, 25
 there was no lamentation, saving sighs which caused a trembling in the eternal air;
 and this came from the grief devoid of torture felt by the throngs, which many were and great,
 of infants and of women and of men. 30

To me then my good Teacher: "Dost not ask what spirits these are whom thou seest here?
 Now I would have thee know, ere thou go further,
 that these sinned not; and though they merits have,
 't is not enough, for they did not have baptism, 35
 the gateway of the creed believed by thee;
 and if before Christianity they lived,
 they did not with due worship honor God;
 and one of such as these am I myself. 40
 For such defects, and for no other guilt,
 we're lost, and only hurt to this extent,
 that, in desire, we live deprived of hope."

Great sorrow filled my heart on hearing this,
 because I knew of people of great worth,
 who in that Borderland suspended were. 45

"Tell me, my Teacher, tell me, thou my Lord,"
 I then began, through wishing to be sure about the faith which conquers every error;
 "came any ever, by his own deserts,
 or by another's, hence, who then was blest?" 50

And he, who understood my covert speech, replied: "To this condition I was come but newly, when I saw a Mighty One come here, crowned with the sign of victory. 55
 From hence He drew the earliest parent's shade, and that of his son, Abel, that of Noah,
 and Moses the law-giver and obedient;
 Abram the patriarch, and David king,
 Israel, with both his father and his sons,
 and Rachel, too, for whom he did so much, 60
 and many others; and He made them blest;
 and I would have thee know that, earlier than these, there were no human spirits saved."

Because he talked we ceased not moving on,

but all the while were passing through the wood, 65
 the wood, I mean, of thickly crowded shades.
 Nor far this side of where I fell asleep had we yet gone, when I beheld a fire, which overcame a hemisphere of gloom.
 Somewhat away from it we were as yet, 70
 but not so far, but I could dimly see that honorable people held that place.

“O thou that honorest both art and science, who are these people that such honor have,
 that it divides them from the others’ life?” 75

And he to me: “The honorable fame, which speaks of them in thy live world above,
 in Heaven wins grace, which thus advances them.”

And hereupon a voice was heard by me:
 “Do honor to the loftiest of poets! 80 his shade, which had departed, now returns.”
 And when the voice had ceased and was at rest,
 four mighty shades I saw approaching us;
 their looks were neither sorrowful nor glad.

My kindly Teacher then began to say: 85
 “Look at the one who comes with sword in hand before the three, as if their lord he were.
 Homer he is, the sovereign poet; Horace,
 the satirist, the one that cometh next;
 the third is Ovid, Lucan is the last. 90
 Since each of them in common shares with me
 the title which the voice of one proclaimed, they do me honor, and therein do well.”

Thus gathered I beheld the fair assembly 95
 of those the masters of the loftiest song, which soareth like an eagle o’er the rest.

Then, having talked among themselves awhile,
 they turned around to me with signs of greeting;
 and, when he noticed this, my Teacher smiled.
 And even greater honor still they did me, 100
 for one of their own company they made me,
 so that amid such wisdom I was sixth.
 Thus on we went as far as to the light, talking of things whereof is silence here becoming, even as speech was, where we spoke. 105
 We reached a noble Castle’s foot, seven times encircled by high walls, and all around defended by a lovely little stream.
 This last we crossed as if dry land it were;
 through seven gates with these sages I went in, 110
 and to a meadow of fresh grass we came.
 There people were with slow and serious eyes,
 and, in their looks, of great authority;
 they spoke but seldom and with gentle voice.
 We therefore to one side of it drew back 115 into an open place so luminous and high, that each and all could be perceived.

There on the green enamel opposite were shown to me the spirits of the great,
for seeing whom I glory in myself. 120

I saw Electra with companions many, of whom I knew both Hector and Aeneas,
and Caesar armed, with shining falcon eyes.
I saw Camilla with Penthesilea upon the other side, and King Latinus, 125 who with Lavinia, his own daughter, sat.
I saw that Brutus who drove Tarquin out,
Lucretia, Julia, Martia and Cornelia,
and, all alone, I saw the Saladin.

Then, having raised my brows a little higher, 130
the Teacher I beheld of those that know, seated amid a philosophic group.

They all look up to him, all honor him;
there Socrates and Plato I beheld,
who nearer than the rest are at his side; 135

Democritus, who thinks the world chance-born,
Diogenes, Anaxagoras and Thales,
Empedocles, Heraclitus, and Zeno;
of qualities I saw the good collector, 140

Dioscorides I mean; Orpheus I saw,
Tully and Livy, and moral Seneca;
Euclid, the geometer, and Ptolemy,
Hippocrates, Avicenna, Galen,
Averrhoès, who made the famous comment.

I cannot speak of all of them in full, 145
because my long theme drives me on so fast, that oft my words fall short of what I did.

The sixfold band now dwindles down to two;
my wise Guide leads me by a different path out of the calm into the trembling air; 150 and to a place I come, where naught gives light.

Inferno V

The Second Circle. Sexual Intemperance

The Lascivious and Adulterers

Thus from the first of circles I went down into the second, which surrounds less space,
and all the greater pain, which goads to wailing.

There Minos stands in horrid guise, and snarls;
inside the entrance he examines sins, 5
judges, and, as he girds himself, commits.

I mean that when an ill-born soul appears before him, it confesses itself wholly;
and thereupon that Connoisseur of sins perceives what place in Hell belongs to it, 10

and girds him with his tail as many times,
 as are the grades he wishes it sent down.
 Before him there are always many standing;
 they go to judgment, each one in his turn;
 they speak and hear, and then are downward hurled. 15

“O thou that comest to the inn of woe,” said Minos, giving up, on seeing me,
 the execution of so great a charge, “see how thou enter, and in whom thou put thy trust; let not the gate-way’s width deceive thee!” 20

To him my Leader: “Why dost thou, too, cry?
 Hinder thou not his fate-ordained advance;
 thus is it yonder willed, where there is power
 to do whate’er is willed; so ask no more!”

And now the woeful sounds of actual pain 25 begin to break upon mine ears; I now am come to where much wailing smiteth me.
 I reached a region silent of all light,
 which bellows as the sea doth in a storm,
 if lashed and beaten by opposing winds. 30
 The infernal hurricane, which never stops, carries the spirits onward with its sweep,
 and, as it whirls and smites them, gives them pain.
 Whene’er they come before the shattered rock,
 there lamentations, moans and shrieks are heard; 35
 there, cursing, they blaspheme the Power Divine.
 I understood that to this kind of pain are doomed those carnal sinners, who subject their reason to their sensual appetite.

And as their wings bear starlings on their way, 40
 when days are cold, in full and wide-spread flocks;
 so doth that blast the evil spirits bear;
 this way and that, and up and down it leads them;
 nor only doth no hope of rest, but none
 of lesser suffering, ever comfort them. 45

And even as cranes move on and sing their lays, forming the while a long line in the air;
 thus saw I coming, uttering cries of pain,
 shades borne along upon the aforesaid storm;
 I therefore said: “Who, Teacher, are the people 50
 the gloomy air so cruelly chastises?”

“The first of those of whom thou wouldst have news,”
 the latter thereupon said unto me,
 “was empress over lands of many tongues.
 To sexual vice so wholly was she given, 55
 that lust she rendered lawful in her laws,
 thus to remove the blame she had incurred.
 Semiramis she is, of whom one reads that she gave suck to Ninus, and became his wife; she held the land the Soldan rules. 60

The next is she who killed herself through love,

- and to Sichaesus' ashes broke her faith;
 the lustful Cleopatra follows her.
 See Helen, for whose sake so long a time of guilt rolled by, and great Achilles see, 65 who fought with love when at the end of life.
 Paris and Tristan see;" and then he showed me,
 and pointed out by name, a thousand shades
 and more, whom love had from our life cut off.
- When I had heard my Leader speak the names 70
 of ladies and their knights of olden times, pity o'ercame me, and I almost swooned.
 "Poet," I then began, "I'd gladly talk with those two yonder who together go,
 and seem to be so light upon the wind." 75
- "Thou'lt see thy chance when nearer us they are;"
 said he, "beseech them then by that same love which leadeth them along, and they will come."
- Soon as the wind toward us had bent their course.
 I cried: "O toil-worn souls, come speak with us, 80 so be it that One Else forbid it not!"
- As doves, when called by their desire, come flying with raised and steady pinions through the air to their sweet nest, borne on by their own will;
 so from the band where Dido is they issued, 85
 advancing through the noisome air toward us, so strong with love the tone of my appeal.
- "O thou benign and gracious living creature, that goest through the gloomy purple air to visit us, who stained the world blood-red; 90
 if friendly were the universal King, for thy peace would we pray to Him, since pity thou showest for this wretched woe of ours.
 Of whatsoever it may please you hear and speak, we will both hear and speak with you, 95
 while yet, as now it is, the wind is hushed.
 The town where I was born sits on the shore,
 whither the Po descends to be at peace together with the streams that follow him.
 Love, which soon seizes on a well-born heart, 100 seized him for that fair body's sake, whereof
 I was deprived; and still the way offends me.
 Love, which absolves from loving none that's loved,
 seized me so strongly for his love of me,
 that, as thou see'st, it doth not leave me yet. 105
 Love to a death in common led us on;
 Cain's ice awaiteth him who quenched our life."
 These words were wafted down to us from them.
- When I had heard those sorely troubled souls,
 I bowed my head, and long I held it low, 110
 until the Poet said: "What thinkest thou?"
 When I made answer I began: "Alas!

how many tender thoughts and what desire induced these souls to take the woeful step!"

I then turned back to them again and spoke, 115 and I began: "Thine agonies, Francesca, cause me to weep with grief and sympathy.
But tell me: at the time of tender sighs, whereby and how did Love concede to you that ye should know each other's veiled desires?" 120

And she to me: "There is no greater pain than to remember happy days in days of misery; and this thy Leader knows.
But if to know the first root of our love
so yearning a desire possesses thee, 125
I'll do as one who weepeth while he speaks.
One day, for pastime merely, we were reading of Launcelot, and how love o'erpowered him;
alone we were, and free from all misgiving.
Oft did that reading cause our eyes to meet, 130 and often take the color from our faces;
and yet one passage only overcame us.
When we had read of how the longed-for smile was kissed by such a lover, this one here, who nevermore shall be divided from me, 135
trembling all over, kissed me on my mouth.
A Gallehault the book, and he who wrote it!
No further in it did we read that day."

While one was saying this, the other spirit
so sorely wept, that out of sympathy 140
I swooned away as though about to die,
and fell as falls a body that is dead.

Inferno VI

The Third Circle. Intemperance in Food

Gluttons

On my return to consciousness, which closed before the kindred couple's piteous case, which utterly confounded me with grief,
new torments all around me I behold, and new tormented ones, where'er I move, 5
where'er I turn, and wheresoe'er I gaze.

In the third circle am I, that of rain eternal, cursèd, cold and burdensome;
its measure and quality are never new.
Coarse hail, and snow, and dirty-colored water 10 through the dark air are ever pouring down;
and foully smells the ground receiving them.

A wild beast, Cerberus, uncouth and cruel, is barking with three throats, as would a dog,
over the people that are there submerged. 15
Red eyes he hath, a dark and greasy beard,

a belly big, and talons on his hands;
 he claws the spirits, flays and quarters them.
 The rainfall causes them to howl like dogs;
 with one side they make shelter for the other;
 oft do the poor profaners turn about. 20

When Cerberus, the mighty worm, perceived us, his mouths he opened, showing us his fangs;
 nor had he any limb that he kept still. 25
 My Leader then stretched out his opened palms, and took some earth, and with his fists well filled,
 he threw it down into the greedy throats.
 And like a dog that, barking, yearns for food,
 and, when he comes to bite it, is appeased,
 since only to devour it doth he strain 30
 and fight; even such became those filthy faces of demon Cerberus, who, thundering, stuns
 the spirits so, that they would fain be deaf.

Over the shades the heavy rain beats down
 we then were passing, as our feet we set 35 upon their unreal bodies which seem real.
 They each and all were lying on the ground,
 excepting one, which rose and sat upright,
 when it perceived us pass in front of it.

“O thou that through this Hell art being led,”
 it said to me, “recall me, if thou canst;
 for thou, before I unmade was, wast made.” 40

And I to it: “The anguish thou art in perchance withdraws thee from my memory so,
 it doth not seem that thee I ever saw. 45
 But tell me who thou art, that in so painful
 a place art set, and to such punishment, that none, though greater, so repulsive is.”

And he to me: “Thy town, which is so full of envy that the bag o’erflows already, 50
 owned me when I was in the peaceful life.
 Ciaccio, you townsmen used to call me then;
 for my injurious fault of gluttony
 I’m broken, as thou seest, by the rain;
 nor yet am I, sad soul, the only one, 55
 for all these here are subject, for like fault, unto like pain.” Thereat he spoke no more.

“Thy trouble, Ciaccio,” I replied to him,
 “so burdens me that it invites my tears;
 but tell me, if thou canst, to what will come 60
 the citizens of our divided town;
 if any one therein is just; and tell me
 the reason why such discord hath assailed her.”

And he to me then: “After struggling long they’ll come to bloodshed, and the boorish party 65 will drive the other out with much offence.

Then, afterward, the latter needs must fall within three suns, and the other party rise, by help of one who now is 'on the fence.' 70
 A long time will it hold its forehead up, keeping the other under grievous weights,
 howe'er it weep therefor, and be ashamed.
 Two men are just, but are not heeded there;
 the three sparks that have set men's hearts on fire,
 are overweening pride, envy and greed." 75

Herewith he closed his tear-inspiring speech.
 And I to him: "I'd have thee teach me still,
 and grant the favor of some further talk.
 Farinàta and Tegghiàio, who so worthy were,
 Jàcopo Rusticùcci, Arrigo and Mosca, 80 and the others who were set on doing good, tell me where these are, and let me know of them;
 for great desire constraineth me to learn
 if Heaven now sweeten, or Hell poison them."

And he: "Among the blackest souls are these; 85
 a different fault weighs toward the bottom each;
 if thou descend so far, thou mayst behold them.
 But when in the sweet world thou art again,
 recall me, prithee, unto others' minds;
 I tell no more, nor further answer thee." 90

His fixed eyes thereupon he turned askance;
 a while he looked at me, then bowed his head,
 and fell therewith among the other blind.

Then said my Leader: "He'll not wake again on this side of the angel-trumpet's sound. 95
 What time the hostile Podestà shall come,
 each soul will find again its dismal tomb,
 each will take on again its flesh and shape,
 and hear what through eternity resounds."

We thus passed through with slowly moving steps 100
 the filthy mixture of the shades and rain, talking a little of the future life;
 because of which I said: "These torments, Teacher,
 after the Final Sentence will they grow,
 or less become, or burn the same as now." 105

And he to me: "Return thou to thy science, which holdeth that the more a thing is perfect,
 so much the more it feels of weal or woe.
 Although this cursèd folk shall nevermore arrive at true perfection, it expects 110 to be more perfect after, than before."

As in a circle, round that road we went,
 speaking at greater length than I repeat,
 and came unto a place where one descends;
 there found we Plutus, the great enemy. 115

Inferno VII*The Fourth Circle. Intemperance in WealthMisers and Prodigals. The Fifth Circle*

“Papè Satàn, papè Satàn, alèppè!”
 thus Plutus with his clucking voice began;
 that noble Sage, then, who knew everything,
 said, to encourage me: “Let not thy fear distress thee, for, whatever power he have,
 he’ll not prevent our going down this rock.” 5

Then to those swollen lips he turned around,
 and said: “Be silent, thou accursèd wolf;
 with thine own rage consume thyself within!
 Not causeless is our going to the bottom;
 there is it willed on high, where Michael wrought vengeance upon the arrogant rebellion.” 10

As sails, when swollen by the wind, fall down entangled, when the mast breaks; even so,
 down to the ground the cruel monster fell. 15

Into the fourth ditch we descended thus, advancing further o’er the woeful edge,
 which bags all evil in the universe.

Justice of God, alas! who heapeth up the many unheard of toils and pains I saw,
 and wherefore doth our sin torment us so? 20

As yonder o’er Charybdis doth the sea,
 which breaks against the one it runs to meet,
 so must the people dance a ring-dance here.
 I here saw folk, more numerous than elsewhere,
 on one side and the other, with great howls rolling big weights around by strength of chest;
 they struck against each other; then, right there
 each turned, and rolling back his weight, cried out:
 “Why keepest thou?” and “Wherefore throw away?” 25 30

They circled thus around the gloomy ring on either hand unto the point opposed, still shouting each to each their vile refrain;
 then each turned back, when through his own half-ring
 he had attained the other butting place. 35

And I, whose heart was well nigh broken, said:
 “Now, Teacher, show me who these people are,
 and tell me whether all these tonsured ones upon our left ecclesiastics were.”

And he replied to me: “They each and all were in their first life so squint-eyed in mind, that they with measure used no money there.
 Clearly enough their voices bark it forth,
 whene’er they reach the two points of the ring,
 where difference in fault unmateth them. 40 45

These churchmen were, who have no hairy covering upon their heads, and Popes and Cardinals, among whom avarice works its mastery.”

And I to him: “Among such men as these
I surely, Teacher, ought to recognize 50
a few, who by these sins polluted were.”

And he to me: “Thou shapest a vain thought;
the undiscerning life which made them foul,
now to all recognition makes them dark.
To these two shocks they’ll come eternally; 55
these from the sepulchre will rise again close-fisted; these, shorn of their very hair.
Ill-giving and ill-keeping took from them
the lovely world, and set them at this fray;

to qualify it I’ll not use fair words. 60
Now canst thou, son, behold the short-lived cheat of riches that are put in Fortune’s care,
and for whose sake the human race contends;
for, all the gold there is beneath the moon,
and all that was there once, could not avail 65
to make one of these weary spirits rest.”

“Teacher,” said I to him, “now tell me further:
what is this Fortune thou dost touch upon,
which hath the world’s good things thus in her claws?”

“O foolish creatures,” said he then to me. 70

“how great the ignorance which hurteth you!
I’d have thee swallow now my thought of her.
The One whose knowledge everything transcends,
so made the heavens, and so gave guides to them,
that every part on every other shines, 75
thus equally distributing the light;

likewise for worldly splendours He ordained a general minister and guide, to change, from time to time, the vain goods of the world from race to race, from one blood to another, 80 past all resistance by the minds of men;
wherefore, one people governs, and the other declines in power, according to her judgment, which hidden is, as in the grass a snake.

Your knowledge is not able to resist her; 85 foreseeing, she decides, and carries on her government, as theirs the other gods.
Her permutations have no truce at all;
necessity compels her to be swift;

hence oft it happens that a change occurs. 90

This is the one who is so often cursed even by those who ought to give her praise, yet give her blame amiss, and ill repute.

But she is blest, and gives no heed to that; 95
among the other primal creatures glad,
she turns her sphere, and blest enjoys herself.
But now to woe more piteous let’s descend;
now falls each star that rose when I set out,

and one is here forbidden too long a stay.”
 We crossed the circle to the other bank 100 over a bubbling stream, that poureth down along a ditch which from it takes its shape.
 Than purple-black much darker was its water;
 and we, accompanying its dusky waves,
 went down and entered on an uncouth path. 105
 A swamp it forms which hath the name of Styx, this dismal little brook, when it hath reached the bottom of the grey, malignant slopes.

And I, who was intensely gazing there,
 saw muddy people in that slimy marsh, 110
 all naked, and with anger in their looks.
 They struck each other, not with hands alone,
 but with their heads and chests, and with their feet,
 and rent each other piecemeal with their teeth.

Said the good Teacher: “Son, thou seest now 115
 the souls of those whom anger overcame;
 nay, more, I’d have thee certainly believe that ’neath the water there are folk who sigh,
 and make this water bubble at its surface,
 as, whereso’er it turn, thine eye reveals. 120 Stuck in the slime, they say: “Sullen we were in the sweet air that’s gladdened by the sun, bearing within us fumes of surliness;
 we now are sullen in the swamp’s black mire.”
 This hymn they gurgle down inside their throats, 125 because they cannot utter it with perfect speech.

And so we circled round the filthy fen
 a great arc ’tween the dry bank and the marsh, our eyes intent on those that swallow mud;
 and to a tower’s foot we came at last. 130

Inferno VIII

The Fifth Circle. Intemperance in Indignation

The Wrathful and Sullen. Styx. The City of Dis

I say, continuing, that long before we ever reached the lofty tower’s foot, our eyes had upward toward its summit turned,
 because of two small flames we there saw placed,
 and of another answering from so far, 5
 that hardly could mine eyesight make it out.
 Then to all wisdom’s Sea I turned around,
 and said: “What sayeth this? and what replies that other fire? and who are they that made it?”

And he to me: “Upon the filthy waves 10
 thou canst already see what is expected, unless the marsh’s fog conceal it from thee.”

Bowstring nêr shot an arrow from itself,
 that sped away so swiftly through the air,
 as I beheld a slender little boat 15

come toward us through the water thereupon,
under the guidance of a single boatman,
who shouted: "Thou art caught now, wicked soul!"

"O Phlegyas, Phlegyas," said my Master then,
"this time thou criest out in vain! No longer shalt thou have us, than while we cross the swamp." 20

Like one who listens to a great deceit practiced upon him, and who then resents it, so Phlegyas in his stifled wrath became. 25
My Leader then went down into the boat, and had me enter after him; and only when I was in it did it laden seem.
Soon as my Leader and I were in the boat,
the ancient prow goes on its way, and cuts
more water than with others is its wont. 30

While we were speeding through the stagnant trench, one stood before me filled with mud, and said:
"Now who art thou, that comest ere thy time?"

And I to him: "Even though I come, I stay not;
but who art thou, that art become so foul?" 35
He answered: "As thou see'st, I'm one who weeps."

Then I to him: "In sorrow and in grief
mayst thou, accursèd spirit, here remain, for thee I know, all filthy though thou be!"

Then toward the boat he stretched out both his 40 hands; my wary Teacher, therefore, thrust him off, saying: "Away there with the other dogs!"
And with his arms he then embraced my neck, and kissed my face, and said: "Blessèd be she 45
who pregnant was with thee, indignant soul!
He was a haughty person in the world;
nor is there any goodness which adorns
his memory; hence his shade is furious here.
How many now up yonder think themselves 50 great kings, who here shall be like pigs in mire, leaving behind them horrible contempt!"

And I said: "Teacher, I'd be greatly pleased to see him get a ducking in this broth, before we issue from the marshy lake."

And he to me: "Thou shalt be satisfied 55 before the shore reveal itself to thee;
't is meet that thou enjoy a wish like that."

Soon after this I saw the muddy people making such havoc of him, that therefor
I still give praise and render thanks to God. 60
They all were shouting: "At Filippo Argenti!"
the spirit of the wrathful Florentine turning, meanwhile, his teeth against himself.

- We left him there; of him I therefore tell no more; but on mine ears there smote a wail, 65
hence I, intent ahead, unbar mine eyes.
The kindly Teacher said: "Now, son, at last the town, whose name is Dis, is drawing near with all its host of burdened citizens."
- And I said: "Teacher, clearly I behold 70
its mosques already in that valley there, vermilion, as if issuing out of fire."
- And he to me: "The eternal fire within which keeps them burning, maketh them look red, as thou perceivest in this nether Hell." 75
- Thereat we came inside the trenches deep,
which fortify that region comfortless;
to me its walls appeared to be of iron.
Not without going first a long way round,
we came to where the boatman cried aloud, 80 to us: "Get out, for here the entrance is!"
- More than a thousand o'er the gates I saw of those that from the heavens had rained, who, vexed, were saying: "Who is he, that, without death,
is going through the kingdom of the dead?" 85
And my wise Teacher thereupon made signs of wishing to have private talk with them.
- Their great disdain they somewhat checked, and said:
"Come thou alone, and let him go his way,
who with such daring entered this domain. 90
Let him retrace alone his foolish road,
and try it, if he can; for thou shalt here remain, that him so dark a land didst show."
- Think, Reader, whether I lost heart on hearing those cursèd words; for I did not believe 95 that I should e'er return on earth again.
- "O my dear Leader, who hast made me safe more than seven times, and extricated me from serious dangers which I had to face, forsake me not," said I, "when so undone! 100
If further progress be denied to us,
let us at once retrace our steps together."
- That Lord then, who had brought me thither, said:
"Be not afraid; for none can take from us
our passage, since by such an One 't is given! 105
But thou, await me here, and with good hope nourish and comfort thou thy weary soul, for I'll not leave thee in the nether world."
- Thus goes his way, and there abandons me,
my tender Father, and I in doubt remain; 110
for Yes and No contend within my head.

I could not hear what he proposed to them;
 but with them there he did not long remain,
 for each in rivalry ran back within. 115
